A portly, good-tempered female—doubtless the landlady—came hurrying into the kitchen, and no sooner did she catch sight of the young girl than she uttered a loud cry.

"Mercy on us, and save us!" she cried. "Why, as I live, it's Miss Danville!"

The words produced an immediate consternation upon all around, and it was evident by their manner that the name was familiar enough to every one of them.

In particular, one, a young man poorly clad, yet having a noble, ingenuous countenance, sprang forward from the rest and, with a cry of anguish, threw himself down beside the senseless girl.

"Lizzy—Lizzy," he cried—"dear Lizzy, awake—awake! I have returned!"

But his words and the no doubt well-known tones of his voice failed to produce the least effect, and he uttered another anguished cry.

The landlady, however, by this time had recovered her presence of mind, and, calling her domestics around her, the young girl was carried from the room, and means taken to restore her if possible to consciousness.

No sooner had Dick placed the young girl down in safety than the reaction came upon him.

His strength suddenly departed, and he sank down upon a seat almost fainting.

This can scarcely be wondered at considering the amount of exertion he had gone through, and the length of time that had elapsed since he had partaken of any food.

One of the persons seated in the kitchen placed a glass of hot spirits to Dick's lips, who drank almost unconsciously.

The result, however, was soon apparent.

He again opened his eyes to their usual extent, and recovered from the death-like feeling that had assailed him.

The young man who had called upon Miss Danville by her Christian name bent over Dick, full of concern for his condition.

"May Heaven bless you, sir," he said, "for the act you have done to-night! I cannot thank you as I should—my voice fails me!"

"That's enough," said Dick. "If you wish to show your appreciation of it, get me something substantial in the shape of food, for I am almost dead from hunger."

This was a demand instantly and easily complied with, and soon Dick had a most tempting and appetising repast spread before him.

The young man quitted the room, anxious to learn with what success the effort had been met to reanimate the young girl.

No sooner had the door closed behind him than Dick was besieged with many eager questions, and finding that the curiosity of all was greatly excited, he took the wisest and quickest means of satisfying it, which was to relate what had occurred in as few words as he possibly could.

In return, he asked whether anyone could furnish him with any further particulars.

"Yes," said the landlord, drawing a long whiff of smoke from his pipe, "I fancy you are about the only one beneath this roof who could not give all her history. Poor girl! we are all sorry for her, and wonder how her own flesh and blood could treat her as they have."

"If it would not take you long," said Dick, "could you give me a brief account of what you know, for I confess my curiosity is fully roused?"

"With pleasure," said the landlord. "You must know, then, sir, that this young girl is the only daughter of the richest man in this part of the country. He is generally called Squire Danville. He is a justice of the peace, and I know not what else beside.

"It is pretty generally whispered—and I daresay with good truth—that he never was very fond either of his wife or his daughter, and for this reason:

"His whole hopes were fixed upon a son, to whom he believed he should be able to leave his vast wealth and ancient possessions; but this daughter came into the world, and, with an unnatural feeling difficult to comprehend, he looked upon her as an object which had defeated his happiness.

"He visited his wrath, too, upon his wife, as if she could help what had occurred; but, being of a weak and patient spirit, she bore all in silence until she died.

"This girl, Miss Danville, grew up almost unrecognised and unthought of by her father, but her gentle, winning ways made her a favourite with all who knew her.

"She was loved, while her father was feared and hated.

"When very young, an attachment sprung up between her and the nephew of the housekeeper, a young, true-hearted, courageous, good-looking fellow, who, I believe, loves the very ground she treads on."

"The same that has just quitted the room, I suppose?" interrupted Dick.

"Yes, the same.

"Well, how long this attachment went on, or how long it would have continued, is very hard to say; but a certain fact recalled to the squire's brain that he had a child—a daughter.

"This fact was, that Squire Bartlett——"

At the mention of this name, Dick could not help giving a slight start, it came upon him so unexpectedly.

The landlord did not fail to notice it, for he said:

"You know this squire, then?"

"Scarcely," said Dick. "I have seen him once, that's all. But the name sounded familiar, and surprised me."

"Well, then, as I was saying, this Squire Bartlett, who is also very rich, possesses a large estate, which joins that belonging to Squire Danville.

"He has an only son—a dissolute, mean-spirited, cowardly hound, who, thank goodness, has not been much in this part of the country; and, if all I have heard about him is the truth, he is a wretch not fit to live.

"The two squires, as you may guess, were great friends, and it was nothing more than natural, I suppose, that they should talk upon the subject of their properties adjoining each other in the way they did.

"In brief, a kind of compact or agreement was made between them that their children should marry, so that, in the future, the whole possessions would become one.

"They never thought of consulting the young folks in any way, but the blow came upon Miss Danville like a thunderbolt.

"Her father ordered her into his presence, and, tremblingly, she obeyed, feeling as though she had committed some great crime, and was about to be led into the presence of her judge.

"She heard her father express his intentions with feelings which I cannot describe.

"He took scarcely any notice of her, but bade her prepare to receive her future husband at once.

"Great difference was now made in the manner in which she was treated.

"She was now dressed in a manner suitable to her father's rank, and allowed to sit at the dinner-table with him.

"She was quickly brought face to face with young Bartlett, and I don't wonder that she should immediately conceive an utter aversion for him.

"She loathed the very sight of him, and took so little care to disguise her feelings, that all noted the change in her aspect, particularly the young man, who ground his teeth, and turned livid with rage; while he determined, no matter at what odds, to have his revenge upon her.

"She refused most positively to become his wife, and her father broke out into a storm of passion the like of which she had never before known.

"He was furious to think that, not content with having caused him one great disappointment in life, she was now endeavouring to cause him another.

"Such conduct he considered ungrateful and base in the extreme, but he determined not to be baulked this time.

"You may guess some one who was soon at hand whispered in his ears some particulars of the behaviour of his daughter and the housekeeper's nephew towards each other.

"Inquiry served to show that the whisper was correct, and he drove the young man ignominiously forth.

"Since then he has been reduced to great straits, for the housekeeper was dismissed also.

"The two squires, and young Bartlett as well, were all eager in the extreme that the marriage should take place; but Miss Danville showed a firmness and a spirit of resistance which had never been expected, and which filled them with surprise.

"But her father determined to carry things with a high hand.

"I know he had her confined like an ordinary prisoner, and scarcely allowed her enough to eat and drink.

"The poor girl pined and sorrowed, but all in vain; nothing would turn him from his purpose.

"To-morrow is the day fixed for the solemnisation of the marriage, and I can only suppose that, driven to extremities, she somehow managed to escape; and, feeling utterly wretched—perhaps in a delirium—threw herself into the water as you saw, in order to put an end to that existence which ought to be to her a blessing, and not a curse."

CHAPTER CMXXII.

DICK TURPIN FINDS HIS PATH STILL BESET WITH DIFFICULTIES.

"It is a sad enough story," said Dick Turpin, "and I for one am very sorry for the lovers. I cannot consider them in any way to blame."

"Neither can I," assented the landlord; "and although I am a tenant under the squire, yet I hold this place under a lease which, I fancy, will not expire before his death."

"So you feel yourself independent of him?"

"Yes, quite; and if I could do anything to make these two young folks happy, I would do it gladly."

"So would I."

A murmur of assent went round the room.

Clearly they were all of one way of thinking.

Dick Turpin had been accommodated with a very comfortable seat nearest to the fire, and while he had partaken of his meal, which he washed down with some of the very best ale in the landlord's cellar, he had got quite dry.

He was now anxious to continue his journey, for midnight was rapidly approaching.

It was just as he had made up his mind to rise and take his departure that the door of the kitchen was opened again, and the housekeeper's nephew made his appearance.

There was a great degree of bashfulness, not to say awkwardness, in his manner, and he glanced with some timidity into the faces of all present.

He evidently wished to say something, yet lacked the courage; and the opportunity to speak was quickly lost, for he was immediately questioned as to the state of Miss Danville.

"She has quite recovered," he said, in a sad tone, "but seems quite delirious. She could not have been in her right mind when she attempted to destroy herself, nor is she now."

"But she will soon be better, I trust," said the landlord.

"I hope so. But, then, that brings me to what I wished to say. I believe that all here present know my story, and are my friends?"

"We are—we are!" was the response that came from every lip.

"Well, then, my friends, since you admit yourselves to be such, give me your advice. I am young, and have had but little experience in the world. In what way shall I act for the best?"

This was a point open to a great deal of debate, and Dick Turpin was not slow to perceive it.

Nor was he any slower in making up his mind as to what he should say.

"I have saved the lady," he began, "and therefore consider that I have a good right to some voice in the matter."

"Yes, yes, certainly," murmured several.

"Well, then, my advice is simple, short, plain, and easy to follow. It is, young sir, that you go at once to Miss Danville, and persuade her to fly with you. Do not hesitate or scruple; you have a right to consult your own happiness, and so has she. Her father, by his conduct, has forfeited all right and title to the name; think nothing of him. I wish I could help you further than I can, but, unfortunately, it is impossible. However, take my advice, which is all that I can give. Place as great a distance between yourself and this inn as you can, in the shortest possible space of time."

Dick Turpin spoke warmly, and his words found an echo in the breasts of all present.

Probably they would have hesitated to give such clear and straightforward advice, yet when it was thus given by another they could not withhold their approbation of it.

A flush of colour mounted into the young man's cheeks, as he said:

"You fill me with joy, but I feel that such conduct on my part would be wrong—reprehensible in the highest degree."

"No, no—not a bit," said Turpin. "Procure Miss Danville's consent—and if I understand the case at all it will not be wanting—and then, as soon as you have it, off and away. When you are married, you will be master of the situation."

After a few more hesitating remarks, the young man withdrew, and as soon as he had gone Dick rose up from his seat.

"Are you going?" said the landlord.

"Yes, pressing business calls me, and I cannot linger. I have already stayed too long."

"And I must go too," said another voice.

A man whom Dick had scarcely noticed rose from an obscure corner near the fireplace.

He was a stout, well-built, burly-looking fellow, with closely-cropped hair, a thick, red, bull-like neck, and an altogether animal expression, if we may be allowed to use such a term.

Yet Dick looked at his well-developed form with some admiration.

The man's appearance, joined to his peculiar costume, enabled Dick to decide positively as to his calling.

He was a regular trained boxer or prize-fighter.

As soon as he had spoken, the landlord said:

"Very well, Mr. Reynalds—I will give orders for your pony to be put in at once."

"Do, and ask that lazy fellow of yours to be quick for once in his life, if such a thing is possible."

With this, Dick conceived he had nothing to do; but being, in a manner of speaking, interrupted by this stranger, he had paused.

Now, however, he began to take his leave.

But Mr. Reynalds came forward again.

"Beg your pardon, sir," he said, bluntly, and with genuine John Bull freedom, "but I like your pluck and your ways, though you are a stranger to me I am going some miles to-night, and if you happen to be travelling my way, why, I shall be glad of your company."

Dick Turpin said a few words expressive of his thanks for this kind offer, and while he was uttering them he was debating in his own mind whether he should accept of the invitation or not.

Certainly, as time had been lost, it would be an advantage, should Mr. Reynalds be travelling wards Somefield, to share his vehicle with him.

But, somehow or other, a presentiment of danger came over Dick, and he felt impelled to decline.

The feeling, however, was one of which he felt ashamed, and so he banished it.

"I am journeying north from here," he said.

"So am I," returned the prize-fighter. "May I ask how far you are going?"

"To Somefield."

"Somefield?" he repeated. "Ah! I am not going quite so far as that, but within a couple of miles or so of it. Did you come here on foot?"

"Yes."

"Then you had a long walk before you—that's all I can say. However, if you are willing to take half my gig, and ride with me as far as I am going, you are heartily welcome to do so."

"I am much obliged," said Dick; "and accept the offer with great pleasure. I am much obliged to you for it."

"Nay, nay, don't mention it; it isn't worth a word of thanks; and perhaps you would oblige me still further by taking one more glass before we part; we shall have time, for I know what a long-winded rascal the ostler is."

This offer, after some little pressing, Dick Turpin accepted.

Two farewell glasses were brought, and disposed of, and by that time word was brought that the horse and gig were ready at the door.

Once more bidding adieu, Dick and the prize-fighter departed.

On going out of the front door of the inn, Dick perceived a small, well-built pony harnessed to a light little gig, with large wheels that seemed built expressly for speed.

"There's a turn out, sir," said the prize-fighter, with perhaps pardonable pride—"there's a turn out, sir! Fit for any prince in the world! The lightest, best-made gig, and the fastest pony to be found within a hundred miles!"

"Very likely," said Dick, as he followed his companion's example, and climbed into the vehicle—"very likely."

Scarcely had he taken his seat than the prize-fighter, snatching hold of the reins, uttered a peculiar shout.

It was clearly one which the pony perfectly understood, for it started off at a most tremendous pace, and in a few moments the inn was left far behind.

"Don't she go rarely?" said Mr. Reynalds, addressing Dick, and breaking the silence. "Did you ever ride behind such a one?"

"I can't say I ever did. You travel a good deal, I suppose?"

"Yes. I am mostly knocking about the country—first in one place, then in another. Perhaps you know me, sir, though you are a stranger to me?"

"No—I can't say that I do."

"Well, then, my name is Reynalds—you heard the landlord say so—Reynalds, the prize-fighter, I am generally called."

"I have heard of you," said Dick, "though I little thought I should make acquaintance with you so strangely."

"Curious things do come about, and this is one of them But I am tired of this life; I have made up my mind not to fight any more."

"Indeed?"

"Yes, I think I can manage tolerably well without it"

"You have been fortunate, then—made money?"

"Well, yes, fairish; but I have a little speculation under hand at the present moment which I have an idea will cause me but little trouble, and the net gain will be immense."

"I hope you will be successful," said Dick—"I hope so with all my heart."

"Do you indeed?"

"Yes. But why did you speak in that strange tone?"

"Oh, did I? Then I meant nothing—nothing at all, of course. But we are rolling along rarely, are we not?"

"Yes, we are."

"You see those twinkling lights yonder? That's where I shall stop? Somefield, as I told you, lies between two and three miles beyond."

"Then we shall soon part company?"

"Yes, I think that very likely."

"But," exclaimed Dick, "you are pulling up; what's that for?"

"This," was the prize-fighter's reply, as he let fall the reins and clutched Dick tightly by the throat—"this! I know you! Give in—it's no use to struggle, Dick Turpin, you are my prisoner, and I will have the whole of the reward!"

CHAPTER CMXXIII.

DICK TURPIN HAS A LIFE-AND-DEATH STRUGGLE WITH THE PRIZE-FIGHTER.

This attack was so sudden and unexpected that the highwayman had been thrown completely off his guard, and before he could well make out what had happened he was overpowered.

"Now I have you," said Mr. Reynolds. "And perhaps you understand the little speculation to which I referred. In two more minutes we shall be in the next town, and all will bear witness how I bring you in a prisoner, captured by my own unaided exertions!"

Pressing Dick's throat still tighter with one hand, the prize-fighter removed the other, and placed it in his pocket, doubtless with the intention of drawing forth something with which he would be able to secure his prisoner.

Dick Turpin seized that moment to make an effort of resistance.

He had been gradually summoning up all his powers, for he knew the struggle would be no trifling one.

The prize-fighter swore most fearfully, for he imagined his object had been accomplished.

But he found each moment that Dick appeared to grow stronger, and, adept as he was at wrestling and feats of strength, he felt that, for once in his life, he had encountered some one worthy of being called his match.

A struggle of the most furious character now took place in the narrow precincts of the gig.

Both had obtained a good hold, and it would have been difficult for anyone to have decided as to which would prove the victor.

No one was near, however, to note the different phases of the conflict.

But the two men fought none the less desperately on that account.

Suddenly, the prize-fighter, urged to desperation by disappointment and the peril of his position—for he felt Dick was obtaining the mastery over him—uttered again that peculiar cry which was the signal for the pony to set itself in motion.

Nor on this occasion was the signal disregarded.

With a bound that almost threw them both out of the vehicle into the road, the pony started off, terrified by the noise behind it.

Dick guessed at once the purpose of the prize-fighter, and it made him fully conscious of the desperate character of the man with whom he had to deal.

His object was to run the risk of the danger, and make his horse enter the town just before them, when doubtless he would easily obtain assistance.

It is true this would not enable him to lay claim to the whole of this reward, but he felt he would rather forego the whole of it than that Dick should escape him.

The highwayman dared not turn his attention to the horse in the least, nor put one hand to seize the reins, as such a course would have given his opponent the advantage.

Altogether heedless, then, of where the terrified beast was going, or what obstructions lay in his path, Dick bent the whole of his energies to overcoming his antagonist.

The prize-fighter felt himself getting gradually wasted, but he still held on tenaciously.

He knew the town was now within a few yards of them, and he trusted in being able to retain his prisoner until then.

Dick knew this well, and guessed why he continued to struggle so fiercely.

Cold drops of perspiration started out upon his forehead, for he could not close his eyes to the fact that he was in very imminent danger indeed of being captured.

On went the horse at a more furious speed than ever, striking sparks from the hard ground with his hoofs as he went.

Hitherto he had kept directly in the middle of the road, and, providing he continued to do this, and did not abate his speed, there was just the possibility that he would get through the town almost before anyone was aware of what was the matter.

This was a frail hope to cling to, but it was better than none at all.

Dick did not dare to think of what a trifle would bring their headlong course to a stop.

The sudden turning of a corner, the approach of any other vehicle, or, indeed, the slightest obstruction in their way, and then most surely they would go down with a crash.

The next moment the lights of the town flashed before Dick's eyes.

The prize-fighter saw them, and tried to shout for succour.

But Dick's pressure on his windpipe was so great that he could only give vent to a gurgling sound.

The street was clear.

Several people, though, were standing about here and there, gazing with amazement at the strange sight that flitted past them almost before they knew what it was.

The market-place was reached, and passed, and Dick began to think that he should be fortunate enough to ride completely into the open country once more.

The prize-fighter also had this fear, for he changed his tactics.

In his rage, he felt altogether indifferent as to the amount of danger which might befall himself, and so he struggled furiously to fall over one side of the gig into the roadway, endeavouring, of course, to drag Dick Turpin with him.

The consequence of such a fall might perhaps have been death to both of them, but for this the prize-fighter did not care—death was preferable to being vanquished.

And now, indeed, the hardest portion of the struggle had arrived, for hitherto the prize-fighter had endeavoured to consult his own safety as far as possible, and his struggle had been more to overcome the highwayman and bind him.

Now it was almost more than Dick could do to prevent him from throwing himself into the road.

Could he have done so, and remained in the vehicle himself, all would have been well, comparatively speaking, though his danger then would have been considered appalling by most persons.

Dick felt that he was being drawn slowly but surely nearer to the edge of the gig.

He felt that in another moment nothing could save them from falling over.

Rendered desperate by his position, he took a desperate course to save himself.

With great suddenness he released his hold upon his antagonist, and at the same instant clenched both his fists and struck him two hard blows.

The man's grasp perceptibly relaxed.

But Dick followed up the blows by others.

The prize-fighter tried, but in vain, to obtain another grasp of his adversary.

But Dick eluded him, then dealt one more blow of so decisive a character that it put a complete termination to the contest.

With a rush and a hideous crash the prize-fighter fell over the wheel of the gig into the roadway.

To what extent he was injured Dick had no means of guessing, for such was the prodigious rate at which the pony was going, that his foe was in a moment out of sight.

Dick drew a long breath of thankfulness for this escape, and then had to settle down to face a danger scarcely less alarming.

The pony was now completely maddened, and Dick questioned whether any means could be adopted for checking his career.

The reins had dropped, and how to regain them was a mystery.

While going so swiftly, it seemed the height of madness to attempt to leap out of the vehicle, and allow the creature to take its own course.

Yet Dick felt this was what he would be compelled to do.

Just then his foot touched against something, and he stooped down to examine it more closely.

To his joy he found it was the rein, which had fallen over both ends of the dash-board of the gig, and so had remained secure.

Seizing hold of it, Dick began slowly but firmly to pull it tight.

But the horse seemed altogether heedless of the pressure of the bit.

Dick knew that his tremendous pace could not be checked all at once, but he hoped to do so by degrees.

His chief concern was to keep in the middle of the highway.

Tighter and tighter he pulled the reins, and yet tighter still, and he had at length the satisfaction of perceiving that the horse's speed perceptibly diminished.

He bent forward, and pulled again with his whole strength, which proved, unfortunately, too great for the strength of the reins themselves.

With a sudden snap the leather parted, and the frantic animal, again feeling his head at liberty, and chafing under the restraint he had just endured, flew onwards again, if possible at greater speed.

Dick now had clearly no resource but to run the risk of descending from the vehicle, and, after a moment's consideration, he determined to do so by lowering himself over the back.

Climbing over the seat, and clinging tightly to the scroll iron-work at the back, he lowered himself down until his feet almost touched the ground.

It required, even then, a great effort of courage to let go.

But Dick did so, and though he strove to save himself from falling, he failed to do so, and reached the ground with most unpleasant violence.

For a few seconds all the breath was knocked out of his body, but he seemed to be recovered by hearing a tremendous crash.

Raising himself up a little, he looked in advance, and then saw that one wheel of the gig had come in contact with a post, after which the vehicle seemed to vanish as though by magic, while the pony, with portions of the wreck clinging to his harness, continued his mad career.

CHAPTER CMXXIV.

DICK TURPIN TAKES REFUGE IN A TREE, BUT FINDS HE IS BY NO MEANS OUT OF DANGER.

Dick Turpin struggled to his feet, and wiped his face, which had not escaped injury by his fall.

He had good cause indeed for congratulating himself upon having made up his mind to quit the gig when he did.

Had he remained only a few moments longer the chance would have been lost, and he could scarcely have escaped with life had he been seated in the vehicle when it came into such violent contact with the post.

Dick's brain was still confused, and he stood for some time in the road in a strange, dreamy condition.

He was startled, however, by hearing behind the sounds of horses' hoofs beating rapidly on the hard road, and at the very same moment he also perceived in the distance before him two faint, glimmering lights, which, from their distance apart, evidently proceeded from a stage-coach, or some other vehicle carrying lamps.

Dick started at once into life and energy.

"The prize-fighter has given the alarm," he muttered

[THE OFFICERS TAKE EFFECTUAL MEASURES TO DISLODGE DICK TURPIN FROM THE TREES.]

—"that's quite certain. Perhaps, after all, he was not much injured by his frightful fall—at any rate, they are coming, and it must be after me!"

He paused and wondered what step he should take to secure his own safety.

He remembered that he was on foot, while his pursuers were tolerably well mounted.

Therefore flight seemed a thing altogether out of the question.

No matter how fleet of foot he might be, in the end he must inevitably be overtaken.

Moreover, he felt in no condition for making use of his running powers, for he began to feel now more acutely than he had at first how much he had been bruised and shaken by falling.

On both sides of the road tall trees were growing, most of them with trunks many feet in circumference, and with branches stretching far and wide in every direction.

"I may be able to conceal myself in one of those trees," he thought—"at any rate, I will try. They cannot see me, I feel assured, and it would take them a long time to examine these trees, one by one in succession, supposing they had a suspicion that I had taken refuge in one of them.

While speaking these words, Dick had fixed his eyes upon one particular tree, which he determined to select as his hiding-place.

It was one that afforded several facilities for climbing.

Scrambling up the bank at the side of the road, on which the hedge was planted, he managed, by reaching up his arms to their full extent, to grasp a stout horizontal bough.

To raise himself by the aid of his hands and feet was now quite easy, and in less than a moment he had ascended half-way up the tree, and had ensconced himself as a spot where the branches and twigs seemed to grow thickest.

Here he remained sitting perfectly still, and waiting, not without great anxiety, to ascertain what would happen next.

The trampling of the horses' feet in one direction, and the rattling of wheels in another now grew much plainer than before, and, glancing down through the interstices of the trees, Dick again perceived the shining lights.

Directly afterwards a body of mounted men galloped past.

But upon reaching the spot where the gig had crashed against the post they came to a halt.

"Hullo!" said a voice, "he's reached the end of his race, that's certain! My eyes, what a smash!"

He pointed as he spoke to the different fragments of the gig that were strewn in all directions over the roadway.

"I wonder where the horse is?" said a voice. "Do you think he has managed to get on to the back of it and galloped off? He's a desperate character, you know, and might have done such a thing."

"Well, we shall soon know that, I think, for here comes something or other."

"What is it—the stage-coach?"

"No, no," said another voice—"not the stage-coach; it is no doubt the mail-cart."

"Yes—yes, to be sure! And if it is, the driver and the guard will be able to tell us whether a man has galloped past them."

"So they will."

A moment's silence took place.

Although this conversation took place at some distance down the road below the spot where Dick was hidden, yet he was able to hear distinctly every word of it, for the night air was very still, and what little wind there was wafted the sounds towards him.

"Hoi—hoi!" cried one of the mounted police officers. "Stop—stop, will you? Pull up!"

The driver of the mail-cart stopped his panting horses somewhat suddenly, and, in a gruff voice, demanded:

"What's the matter?"

"Why, there's a smash here—do you see? And just tell us whether you have seen a man mounted on a pony gallop past you?"

"No, no," answered the driver—"we've not seen that! But we have seen a pony, with a couple of shafts dangling at its sides, gallop down the road yonder as though it was mad."

"And there was no one on its back?"

"No, not exactly," said the driver, with a grin. "I should like to see the man that would attempt such a thing."

"Well, we're after Dick Turpin!" said the officer who had before spoken.

"What?" cried the driver of the mail-cart, in some alarm. "You don't mean to say he's on this road, do you?"

"Yes, he is, or was a short time since. Why, do you know, he got up into a gentleman's gig and, after having robbed him, bundled him out neck and crop into the road. It's a thousand wonders that he escaped with his life, and even now the gentleman lies in a very dangerous state."

"You don't mean it?"

"It's a fact."

"But when did it happen?"

"Only a few minutes ago."

The driver rolled his eyes fearfully as he asked:

"But what did Turpin do?"

"Why, drove off in the gentleman's gig, to be sure, as if the very devil was behind him. We came on in pursuit, and here, you see, it seems he met with a little mishap while going at such a furious rate."

"Yes, it certainly looks like it. But where is he?"

"That's just what I want to know. I fancied he might have got on the horse's back and galloped down the road; but, as it appears he has not done that, why, I think if we look about here we shall find him."

"Yes," said the guard, "depend upon it he could not be in the gig while it went all to smash like this without being hurt a bit. He won't get far away, take my word for that!"

"Jim's right," said the driver. "You may depend upon it he's hiding somewhere close at hand; I shouldn't wonder if the rascal isn't listening to every word we say."

At these words the officers faced about and ran against each other, producing great confusion.

"We'll search!" said the one in command. "Now, my lads, let us look about us. It's ten to one, hiding in some ditch or other."

"No," said the guard, emphatically, "it's my belief that he'd scramble up into one of those trees; it could be managed easily enough. When once there, who could see him?"

The officers looked up and shook their heads wisely as they beheld the dense foliage of the trees.

"Now," said the guard, "I'll tell you what—I've an idea—a grand idea."

"What is it?"

"Why, if he's up in one o' them trees it will be very hard to find out which one it is, won't it?"

"Yes, very," said the chief officer. "We might fire a bullet into one of them; but I'll warrant he'd have the good sense to remain quite still—I'll warrant he would stand fire."

"Yes, from a pistol," said the guard, "because he would think there was a good chance of one bullet missing him. But how about this little weapon, eh?—what do you think of this?"

From the leather case beside the mail-cart he produced a large-sized carbine of the kind then made use of by the military.

"Yes," continued the guard, as he jumped down off the steps of the mail-cart, "I rather think this will be the ticket. And, mark me, if Dick Turpin is up in one of those trees I'll show him something he has never thought of in all his life."

"Is it loaded?" said the chief officer.

"Yes, of course it's loaded. The priming mayn't be just the thing; but, however, I'll soon put that right."

As he spoke, the guard threw up the pan, shook out the grains of powder in it, and placed in some fresh.

"Now," he said, "I am ready, and this gun has in it a rattling good charge, I can assure you."

"Stop a bit," said the chief officer. "Are you going to fire up in the trees with it?"

"Of course I am!"

"But how do you know which one he is in?"

"I will soon find that out," said the guard, as he put the carbine up to his shoulder. "I will begin with this one."

"Stop—stop!"

"What for?"

"Why, you know," said the officer, "that I must call him first to surrender."

"Oh, yes—certainly; I forgot."

The police officer then stepped a little more into the middle of the roadway, and, pitching his voice in a higher key, exclaimed:

"Dick Turpin, we, his Majesty's officers of police, have good reason for believing that you have concealed yourself in one of these trees, and in the King's name we call upon you to surrender, and if, after having called upon you three times——"

"Blow it!" said the guard, impatiently, "be quick! Don't you know I am in a hurry?"

"You be d—d!" said the officer, angrily. "Who told you to interfere? Don't you think I know my duty better than you do?"

"Oh yes, that's right enough," said the guard, in a more mollified tone: "but you are so awfully long-winded."

The chief officer evidently thought something of the guard's carbine, or he would not have smothered his resentment so easily.

Once more looking up into the trees, he said:

"Dick Turpin, I call upon you to surrender, and warn you if you do not that we shall fire, and the consequences will then be on your own head!"

A profound silence followed this speech, that would have been perfect save for the incessant rustling of the trees.

"Dick Turpin, for the second time I call upon you to surrender!"

Again there was a deep silence.

"For the third time," said the chief officer, in a louder voice than before—"for the third time, I call upon you to surrender!"

Again a deep silence.

"Have you done?" said the guard.

"Yes."

"And time too," he muttered, as he placed the butt of the carbine to his shoulder.

The chief officer pretended not to overhear this remark.

"If he's there," said the guard, "it will be a case with him, and no mistake! I loaded the carbine myself, and know just how many bullets are in it."

"Blaze away, then!"

The guard pointed the carbine full at the tree, and then pulled the trigger.

A slight flash and a tremendous report then followed, and the next thing the officers perceived was the guard lying at full length on his back in the middle of the road, with the muzzle of the carbine pointed skywards.

The bullets went crashing among the boughs of the tree in truly an alarming fashion.

Most effectually had all doubt been set at rest respecting the presence of the highwayman in that tree at least.

Had he been there he must have fallen to the earth, riddled with bullets.

The guard scrambled up to his feet again, and looked very ferocious when he saw all the officers were laughing at his expense.

"Oh, grin away," he said—"grin away, and be d—d to you! It only shows what an uncommon good charge I'd got in the carbine! If you'll wait half a minute, we'll have a try at the next tree."

The officers showed no signs of dissent.

The carbine accordingly was loaded, and one of the officers produced from a little bag a number of pistol bullets, quite a handful of which was poured in, and tightly rammed down.

Again the weapon was raised and discharged.

But with no more result than before.

The guard staggered back after he had pulled the trigger, and tried hard to keep his balance, but he failed, and sat down with such force that all the breath was jerked out of his body.

He looked upon all these failures and mishaps with great complacency, however, for he said to the officers:

"We may make sure he isn't in either of those trees, mayn't we? But he might be hiding in the next, or the next, and if he is in any one of them I'll find him, for I won't stop until I have fired into every tree."

While speaking, he recommenced the task of loading the carbine.

It was an operation that did not require many minutes, and for the third time he stood facing the trees. Now, up to the present moment Dick had looked upon these proceedings with a tolerable amount of composure, simply because the muzzle of the carbine was not pointed at the tree in which he had so snugly ensconced himself, and he clung to the hope that after a few trials they would get disgusted with wasting so much powder and shot.

But their proceedings were more energetic and persevering than he had at all calculated upon, and he began to feel extremely uneasy, for the tree at which the carbine was now directed stood next to the one where he was hidden.

He fixed his eyes upon the guard, and then involuntarily closed them.

When he pulled the trigger the report and crashing of the bullets among the branches was alarming in the extreme; but he quickly recovered himself, for he found he was as yet unhurt.

He had been labouring under great apprehension, however, for it was quite possible that one of the many bullets crammed into the carbine might go so far wide of its mark as to reach him.

Now, however, he held his breath, while his heart beat hard and fast.

The guard, still undaunted, was as actively engaged as ever in reloading his formidable weapon.

CHAPTER CMXXV.

THE GUARD OF THE MAIL-CART PERSEVERES IN THE PROSECUTION OF HIS PLAN.

DICK TURPIN was now truly in a most critical position.

What step to take he knew not.

He was decidedly unwilling to cry out, and so ignominiously surrender himself to the police; but for all that, he could not make up his mind to sit there and remain an animated target.

In fact, he felt sure, should the guard fire the carbine into the tree, his destruction would be immediate and certain.

It was quite impossible for him to escape at least one of the bullets, and he knew well that any one of them would be sufficient to cause death.

No words can possibly describe the amount of intentness with which he regarded the proceedings of his foes below.

Oh, how he hated that officious, troublesome guard of the mail-cart.

Without him the officers could never have carried out their present plan of operations.

Dick sat and watched the reloading of the carbine.

He waited until the whole operation was completed, and then, with a start, remembered that he had not yet made up his mind how he should act.

"I'll tell you what," said the chief officer, "I am tired of this sort of thing, for I don't believe he is in the trees at all; however, you shall have this one fire, and if it produces no results we'll part company."

"Oh, just as you like," said the guard—"just as you like! I don't mind it—I look upon it as a capital bit of sport."

But the officers clearly did not do so, for they were conscious that if they were now on the wrong scent they were giving the highwayman every opportunity of completing his escape.

"Are you ready?" said the officer, gruffly.

"Yes, quite ready."

"Then bang away; and make haste about it!"

For the fourth time the carbine was raised and pointed at the trees.

Dick sat perfectly still, and as he did so he fancied he could see right down the barrel of the murderous fire-arm.

Only a second elapsed, and yet to Dick it seemed a whole age.

A thousand thoughts passed through his mind.

He felt that he was on the brink of destruction.

He gave a thought to Maud, to his friends, to all he had any occasion to remember with kindness, and then closed his eyes and compressed his lips with the resolution to die calmly.

Nothing short of a miracle could save him.

But his conviction was that if his time had come it would be much better to perish by one of the bullets from the guard's carbine than descend to be taken prisoner by the police.

In either case his death would be certain.

But a loud cry at this moment made him open his eyes and start so violently that the branches of the trees clashed together.

It was the driver of the mail-cart who had given utterance to the shout.

The guard had turned round quick as lightning, wondering what had happened—an alarming character.

"Look—look!" said the driver, standing upon his seat, and pointing across the meadows with one hand. "May I never hold the reins again if the rascal is not taking his way quite coolly over the fields yonder!"

"What—what?" exclaimed the officers.

"Jump up—jump up, all of you, and you will see! Look—look! Yonder he goes, just by that tall poplar tree!"

The officers scrambled up into the cart, and gazed eagerly in the direction to which the driver's finger pointed.

We have already described the nature of the night as being one when the moon broke forth at times in revals.

A large rift of blue could now be seen between the clouds, and in this the moon was shining with a lustre unsurpassable.

Far and wide all objects could be distinctly seen, and the police, as they gazed over the fair, silvery-looking country, uttered ejaculations of surprise and astonishment.

At first they could not credit their vision, but a second glance assured them that they saw aright.

Dick Turpin, in his well-known scarlet coat, his large white cravat, and his three-cornered hat, was making his way at a sharp trot across the level expanse of meadow-land.

"Curse it all!" said the chief officer, as he pulled off his hat and in his rage smacked it down into the roadway. "Something told me that we were wasting our time on a wrong scent! But never mind! He is not far off my lads! Come on—we shall have him yet!"

The police left the mail-cart even more precipitately than they had climbed into it, and then ran with might and main to their horses.

"Jenkins," roared the chief, "run to that gate yonder, and open it, then we can make haste through."

One of the men hastened off to obey this command, while the others scrambled with the best speed they could into their saddles.

It was wonderful to see in what an incredibly short space of time they were all in the saddle and in motion.

The gate was held open, and they dashed through it in a dense throng, quite heedless of the injuries they received by coming in contact with each other and with the gate-posts.

Once in the meadow, they separated, and away they went at the utmost speed of which their horses were capable.

No person had been more surprised or astounded at this sudden turn of affairs than Dick Turpin himself.

He sat up in the tree with a dim, vague consciousness about him that he had escaped by a hair's breadth from a dreadful death.

He peered as well as he could through the branches of the trees, and presently made out the form of the horseman that the officers had mistaken for him.

Dick did not wonder at the error.

The figure did in many respects resemble himself.

Nor was he at any loss to recognise the rider.

It was Tom King.

After the officers had entered the meadow, Dick remained in the same position, watching vigilantly and full of anxiety to learn the result of the chase.

To his great disappointment, however, Tom King became suddenly lost to view behind a large clump of trees.

He watched to see him reappear from them.

But in vain.

Then did his concern for his old comrade redouble.

He felt pretty certain that Tom King had no idea the officers were so close behind him.

On the soft sward their horses' feet would not make noise enough to reach his ears.

"He has been well hunted about the country, that's certain," Dick muttered to himself, "and now he believes himself in safety. Ten to one he will stop among those trees for rest and shelter; and if he does his position will be an awkward one, for the officers will absolutely be upon him before he is aware that they are at hand."

Dick watched the officers until they, too, could be seen no longer.

Then he turned to a consideration of his own position.

The guard and driver of the mail-cart had also stood watching intently until there was nothing more to be seen.

Then Dick heard the latter exclaim:

"Well, some, old fellow, I think we have loitered on our journey long enough. The horses must make up for it, though—it will not do for us to arrive late."

"No, certainly not."

"Well, then, we'll be off."

"In one moment," said the guard, as, with the carbine in his hand, he jumped out of the cart—"one moment! I'll just have this one bang for the say-so of the thing, and after that I shall be ready to go with you."

These last words fairly took away Dick's breath when he heard them, they came upon him so unexpectedly when now he suddenly found himself in the same imminent peril as before.

The only question that now arose in his mind was whether he should at once reveal his presence in the tree.

It would be a very different thing to deal with these two men, only he fancied indeed he should be able successfully to cope with them.

He gave one keen, rapid glance in the direction the officers had taken.

To his great joy, he found they were still out of sight.

"Jim," said the driver of the mail-cart, as soon as the guard had ceased speaking, "don't make a fool of yourself."

"What do you mean?"

"Well, not exactly what I said. But don't try to be a bigger fool than you are, for that's quite needless."

"You be blowed!"

"Very well; but I just tell you this much: I am going, and if you like to come with me, well and good; if not, stay where you are, and you can fire up those trees till doomsday, if you like!"

With these words the driver gave his horses a smart cut with the whip, and the animals, who had been chafing under their restraint all the while, now started off at a capital speed.

"Hi—hi!" roared the guard—"stop—stop!"

The driver slackened his speed.

"Are you coming?"

"Just this one shot!"

"No, I'm off."

But the guard was determined not to be baulked in his whim, so, hastily raising his piece, he pulled the trigger.

He did not wait to see the result of the explosion, but ran off down the road as fast as his legs could carry him, bawling lustily to his comrade to pull up.

He was out of sight in a few moments, and then there was a slight rustling in the tree.

It was caused by Dick Turpin taking off his hat.

He looked at it, and through the broad brim he saw a large jagged hole, which would admit his finger easily.

"A close shave," he muttered. "But a miss is as good as a mile, I've heard say. Confound the fellow, he's been the cause of half my troubles!"

Dick felt himself carefully all over to ascertain that he had received no other hurt, and, having satisfied himself on this particular point, he paused to look around him on all sides before he ventured to make his descent.

No human being was in sight, nor did any sound break the silence, save that which the wind produced.

The moon was again hidden by clouds, and Dick felt rejoiced at it, because he knew how much it would favour his escape.

Rapidly, then, he descended from bough to bough until he once more stood on the firm earth.

Then he shook himself thoroughly, as though by that means he could rid himself of all the disagreeable circumstances through which he had just passed.

"I have had some close touches," was his muttered remark. "But no matter! There's much before me that I must attend to—besides, the hour is much later than I could wish. As all is so quiet I will set forward at once."

He carried out this intention without delay.

He knew perfectly well that he could be at no very great distance from his destination, but yet he had to consider for some moments before he was able to say positively in which direction Somefield lay.

Having at last decided upon the point, he took his course in a straight line, disregarding the obstacles that continually placed themselves in his path.

In this way he had not proceeded long, before he perceived before him a bright, ruddy gleam of light.

It increased in brilliancy with a rapidity truly marvellous, and soon the whole horizon was lighted up.

The dense clouds lost their former sombre look, and glowed with crimson.

"A fire," said Dick, after he had gazed in silence for some moments at this spectacle—"yes, surely a fire! And how fiercely and rapidly it rages!"

In a few more minutes he was so close to the scene of conflagration as to behold the huge columns of smoke ascending, and the thousands of brilliant sparks that rushed upwards.

As he continued to gaze, a strange feeling of uneasiness sprang up in his breast—a feeling that was indefinable, but yet which increased in power every moment.

A vague consciousness that something was wrong—that something was about to happen which would be to him a greater misfortune than anything that had yet happened to him—took full possession of his heart.

For a brief space of time it unnerved him, but, obtaining command over himself, he redoubled his speed, changing his course slightly and making his way direct to the scene of conflagration.

CHAPTER CMXXVI.

IN WHICH BLACK BESS MAKES HER APPEARANCE BEFORE THE PUBLIC IN A FRESH CHARACTER.

HAVING brought the narrative up to this point, we will take our leave of Dick Turpin for awhile, and revert to the proceedings of two others, in whom it is presumed scarcely a secondary interest is felt.

The others we allude to are Maud and Black Bess, who, the readers will recollect, had been left in the charge of the friendly proprietor of the circus.

It was shortly after Dick's departure that a man, travel-stained, dusty, and weary, came walking slowly over the common on which the strollers may be said to have encamped.

His eyes were fixed upon the bright, ruddy fire they had lighted, and which looked like a beacon of hope in the gloom.

As he drew nearer the sound of footsteps was heard, and Smithini himself, starting up, strained his eyes in the endeavour to make out the form and features of the intruder.

It was not long before he succeeded, for this new-comer advanced boldly until the ruddy light from the fire fell full upon his haggard countenance.

"Why, Joe," said Smithini, extending his hand, "can it be possible—is it you?"

"Yes, there is no doubt about it," replied the other, sadly. "I have managed to get thus far."

"But I thought you were laid up, unable to move, after that terrible fall of yours."

"Well, I was, and I am not right now, but better; I am starving, though," he added, "and so am not likely to improve. I recollected you, and from the past felt certain that you would do all you could to help me."

"So I will," said Smithini. "We'll talk about that more at length to-morrow. Here, sit down and have something to eat."

The man gladly complied, and, sitting down, he removed his hat and the wrapper from the lower portion of his face.

The firelight then disclosed the countenance of a middle-aged man, with many deep lines furrowed upon it, and the whiteness of which was brought into strong relief by the black moustache he wore upon his upper lip.

To many he was known, and as soon as their greeting was over, Smithini, turning to him, said:

"Have you any news, Joe? Is there anything fresh?"

"No," he returned, "nothing at all, except a rather odd thing that happened to me on my way here."

"What was that?"

"Why, I was suddenly encountered and surrounded by a troop of police officers. I was much frightened—I could not help it. I was rigidly examined and closely questioned, and it would seem that I had been mistaken for another."

"Indeed?"

"Yes. These officers are in pursuit of a highwayman and a female he has with him. They have been tracked to somewhere near this place, but the clue has been lost. However, they are resolved to find it."

These words gave Smithini more uneasiness than he thought proper to express.

Maud, too, overheard the words, and it cost her a great effort to preserve anything resembling calmness.

Her anxiety to hear more, however, overcame every other consideration.

"They are on their way to this place even now," continued the man. "No doubt you will see them shortly, and they will make the same inquiries of you."

"What makes you think that?"

"Simply because I left them coming in this direction, and because I heard them say that they were resolved to question everyone they met."

Smithini lapsed into silence.

At length, however, he spoke.

"I don't like the grabs," he said; "I never did; I had half made up my mind to stay here till to-morrow, but now my determination is changed—we'll start at once"

"And to what place are you bound?"

"Somefield."

"Oh, not far from here—I know the place."

"Yes, we shall reach it in a short time easily."

He rose from his seat as he spoke these last words, and issued rapid injunctions to the others to get all ready for a start.

The injunctions did not require much time to carry out—indeed, sooner than could have been expected they were all in motion.

"Fear nothing," said Smithini, whispering in Maud's ear, "I will protect you; while with me you are safe. I am doing this merely in the way of precaution."

"And Dick," she said—"will he find us?"

"Oh yes, I arranged all about that. Do not be apprehensive on that score. All I wish is to avoid a meeting with the officers."

The journey to Somefield was performed in safety and in secrecy.

Day was just beginning to dawn when they halted on a piece of waste ground just outside the little town.

A short time was allowed for repose, then the men began busily to work at erecting their large canvas tent.

It was not long before their arrival became known to the inhabitants, and there was soon a crowd of idle spectators, who stood and watched all their preparations.

It was announced that one grand performance in the circus would be given at mid-day, and by that time everything was in readiness.

To the deep disappointment of all, and Smithini in particular, for he had met with much ill-luck of late, they met with very little encouragement.

So few people, indeed, sat down upon the seats that none of the performers felt the heart to go through their performance properly.

When the audience had been dismissed, Maud found her new but kind-hearted and trusty friend seated in an attitude of deep dejection.

Anxiously she inquired into the cause.

"My usual luck," he said; "I don't know what it is to do well now. There was a time, however, when all was different, but it is no good thinking about that. You see, the people will not come, and my stock of money is now exhausted!"

Maud was not in a position to suggest any means by which Smithini could be helped out of his difficulty, yet she longed for the power to do so.

She valued his friendship, for there were few indeed who would hold out to herself and Dick a protecting hand.

"I don't know what to bring forward to attract the public," Smithini continued. "I am completely at fault!"

"And I," said Maud, "cannot help you. If I could I would with all my heart. There is nothing I would not do to assist you."

Smithini raised his eyes and fixed them keenly upon her countenance.

"Are you sure of what you say?" he asked.

"Quite sure," she answered, earnestly. "Now tell me why?"

"I was thinking—— But no—no," he broke off, "I will not give utterance to that thought; it is wrong—madness!"

"Let me know it," said Maud—"let me form my judgment of it."

Smithini resisted, but she was so pressing that he at last complied.

"Well, then," he said, "the wild idea just for a moment crossed my mind that Black Bess might be the means of saving me."

"Of saving you? How so?"

"Why," he continued, "I have been told that her master has trained her with uncommon care, and that she is possessed of rare intelligence. It would take too long to repeat one half of the stories I have heard, but doubtless there is only a slight foundation for them."

"Not so slight as you imagine," said Maud, with a glow of joy, for she was delighted at seeing this prospect opened out before her of testifying her gratitude to her new friend—"not so slight as you imagine," she repeated. "At various times I have seen strange things done. She would obey his every word, but I fancy will attend to no one else."

"It is very likely."

"Still," she continued, with fresh animation, "if you will allow me to try I shall gladly do so. You must not forget she is so disguised that even I should not recognise her, and it might be that this would prove sufficient to attract the people."

Smithini evidently thought so.

The proposal was one that recommended itself to him in every way, but yet he hesitated.

Maud, however, insisted upon carrying out the course she had suggested.

Black Bess was brought, and she endeavoured by imitating Dick's manner to induce her to perform several tricks which she had seen.

The experiment met with a success that exceeded their most sanguine expectations.

But having succeeded so far, an obstacle now obtruded itself which threatened to be insurmountable.

To perform these tricks it would be necessary that Maud herself should appear before the audience, a thing from which under any circumstances she would have shrunk.

But now it would have been dangerous in the highest degree for her to do so.

Among the many eyes that might be upon her, there would be a strong probability of her recognition.

"I have it," said Smithini, in a voice of exultation—"I have it; our fortunes are made. 'The Masked Lady,' that sounds well, does it not? It will make a good line, too: 'The Masked Lady and her Matchless Steed, White Diamond, will give their unrivalled performance.'"

"Yes," said Maud, "I could wear a mask, and then there would be almost an end to danger. At any rate, I will run the risk."

Even then Smithini hesitated.

He thought of Dick, and wondered in what light the highwayman would look upon the affair.

He was no stranger to the fact that Turpin placed a priceless value on his mare, and should any accident befall her—should she be recognised, what could he say then?

But for Maud's determination, he would at the last moment have abandoned the idea; but she was firm, and resolved that it should be carried out.

The next step was to make the inhabitants of the town aware of what was going to be performed, and this task was executed as well as the shortness of the time at their disposal would admit.

"I don't care," said Smithini. "Let only half a dozen come the first time, and I shall be satisfied. When they have seen this performance they will pour a glowing account of it into the ears of everyone."

Rather late in the afternoon a second performance was given.

It was rather better attended than the first; but it was evident they had been induced to come by the representations that had been put forth respecting the Masked Lady and White Diamond.

The moment for Maud's appearance at length came, and, dizzy and confused, she rode into the ring.

She was received with a loud burst of applause, and all looked on with the greatest excitement and eagerness at the strange spectacle of a masked performer.

Trembling for the result, Maud then uttered the words of command that Dick Turpin himself had used.

It would really seem that Black Bess understood the nature of her position, for never before had she appeared so docile—so intelligent.

Every command that Maud gave was obeyed with a promptitude that produced unbounded applause.

The experiment was a complete success.

When all was over, Black Bess was led round the ring, and all admired her matchless shape and proportions.

Never had their eyes rested on such a steed,

But little did they dream what steed it was.

Smithini, in the character of manager, announced that a repetition of the performance would be given that evening, and then the audience departed.

The words he had made use of were prophetic.

Those who had witnessed the performance of White Diamond gave so glowing an account of it that all who heard determined to attend, especially when those who had paid the visit on the first occasion declared their intention of going a second time.

To the joy of Smithini and his troop, long before the announced hour of opening, a great crowd besieged the entrance to the tent.

In they rushed, in one continuous stream, packing themselves into the closest possible compass.

The canvas erection was crammed to its fullest extent—it would not have been possible for another person to have found standing-room.

Thus the time passed on until the hour for Maud's second appearance.

Her success was even greater than on the previous occasion.

Still, there remained outside a crowd of persons sufficiently large to fill the tent again, and, by the generally-expressed wish of all, a third performance was announced, although the hour was then so late a one.

Fortune was at last smiling upon Smithini.

The money rolled in so fast that he could scarcely find places in which to stow it.

It happened thus, that the hour was long past midnight when Maud again appeared.

Again was the performance a complete success.

But before it was half over, a loud, appalling shriek was heard.

It was followed by another, and then from the throats of all issued the one word "Fire!"

There was an instantaneous rush, and then, as though to make the calamity complete, the seats, which had never been designed for the accommodation of so many people, suddenly gave way on one side.

There was a hideous crash, and the next moment the people were lying on the ground in a confused and bleeding mass.

As the seats all depended upon each other for support, those on the other side fell also before those seated on them could succeed in making an escape.

Then followed a scene of such appalling horror that no tongue could describe it, and the fearful nature of the scene was enhanced by the rapid progress of the flames.

They spread with a rapidity truly alarming.

Something might have been done to check them, it is true, but there was no one who could take that direction of affairs upon themselves at the right moment, and so the fire raged on.

By twos and threes, the bruised and burned people rolled out on to the open ground.

Selfishness reigned paramount.

No thought was given by anyone to the sufferings of another.

In the midst of the confusion a man appeared, whose arrival was unnoticed in the general excitement.

It was Dick Turpin, who had seen from afar the conflagration, and who, on coming close enough, had found that it proceeded from Smithini's circus.

He did not know at that moment that Maud was in the very centre of the building, hemmed in by maddened, furious people.

But he dashed on at a venture, looking everywhere for her.

He saw her not—he saw no one of whom he could ask a single question.

He felt certain, however, that if he raised his voice she would recognise it, and give vent to an answering cry, which would enable him to proceed to her rescue.

There was danger about this course; but at such a moment as that such danger was not to be thought of.

"Maud," he cried—"Maud—Maud! Where are you? Speak, that I may hear your voice!"

He fancied that the roaring of the flames and the shrieks and cries of the populace beat down and drowned his words.

He thought just then too, of Black Bess, and wondered she was in the midst of the scene of riot.

Just then his eyes fell upon a man, begrimed with smoke, and with his clothing badly torn.

Nevertheless, he recognised him.

It was Smithini.

"Maud—Maud!" Dick exclaimed, as he seized hold of him. "Where is she—where is she?"

Smithini answered only by a groan.

Alarmed beyond expression, Dick repeated his inquiry, and so furiously that Smithini was terrified into a reply.

"She's there," he said, pointing to the remains of the circus—"she's there, in the very midst of the wreck, and Black Bess is with her!"

CHAPTER CMXXVII.

DICK TURPIN IS MUCH HARASSED BY THE POLICE OFFICERS.

Upon receipt of this intelligence Dick Turpin clasped both his hands over his face, and uttered a deep groan.

But he banished the emotion quickly, for he felt that it was the moment for deeds, not for grief.

How he was to make his way through the fighting, struggling throng, and gain the centre of the circus he had no idea, and it was fortunate indeed even at that dire moment that he should maintain sufficient presence of mind to be aware that any attempt to mix himself up with the throng would prove fatal.

His mind at the same instant grasped another idea.

Smithini had said that Black Bess was with Maud, and that reminded him that he had the power of calling Black Bess to his side.

There was a possibility—just a remote possibility—that Maud might come with Black Bess if he gave utterance to the signal.

The experiment was worth trying, and almost without reflection he whistled shrilly.

There was an answering neigh, and then the confusion on the spot where the circus had stood was redoubled.

With a furious rush and frantic, terrified bounds, Black Bess came galloping over those people who chanced to be in her way.

Dick could scarcely summon up his courage to look and see whether Maud was with her.

Tremblingly and in great fear he raised his eyes, and then, with a cry of joy, sprang forward.

Maud was there, seated upon Black Bess, and to all appearance quite unhurt.

In another second she was in his arms, and pressed tightly to his breast.

"Safe," she said—"I am quite safe and unhurt! And you, too, have escaped?"

"Yes—yes!" said Dick, whose heart was now lightened of a terrible load—"yes, all is well. And Bess—what about her?"

"She, too, I think, is quite unharmed, or if she is hurt it is only in a very trifling degree."

At this moment Smithini came hurrying towards them, and by the expression of his face it could be seen that some fresh calamity had befallen him.

"All is lost!" he said, when he came nearer. "My bad luck clings to me! I thought I had got the better of it for once, but no, I have not. I am now a ruined man in the fullest sense of the word!"

Dick thought he referred to the fire, but in this he was quickly undeceived.

"The receipts have been stolen," continued Smithini—"all the money taken at the doors has been carried off by the mob. I had no means of placing it in safety, and it is gone. I have not now a shilling in the world!"

"No matter," said Dick; "you remember my promise. I will be as good as my word."

"Hush—hush!" said Smithini, suddenly—"look there, Dick—look there!"

He pointed to a spot close to the scene of conflagration—a spot that was only a few yards distant.

"Officers," ejaculated Dick—"officers, as I live! I must retreat at once; perhaps I shall be lucky enough to escape unseen. Come, Maud, up quickly—quickly!"

Maud was trembling violently, and weeping, for she had not yet overcome her last excitement.

Dick, however, in this moment of fresh danger was calm and steady enough.

Keeping his eyes fixed upon the officers so as not for a moment to lose sight of their actions, he placed his hand upon the saddle and swung himself easily into his seat.

It was just then that a voice cried out in loud, shrill tones:

"Here he is—here he is; I have him now, and no mistake."

While these words were uttered, Dick felt his leg suddenly seized by some one, and the jerk given was such that it almost unhorsed him.

Luckily, he kept his seat.

The officers answered the cry with a loud shout, and came hastening towards them.

With a sudden shake Dick managed to get his foot partially free, and before the man who had seized it could save himself he received a tremendous blow in the mouth from the tip of Dick's heavy riding boot.

He relaxed his hold and fell back with a strange cry.

"On, Bess," Dick cried—"on, my lass—your best speed is wanted now!"

While he spoke the words a dropping, irregular volley came from the pistols of the officers.

But the bullets sped past him harmlessly, for the short stumpy pistols that were at that time carried by the police officers were more for show than use, and if they struck an object aimed at it was by accident merely.

But Maud uttered a loud cry, and at first Dick thought she had been injured.

She quickly assured him, however, that all was well, the cry had been wrung from her lips by terror.

There was something truly alarming in the furious rate at which Black Bess took her way across the rough, uneven piece of waste ground on which the circus had been erected.

It was of considerable extent, and some time elapsed before its further boundary was reached.

At length they reached this point in perfect safety.

But Dick had left all to the sagacity of his mare; he had made not the slightest attempt to guide her, for he knew well enough she would be better able by this means to avoid any obstacles that might be in her path.

The officers, however, were not so fortunate.

The horses of the two foremost stepped suddenly into a hole only a few inches deep, but yet such was the jar produced that they stumbled and fell, carrying their riders with them.

The others were so close behind that they could not stop themselves immediately, and thus a scene of the utmost confusion took place, a confusion which lasted for several moments.

This was an opportunity that Dick improved to the utmost.

"All is well, Maud," he cried, in a reassuring voice—"all is well! Fear nothing! If the officers are in the humour for a good gallop to-night they shall have it; but I promise them they will get nothing for their pains."

Black Bess seemed in excellent condition, and, so far as could be judged, quite overjoyed at thus again meeting with her master.

A broad, tolerably-straight and well-kept cross-road was before them, and along this Dick allowed her to proceed at full gallop.

Coming, then, to a spot where the road was intersected by another, he paused.

He had not listened more than a few seconds before he heard distinctly behind him the sharp clatter produced by the hoofs of the officers' horses striking the hard road.

"They're after us at full speed, Maud," said Dick; "but you have no cause to fear. We have the advantage of them now. When they reach this place they will have great difficulty in determining which way we have gone."

"And which way shall you take?"

Dick paused a moment before he replied, then said:

"This one to the left."

He turned Black Bess's head down it while he spoke, and again urged her to put forth her utmost powers of speed, for he wished to get so far before the officers reached the cross roads that they would not be able by listening to detect the scuad of his horse's hoofs.

Suddenly, however, while going at full gallop, he perceived something unusual in Bess's manner.

Her neck was outstretched, and her ears were projected forwards.

At the same instant, Maud said:

"Hark—hark! Dick, I can hear the officers now! How is it they have come upon us so quickly?"

Quite puzzled by this circumstance, and scarcely able to credit it, Dick brought Black Bess to a halt, and then listened.

Horsemen were approaching—there could be no doubt about that.

But he quickly found they were proceeding from a direction opposite to that which he had first expected.

"It is, ten to one, another troop," he said, in answer to Maud's query, "and it's lucky we heard them when we did, otherwise we should have dashed at full speed into their midst. They are frightfully close at hand, and I fear they must have heard us."

Maud clung to Dick in alarm.

"We are in danger," said the highwayman; "but we are not lost, for all that. Cheer up! This will be my best course now. Cling tightly."

He turned Black Bess so that she faced a low hedgerow growing on one side of the road.

She comprehended his wish, and with one bound cleared the obstruction easily.

Soft green turf was now beneath the hoofs of Black Bess, and it made a wonderful difference to her.

She flew onward as if she had suddenly received a fresh accession of strength.

The night was still cloudy, with the moon breaking forth at intervals, and now, at this moment, to Dick's vexation, a cloud parted, and the moon peeped forth.

The silvery light stole in an instant over the whole landscape.

"I fear we shall be seen," said Dick. "But the same light which enables them to see me will enable me to see them. Ah! look—there they are!"

The piece of ground on which they now were was of greater elevation than the road itself, and as Dick looked back he perceived the second troop of police officers, whose approach he had so opportunely heard, standing in a dense throng close to the spot where he had overleaped the hedge.

Then, looking a little way to the left, he saw the other troop coming on at full speed.

In less than a moment the two forces would unite

"They see me," he exclaimed. "But no matter! fear them not! Forward, Bess," he added—"forward, my lass! All depends upon your speed! Let us see what you can do!"

It really seemed as though the gallant creature comprehended the purport of the words that had just been uttered, for, without any further incentive for exertion, she all at once broke out into that long, stretching gallop which seemed to require no particular amount of exertion on her part, but yet which got over the ground in a style truly marvellous.

A succession of broad, undulating meadows was quickly passed over, and when Dick drew rein again it was not until he had placed many miles between himself and the spot where he had last stopped.

He was now nearly at the brow of a steep hill, and he looked back from this advantageous position, in order to ascertain whether the officers were still upon his track.

But the moon was once again covered by clouds, and it was impossible for him to see to any great distance.

He listened; but no sound resembling the clatter of horses' hoofs reached his ears

The silence was alone broken by the whistling of the wind among the tree tops.

"Do you really think that you have distanced them?" asked Maud, beginning to recover herself from the state of fright in which she had been for so long a time.

"I trust so," answered Dick; "but at present it is impossible to say. I will let Bess go gently to the summit of this hill, and then we will pause again."

"And," pursued Maud, "supposing that you should find yourself quite clear of the officers, what will be your next step?"

Dick paused a moment before he replied.

"I can hardly answer you," he said, "except by saying that I should push on at a gentle rate and look around me for some place of shelter where we could remain concealed until the time comes for me to meet my companions."

Maud sighed

"Where," she said—"where is this place of concealment and safety to be found?"

"We must wait and see," returned Dick, lightly and carelessly. "We have found places ere now, and doubtless we shall find them again; we shall have to place ourselves entirely at the mercy of circumstances."

During this brief conversation Black Bess had been making her way at a slow walk up the steep declivity of the hill.

Now the brow was reached, and Dick brought her to a standstill.

At the same moment the darkness was dispersed, for the moon broke out once more into her full lustre.

The thick obscurity seemed to roll away like mists before the rising sun.

And so Dick looked back in the direction he had just come.

Distant and more distant objects were by degrees brought into view.

An ejaculation broke suddenly from his lips, which was echoed by one from Maud.

Dick looked again, for he could scarcely believe in the reality of what he saw.

"Confusion!" he muttered. "They have managed somehow to steal a march upon us; but how—how?" Surely by some means or other they must have possessed themselves of fresh horses."

Coming swiftly along, and at no great distance beneath him, Dick saw the full troop of police officers.

They were making good speed, he could tell that, but whether they had really obtained a change of horses was more than he could determine.

As the moon was shining full upon Dick on the top of the hill, he could doubtless be seen very plainly by the officers below, for the forms of himself, Maud, and Black Bess would be thrown into full relief by the sky behind them.

Indeed, something like a shout, sounding faint and far off, came upon Dick's ears, as though the officers had really recognised him.

It was only for a moment that Dick allowed this to give him any concern.

He saw that Maud was alarmed, and endeavoured to act in such a manner as would lead her to believe the danger was not so great as it actually was.

Accordingly, with the resumption of that reckless, daring spirit that would peep forth at times, he dropped the reins on the neck of Black Bess, and pulling off his hat, made a kind of mocking bow with it.

It was rather a gesture, to be understood by the officers as a challenge to follow him.

"Dear Maud," he said, "fear nothing. If they are in the humour for a good ride to-night, I will not disappoint them. Cling tightly to me, and then all will be well."

This injunction was scarcely necessary, for Maud held to Dick as though she felt that here only safety she could know.

At the same moment, Dick gathered up the reins, and gave Black Bess the impulse forward.

She willingly responded to it, for the brief halt they had had was sufficient to enable her to recover to some extent her spent breath.

Away, then, at a terrific pace she sped.

Their way lay all down hill, so that comparatively little exertion was required to carry her over the ground.

Away—away they went, with a speed that was absolutely terrific and alarming—a speed that no one would have thought of making in the darkness except from the conviction that by that means was their only chance of escape from death.

And it was in darkness, for the clouds, driven before the strong breeze, had again completely hidden the moon's disc.

How long that fearful gallop lasted, Maud never knew.

To her it seemed a long and endless time

[DICK TURPIN'S DESCENT INTO THE OLD QUARRY.]

She did not speak, neither did Dick, for the air rushed past them with such swiftness as to make breathing a matter of difficulty.

CHAPTER CMXXVIII.

DICK TURPIN ESCAPES A FRIGHTFUL PERIL, BUT FINDS A STRANGE PLACE OF REFUGE.

It must be understood that the course taken by Dick Turpin in his headlong flight was not along any road or beaten path, but simply across the extensive meadows with which the sides of this hill were clothed.

At times some other kind of land would intervene, but so quickly were these places passed over that they were scarcely noticed.

Great as was the distance that had been passed over since Dick saw the officers from the summit of the hill, yet he did not attempt in any way to restrain his mare's progress.

On the contrary, indeed, he from time to time urged her to keep up the tremendous speed at which they had been going.

Nothing but flight could save them, and he knew full well that it was better to place as great a distance between himself and the officers as he could in the shortest space of time.

Yet that headlong progress through the darkness, with trees suddenly starting into view, and rushing past them like swiftly-flitting shadows, was something fearful to contemplate.

But, as before, Dick trusted to the sagaciousness of his mare, whose perceptive faculties, he knew from experience, were much keener than his own.

Suddenly, while in the midst of this furious gallop, Black Bess came to a stop with so much abruptness that it is a thousand wonders her riders were not flung violently from the saddle.

Dick was taken completely at unawares, and he partially lost his seat, and a less accomplished horseman than himself could never have regained it.

Dick was puzzled beyond measure by this sudden stoppage.

What could have been the cause?

He strained his eyes, but the obscurity appeared to thicken.

He could distinguish nothing beyond his mare's head.

Black Bess had her neck stretched out and her ears projected forward, while she trembled from head to foo as though enduring the utmost fright.

"What is it, Dick?" asked Maud, fearfully—"what is it?"

"It must be something in the way," Dick answered—"some obstruction or other, though I can see nothing."

He patted Black Bess on the neck while he spoke, then strove to reassure her.

"Gently, old lass," he said—"all is well! Forward—forward—slowly! There—that's it!"

With very great difficulty, the highwayman succeeded in persuading his mare to take a few hesitating steps in advance.

She did not take more than a dozen before she again stopped, and this time she planted both her fore feet together firmly on the ground, as though expressive of a determination not to allow anything to urge her beyond that point.

"Oh for a gleam of light!" said Dick. "If the moon would only shine now as it did a short time ago, we should be able to comprehend the meaning of this mysterious circumstance."

"But there seems no hope of it," said Maud, as she glanced upwards and saw that the whole sky was covered by one huge, dense cloud.

"It will not do to pause here," were Dick's next words; "it is impossible to say where the officers may be, and on this soft turf-land the hoof-strokes of their horses would be inaudible."

"What is to be done?"

"Don't be alarmed, Maud—there is as yet no cause for fear. I will descend and grope carefully forward, when doubtless I shall discover what this obstruction is."

But this course seemed to Maud to be fraught with a thousand terrors, and so she clung so tightly to Dick that he was unable to alight.

"Turn her aside a little," she said—"then perhaps she will go on as before."

Dick thought it worth the trial, and pulled the rein.

To no purpose, however.

Black Bess would move neither to the right nor the left; in fact, she seemed to be growing more restive every moment.

"There is no danger," said Dick, "and if I attempt to force her she might turn round and gallop in the way we have just come, and that would be death."

Maud felt this, and reluctantly removed her arms.

Without another word, Dick slipped from the saddle to the ground.

Retaining his hold upon the reins, he stooped down, and, with one hand outstretched before him, groped forward.

He was startled by a slight exclamation from Maud, and paused.

Just then, a faint, misty light began to creep over all things.

He knew then what had produced Maud's exclamation

Glancing up, he found that the moon had reached one portion of the dense cloud less opaque than the rest, and through this partially-transparent medium she shone with a dim and sickly lustre, yet her light increased as the clouds drifted onward.

Dick looked down again, and then he staggered back, uttering a loud cry of alarm, which almost had the effect of causing Black Bess to break from his hold.

The shout was echoed by a shriek from Maud, for both had looked down on the ground at the same moment.

What words can express the horror they felt upon making the discovery that they had paused upon the very verge of a huge excavation, so wide and so deep that the misty, uncertain light was insufficient to reveal the other side or its lowest depths.

Black Bess, when she placed her feet so determinedly upon the earth, was little more than a foot from the brink of the abyss.

Dick himself, when groping forward, had been so close to it, and so near falling down, that the bare recollection of it made his brain spin round and round.

It was only for a moment that they were allowed the opportunity of taking a glance at the excavation.

The moonlight again faded away, and all was obscurity as before.

Maud trembled so excessively with fright that she could scarcely retain her seat.

By an effort, Dick recovered himself from his consternation.

"A fortunate escape," he said—"a most fortunate escape. Black Bess," he added, patting his mare upon the neck while he spoke, "once again I owe you my life, for without you I should surely have perished."

"I am terrified to death!" said Maud. "Back—back! Come further back—I cannot remain so close to the verge!"

"You are safe," said Dick—"quite safe. The danger is over, now that we know it. We have had a frightfully narrow escape from an awful death, and it will be long indeed before I can forget it."

In spite of his efforts to speak calmly, it was easy to see that Dick was much overcome.

Probably he would have given way still more to the feelings that would naturally be called forth by such an event, but for the recollection that he still stood in great danger.

The officers were still behind him—how close he could not say.

It was rather difficult now for Dick to determine what course to take.

The transient view he had obtained of his surroundings sufficed to show him that the excavation was of vast extent and very irregular in shape; thus to attempt to skirt it in the darkness would be attended by no little difficulty.

Yet he felt that this was what must be done.

He could not advance, and to retreat would be only to diminish the distance he had been at such pains to place between himself and the police officers.

"I will not mount at present," he said at length. "Remain where you are, Maud, and I will lead Bess by the bridle, then you may be sure that all will be well. I will not put my foot down until I know that there is firm earth to place it on."

Maud remained silent, and Dick took her silence for consent; but it was more because she felt her emotions so great as to obstruct her utterance.

Stepping lightly and carefully, as he had promised, Dick advanced, taking care to keep as far away from the brink of the abyss as he was able.

From time to time he looked up anxiously towards the sky above.

The wind was increasing in force and steadiness each moment, and drove the clouds along at a tremendous rate, so that he indulged in the hope that ere long the moon might break forth again and light him on his way.

As well as the rushing of the wind would let him, he listened, but he could hear nothing of his foes.

Yet they might be close behind him, though, when he took into consideration the length of time Black Bess had been going at full gallop, he scarcely thought it possible.

There was a consolation to be found even in the darkness.

If it concealed his pursuers from him, it also concealed him from them, and it also multiplied the chances of missing him.

In so [illegible] an obscurity as that it would be hard indeed to keep upon his track.

Once more the sky began gradually to grow lighter, and far away on the horizon could be seen a long bright streak, which appeared rapidly to widen as the clouds came driving on.

He soon found that this was a rift of considerable extent, and when the moon entered it again, every object around him was brought into full view, as though by the magic stroke of some enchanter's wand.

On this occasion he was able to see the general configuration, but not the depth, of the place into which he had so narrowly escaped falling.

Hitherto he could only guess at the character of the excavation.

Now he saw that it was a huge stone quarry.

From various signs that he saw around he concluded that it had remained for many years disused.

The strata of soft earth that lay above the stone had given birth to vegetation of all kinds, in most places growing in luxuriance, so as to give the quarry an aspect of rare picturesque beauty.

The sides were rugged, irregular, and steep.

The quantity of stone removed must have been immense, for although he drew close to the verge and strained his eyes to the utmost, Dick was unable to perceive the bottom.

At various places on the sides, however, trees were growing out in oblique, fantastic fashions, while the splashing and rushing of water came distinctly to his ears.

The thought that entered Dick's mind while gazing at this place was a very natural one, considering his position.

Turning round first, so as to avail himself of the light of the moon while it lasted, he looked keenly in the way he had just come.

But to his great satisfaction no signs of the police officers could be perceived.

"See here, Maud," he exclaimed, when he had satisfied himself upon this point; "have we not been fortunate in reaching this strange place?"

"Fortunate?" she repeated, in accents of surprise.

"Yes, surely so; we have outrun the officers, of that I am certain. You were asking me where I should find a place of refuge. Behold, it is there. Chance has thrown it in our way."

But Maud shrank back in some dismay at the prospect of taking shelter in so wild and desolate a place.

"Yes," continued Dick; "it is only in some such place as this that we can hope to remain in safety; we shall be dependent upon no one save ourselves, and therefore shall have nothing to fear in the shape of treachery in the depths of this huge excavation. No one would think of looking for us; or if the place was visited, we should, ten to one, escape observation. Believe me, we cannot hope to find a better place than this."

"But how shall we descend?" said Maud, becoming more reconciled to the idea of remaining in so gloomy a place, by the considerations of its safety. "The sides seem to me like walls."

"In all probability," returned Dick, "there is a path somewhere leading down into its lowest depths. That path we must find, and carefully pursue."

"I see no signs of it."

"Nor I at present. You can guide Black Bess, and while you are doing so I will creep close to the edge of the abyss and make good use of the moonlight while it lasts."

Dick did not wait for Maud to make any reply, but going as close to the edge of the quarry as was consistent with safety, he walked rapidly along, looking keenly all the time, in the hope of discovering the path of which he had spoken.

For a long time he saw nothing bearing any resemblance to it.

In one place he saw what looked like steps roughly hewn in the stone, but these were impracticable.

It was necessary to find some sloping path, down which he could lead Black Bess.

After much searching, he was at length rewarded.

A narrow path was found, but it was so much overhung by the stone that it required a very quick eye indeed to detect it.

The descent was very rapid, and must at all times have been attended with a great amount of danger, but now that danger was much increased by the presence of a quantity of green moss, which seemed to rest upon the surface of the stone, and which changed to a watery moisture beneath the feet.

In all probability, however, there was no other mode of descent into the quarry save this, and accordingly Dick hastened to Maud's side.

"You will have to summon up all your courage," he said, "for the task before you is a difficult one; but you must endeavour to gather confidence by thinking what safety we shall gain by adopting this course. Once fairly at the bottom of that quarry, we can bid defiance to all the officers in the kingdom. I am convinced they would never dream of looking for us there."

Certainly nothing would have inspired Maud with more courage than the thought that she was about in some way to contribute to Dick's safety.

She had always been in a state of perpetual alarm on his account, and thought how grateful would be the change could she but feel certain that for a time he was in no danger.

Nevertheless, although she steeled her heart well, her courage for a moment failed her when she saw the narrow, precipitous path down which she would have to make her way.

But, recovering herself with great difficulty, she said:

"Lead the way, Dick—lead the way, and I will follow. It is necessary that you should take Black Bess by the bridle, and when I see you both before me I shall have confidence to follow in your footsteps."

"As you will," said Dick. "It will, I expect, be no easy task to lead Black Bess; but yet, with care, it may be accomplished."

Accordingly, he took hold of Black Bess by the bridle, and led her towards the brink of the precipice.

She shrank back in natural terror, yet did not hesitate to follow where her master led.

Taking each step slowly and carefully, Dick began to descend.

Black Bess slipped more than once, and every time a pang of alarm shot through his breast.

He knew how easy it would be for her to fall over the side of the narrow pathway into the depths below.

Maud, too, occasioned him much anxiety, and at every moment he would look back, in order to make sure that she was safe.

But Maud, wisely making the resolution not to turn her eyes in the direction of the quarry itself, steadily stepped onwards, for the most part keeping her hands close against the side of the precipice, acquiring additional confidence by this intangible handhold.

After going down some distance, they found themselves upon a small flat piece of rock, or what the French would call a plateau, and here Dick paused a little while, in order to take a glance at that portion of the pathway which led down from this place.

He endeavoured also to make out how much further he would have to descend, and as the moon just then was shining brightly, he perceived, or fancied he perceived, among the many shadows down below, the tops of a few stunted trees, and the sparkle of running water.

The pathway presented much the same appearance as before, and it was entered upon with additional confidence.

It conducted to a second plateau, from which they similarly descended to a third, and from the third to the rough and rugged bottom of the quarry.

Huge stones were lying about here and there promiscuously, and in some places grass and trees were growing.

Save and except the rushing of the water, a profound silence prevailed in this place.

A cold chill was in the air, and the darkness was such as to have a most depressing influence upon the spirits, for although the moon shone down into the quarry, yet she was not near enough to the zenith to illumine this its lowest depth.

Oppressed and half terrified, Maud crept closer to Dick's side, who, however, was impressed very differently by his surroundings.

"Safe now, Maud," he said, and his voice sounded unearthly and strange as it reverberated among the recesses in the stonework—"quite safe now. The officers will not find us here."

"But," said Maud, with a shiver and a sigh, "should they by any chance learn of your whereabouts, would you not then be completely at their mercy?—would they not hold you as if in a trap?"

CHAPTER CMXXIX.

RETURNS TO TOM KING, AND SHOWS HOW HE ADOPTED A CLEVER STRATAGEM TO GET RID OF THE POLICE OFFICERS, AND WHAT WAS ITS RESULT.

When Tom King parted from Dick Turpin in the little plantation at the back of the Three Spiders Inn, he made his way with as much speed as he could towards the open country, which he trusted to reach unperceived.

But this expectation was doomed to disappointment.

Despite all the elaborate precautions that he took, an officer stationed near the spot whence he emerged uttered a loud shout, and immediately followed it up by discharging his pistol.

These two acts served at once to raise an alarm, which was just what the officer intended, and in a few minutes he found himself surrounded by four or five of his companions.

He answered the questions they poured in upon him by pointing across the fields, where, at some distance, the flying forms of Tom King and his steed could be distinguished.

"Make all speed!" he said, addressing the others. "A sharp touch is most likely to do it; but a stern chase, I have heard say, is a long one, and, if you are all of my mind, we will keep on his track, and never quit it until we have slain or captured him. If this goes on much longer we shall get so much disgrace that we shall be dismissed in a whole body."

"We are with you!" said the others, and while they uttered the words, they lashed and spurred their horses savagely.

The animals were tolerably fresh, and as the officers by this time had learned from experience that they could have no chance of success whatever unless mounted upon cattle of superior quality, they had not on this occasion neglected to provide themselves with the best steeds they could procure.

With scarcely any delay, then, the chase was commenced, and Tom King had the mortification of knowing that the officers were close behind him—so close that he could scarcely be said to have had a start worth speaking of.

But Tom knew to what extent he could rely upon his horse; it had served him well on many previous occasions, and, moreover, it had lately had good rest and food, and therefore would be capable of putting forth its best exertions.

Away, then, at full speed he went, until the turnpike-road was gained, and along this he resolved to make his way, chiefly because on the opposite side of it he saw nothing but ploughed fields, over which he knew it would be madness to attempt to ride.

With a prodigious clatter, then, he sped along the highway in the direction of the country.

People and vehicles were passed so quickly that only a transient glimpse was obtained of the flying horseman.

Perceiving presently before him the white, gleaming bars of a toll-gate, and knowing full well that at that hour of the night the gate would be closed, Tom again took to the fields.

His horse leaped over a low hedge easily, and then he found himself once more with turf beneath his feet.

Another ploughed field forced Tom King upon the high-road again.

In passing the toll-gate he had made a considerable detour, and this had told greatly against him, for the officers, having kept direct along the road without relaxing their speed, were now clustered together in a dense throng around the toll-gate, which a man was in the act of unlocking.

But Tom still had the start, and as the road had a gradual downward tendency, his horse was able to keep up the headlong gallop without much distress.

Further and further into the country Tom went.

He was incited to urge his horse on to the uttermost, for slowly but surely he saw that the space between himself and the officers was gradually getting wider and wider.

But his horse now began to cause him much apprehension.

More than once it had staggered and limped as though fearfully exhausted, but yet as if so full of mettle that it would gallop on until it fell down dead rather than relax its speed.

Such being the case, and as the officers were now quite out of sight, and almost out of hearing, Tom began to look about him for some means of throwing his pursuers off his track.

Glancing to his right, he saw nothing before him but a smooth expanse of country, which offered him not the remotest chance of concealment.

On the left the highway was bounded by a very high stone wall, so high that, though on horseback, he could not see fairly over it.

This wall was of immense length.

It stretched as far as he could see behind and before him.

By the trees which he perceived growing in great luxuriance over this wall, and indeed by the general appearance of the place, he readily enough concluded that this was the boundary wall of some large estate, such as can be met with in many parts of England.

This, then, offered him no chance at all.

It was quite in vain to look for shelter in this direction.

Nothing remained for him to do but to goad the already bleeding flanks of his horse, and so force him to keep up his gallop.

Fainter and fainter, however, grew the sounds of the horses in his rear, until at length they became so indistinct that it was only at intervals they floated to his ears.

Suddenly, while flying onward at this rate, he perceived that this long stone wall, that seemed as though it had no termination, was broken in upon by a gateway.

The sight of it caused a sudden thought to dart into his mind, a thought which was instantly matured.

He felt that he should be able to put into execution a stratagem that promised well to baffle the acuteness of his foes.

Accordingly he brought his horse gradually to a standstill, then turned his head round and took him gently towards the gateway he had passed.

Reaching it, he saw that it was an ordinary five-barred gate, and that it opened upon a broad, well-kept road that appeared to lead in a direct line across the park.

Hurriedly descending, he examined the fastenings of this gate, and saw that they consisted only of a kind of spring latch which allowed him to make ingress easily.

Passing quickly through the gate, he closed it after him, then, placing his ear upon the ground, listened.

Faintly—very faintly, but yet so audibly as not to be mistaken, he could hear the dull thud, thud produced by the beating of the hoofs of the six horses on the road.

"They may have heard me stop," Tom muttered, "but I doubt it. If they have, they will be in some doubt as to which way I have taken. It's a good thought—a lucky thought; I will imitate the hare by doubling directly on my course."

He sprang into the saddle in a moment, and with an amount of audacity truly wonderful, and yet which promised well for the success of his scheme, he turned his horse's head in the direction from which the officers were coming, and so rode on as it were to meet them, only the high stone wall of which we have spoken lay between.

On this side of the wall, too, the ground was soft, and as Tom allowed his horse to go at a moderate speed, his footfalls scarcely made a sound.

It was only occasionally that there was a slight crackling of twigs to betray his progress.

As he thus went on, the sounds of the officers approaching grew more distinct with marvellous rapidity, and at length Tom deemed it prudent to pause.

The stone wall was quite sufficient to screen him from their view, and it would be a pity if any accidental sound he might make in forcing his way onwards should attract their notice, and so lead them to suspect his whereabouts.

Getting as close as he possibly could to the wall, he remained quite still, busying himself, however, by stroking and caressing his horse's neck, by which means he trusted to keep the creature quiet.

There was little fear, however, that it would either move or make any sound.

It was so fatigued as to be only too rejoiced at an opportunity of recovering its lost breath.

The officers were now close at hand, and Tom could not hear them approaching so closely without a sensation of uneasiness creeping over him, though he had the greatest confidence in the stratagem he had adopted.

He was pleased to find that there were no signs of the officers abating their speed in the least degree.

He could hear them urge their horses onward both by voice and by the smacking of their riding-whips.

With a sudden rush the whole troop swept past him, and no sooner had they done so than he was irresistibly impelled to raise his head above the wall a little, and peep at them.

They did not remain long in view, being hidden from his sight by the thick, interposing branches of hundreds of trees.

Nevertheless, he could hear them, and this sufficed to let him know they were still galloping along the highway.

"Now," said Tom, to himself, "forward once more—forward! And every step I take will indeed increase the distance between the officers and myself! If I am careful, in a little while I shall be rid of them, for no one has seen me enter this place, and there will be nothing to serve them as a clue to the way I have taken."

Imagining, however, that little advantage was to be gained by keeping close under the shadow of the wall, Tom gradually increased his distance from it, being induced to do so by the fact that the vegetation was more scanty further from it, and consequently he was thus enabled to make better speed.

And now he came to a portion of the park—for park it was—consisting only of turf, and being entirely destitute of trees.

Over this he went at full gallop, then stopped, for before him was a dense preserve.

He hesitated a moment as to whether he should endeavour to force his way among the thickly-growing trees.

But he resolved not to turn aside; he was going now in the right direction, and the chances were that this plantation would not be of any great extent.

Just as he was about to enter it, he perceived a board nailed up to one of the largest trees.

Some words were painted on it in white letters, but this was all he could make out—there was not light enough to read by.

"A caution against trespassing, I suppose," muttered Tom, with a light laugh. "Well, I need not trouble about that. If anyone attempts to interrupt my progress, they will find they have an ugly customer to deal with!"

With this reflection he pushed his way through the trees, hoping in a little time that they would become less dense.

For the most part, they were saplings, with thin, supple boughs, which were easily displaced.

Every now and then the faint cry of some night bird would reach his ears, and then there would be a whirring and fluttering of wings as some large bird or other would be disturbed from his perch.

Tom's mind was now comparatively easy, for he fully indulged in the belief that he had got rid of the police officers entirely.

All around him was so very still and quiet, and so unsuggestive of the presence of his fellow-creatures, that it is no wonder such a feeling should occupy his breast.

That confidence, nevertheless, was suddenly shaken.

His horse stopped abruptly, and uttered a loud cry, unmistakably of pain.

It struggled and kicked furiously; but one foot was fast.

It plunged again, and then Tom was conscious that one of the horse's hoofs had struck against some other obstacle.

The action was instantaneously followed by a flash and a loud report.

At the same time the horse plunged again, snorted, and then fell down all at once as if struck by lightning.

Tom with difficulty disengaged his feet from the stirrups in time enough to prevent himself from receiving any injury by this fall, but he did so.

These last events had occurred so suddenly and so unexpectedly that for a few minutes he was stunned and completely bewildered; not being able to comprehend what had happened, he was surprised that the report of the gun should not have been followed up by any attack upon him.

He stooped down to look more closely about him.

Examination served to banish his bewilderment. It was plain enough to see what had happened.

The owner of the preserve, in order to prevent others from poaching on his domain, had placed man-traps and spring-guns in various places.

In one of the former Tom's horse had placed his fore foot.

It was this which had brought him so suddenly to a stop, and which elicited the cry of fright and pain.

The horse was now lying quite still, either dead or dying, and so artfully had the deadly weapon been contrived that its contents had proved mortal.

Tom congratulated himself upon his own narrow escape from sudden death, the recollection of which served to make the calamity of the loss of his horse sink into comparative unimportance.

Any attempt to recover his horse he saw was fruitless, and how to repair his loss he knew not.

Yet a moment's thought told him that probably in the grounds some other horse would be found which he might be able to capture.

The trappings would be necessary, and these he hastened to divest his horse of.

The saddle had been removed. He was in the act of pulling off the bridle, when there came suddenly upon him the flash of many lights, the sound of voices, the trampling of footsteps, and the crackling of the underwood.

"Stand still!" roared a loud voice—"stand still! If you move one step we will all fire, and your death will be certain! Surrender—you are our prisoner!"

Confused by this sudden and unexpected turn of affairs, and dazzled by the lights which proceeded from the lanterns carried by the men, Tom stood still, as he had been commanded.

He gazed anxiously around, and saw that he was surrounded by several men—one-half bearing lanterns, the light of which was turned full upon him; the other half with guns pressed against their shoulders, and with the muzzles pointed at his breast.

CHAPTER CMXXX.

IN WHICH THE GAMEKEEPERS MAKE TOM KING A FAST PRISONER.

In that brief, rapid, but comprehensive glance, Tom King saw something more, which served, to some extent, to allay the alarm that was rising in his breast. The men by whom he was confronted and called upon to surrender were not attired either in the costume of police officers or of dragoons.

They were, indeed, as their dress plainly showed, neither more nor less than gamekeepers, who, hearing the explosion of the spring-gun, had hastened to that part of the preserve.

"I surrender," said Tom King. "I have no intention of attempting to make my escape. You see I have met with an accident."

The word was repeated by the gamekeepers in tones of surprise and derision.

But three of them stepping nimbly forward, placed themselves one on each side and the other behind him.

"What are you about to do?" he asked. "Why do you make me your prisoner?"

"For poaching."

Tom laughed loudly.

"Poaching?" he said. "The idea of such a joke! I should like to know who ever heard of a man going poaching on horseback."

"Well, if not poaching, it's trespassing," said one of the gamekeepers, in a gruff voice, "and that's all the same to us—Sir Thomas does not allow either the one or the other; so come along!"

"Pooh, pooh!" said Tom—"there's no necessity whatever to trouble Sir Thomas in the matter—I am sure it can be settled easily between us. Look here—you can see what kind of an accident I have met with. In my ignorance of where I was, having lost my way, I blundered into this preserve. My horse put his foot into the trap, touched the wire connected with the spring-gun, and so has met with his death."

"That may be all right enough," said the gamekeeper who had last spoken, "but it is trespass, and we have strict orders to take all trespassers into custody."

"Yes, I know all about that," said Tom, "but there are exceptions to every case, and I suppose a little consideration from me will put matters quite straight."

There was a silence, and Tom said:

"Let me see. Why, there are six of you. Now I suppose a couple of guineas each, or something like that, would be very acceptable to all of you, and no one would be the wiser."

"Well," said the gamekeeper, "of course, if you are prepared to treat us liberally, that's another thing, and your business might be urgent enough to make it worth while to pay something to be let off."

"Decidedly," said Tom—"decidedly."

He plunged his hand first into one pocket and then into another, but, to his consternation, discovered he had not about him anything more than some loose silver.

The gamekeepers began once more to look distrustfully and suspiciously upon him.

Tom was greatly mortified, for he saw that if he had only happened to possess a few guineas he would easily have got out of his present situation.

Not that it was particularly an alarming one, but, then if he did not extricate himself from it at once, there was no knowing what complications it might lead to.

"My good friends," he said, "I have not about me the amount I promised, but I give you my word of honour you shall have it at any time that you think proper to appoint—say to-morrow night. I will meet one of you, or all of you, anywhere you choose, and will give you the amount."

"Oh, gammon!" said the one who, by the common consent of his fellows, took the lead in the affair—"gammon! I thought how much you were going to give us in money. You will take notice," he added, addressing the others, "that we are all witnesses to his having offered to bribe us with money to get off."

"Yes—yes."

"Now, take care!" said Tom. "I give you my word, and you may depend that I shall not go back from it; but if you refuse, why, then you will find that I shall turn out a rough customer to deal with."

"Oh, all right," said the gamekeepers—"we will take the risk of all that. Now, then, just march along, will you, or it will be the worse for you!"

While these words were spoken, those three gamekeepers who had already taken hold of Tom King tightened their grasp upon him, while the three others immediately placed themselves in the rear, and pressed the muzzles of their guns against his back."

In this position he was commanded to proceed, and threatened, in case of his refusal, that the guns should be discharged, the men alleging that Sir Thomas would take care to hold them blameless.

There was an amount of rough, savage earnestness about the manner in which these men spoke that could not by any possibility be mistaken.

Tom King instinctively felt that they would not hesitate to carry their threat into execution.

He most bitterly regretted now that he had allowed himself to be taken captive at all, since by so doing he had shut himself out from all chance of regaining his liberty.

Disagreeable and repugnant as it was to him, he had no other resource than to comply with the demands of these men, and to march ignominiously forward.

They pushed him on, indeed, at a much greater speed, and with much more violence, than was at all necessary.

Tom King disdained to say another word to those fellows, but he kept himself particularly on the alert, so as to be able to take advantage of any trifling circumstance that might arise that was capable of being turned to his benefit.

The men knew every inch of the ground, and consequently took the shortest way out of the preserve.

Tom then found himself in a large meadow, beyond which over the tree tops he could dimly distinguish the chimneys of a habitation.

This he expected was the residence of the Sir Thomas who had been mentioned by the gamekeepers.

In the same manner as before Tom was hurried across this meadow, and so by a rather circuitous route to the back part of a large, old-fashioned building—one of those comfortable residences of dull red brick which the great landed proprietors were so fond of building two or three centuries ago.

As the hour was late, this mansion—for such it might be termed—was plunged in darkness, save and except that from one solitary window came forth a beam of light.

Manifestly their destination was this building, and Tom began to wonder whether it would not be better to run the risk of receiving a wound from the gun rather than suffer himself to be carried beneath any roof.

But before he had time to make up his mind on this point a door was opened, through which he was quickly hustled.

Then he found himself in a small chamber on the ground floor, wherein a huge fire was burning.

This chamber, he imagined, was chiefly for the use of the gamekeepers while engaged on night duty.

An old man, with a stern-looking face, to whom the gamekeepers showed some degree of deference, was the only inmate of this apartment, and he rose slowly to his feet when the throng entered.

"A prisoner, Ambrose," said one of the gamekeepers. "We caught him trespassing in the north plantation. Just open the door, will you, and we will make him right till morning."

The man addressed as Ambrose took a huge key from his pocket, which he fitted into a small, strong-looking door, which Tom did not notice until he thus went towards it.

The gamekeepers pushed him on, so that he was compelled to follow in the footsteps of this man.

Passing through this door, however, he found himself at the foot of a winding flight of stairs, and then he was made to ascend them, very much against his will.

The ascent was long and trying, and Tom felt certain that he must be at the very top of the building.

Suddenly Ambrose stopped, and pushed open another door that grated harshly upon its hinges.

Across the threshold of the room into which it led Tom was thrust, and then, as quick as lightning, the door was closed, locked, and bolted.

The man descended the stairs again, after which all was still.

As Tom had comprehended, the room in which he now stood was at the very top of the mansion.

It was always used for the reception of those prisoners who might be made by the gamekeepers during the night, and it was rarely indeed that it was without an occupant, for Sir Thomas was one of those strict preservers of game who looked upon the unlawful slaughtering of a bird or hare as a crime almost worthy of being punished by death.

As often happens, however, the very severity of the punishment did not deter the people from continually poaching upon his domains, and it was supposed that he lost more game in this manner than any other resident in the county.

The chamber was very dark, but Tom King managed after awhile to see dimly about him.

Articles of furniture there were none—not even a bench on which to sit.

There was only one window, and that was scarcely deserving of the name, being merely a square opening in the wall, placed so high up as to be considered out of reach of everyone.

Upon that window Tom's eyes at once fixed themselves.

From what the reader knows already of his character, it may be guessed that he did not for one moment intend to submit quietly to any fate Sir Thomas or his myrmidons might design for him.

His immediate object was to escape, and that object he determined to effect somehow or other.

Walking close up to the wall beneath the window, he reached up with his hands as high as he could, and found that the tips of his fingers were a few inches from the sill of the window.

A slight spring from the ground, however, enabled him to hook his fingers over it, and the grasp thus obtained was sufficient to enable him to draw himself up until his breast was level with his hands.

Then he saw, somewhat to his surprise, that the window was defended only by one perpendicular iron bar, which looked to be far enough away from the wall on either side to allow his body to pass through.

Clinging tightly with his left hand, Tom reached out with his right, and took hold of this iron bar just mentioned.

By the aid of this he was able to draw himself up a.d higher and higher.

As he expected, there was just room to allow hi head and shoulders to pass between the wall on one side and the bar on the other.

He looked down, and for a moment felt rather giddy.

He saw, at a great height from the ground beneath him, at all manner of angles and at varying depths, the roof of the building, and from his position he made out that he was in a kind of circular turret that rose up from the centre.

For what purpose this tower was designed he knew not, but just then he was startled by hearing a clock strike the hour.

The sounds were sonorous to a degree, and Tom then found that above him was a large turret clock.

He looked down, and wondered how he should escape.

He was no longer surprised that the window should have been left comparatively so unguarded.

Few, indeed, would be able to climb up to it at all—those who did would naturally hesitate and shrink before they attempted to lower themselves from such a height.

Indeed had not Tom King had a price upon his head, and knew that so many were thirsty for his blood, he would have banished all further contemplation of making his escape.

The remembrance of these facts, however, nerved him to such deeds as would make others not similarly situated shrink back appalled.

The distance to the roof immediately beneath the window was considerable, and, moreover, this roof slanted at a very sharp angle, so that in dropping upon it it would not be possible to retain any hold.

Seeing, however, that rolling down the tiles he should only fall into a gutter formed by another portion of the roof sloping from an opposite direction, Tom King resolved to run the risk.

It was a matter of some difficulty to turn round in such a confined space as he was now in, but this feat was accomplished, and he began slowly to lower himself through the window feet foremost.

He continued to do so until he held only by his hands, with his body remaining stretched at the full length of his arms.

He did not dare to look below, to hesitate, or to think upon the consequences of his fall.

He shut his eyes and released his grasp.

He came with a sharp shock upon the tiles, several of which were loosened by the violence of his fall.

Half sliding, half rolling, he continued to descend until brought up by the gutter of which we have made mention.

Here he remained for some minutes, only partially in possession of his consciousness.

But what sense that remained to him was fully occupied in listening, in order to ascertain whether any alarm had been given by the noise he had made.

So far as he could tell, however, all was well, and at length he scrambled to his feet.

He found that he was badly bruised, but as yet did not suffer much pain—that would come in time, no doubt.

Judging by what he had already accomplished, Tom King had little more to do, and yet it was no easy task to look forward to having to reach the ground from the top of that lofty habitation.

But Tom scrambled over the roof tops until he reached the outer parapet.

Along the inside of this he crept until he had almost made a circuit of the building.

Then he came to a spot where there was another roof below him, apparently belonging to some outbuilding.

Straining his eyes, he could make out beneath him something that looked like a large yard, with stables on one side of it, and coach-houses on the other.

"Ah!" he said, "this is the place to descend. Confound Sir Thomas and his gamekeepers! they have given me some trouble, but they shall pay for it! I've lost one horse, but I'll take good care not to quit these premises until I have supplied his place with the very best animal to be found in his stables. And here goes, for the sooner I am off the better."

Tom then, with great daring and apparent recklessness, climbed over the parapet, and by the aid of an iron pipe fixed against the wall, slid rapidly down until his feet rested on the roof beneath.

CHAPTER CMXXXI

TOM KING ESCAPES FROM HIS TEMPORARY PRISON, AND PROVIDES HIMSELF WITH ANOTHER HORSE.

THE further progress of Tom King was, comparatively speaking, easy enough.

From this roof he descended to another not far beneath it.

From that to another outbuilding, and then to the ground.

Scarcely, however, had his feet touched the ground than, with a suppressed, savage growl, a dog sprang at him.

It was one of those sly, treacherous animals which give no warning of their presence until within reach of their victim.

Tom King, however, partly in surprise, and partly in dread of receiving a bite from this savage creature, gave such a bound that he escaped his fangs.

At the same moment his hands came in contact with a pitchfork that was resting against the wall.

To seize hold of this, and use it as a weapon of defence, was the work of a second.

The dog came rushing on, and then received such a blow as sent him back howling.

With desperate courage he renewed the attack, and Tom King, being more self-possessed than before, raised his weapon, and waited patiently.

When the moment came, he dealt the animal a blow that stretched it senseless, if not lifeless, upon the ground.

But all this had not been done without creating a great deal of noise.

Indeed, there seemed every probability that the alarm would in a moment be raised.

Had he been so minded, however, it would have been perfectly easy for Tom King to have made his escape from the yard at that moment, but he determined to carry out the intention he had originally expressed, and accordingly darted at full speed towards the door leading to the stables.

The door was not locked, but merely latched, that being considered quite sufficient protection, for the grooms and stable-helpers all slept close at hand.

Fully impressed with the necessity of making the utmost speed, Tom King seized hold of one of the horses—the first one he came to—and led it out.

On the end of the stall had been hung a saddle and bridle, and these Tom flung on rather than properly placed them.

One bound placed him in the saddle; then, bending his head low down upon the horse's neck, he urged him forward, and darted through the door into the yard.

This was a proceeding that took greatly by surprise, and much disconcerted, a man who, having been aroused by the barking of the dog, and yet not knowing what had caused it, had descended to ascertain what was the matter.

Seeing the stable door open, he had hastened towards it, and he had just reached the threshold when Tom darted forth in the manner we have described.

The man was thrown down at once, and with a prodigious clatter the highwayman reached the yard.

By this time, however, the alarm had been given generally.

The gate leading into this yard had been left open by the gamekeepers, and Tom saw a man hurrying to close it.

But spurring his horse savagely, he caused the animal to start off at full gallop.

The gate was passed before anyone had time to close it, and the next moment Tom King was making his way at a tremendous rate across a large piece of smooth, level turf.

He felt now that he had nothing to fear, yet was nevertheless desirous of getting off Sir Thomas's estate as quickly as he could.

Takings things altogether, he had much to congratulate himself upon, though now, as he began to grow somewhat cooler, the effect of the different bruises he had received made themselves painfully apparent.

At length, to his disappointment, he found himself again opposite that high wall that had been erected upon the boundaries of Sir Thomas's property—a wall of such a height that it was quite out of the question to think of getting a horse over it.

The only thing that remained in Tom's power was to follow its course until he met with a gateway similar to the one through which he had previously passed.

This, however, might cause him some little additional difficulty, for probably there would be time to allow of men being posted at the various exits from the estate.

Time was clearly of importance, and so he again spurred his horse.

He was pleased to find that the animal of which he had so recently possessed himself was of tolerable quality.

His stamp was good, though it would seem by his manner that he had lately performed a long journey, and had not yet recovered from the fatigue occasioned by it.

After going about a quarter of a mile further to the left, Tom found another gate, and just as he reached it he happened to look back towards the mansion.

Then he saw in the darkness lights flashing about, from which it was evident close search and pursuit were being made after him.

However, he was now quite clear and free from danger.

He opened the gate and rode through on to the broad, well-beaten highway.

At first he fancied he had emerged upon the very same road he had so lately quitted, but upon looking more carefully around he soon became convinced that this was an error.

The road he was now upon ran almost parallel to the other, but it was at a considerable distance from it.

Turning the horse's head in the direction of the country, he allowed the animal to proceed at an easy rate, as there was now no immediate hurry, and he wished to reserve its strength as much as possible.

After going for some distance without accident, he reached a point where the road divided, forming what is called a fork.

The triangular piece of ground formed by the junction of the roads consisted of a field well defended by high, thick hedges.

Tom King as he approached gradually slackened his speed, for he was somewhat in doubt as to which of these two roads he should take.

While in this state of uncertainty, a man suddenly started up from behind the hedge just at the sharp angle of the road.

Tom uttered an exclamation as soon as he saw him.

The man raised his hand, though for what purpose Tom did not guess.

The next moment there was a flash and a report, and, with a whistling sound, something sped past the highwayman, which he knew at once to be a bullet.

The occurrence was so strange a one that he could scarcely make it out.

This man had evidently been lying in wait for him to make his appearance, and yet how should he know that he was about to reach that point?

Again, it seemed as though the man had purposely missed him—it was either that or else he was a terribly bad marksman, for Tom was only a few yards distant.

The most probable thing was, that this man had been placed there to watch for the appearance of some one else, for whom Tom King had been mistaken.

The highwayman's first impulse was to start in pursuit of this man, who appeared to be at an immediate retreat upon discovering his mistake.

But a second thought induced Tom to alter his mind.

"It seems to me," he said, "that I know the means of rendering some one or other a valuable service. That rascal beyond doubt has been posted here by some one to assassinate some gentleman who is expected to be riding this way about this time. I will save him—or, at any rate, I will put him on his guard."

Accordingly, although he was running no small personal risk by so doing, Tom King turned his horse again, and rode slowly in the direction he had just been coming.

But he did not go much more than a quarter of a mile.

He pulled up then, for he by no means relished getting too near to Sir Thomas's estate.

Scarcely had he come to a halt than the clear, unmistakable sound of a horse's hoofs upon the road reached his ears.

"The intended victim comes," he muttered. "But, whoever he may be, he shall be saved from the fate that awaits him! That rascal shall be disappointed!"

Upon a second thought, Tom King thought it would be better to ride forward slowly to meet this approaching horseman than to remain in waiting, and he accordingly restrained his horse, allowing it to go simply at a walk.

In a few moments he perceived before him in the distance the dusky figure of a man on horseback.

To protect himself from the cold night air he had wrapped around him a thick travelling cloak.

As soon as ever he was near enough, Tom King raised his voice, and said:

"Hold, sir! let me entreat you to stay—let me warn you that your life is in danger."

The horseman checked his speed irresolutely, and seemed half inclined to gallop past our friend.

It was by no means strange that he should have his doubts as to the advisability of allowing a stranger to come close to him at a time when the roads were so unsafe for all travellers as they were then.

Tom guessed what was passing in his mind, and endeavoured to reassure him.

"You need be under no apprehension," he said; "you will receive no harm from me—in fact, I have turned altogether out of my way in order that I might be able to give you this necessary warning. Bethink yourself, sir; have you an enemy?"

The stranger hesitated for some moments before he replied.

Then, in a constrained voice, he said:

"I think not."

"I differ with you," said Tom. "Chance entirely has brought me upon this road to-night, and while riding a little distance further on a man suddenly started up from behind the hedge at the junction of the high-road, and fired a pistol at me. The shot could not have been intended for myself, but he was evidently placed there to assassinate some one who was expected to be passing by about this time."

The stranger received this intelligence with considerable coolness—in fact, his misgivings as to the character of the man who had accosted him had increased.

"If it was known to anyone that it was your intention to be upon this road at about this time to-night, let me entreat you to turn aside and travel by some other way; if not I fear your life may be the forfeit."

The stranger walked his horse slowly forwards, and as he did so he addressed Tom King in a sneering, sarcastic tone of voice.

"My good sir," he said, "I am obliged to you—infinitely obliged to you! But no doubt I shall stand as good a chance of escaping from the bullet as you did yourself."

"Stay!" said Tom, perceiving that he continued to ride on—"stay—stay! for I am convinced the man saw that I was not the person he was on the look-out for, though he did not discover his mistake in time to check himself in discharging the pistol."

"I again repeat that I am obliged to you," answered the stranger, as sneeringly as before. "My way lies in this direction, and I shall take it. You will excuse me, but I never like to form acquaintances on the road, so oblige me by keeping your distance."

As he spoke he spurred his horse, and the animal started onward at a kind of cantering gallop.

"Well," said Tom, to himself "this is a specimen of ingratitude surely, and yet, after all, the man is not to be blamed. At any rate, I will try to save him even now."

Accordingly, Tom rode after the stranger, who had nevertheless in this short space of time obtained a tolerably good start.

[TOM KING TAKES A DESPERATE LEAP FOR LIFE.]

Tom rode on swiftly, keeping his horse not upon the highway, but upon the strip of turf that lay upon one side of it, so that his approach was almost noiseless.

Still he was afraid he should not be in time to render the stranger the assistance he expected he would need, for already he could see before him the spot where the roads converged.

There was just a question whether the man, after having made this failure, would remain at his post and make a second attempt.

Tom's mind was occupied upon this point, when suddenly he saw a bright flash of light.

He uttered an ejaculation that was drowned by the report of the firearm, and then, with a loud cry, the stranger fell headlong from his horse.

"I will catch the assassin, at all risks!" was Tom's next determination, and he urged his horse to his utmost speed in order to carry it out.

No. 191.—BLACK BESS.

He could not fail to give some indications of his approach, and these must have been overheard by the assassin, for he beat an immediate retreat.

Tom was not to be baffled, however, but kept up his pursuit.

On reaching the triangular meadow, however, and looking around him, not a trace of a human being could be seen.

For a long time he searched rigidly in every direction, but in vain—no trace of the assassin could be found.

He had evidently secreted himself in some well-contrived hiding-place.

The failure in his purpose filled Tom King with no small degree of chagrin.

But finding his efforts here were useless, he turned them to another quarter, where he hoped his aid would be welcome.

Accordingly, he hastened to place himself by the side of the stranger, who now lay immovable in the centre of the high-road.

Fortunately, his feet had become disengaged from the stirrups as he fell.

The horse had vanished. But had the stranger's feet remained entangled, he must have been dragged, a bruised and bleeding mass, at the heels of the terrified animal.

Alighting, and stooping over him, Tom raised him gently from the ground.

"Speak, sir," he said—"speak if you can, and tell me what I can do in your behalf."

After a deep sigh, or rather groan, the prostrate traveller spoke.

"Ah! it's you, is it? You have come now to exult, I suppose, and to reproach me for having despised your warning. Go—go! I desire nothing but to be left to myself."

"I am sorry to find you in this mood," said Tom King. "I am prompted by motives of humanity only, and I assure you if there is anything I can do, any service I can render, you have but to speak, and it shall cheerfully be performed."

CHAPTER CMXXXII.

TOM KING REACHES, AS HE BELIEVES, VERY COMFORTABLE QUARTERS.

The stranger groaned again, and pressed his hand tightly upon his left breast, on the spot where the bullet had struck him.

"If you live near this place," continued Tom, "tell me so, and direct me to it. I will lead you thither; or, if you are too much hurt to allow of that, I will hasten off and summon assistance."

That deep-seated feeling of mistrust or suspicion which was so prominent in the stranger now somewhat broke down, and when he spoke again it was in a tone of voice totally different to that which he had previously employed.

"Forgive me," he said, "for my rough, suspicious manner! If you knew all, you would not wonder at my behaviour. I do not live far from here. My house is almost within sight, but whether I shall ever reach it again alive, I know not."

"Let us hope so!" said Tom. "Do you think, if I bound up your hurt to the best of my ability, and raised you to your feet, that you could manage to seat yourself upon my horse? If so, I would lead him gently to your home."

"You are very kind and considerate," said the stranger, in accents of amazement. "I cannot understand why you should take all this trouble with one who is a perfect stranger to you."

Tom King thought fit to disregard this speech—at any rate, he did not make any reply to it, but busied himself in rudely bandaging up the ugly-looking wound the stranger had received.

Then, as suggested, he raised him to his feet, and after that, with much difficulty, the stranger was assisted into the saddle.

By his directions, Tom led the animal forward.

On the way but few words were exchanged.

Tom endeavoured to keep up a conversation, but the stranger remained silent, and therefore Tom desisted.

The truth was, the stranger was much more severely hurt than either himself or the highwayman imagined, and it was as much as ever he could do to retain his seat in the saddle.

His brain swam, and at every step he felt as though he must fall sideways to the ground.

A deadly feeling of faintness also came stealing over him, but the house was now within sight.

It stood quite alone, surrounded by its own spacious grounds, and was situated almost at the summit of a gently-rising piece of ground.

On reaching the lodge gates, which were closed, Tom seized the bell handle, and gave it a hearty pull.

But scarcely had he done so than, with a sudden rush, the stranger fell heavily to the ground.

Tom darted forward as he saw him falling, but was not in time to save him.

Some little delay took place before the lodgekeeper appeared, and when the door was opened, Tom cried:

"A light—a light! Be quick—fetch a light!"

An old man came forth, carrying in his hands a candle, which he had quickly placed inside a battered lantern.

He uttered an exclamation of grief and surprise at what he saw.

"Quick!" said Tom. "Give me the light! Let me look at him!"

"My poor master!" said the lodgekeeper. "Oh, help—help! Who will ride off for the doctor?"

"I sadly fear no human aid would be availing," replied Tom King, who by this time had inspected the stranger's countenance. "There can be no mistaking its expression," he added. "Your master, if such he be, is dead."

"Dead?" said the old man. "Oh, what shall I do—what shall I do?"

"Help me to carry him inside the lodge," said Tom, "and as soon as you have done that, send some one for a doctor—I will remain here."

Tom's suggestion was promptly carried out.

The lifeless body of the stranger was placed gently on a rude kind of bench, near the fire, on the ground floor of the lodge.

The old man then took his departure, hastening off at a speed that one would scarcely have expected from a man of his years.

Tom King looked again into the stranger's countenance.

There could be no doubt that life had fled for ever.

The interior of the lodge was most oppressive to Tom, and he sallied forth to keep watch outside.

He had secured his horse to the gate, and now he went up to it, and patted it gently.

While so engaged, he fancied he heard a well-known sound.

He listened again, and was convinced that his ears had not deceived him.

Persons on horseback were approaching the spot, and, from the direction they were coming, most probably would be the party of police officers he had been at so much pains to elude.

He hesitated a moment as to what course he should adopt.

If he went inside the lodge the officers might ride past without suspecting his presence.

But then, on the other hand, their aid might be called for by some of the servants, in which case Tom would be recognised, and in all probability the death of the unfortunate gentleman laid to his charge.

This consideration, and also the reflection that he could not possibly do any good by remaining, made Tom resolve to seek safety in flight.

Accordingly, untying his horse, he sprang into the saddle, and, again taking to the open country, galloped off across the fields at the best speed of which his horse was capable.

From time to time he glanced back, but he saw nothing of the police officers.

This was not so very surprising, considering trees were growing in clusters here and there, which prevented a clear or uninterrupted view being taken.

Arriving at the summit of a hill, Tom King drew rein to look about him.

Already in the east, he could perceive unmistakable indications of the approach of the coming day.

"It is time I found some place of shelter," he thought; "and yet where shall I find it? As yet to-night I have not had the opportunity of remaining more than a few moments in any place without being molested. Where, then, can I hope to conceal myself for a long period?"

While these thoughts were passing through Tom's mind, his eyes rested successively upon the various objects of which the landscape was composed.

But although he saw many things, he shook his head at every one of them, for none promised him any chance of the shelter he sought.

"I must ride on," he said, "and trust to the chapter of events. I cannot do wrong by getting away from London, so this is clearly the course I ought to take."

Turning his back to the faint grey flush of light in the east, Tom King took his course steadily forward into the open country.

He looked about him incessantly with great wariness, but he saw nothing whatever of a character to excite his apprehensions.

A feeling of great fatigue, however, began to creep over him, a feeling which at first he tried hard to banish, but failed. It would assert itself in spite of all his efforts.

This made him all the more desirous of finding some place whereat to rest.

He was also forcibly reminded that a long time had elapsed since he had partaken of any food.

The district he was in, however, seemed very thinly populated, for not so much as a rudely-built, thatched cottage met his gaze.

Still he rode on, until the darkness of night rolled away and daylight fairly came.

The sun rose and climbing high up in the sky found him still pursuing his lonely course, growing at each step more and more exhausted.

The sight of a thin wreath of blue smoke curling up from among some trees a little distance in advance roused him into fresh life and animation.

Quickening his horse's steps, he shortly found himself in front of one of those old-fashioned places, half farm-house and half inn, which a hundred years ago were commonly found all over the country.

As was usually the case, there was an air of peaceful serenity dwelling around this place, and Tom immediately became susceptible to its influence.

"If I only dared to run the risk of staying here," he muttered, "how comfortable I could make myself for a short time, but I fear it is not to be thought of. No, no; it would be unsafe in the highest degree. I had better not be seen even."

Tom was about to ride on, when just at that moment the front door of the inn was thrown open and an elderly man with round, stooping shoulders made his appearance.

"Good morning, sir," he said, in a civil, offhanded tone of voice. "Do you wish to stay here? I have the best of entertainment for man and beast."

Tom hesitated.

"Think twice before you decide to go on," said the landlord; "for, judging from your appearance, you have made a very long journey, and must be fatigued. Don't ride on with the expectation of finding some other place, for you will have to go twelve miles at the least before you meet with a chance of halting again; and then the accommodation you get there is not for a moment to be compared to what you will have here."

"You are not troubled with many visitors, I suppose?" said Tom, thoughtfully.

"No, not many, I am sorry to say. The sight of a traveller is quite a treat. If I depended only upon what the inn produced I should have been in the workhouse long ago."

Tom was pleased to find that the house was of so lonely a character, and he imagined as well that at the present moment there was no other traveller resting beneath its roof, or the landlord would have mentioned the fact.

Then Tom began to consider that it was unlikely indeed that his foes would find him out at this place.

"I will stay," he said, suddenly, unable to resist the temptation—"I will stay, landlord, and I shall look to you to make me comfortable."

With quite a radiant smile upon his face, the landlord came forward, and was profuse in his expressions of welcome.

"You keep no groom or ostler, I suppose?" was Tom's next remark.

"No, I should have nothing for him to do. I will attend to your horse, sir, if you please; don't be afraid to entrust him to my care."

"Not by any means," said Tom; "but as he is a particular favourite of mine I will walk with you to the stable, if you have no objection."

"None whatever," said the landlord—"none whatever; you are welcome to go wherever you please about the place."

"That's the way, then, I suppose?" said Tom, noticing his horse by the bridle and pointing to a wooden shed.

"Yes, that's the stable, and when you are inside it you will find that it is more comfortable than it appears."

Tom advanced, and in a few moments he had the satisfaction of seeing that his horse was properly attended to.

This being done, he returned with the landlord to the inn.

"There's no one up at present," he said to Tom, "excepting myself, but the missis and my daughter will be down directly. What would you like for breakfast?"

"Anything that you have in the house that you can get readily," was Tom's response. "Can you let me have a private room?"

The landlord smiled.

"They're all private enough for that matter," he said; "for while you are staying here I very much question whether I shall be so fortunate as to see another strange face. Two travellers stopping here in one day would indeed be an extraordinary occurrence."

Tom laughed as he said:

"But I should like a private room for all that; I should then be able to guard against any intrusion."

"Your wishes shall be attended to, sir. Step this way."

Then throwing open a door, the landlord added:

"This is our best parlour, sir, and you are heartily welcome to make use of it while you stay."

"And what about the breakfast?"

"Would ham and eggs suit you?"

"Excellently," said Tom; "and make haste!"

He seated himself in what the landlord called the best parlour.

It was indeed a very decent apartment, and Tom was by no means inclined to quarrel with it in any particular.

A feeling of great drowsiness came over him while he sat waiting for his breakfast, and to overcome it he was obliged to get up and walk round and round the room.

He paused several times to look through the window, which commanded a view of an extensive piece of country.

But all as far as he could see was perfectly quiet.

"I believe I shall be safe here," he muttered to himself for about the hundredth time. "I think I might venture to go to sleep."

The meal was brought in and done ample justice to, and when the landlord came to remove the cloth he said:

"I don't know how long you may be wishing to stay, sir, but don't hurry off on any account, only——"

He paused.

"What?" asked Tom.

"Only I have some particular business to do in the next town, and I shall be obliged to go to-day. It only happens once in a year, and I have to make the journey, and it is especially aggravating that it should come now."

"Not at all," said Tom—"not at all! I am inclined to rest more on my horse's account than my own, and perhaps I may remain here the greater part of the day; most likely you will find me here upon your return."

Upon hearing this, the countenance of the landlord brightened.

"You will be well attended to," he said. "I will give particular instructions about that."

"Thanks," returned Tom; "but I don't think I shall give much trouble."

"Very good, sir, just as you like, but if you want anything just touch the bell, and it will be answered at once."

"I shall take a nap if I can," replied Tom, "for I have a long ride before me as yet. However, you leave me to make myself comfortable."

The landlord withdrew, and Tom, still fighting against the irresistible inclination he felt to fall asleep, walked about until he had seen the landlord take his departure.

After that the silence of the inn grew more and more oppressive, and Tom, unable any longer to keep his eyes open, laid himself down at full length upon the comfortable sofa placed against the wall on one side of the parlour, and had no sooner assumed a recumbent position than he fell fast asleep—so fast that he was altogether dead to all external noises—so fast that not even the approach of a body of horsemen in the front of the inn would arouse him, as was proved by the fact of such an arrival taking place several hours after he had first closed his eyes in slumber.

CHAPTER CMXXXIII.

IN WHICH TOM KING MEETS WITH A VERY GREAT SURPRISE.

It seemed to Tom that he had only closed his eyes for the space of a moment when he opened them again.

To his surprise and confusion, however, he saw around him nothing but darkness.

He sat up on the sofa and rubbed his eyes doubtful whether he was really awake

A second glance around him assured him that there was no mistake upon this point.

His eyes rested upon the window, through which he could obtain a glimpse of the night sky.

"Can it really be," he muttered, "that I have slept away the whole of this day. I can hardly believe it, and yet——"

He stopped suddenly, for he heard voices somewhere very close to him; indeed, at first, he could not make out from whence the sounds proceeded.

But he soon discovered that one side of the best parlour was composed only of a wooden partition, which divided it from another apartment, and it was in this last-named place that several persons were seated engaged in conversation.

Something had just been said, and caused a general laugh.

"We'll have more to drink," said a rough voice. "It's not worth while to go yet, our horses are so much exhausted; besides, I don't like leaving such a snug place as this."

"No—no!" came from several lips, and then another voice cried:

"Ring the bell."

The command was immediately followed by a sharp tinkling sound.

There could be no doubt whatever that during Tom King's long and deep sleep some visitors had actually arrived at the roadside public-house, and what was more, that they had arrived in tolerably strong numbers.

An immediate curiosity respecting them sprang up in Tom's breast.

He considered it was highly imperative that he should make himself acquainted with everything that was going on around him.

The next sound which reached his ears was the opening of a door, then a feminine voice asked what was wanted.

Rum punch was unanimously ordered, and the girl withdrew to prepare the steaming beverage.

By this time Tom's eyes had grown tolerably familiar to the semi-obscurity which filled the best parlour of the inn.

He was now able to see with a certain amount of distinctness even in the darkest and remotest corners.

His principal attention, however, was directed to the wooden partition.

He was wondering whether he could find any small chink or opening through which he could take a peep at the inmates of the next room.

Something that looked like a shutter or movable panel at the top of the partition at length rewarded his search, but it was far up out of his reach.

Before lying down, Tom had taken the precaution to lock the door; and now, on tiptoe, he crossed the room, picked up a table, and carried it with him, and placed it against that part of the partition.

By standing on this, however, Tom was scarce tall enough, for the panel was placed just where the partition joined the ceiling.

By placing a chair on the table, however, all difficulties were overcome.

Tom took care to mount as quietly as possible.

He found he had made no mistake—there really was a small door about a foot square in one of the upper panels.

Why it should have been placed in such a position he could not conceive, nor did he much trouble himself about the circumstance—he was content to find that it was there, and so convenient.

Care would have to be taken in opening it, so that while doing so the attention of those in the next room should not be attracted.

But this Tom accomplished by opening the door a very little way, and then pausing until, by degrees, it was opened sufficiently for him to look through.

Before this was the case, however, the girl had returned with the bowl of punch.

As she placed it on the table, one of the guests said:

"I think you told us, my dear, that you had no one staying in the house at the present time?"

"I don't remember that I said anything of the sort!" was the reply, given in a pert tone of voice.

"Oh yes, you did; or if you did not it don't matter. There is no one, I suppose?"

"Well, no one that I've seen," replied the girl; "but father said a gentleman arrived early this morning, and took the best parlour, but I have not seen or heard anything of him."

"Oh!" said the voice. "And pray where may your father be?"

"Why, he went over to Mapleton this morning, and has not come back, though I expect him every minute."

"Oh, very well!" was the reply. "Then, when he comes in, just tell him we want to speak to him."

"Very well, sir!"

"And also, should that gentleman you have not seen make any movement just let us know, will you? I have a curiosity to peep at him."

It was just at this moment that Tom King, who also had a curiosity to take a peep, looked through the panel he had so carefully opened.

What, then, was his amazement, not to say alarm, to perceive that quite a large party of police officers were seated most comfortably in the adjoining room, and separated from him by nothing more than a thin wooden partition.

He looked into their countenances one by one, but without recognising any.

In doing this he also counted them, and found the number to be fourteen.

How on earth they could have arrived there, and sat down to make merry, without his being aware of it, Tom could not imagine.

It seemed to him incredible that he could have slept so soundly.

By keeping his face at a little distance from the opening there was not much fear that any of the officers would see him, so Tom did not quit his exalted position, but remained with the determination of watching the course of events.

There was just a bare possibility that the officers might depart without seeing him at all; for, from the manner in which they were enjoying themselves it was evident they had no suspicion of his presence there.

"Are you sure," said another officer, who sat close to the fire—"are you sure, my dear, that you can't give us some sort of description of the gentleman who came so early this morning?"

"Why, now, how can I do any such thing? Didn't I say I hadn't seen him?"

"Yes, yes—to be sure you did!" was the answer. "But, then, your father might have mentioned what sort of a looking gentleman he was, or something of that sort."

"No, no—I hardly saw father this morning, he was off so soon, and he said nothing whatever on the subject."

"But you expect him back very soon, you say?"

"Yes, every minute. Hark! Do you hear that?"

"What?"

"The sound of wheels! It is father—I'll warrant it is father! People rarely pass here after dark."

The girl was proved to be correct, for the revolution of the wheels suddenly ceased.

"Then, my dear," said the officer seated at the fire, "if that's your father, just go quietly to him, and say that we are here, and want to ask him an important question."

The girl withdrew, and immediately afterwards returned. She had met her father in the passage.

Never did man look so astounded as he did upon finding the room so full of company.

Upon his entrance there was a momentary silence, so accordingly he made a kind of circular sidelong bow, in which he included every person present.

"Glad to see you, gentlemen," he said—"very glad indeed to see you! It's a coldish night outside, and the fire must be acceptable."

"Yes, yes, landlord," said the officer who had before spoken—"but come here; I want to speak to you quietly about something."

With wonder in his looks, the landlord complied.

"Your daughter tells me," said the officer, with great emphasis, and bringing the forefinger of his right hand into the palm of his left hand at every word he spoke, "that early this morning a traveller arrived here and took a private room."

"Yes, that's quite true, but he has gone by this time, surely?"

"No, he has not—at least, your daughter says so. Well, now, stop—don't run away; just listen to me!"

"I am listening."

"Well, then, in as few words as you can, and as quietly as you can, give me a description of that gentleman's appearance."

The landlord endeavoured to comply.

But he made a sad bungle of it.

"Hush!" said the officer, sinking his voice to a still lower tone. "Keep quiet—I don't want to raise an alarm. Just say whether he agrees or not with this description."

The officer pulled a bill out of his pocket, and folding it in the middle, began to read.

Scarcely had the first words passed his lips, however, than he was interrupted by a prodigious clatter—a noise that drowned every other sound.

"Goodness gracious alive!" ejaculated the landlord, staggering back—"what on earth is that?"

The officers, all startled by the noise, looked around, for it seemed to them it had actually been made in the very room in which they sat.

"What's on the other side of that partition?" roared the officer, thrusting the bill back into his pocket.

"Why, the best parlour."

"The best parlour?" he yelled. "Ten thousand devils! That's where the gentleman was, I suppose? Of course it is, and now he is escaping. But quietly, my lads—let us take it quietly! We have him—there's no occasion to trouble! Briggson is outside, and he will be after him, depend upon it!"

Just as he uttered these words, the loud report of a pistol made itself distinctly heard.

CHAPTER CMXXXIV.

IN WHICH TOM KING FINDS HE IS UNABLE TO SHAKE OFF HIS PURSUERS.

It was indeed from the best parlour in the inn that the tremendous clattering noise had come, and the cause of it was this.

When our old friend saw the police officer produce the bill and unfold it, he judged it was high time to be off; in fact, he believed that the very best thing for him to do under the circumstances was to beat as hasty a retreat as possible.

But there is such a thing as making too much haste, as Tom found to his cost, for in stepping from the chair on to the table he placed his foot much too near the edge of the latter, the consequence of which was that before he knew what was the matter the whole affair had overbalanced, and he was lying on the ground with the furniture upon him.

A cry of vexation escaped his lips at this untoward accident.

It would at once let the police officers know that he was on his guard and preparing to escape.

Scrambling to his feet, he scarcely knew how, he made a rush to the window.

From mere habit more than anything else, he had previously made himself acquainted with the nature of its fastenings, so that now he was able to fling it open quickly and easily.

To spring into the roadway was but the work of a second; and then, knowing perfectly well where his horse had been posted, he ran off in that direction.

Before he had gone many steps, however, he was challenged, and a voice commanded him to stop.

It was not likely that he would pay any attention to any such command as this, and so continued his course, if anything, with slightly-increased speed.

Then the man who had challenged him—being no other than Briggson, the officer, who had been put there on the look-out—deemed himself justified in producing his pistol and discharging it at the flying figure.

Tom felt the bullet whistle past him, or fancied he did; but he heard the report of the firearm, and so he knew he was safe

At that very moment he gained the stable door.

Never, probably, had a horse been got ready and mounted in so short a space of time as Tom's was now.

But the fact was, however, in the morning, when attending his steed, he had requested that the saddle might be left upon his back, doing no more than loosening the girths.

The bridle had been hung upon a hook close by.

Tom seized this bridle, and, without waiting to put it on, and without pausing either to tighten the saddle-girths, he vaulted into the saddle, providing himself with no other means of guiding his horse than the halter by which he had been secured to the manger.

Owing to these rapid and energetic proceedings, Tom was enabled to get outside the stable almost before Briggson had made up his mind whether he had hit the fugitive or not.

Still, the police officers had poured out from the inn, and were hastening as fast as their legs could carry them to another large shed, lying more at the rear of the inn, which had been rapidly turned into a stable on their arrival, for, as may be supposed, in a place of so little trade there was not accommodation for so many horses.

They saw him take his departure, and gave vent to a loud cry, as though to express their determination to give him full chase.

Tom, however, paid no attention to them, but hurried off.

He quickly found, though, that, practised as he was in the art of riding, it was by no means easy to keep the saddle in its proper place.

Having, then, gained a trifling start, he thought he might venture to pause while he made himself and his steed more comfortable.

Accordingly, he alighted, tightened the girths, pulled off the halter, and substituted the bridle.

These operations occupied only a few fleeting moments, yet the police officers were enabled in the meanwhile to mount and to commence the chase in good earnest.

Tom, however, now felt but little apprehension.

He was convinced that his new horse was a good one, and now that he had had so long a rest and been well provided with food, he would be in excellent condition for the road, and capable of making any amount of exertion that might be required of him.

In accordance with his usual habit, Tom King took to the fields. He had found by experience that riding across the country afforded him a much better chance of shaking off his pursuers than confining himself to the high-roads and lanes.

But from time to time he turned in the saddle and looked behind him, and each time that he did so he saw that the officers were unpleasantly close behind him.

He put his horse to increased speed, and coming to a very high hedge, made him leap over it.

The animal seemed nervous, for it shied and swerved, but Tom was resolute, and forced him to rise.

It was unfortunate, however, for the animal barely cleared the obstruction, and coming down awkwardly, slipped and fell upon its side, carrying Tom with it.

But the highwayman, though he released his feet from the stirrups, kept firm hold of the bridle, and was on his feet as soon as the horse was.

The noble creature trembled and shook all over.

Whether it was injured or not by the fall Tom could not tell, nor dare he pause to ascertain.

Once more springing into the saddle, he plunged the spurs deeply into his flanks.

The horse staggered at first, and then broke out into full gallop, showing pretty clearly that whatever injury he might have received was not of a very serious character.

"I rather think," said Tom, as he noted the length and uniform height of the hedge, "that that will be a slight obstruction in the way of my friends behind. But for my fall, I should have got clear of them easily."

As may be imagined, however, the delay this sudden fall occasioned enabled the officers to get much nearer.

Upon arriving at the hedge they pulled up by common consent. Not one felt inclined to run the risk of leaping over it.

"Quick!" said the one in command. "Speed will do it now, after all. Get your cutlasses and cut away these branches. It won't take a moment to make a gap large enough for us to pass through one at a time. Now, then, set to work!"

Long before he had finished giving his directions, one of the men had alighted, drawn his cutlass, and commenced an attack upon the hedge.

His weapon was sharp and his arm strong, and it was surprising to find what havoc he made among the closely-growing twigs.

A gap was soon made—not exactly large enough for the horses to walk through, but still such a one as they could leap over easily; and as soon as this was the case, the one in command cried:

"That will do, Parker—that will do now; up into the saddle, and all of you follow me."

He set the example of making his way through the gap, and the others followed without loss of time.

Tom King was not a little disconcerted when, on turning round again, he found that the officers had so easily overcome the obstruction.

He had hoped that they would be obliged to ride along the hedge until they came to a part low enough to allow them to leap over.

Still he did not despair, for he had a pleasant piece of country before him, and he did not doubt that in the long run he should tire out his pursuers.

Nevertheless, he wished to get the chase over as quickly as was possible, and so urged his horse to the utmost, for he was fearful that the animal would in a short time begin to feel the effects of his fall.

Yet it was vexatious, and in spite of all his exertions and efforts, the police officers kept about the same distance in the rear.

They did not gain on him in the least, nor did they lose ground.

There was a dogged obstinacy about this chase which made Tom King feel rather uncomfortable.

It was so palpable that the officers were determined to hold on in pursuit until they effected his capture.

For nearly as far as he could see the country round was as smooth and level as a bowling green, not affording him any chance of doubling upon them, or to put into execution any manœuvre whatever.

He was thus compelled to resort to his original expedient, namely, that of making the best speed in his power.

It was while things were in this unsatisfactory state that Tom King suddenly found on the other side of a hedge before which he halted the broad turnpike road.

Looking to the left, and seeing a white gate only a few yards off, he walked his horse towards it, preferring to do this rather than run the risk of another leap.

The difference in time was really not very great.

He closed the gate behind him, remounted, and then looked up and down on the opposite side, hoping to find a similar means of entering the next field.

Nothing of the kind presented itself, however, and as it would not do to linger, he turned in the direction that would lead him away from London, and continued his hasty flight, resolved, however, that the moment he caught sight of a gate that he would pull up and pass through it.

To his annoyance, however, he failed to see any gate whatever.

The officers finding that the object of their pursuit was hurrying along the high road, changed their course slightly.

Instead of riding direct for the gate through which Tom had passed, they took a diagonal direction, which would serve to cut off a very large corner indeed.

It did so; and Tom shortly afterwards had the additional mortification of discovering that the officers had gained very much upon him.

He saw a gate, but he felt it would be madness to stop now and attempt to pass through.

There was no resource save that of continuing his wild flight along the highway.

All at once, passing round a bend in the road, he perceived before him a small covered cart, the driver of which carefully drew out of his way.

Little did Tom suspect that in this cart was seated his old companion Dick.

Had any immortal being whispered such a thing in his ears he would have received the intimation with incredulity.

Amid the clattering sound produced by his horse's feet on the hard road, Tom fancied he distinguished another sound like a cry of startled surprise.

But he had no time to think about this, but bent all his energies to urging forward his horse at his utmost speed.

But as he was now out of sight of his pursuers, and as he could perceive before him a gate, Tom gradually relaxed his speed, and then dismounted.

The gate was locked, but a couple of good, smashing blows with a heavy stone that lay close at hand, demolished the padlock, and allowed him to pass through.

Tom crossed this field, and then the next, then paused.

He looked behind him.

To his surprise, he no longer saw his foes, and at this circumstance he wondered greatly.

He little knew the service Dick had rendered him by sending the officers across the country in the wrong direction.

But although the officers were not within sight, Tom did not feel satisfied to remain so close to them, and continued on his way until he was again brought to a stop by a tall hedgerow.

He paused when near it, and at the same moment he heard a voice exclaim:

"There he is—there he is, over in the meadow! Quick—quick! Run on and open the gate! We are close upon him!"

Now, these sounds were not a little bewildering to Tom King, for, of course, he imagined that these words were uttered by one of the officers who had given him such a long and persistent chase.

But the fact was, as the reader no doubt surmises, that these police officers were those under the immediate command of Jack Marshall himself, and whom Dick had left disputing with each other at the junction of the four cross roads.

At the first sight the officer who had called out had taken Tom King for Dick Turpin, which was a thing not unfrequently done, owing to the general resemblance there was between them.

Tom caught the alarm, and, turning his horse's head another way, began his flight afresh.

He was now growing terribly alarmed; he could not conceal the fact from himself.

Already his horse had had a long and wearying gallop, added to which he had met with a severe fall.

Now he was close to his foes again, all his previous exertions had gone for nothing.

It did indeed seem a disheartening state of things.

But Tom only gave way to this depression of spirits for about a moment.

Drawing a long breath and giving himself a good shake, he braced himself up, so to speak, and prepared to meet this fresh danger with which he was assailed.

The only thing which troubled him was the strangeness of the fact that the officers should be so close behind him when he believed them to be at a distance, for, strangely enough, the thought did not strike him that it was another party altogether.

Fortunately for him, the meadow he was now crossing was of unusual extent.

It was very level, and divided from another almost as large by a narrow, winding stream, or rather brook.

His horse leaped over this without any perceptible exertion, and Tom—by means of his voice, by doubling up the reins and using them as a whip, by spurring vigorously with both heels—endeavoured to stimulate his horse into making still greater speed, although the gallop he was then going at was of truly an alarming character.

CHAPTER CMXXXV.

TOM KING UNEXPECTEDLY BUT OPPORTUNELY ENCOUNTERS AN OLD FRIEND.

Once again, while going at this headlong gallop, Tom King turned his head over his shoulder and looked behind him.

He was then in no small degree rejoiced to find that he had succeeded in placing a much greater distance between himself and his foes than he had dared to anticipate. Surely if anything was calculated to encourage him this was.

And so, with quite a feeling of exultation, he redoubled his efforts.

It really seemed, however, as though all things should on that night turn out vexatiously.

The ground suddenly began to rise, so that his horse not only went more slowly, but underwent much more fatigue.

There was no other resource, however, than to keep on, and the highwayman endeavoured to console himself with the thought that when the summit of the hill was reached he would be able to make up for loss of time by the rapidity with which he should perform the descent.

And here in this case fortune favoured him, for the descent was much greater than he had been led to imagine.

Allowing the reins to fall unrestrainedly upon his horse's neck, he again goaded him to the utmost.

The danger of such a course as this must be apparent, but, then, all ordinary dangers were lost sight of under such exciting circumstances as these.

One false step, Tom was well enough aware, and down his horse and himself would go, and with such violence as would probably occasion insensibility, if not instant death.

But the false step was not made, and at the bottom Tom found a rather dense cluster of trees, through which he did not attempt to penetrate, however, but contented himself by simply skirting them—his object being to get out of the sight of his foes.

On the opposite side of these trees Tom King suddenly perceived a light.

It came into view so quickly that he was upon it almost instantly.

At the same time a man started up, as it appeared, from the earth, and raised his arms above his head.

Tom's horse stopped and reared with so much suddenness that the highwayman was unhorsed.

The man, however, who had started up seized the frightened animal, and Tom King scrambled quickly to his feet.

"You were riding fast, stranger," said the man who had started up. "I was lying here, and did but move to save myself from being trampled upon by your horse's hoofs."

Tom King, breathless and exhausted, could not reply, but he endeavoured to climb into the saddle.

"You are spent and weary, stranger," continued the man. "You seem like one flying for his life. Your form looks familiar to me, too. Hi! Sebel!"—in a different tone of voice—"a light here—quickly!"

"Curse your light!" said Tom. "I want it not! Let go the reins!"

Before he had finished speaking, a light suddenly appeared in the darkness, and Tom could tell it was turned full upon his countenance.

"I knew it, stranger," said the man—"I felt certain we had met before! I do not break bread with so many strange faces as to be unable to remember them. I recollect you well."

"And there is something familiar in your voice," said Tom King, recovering his composure, and with the thought flashing upon him that this man might possibly be able to befriend him in no ordinary degree.

"Yes," continued the man, "it is long—very long since we met. You had then a companion with you, who rode a black steed of matchless quality. Do you remember now?"

"Yes, yes," said Tom—"quite well! You gave us both shelter and food at a time when we were sorely in need of both."

"And it seems that you are in fresh danger now?"

"I am," said Tom. "The officers of police are close behind me. They have given me a hard—a very hard chase, and every moment I expect to see them come into view."

At the very name of officers the gipsy ground his teeth savagely, and uttered an angry exclamation.

"No matter, stranger," he said. "The poor Zingari will again befriend you! Come with me, and fear not—you're safe! Let the officers do what they may, they cannot find you!"

There was something so sincere in the tones of this man's voice, that Tom did not hesitate to trust and to believe him.

Moreover, on the former occasion, that he so well recollected, this man had been to them a most faithful ally.

He had nothing to fear from him in the shape of treachery, and just then his position was so bad that it could not possibly be worse, and consequently there was all the more chance of making it better.

These reflections did not take Tom King a moment to make, and he suffered him to lead him onwards in the darkness, for the boy Sebel had extinguished or hidden the light.

Tom soon found that he was descending into a kind of dell, at the bottom of which a fire was blazing.

It was, indeed, the light that he had first perceived.

Round this were grouped, in various picturesque attitudes, some ten or a dozen gipsies, male and female.

They were all anxiously on the look-out, and wondering what had happened.

"A friend," said Tom's conductor, briefly. "He requires shelter and concealment. Draw out the waggon quickly! There, that will do well. Stranger, come this way."

A large covered waggon, or rather cart, that had been backed close up against one side of the dell, was drawn away from its position, and the gipsy, leading Tom forward, showed him an indentation in the soil, looking like the entrance to a cavern.

"Enter," he said—"enter quickly; it is a small chamber, yet large enough to conceal you and your horse. Be quick; we will push the waggon back, and assume careless attitudes; then, if the officers appear, they will behold nothing suspicious."

"But should they search?" said Tom, who by no means relished shutting himself up in such a place.

"It is not likely," said the gipsy. "You leave that to us. If you are in any danger of discovery we will arm ourselves, and stand up in your defence. If we can do no more we will cover your retreat; but believe me, when I say again you have nothing to fear. In—in quickly!"

Almost against his will Tom was pushed into the little indentation we have mentioned, and his horse also.

Then, with great nimbleness and dexterity, the gipsies pushed the covered cart back in such a manner that his hiding-place was altogether concealed.

The gipsy calculated that the existence of such a place would never be suspected, consequently that Tom would be quite safe.

Whether he was right or not would be quickly put to the test, for his quick ears detected the dull thud produced by the concussion of many horses' feet upon the turf.

"Now, then, round the fire, all of you. Sit quietly, and remember if we are questioned, that we have seen nothing—heard nothing."

Scarcely had these instructions been carried out than the police officers arrived at the brink of the dell.

They came upon the place very unexpectedly, and were very near galloping into it.

They reined up their horses in good time, however, and seeing the lights, called out in loud tones.

The gipsies gave a responsive cry, and then the police officers, finding that the descent was practicable, began to make their way down one side of the dell.

In a few minutes they halted near the fire.

"Hullo!" cried one of the gipsies.

The appearance of the police officers caused considerable consternation among the gipsies, part of which was feigned, and part real.

"Have you been here long?" asked the officer.

"Since sunset."

"And have you seen anyone or heard anyone pass by—a man mounted on a horse, and going at full gallop?"

He was responded to by a general negative; and the gipsy who had hidden Tom King said:

"The silence of this place has not been disturbed, but there is something in the air of it which proclaims that it is no place for us. When you arrived, we were consulting as to whether we should strike our tents and now or wait till daylight."

These answers were given with so much calmness and presence of mind that the officers were quite deceived.

To Tom's inexpressible satisfaction, they rode away; but before the summit of the dell was reached one of the officers who rode nearest to Jack Marshall said:

"I hope, sir, you do not pay any particular attention to what those fellows said; they will tell more lies in a minute than a hawker could in a day."

"I don't believe them, as a general thing," said Jack Marshall, thoughtfully, "but yet they would know better than deceive us in such a case as this. Rely upon it, he has galloped past."

"But where has he gone?" said the officer, glancing around him, for by this time they had reached the level of the meadows. "I can see for a long, long distance, but there's not a trace of him."

Jack Marshall was silent for a moment or two, and then he said:

"These people are cunning."

"Very," assented the officer.

"Then we will meet cunning with cunning. Half of our number, headed by yourself, shall remain here. Search well. In the meantime I and the rest will keep up the pursuit."

"Agreed!" was the reply. "And if he is hidden anywhere about here, Mr. Marshall, rely upon it I shall be the one to unkennel him."

As Jack Marshall elected which men should accompany him, there was no difficulty nor delay in making a separation, and really without any particular loss of time one-half were going at full gallop across the meadow.

Now, had not these remarks been overheard by the gipsy who had so befriended Tom, our friend's position might have become critical.

Yet even now he was in a very dangerous predicament.

The gipsy was aware that only half the officers had taken their departure; but then he doubted much whether the highwayman was in possession of that knowledge, and he remembered also that he had forgotten to give Tom a caution not to move until he came to tell him all was well.

Thoughtfully and silently the gipsy made his way down into the dell again, and having reached the bottom, he began to give orders that the whole troop should get ready to depart.

He gave the command in a loud voice, then told his companions in an undertone to make as much flourish or display as they could over their preparations, but by no means to depart hastily.

This, of course, was done for the purpose of misleading the officers, and it produced a very tolerable effect, for the one who had remained in charge of this second party began to fancy, after all, he was mistaken, and that Jack Marshall and the rest would have the credit of a capture.

Accompanied by much shouting and talking, the horses were caught and harnessed to the different vehicles.

The tents were pulled up, the canvas folded, and, in a word, every preparation made for an immediate start.

This had been going on for more than half-an-hour, during which the officers had been looking keenly around them, when the one in command said:

"I am not satisfied about these gipsies yet. Come with me; let us go down. We will make a thorough search all through the dell."

His orders were obeyed immediately.

Some muttered discontented grumblings, for the fact was the officers who had to remain were very much annoyed at the event; they would have much preferred following Jack Marshall and the rest.

The gipsies affected to be surprised when the officers returned.

"Look here," said the one in command, "we are determined to stand no nonsense! We tracked our man close to this spot, and he has here most mysteriously disappeared. Now, we believe you to be in the secret; if so, and if you are wise, you will tell us at once, otherwise the consequences will be more serious than you think of."

"The Zingari has spoken," said the gipsy, "and you are welcome to search. In a few more moments we shall all have left the dell."

The officers began to search about in all directions, yet, as they did not come near the waggon, they found nothing of a suspicious character

But Tom King began to feel decidedly uncomfortable.

That confidence which he had felt in the gipsy had altogether departed, and most unquestionably, had there been any means whatever of making a dash from his hiding-place Tom would have done so.

But as the heavy waggon was backed up against him this was an impossibility, and so he had to remain quite still, and prepare himself for what was about to happen.

No place was left unsearched by the police, and at length they came to the covered waggon.

They looked around it; one even climbed up and stood on the shafts while he pulled aside the canvas flap in front and looked within.

The light of his lantern, however, rested only on the water-proof covering, for the opening at the back was concealed by the two flaps of canvas at the tail of the waggon, which were drawn closely across and tied together.

If the officer had entered the vehicle and pulled aside these flaps, Tom King must to a certainty have been discovered.

But he did not do so.

The thought that Tom King might be concealed behind never once occurred to him, nor was it likely that it should.

They moved off to a little distance, and then the gipsy, seizing Sebel by the arm, whispered in his ear:

"Crawl into the cavern and ask the stranger whether he thinks he should be able to creep into the waggon and to drag his horse in after him. If so, tell him all will be well. By that means we shall get him clear of the police officers, who, if I mistake not, intend to linger about this spot till daybreak."

The boy gave a nod to show that he understood thoroughly the purport of the hastily-uttered words, and gliding noiselessly away in the darkness, hastened to deliver his message.

CHAPTER CMXXXVI.

THE POLICE OFFICERS KEEP A SHARP LOOK-OUT UPON THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE GIPSIES.

The gipsy who had so well befriended Tom King continued to stand watching the movements of the police officers.

After a brief whispered conference together, they quitted the dell; but did not go far away from it.

"You may say what you like," exclaimed one, "but I am more than ever of opinion that the man we want is not very far from here."

"Well, but where is he?"

The officer who had just spoken shook his head sagaciously, while at the same moment he pointed towards the gipsy encampment.

"It's my settled belief that those fellows yonder could answer that question if they liked, and if you would take my advice——"

"Well!"

"It would be not to leave off searching around, but at the same time to watch with all closely the movements of those varmint yonder."

"That is precisely what I had already made up my mind to do, so you will have the satisfaction of knowing that your advice for once in a way has been taken. Now, my lads," he added, "search around, and I will watch the gipsies."

The officers, however, set about their work very coldly.

Their failure to find any clue at all up to the present moment made them feel doubtful whether the highwayman was there at all. At any rate, they considered that those who had galloped off with Jack Marshall stood by far the best chance of making a capture.

In the meantime the boy Sebel had crept under the waggon and delivered his message to the highwayman, who said:

"I suppose, Sebel, he means to carry me away in the waggon?"

"Just so."

"Well, it is a plan as likely to serve me as any that I can think of, so I will make the attempt. Do you know whether the officers are far enough off to make it safe for me to try?"

[TOM KING LOSES HIS SECOND HORSE.]

"I think not; but when I creep under the waggon again I can soon tell."

"Then, if they are far enough off," whispered Tom, "just give a faint, low whistle. Do you understand?"

"Perfectly."

"Make haste, then!"

Sebel disappeared.

Tom King listened intently, and almost immediately the wished-for signal reached his ears.

Now on his own account he was not at all doubtful of his ability to get into the waggon, but as for his steed, that was another affair altogether.

He was quite a stranger to it, and knew not what its disposition might be.

But Tom relied to a very great extent upon the amount of sagacity which he knew all horses to possess.

He patted and stroked the creature for some minutes, and was pleased to find that it perfectly appreciated his caresses.

Then, mounting into the waggon, Tom tied back the canvas flaps so as to leave the way clear.

Fortunately, the vehicle stood on low wheels.

Stooping down, the highwayman took hold of the bridle, and endeavoured to draw the horse up into the waggon.

But this was a failure, so he descended again; but though he tried in a variety of ways, he could not succeed—the horse would not or could not understand him.

At this moment Tom became conscious that some one was near him, then a voice, which he recognised as belonging to the friendly gipsy, said:

"Is it too difficult?"

"I fear so."

"Then I'll tell you what you must do: You must make a bolt for it, and trust to the fleetness of your steed."

"I like that plan best. Where are the officers?"

"Not far off; and yet so far that I think you have a reasonable chance of stealing away."

"Then I will try at all hazards."

"Good! You cannot have a better chance than you have now."

"But, my friend," said Tom, "I must make you some recompense for what you have done. Now it is impossible, but we shall meet again, and then you will find I shall not be empty-handed."

"What I have done," interrupted the gipsy, "has been done willingly, and without desire for reward. The officers are my enemies, and I have treated them as such."

"Yes, yes," responded Tom, hastily—"I know very well all about that. Still, at the same time, it is my wish and intention to reward you for what you have done."

The gipsy bent his head submissively.

"At some future time," said Tom—"and I hope it will not be long distant—we shall meet again; then you will find that this will be about the best night's work that you have ever done."

"As you will," was the answer. "But there is no time to lose now upon matters of this kind. Are you all ready?"

"Quite."

"Then mount, and bend low down in the saddle, so as to prevent yourself as much as possible from being seen."

"Right!" said Tom, as he complied with this demand.

"If all is well," the gipsy added, in conclusion, "I will have the cart drawn a little on one side, in such a manner, understand, as to screen you from the observation of the police officers as much as I can. The rest I leave to you."

"You can do so safely," said Tom. "This brief rest will make all the difference to my steed. Besides, I have only half the number of foes to contend with."

Almost before Tom finished speaking the gipsy glided away.

A silence of some moments' duration then ensued, which was broken by the noise made in harnessing to the waggon.

At length the heavy vehicle was slowly drawn aside, and no sooner was there sufficient room to permit him to emerge than Tom did so.

The officers, however, were more on the alert than either the highwayman or the gipsies had given them credit for.

There was a sudden report from a pistol, and Tom felt his left arm suddenly fall nerveless to his side.

The reins fell upon his horse's neck.

He grasped them instantly with his right hand, and then used his spurs vigorously.

Away the horse went at full speed; but Tom heard loud shouts and cries in his rear, and, without looking back, he could tell that the officers were close behind him.

Keeping his horse's head still turned in the direction of the open country, Tom urged him onwards until, having got him to the very top of his speed, he let the reins fall upon his neck in order to ascertain the amount of injury the pistol bullet had inflicted.

The pain in his left arm was intolerable, and from the feel of it he came to the conclusion that the bone was broken.

Blood was flowing freely—so freely that if it was not checked at once its effects would soon be weakening to such a degree as to deprive him of all power to remain in the saddle.

As well as he could—for it was a difficult operation while going at so great a speed—Tom bound his handkerchief tightly round his arm.

The pain was by this proceeding much increased, yet, in his excitement, he scarcely heeded it.

It was some time before he could summon up sufficient courage to turn his head and look behind him.

He fancied that his pursuers were very close indeed upon his heels, so at last, with feelings of the greatest uneasiness, he gave one backward glance.

What was his satisfaction and intense surprise to find that his foes were far, far behind!

His steed had distanced them gallantly.

It was just at this time that he again came to a rather broad cross-country road, and as it was only divided from the meadows by a low hedge about twelve inches in height, he had no difficulty in gaining it.

This road he suddenly resolved to follow, with the intention of again taking to the fields at the first opportunity.

Then, suddenly, a faint cry reached his ears.

No doubt it had been a loud and lusty call, but distance had softened it down until it was little more than a murmur.

The moon was shining with tolerable brightness, and by its aid, on looking back, Tom saw the officers waving their arms in a most furious manner, and from time to time uttering a loud shout.

What could be the meaning of this proceeding, Tom, for the life of him, could not guess.

By their manner it would almost seem as though they were calling upon him to stop, yet such a thing as this was unlikely in the extreme.

It was not long, however, before this mystery was revealed.

The officers, not yet having reached the road, were at a rather higher elevation than the highwayman, and they were enabled to command a much greater extent of country.

They had perceived in the cross-road, at no great distance, a man engaged in driving one of those long, lumbering waggons used for the conveyance of huge pieces of timber.

Although he was so far off, the officers hoped that the stillness of the night would carry the sound of their voices to his ears, and they hoped as well to make him understand by sign what they meant.

There was just a chance that they might be successful, and no more, yet it was a chance well worth the trying, for since if they lost it they would be no worse off than before.

To their extreme satisfaction the man, who was trudging along by the side of the horses, stopped, and looked behind him.

Seeing this, the officers shouted and waved their arms again.

Evidently, however, the waggoner did not comprehend their gesticulations, nor would have done so had he not all at once heard the sound of horses' hoofs approaching at a rapid rate, and then immediately afterwards caught sight of Tom.

A being with an intellect more obtuse than this waggoner possessed could then have come readily enough to the conclusion that the officers wished him to intercept the fugitive.

Running with all speed to the head of his team, the waggoner caught hold of the bridles, and exerting his utmost strength, pulled the horses round in such a manner that the timber waggon was quickly turned broadside across the road.

Such was its length that the ends of the long poles brushed against the hedgerow on one side, while the points of the shafts came almost into contact with the trunk of a tree that grew opposite.

Tom saw this obstruction in his path, and instinctively slackened his horse's speed, though at first he did not guess what the waggoner was about to do.

All at once, however, he perceived how formidable a barrier there was to his further progress.

A loud cry, unmistakably one of exultation, next reached his ears.

It proceeded from the officers, who now made quite sure of their captive.

A high embankment was on each side of the road. The timber waggon was drawn across it, and so they felt that they had the highwayman in a trap.

Tom King quickly saw, however, that he had one chance—only one, and that a most desperate one—of escaping from his enemies.

It was to spur his horse onward again with all speed, and force him to overleap the barricade.

Had it been his own horse, which he had so unfortunately lost, Tom would not have felt so much hesitation about making the attempt, but of the animal he now bestrode he knew scarcely anything.

It might be that such a desperate leap as that was far beyond its powers.

At the time, however, it can scarcely be said that these considerations presented themselves to Tom's mind.

On the contrary, rather, no sooner did he conceive this idea than he proceeded to put it into execution.

Uttering encouraging cries, and doing everything that lay in his power to incite his horse to put forth his utmost powers, Tom came on at full gallop to the waggon.

When within a short distance of it, however, the animal stopped suddenly, then swerved aside.

The highwayman's heart sank within him, but the mocking laughter that came from the lips of the waggoner and the police officers in their too-soon exultation at the success of his scheme made him furious, so, angrily tugging at the rein, he made his horse draw back again, and once more he put it to its utmost powers.

He used the spurs with a barbarity that no other circumstances could have excused.

One would have thought, however, to witness the behaviour of the horse, that the animal had gone for the first time merely in order to ascertain the nature of the leap it had to take, for on this second trial it rose gallantly in the air and just cleared the formidable barricade; its hind hoofs just scraped one of the upper poles, but that was all.

The ground was reached in safety.

Such a discordant yell of disappointment and rage as came simultaneously from the lips of all the police officers was surely never heard before.

It was now Tom's turn to exult, so, wheeling his horse round, he took off his hat and returned their mocking laugh.

So exasperated were the officers by this proceeding, that by common consent they pulled out their short, stumpy pistols, and discharged them.

A ridiculous proceeding, for they must have known full well Tom King was far out of their range.

And now this clever stratagem that they had caused to be put into execution told much against them.

Not one of the officers dreamed for a moment of attempting to overleap the waggon, so they pulled up and called to the waggoner to allow them to pass.

To turn the waggon round again, however, into its original position proved to be no easy task, for one of the wheels got fixed in some way, and for a few moments the vehicle was quite immovable.

The officers cursed, and swore, and behaved themselves more like madmen than sane beings.

But, as one might expect, that did not mend matters in the least.

In the meanwhile, Tom profited by this delay to the very utmost.

He knew the time was a most favourable one for him to make an effort, and he made it accordingly.

Before his foes were enabled to get once more fairly upon his track, he was not only out of sight but out of hearing also.

To come so near achieving their object, and then to miss it, was indeed aggravating in the highest degree, and it is scarcely to be wondered at that the police officers should lose their tempers under such circumstances.

But with dogged determination they kept steadily along the road, trusting to run down their prey in time.

Tom King no sooner found that he had fairly shaken them off than he reined in his steed to allow it a little rest after its recent exertions.

The pause thus made, too, enabled him to take a review of his position, and allowed him the opportunity of considering the nature of his future movements.

First, then, as to his position.

After an attentive contemplation of the objects around, the highwayman came to the conclusion that he was by no means so many miles away from London as he had imagined.

When he thought back upon his late adventures he could not wonder at his having been so hunted up and down the country.

Tracing back events, he could tell that very many times he had doubled upon his course, and altogether had taken a rather semicircular direction, the course of which tended towards the metropolis.

This settled, his chief consideration was where to remain during the time that had been agreed upon by himself and his companions.

So far the officers had been so vigilant and pertinacious that they had not allowed him to remain for any length of time anywhere, and even now, as the moon shone forth with great brilliancy and power, and revealed to him objects at a very great distance, he failed to perceive a place which held out the slightest promise of affording him the shelter he so much required.

Moreover, he remembered how ill-provided he was with funds, owing to the suddenness with which he had taken his departure from the inn.

There was no resource but to remedy this somehow or other, as it was impossible to say how soon circumstances might arise rendering it necessary that he should have command of money in order to purchase his safety.

Having reached this point, Tom listened again, but as yet no sound of his pursuers was audible.

His horse by this time had recovered his wind, and so, at a very gentle trot, Tom continued his course for a little way along the cross-road.

He did not pause, indeed, until he reached a spot where a narrow winding lane branched off.

To what place it led he knew not; but, by its appearance, it was evident that few travellers ever used it.

This would have made many turn aside, but Tom liked it all the better on that account.

So, turning his horse's head, he once more put the animal in rapid motion.

The course of this lane was most devious and uncertain, and, having journeyed along it for some little time, Tom lost his reckoning, and could not for the life of him tell whether he was proceeding north, south, east, or west.

Once, and only once, he caught sight of a human habitation, and that appeared to be a farm-house, lying back at some distance, and being almost buried by a dense mass of trees.

After more than half an hour's hard riding, Tom found himself at the end of the lane.

As he quite expected, it debouched upon the high-road.

At this spot trees were growing densely, and the shadows which they cast amply sufficed to screen him and his steed from all observation.

Therefore he paused once more to consider upon his proceedings, and also to listen for the approach of his foes.

The latter, however, proved a vain attempt, and the highwayman muttered:

"I have tired them out, that's certain, and I suppose I may look now for a few moments' peace. What shall be my next step?"

He checked himself abruptly, and listened again.

Very faintly, yet quite distinctly, came a dull, murmuring sound.

Tom knew it well.

A vehicle was coming along the high-road from the left hand at a very rapid rate, and, by the noise produced, it must be one of tolerable dimensions.

Almost at the same moment, he caught sight of two faint, star-like lights, creeping rapidly along, at no great distance from the ground.

"Shall I try my luck?" he muttered.

As he spoke, he drew forth one of his pistols, and examined it attentively.

"One would call it a piece of foolhardiness to attempt to stop any vehicle while the officers are thus at my back, but money is requisite, and who knows whether I shall have a better chance of obtaining any than I have now?"

He ceased, for by this time the vehicle was very close at hand, so close that Tom, by straining his eyes, was able to make out that it was a carriage drawn by four beautiful grey horses.

"After all," he said, as he rode quickly forward "it will be but the work of a few moments, and I shall be on my way again, without any interruption worth naming."

Just then, Tom pointed his pistol in the direction of the coachman, who was seated, half dozing, on the box, yet taking care to incline the barrel upwards to such a degree that the bullet would pass harmlessly above his head.

CHAPTER CMXXXVII.

IN WHICH TOM KING'S MISFORTUNES CONTINUE TO INCREASE.

"HALT!" cried Tom King, in a loud voice—"halt, I say! Stop—stop, if you value your life! Pull up this moment!"

Tom accompanied these words by seizing the bridle of one of the leading horses and pulling it vigorously, thus materially assisting the coachman in bringing the carriage to a standstill.

Tom King perceived, for the first time, that behind the carriage a footman was seated, and he began to think if there were many inside he should have rather long odds to deal with single-handed.

Therefore, almost without reflection, he put into execution a stratagem which had well served himself and his companions on many occasions.

The coachman, thoroughly terrified by Tom's words, and hearing the explosion of the pistol, sat trembling on his box, hardly certain whether he was alive or not.

Tom heard the window of the carriage let down with a sharp, crashing sound, but he paid no heed to the circumstance.

Turning his head round, as though addressing some one at the side of the road, he cried, in a loud voice:

"Understand me, my friends, I intend to manage this little affair single-handed. Do not fire, Claude, nor you, Jack, on any account, until I give you the signal—do not interfere until I call for your aid."

Having thus apparently settled this matter, Tom turned his horse's head round, and trotted easily and carelessly up to the door of the carriage.

He saw a slight movement within, and the faint light given from the cloud-obscured moon rested upon something glittering.

What it was he knew not, but he abruptly changed his course, and the next moment a pistol was discharged.

Not the slightest injury resulted from it, however, and, without perceptibly changing his course, Tom made his way to the door of the carriage.

He still held a pistol in his hand, which must have been seen, for the inmates of the vehicle shrank back.

At the same moment, a faint, half-smothered scream came upon his ears.

"I know not to whom I am indebted for that shot," said Tom King, coolly, "but let me state at once that I shall not forget the favour. Now, then, quick—you have money, and I want it! Surrender it to me quietly, and you may proceed upon your journey without any further danger or delay. If you refuse, you will only have yourselves to thank for the unpleasant consequences."

The interior of the carriage was quite dark, so that Tom was unable to see who it contained.

But he heard a sweet, pleasant voice say:

"Oh, papa, give him money—do not deny it—and let us ride on! Do not provoke him to violence."

"Hush—silence!" said another voice. "You know not what you ask. Any concession that I might make may be the signal for greater extortion; we should not be left with one article of value."

"Make the trial," said Tom. "Gold is all that I require. Time is pressing, and I am anxious to depart."

"Then," said the same voice, in firm tones, "I am determined to defend what I have with my life; so now beware!"

"I regret to hear you say as much," said Tom

"Regret it?"

"Yes, because it will force me to extremities."

Just then Tom looked up, and found himself menaced by a danger which he had never for a moment taken into account.

In fact, he had believed that the words he had uttered would be quite sufficient to deter the coachman and footman from making any movement whatever

But in this he was mistaken.

The footman, with a surprising amount of boldness, considering that he had no weapon of defence but a long wand or staff, had climbed slowly from his seat behind on to the roof of the carriage.

Then, suddenly drawing himself up to his full height, he raised the staff above his head, with the intention of bringing it down with his utmost force upon the head of the highwayman.

But Tom saw his danger, though only just in time to save himself.

Quick as thought, he pulled the rein so suddenly and violently that the horse, in turning round, rose up for an instant on its hind legs.

At this same instant of time, another pistol was discharged from the interior of the carriage.

The footman, being in the act of delivering the blow, could not save himself.

He had put forth his utmost strength, intending that the one blow should be effectual.

Therefore, the staff passing through the air with great swiftness, and not meeting with the impediment he had calculated upon, overbalanced him, so that he fell with great violence into the roadway.

This event was scarcely noticed by Tom, for, to his surprise and consternation, his horse staggered for a second or so, and then fell down as though struck by an invisible hand.

He had barely time to disengage himself from the stirrups, and so save himself from an awkward fall.

The fact was, the bullet from this second pistol had lodged itself somewhere in the horse's head at the moment when the animal raised itself upon its hind legs in turning round.

For the second time, then, Tom King found himself deprived of a steed.

The gentleman in the carriage, seeing what had happened, though greatly bewildered by the rapidity with which these events had taken place, now called out:

"Drive on, coachman—drive on with all speed! Don't spare the lash, and we shall outstrip the rascal easily!"

"But John," said the coachman, who thought more of his fellow-servant than the gentleman appeared to do. "Don't you see that John, sir, has fallen headforemost into the road? Can you leave him where he is?"

"Confound you, yes!" was the reply. "He can shift for himself! Drive on, I say—drive on!"

"No, coachman!" said Tom, who had by this time recovered himself. "You had better not attempt to move—that is, if you have the least regard for your life!"

While speaking, Tom King advanced, and the coachman, seeing him, shrank down, and covered his face up with his hands.

He could not bear to look upon the death-dealing weapon that was pointed so menacingly at him.

Tom had a purpose in all his movements, and it was quickly carried out.

Thrusting his pistol into his belt, he drew his sword, and with the sharp, glittering weapon, instantly severed that portion of the harness that connected the leading horse nearest him to the others.

It was a magnificent creature, though it showed signs of being greatly terrified.

Quickly sheathing his sword, Tom hastened to pat it upon the neck, and so quiet it.

Again producing his pistol, he laid it upon the ground, first having satisfied himself that it was in readiness for immediate use.

"Now, sir," he said, addressing the occupant of the carriage, "whoever you may be, let me bid you to beware! You have had two shots at me, but, for your own life's sake, do not try a third, or try in any way to interrupt me in what I am about."

Tom did not wait to see whether due attention was given to his words or not, but with remarkable dexterity stripped off the trappings belonging to the grey horse.

Having done so, he stooped down, and in the course of a few moments transferred the saddle and bridle from the dead steed to this new one.

Then, vaulting into the saddle, he again placed himself beside the carriage door.

"Do not say I have not treated you with forbearance were Tom's first words. "But perhaps you know scarcely any act will tempt me to offer violence? Understand me, however, that I will be trifled with no longer! Your money I must and will have! Better give it to me thus than compel me to take it from you!"

"Why, curse your impudence!" said the gentleman, "are you not content with what you have already? This is too good a joke! Have I lived to see a rascal mount one of my horses, and then demand my purse?"

"That was your act," said Tom. "My own horse you destroyed. But come, I have no time for talk!"

"Oh, papa," said the other voice, though this time Tom could tell that the young girl was struggling with her tears, "do give him the money—it can make little difference to you!"

"It does not," was the reply. "Here, fellow, take this, and be content! I have resisted you as well as I could. I would have done more, but, like a fool, I trusted myself with one brace of pistols only, though, if I had ammunition with me, rely upon it you would not have got off so easily."

While these words were spoken, a purse was tossed with a disdainful action out of the carriage.

Tom dexterously caught it.

"Thanks," he said—"thanks! I have what I require! I daresay you will find it rather awkward with three horses, but you have only yourself to blame for that. Had you complied with my demand at first, all this would have been saved!"

"Oh, look—look!" cried another voice, which Tom King had not yet heard—"oh, look—look! Here are officers close at hand! Help—help—oh, help!"

The last word was pronounced with a shrill, sharp intonation.

Tom was quite surprised to hear it, for he had fancied that the carriage was tenanted by two persons only.

The fact was, a lady was present, the mother of the young girl who had spoken, but at the first approach of danger she had either fainted or pretended to do so, recovering only just at the moment when she saw succour at hand.

The officers she had seen were those who had been so long in pursuit of Tom.

They had kept resolutely upon his track, and just then emerged from the shady entrance to the lane.

They had approached very gently, having made their minds up only a moment before to give up all further thoughts of making Tom a prisoner.

The lady's voice aroused them, and one glance enabled them to comprehend the position of affairs.

Tom King knew well enough what had occurred, though he could not see the officers, the carriage being between himself and them; and, not waiting another moment, he wheeled suddenly round, and tested the quality of his new horse by putting him to overleap a rather high wooden fence.

The obstacle was cleared in beautiful style.

"Over the palings yonder!" shouted the gentleman, leaning out of the carriage window, and addressing the officers. "There he goes at full speed over the meadow!"

"All right!" cried a voice, in reply. "We'll have him—we're bound to have him!"

"Nothing of the sort," ejaculated the gentleman, with a rattling oath—"nothing of the sort! The rascal is mounted on the very best and fleetest horse in my stables, and will defy such animals as you have underneath you!"

The officers paid but little attention to his words, though, with surprising boldness, they one and all attempted to clear the fence.

Only about half their number succeeded—the remainder fell ignominiously on the other side.

The manner in which the grey horse had cleared the fence let Tom King know what he might expect from such a creature, and, taking all things into account, he had really matter for congratulation, since he had been greatly the gainer by the exchange that had been made.

On looking back, he saw to what a small number his pursuers had been reduced, and so, with a loud, defiant cry, he waved his hat, and the next moment was hurrying along at the utmost speed his new horse was capable of making.

For the officers to attempt to keep up the chase was quite ridiculous.

Success could not be hoped for.

Their horses were much jaded by the long journey they had performed, while Tom's was comparatively fresh.

In a much shorter space of time than he had dared to believe possible, Tom King found himself once again clear of his troublesome foes, and this time he trusted to remain so.

"Bravo!" he said, as he patted the magnificent steed upon the neck—"bravo! If you only turn out according to my expectations, I shall consider you not far inferior to Black Bess herself!"

Tom King had been speaking in a light-hearted, joyous tone, but as he proceeded the accents of his voice changed entirely, and when he ceased speaking a cry of pain escaped his lips.

The way in which he carried his hand to his left arm told eloquently what was the cause of it.

"I had forgotten my arm," he said—"quite forgotten it until now! Well, that must be a sign that the injury is by no means so great as I thought at first. But, oh! this pain! It is more than I can bear!"

The bandage still remained in its place, though it had become deeply tinged with blood.

"I should have attended to it earlier," he continued. "But no matter! I seem to be quite alone."

He raised himself in the saddle while he spoke these words, and took a comprehensive glance around him.

He was enabled to do so tolerably well, for, mingled with the faint, sickly-looking moonlight, came the first beams of a new day.

So far as he could see, no living creature of any description met his gaze.

His eyes rested at length upon a large, smooth sheet of water, the surface of which was not broken by the tiniest ripple.

Towards this he bent his way, and, having reached its margin, dismounted.

His horse drank eagerly at the pool, and Tom then slowly and carefully removed his temporary bandage.

As he did so, a dreadful feeling of faintness and giddiness came over him.

He tried to struggle against it and overcome it, but in vain—he felt that all things were sliding from him.

The ground slipped suddenly from beneath his feet—he felt himself falling, but he knew not where.

Just then came a blank, for, ere he fell at full length beside the water, he was quite insensible.

How easy a prey the highwayman would have been just then had the police officers been a little closer!

He could not have offered the slightest resistance to them.

But Tom was oblivious of all things, and so, of course, being in danger was one of them, and he lay there calmly and peacefully enough until the first rays of the rising sun shone upon his face.

CHAPTER CMXXXVIII.

TOM KING UNEXPECTEDLY MEETS WITH A STRANGE ADVENTURE.

With a hurried start, and with a sensation of great pain, Tom King recovered possession of his faculties.

Slowly, and with much difficulty, he raised himself slightly, and looked around.

A kind of misty film was before his eyes and before his memory, so that some time elapsed before he could make out by what objects he was surrounded, or by what train of events he had reached that spot.

At length all became clear, and, creeping forward, he stooped down, and drank heartily of the clear water.

Its beneficial effects were immediately apparent.

New life and vigour filled his frame, while the fever of delirium that had gathered partially about his brain was dissipated also.

He gave another and clearer look around.

No human being could be seen—nor, indeed, any living creature whatever, save his new horse, which was grazing peacefully enough at a little distance.

Taking off his coat, Tom next proceeded to ascertain as well as he could the precise amount of injury he had received.

He was terribly afraid a bone had been fractured, but he was not long in coming to the conclusion that this fear was unfounded.

There was a very ugly wound, however, in the fleshy part of his arm, which from his wrist to his shoulder presented a very red and inflamed appearance.

But the bleeding had almost ceased.

And now he set to work to bathe it well in the clear cold water.

He soon felt the benefit of this treatment, and having remained as long as he thought prudent for his safety in that place, he bound up his arm as skilfully as he was able, and resumed his coat.

When he tried to stand, however, he became more fully aware of the extent to which he had been weakened.

He staggered, and could scarcely save himself from falling.

By one of those powerful efforts of the mind which will at times entirely control the corporeal functions, he succeeded in banishing this deathlike sensation.

He hastened to his horse, but the animal hearing his approach looked up and then moved off.

Evidently it had no desire to be caught.

Tom's heart sank again when he noted the vast extent of the meadow.

He knew it would require far more strength and endurance than he possessed to recapture his horse.

For a little while he was almost inclined to give up in despair, which circumstance will show better than anything else how much loss of blood had reduced him.

Advancing slowly and with caution, and using such soothing expressions as he was able to think of, he again crept nearer to his horse, and at length succeeded in taking hold of the bridle.

To mount was a difficult process, but he accomplished it, and then hesitated as to the way he should take.

Shelter and rest somewhere he felt were more than ever needed.

Surgical assistance also was required, though where he could obtain any of these he had not the slightest idea.

"I must trust to chance to guide me," he muttered. "I have no better counsellor at the present time. I must congratulate myself upon having so well got rid of the police officers."

As he uttered these last words he set his steed in motion, following the course which he had taken in flying from his pursuers.

A ride of rather more than a quarter of an hour brought him to the summit of a hill, from which a tolerably extensive prospect could be obtained.

One habitation, and one only, was in sight.

This was a large, substantially-built mansion, whose very antiquity gave it an air of the greatest picturesqueness.

Ivy and other parasitic plants had taken possession of nearly every wall, and around it were many stately trees, every one no doubt many hundreds of years old.

The loud cawing of some lazy-winged rooks alone disturbed the silence, but this sound only served to make the general air of peace and quiet that reigned around the more apparent.

Tom King stopped his horse in order to gaze upon this structure, and as he gazed he sighed.

It may be that the sight of it brought back to his recollection some memory of the past, or it might be that he thought how welcome a shelter would those substantial walls afford.

Be this as it may, however, it is certain an intense longing came over him to make his way towards that dwelling.

Strangely enough, he felt a presentiment that he had only to present himself at its portal to be made welcome.

This and other fancies came crowding thickly upon him, but he shook them off as one might shake off the recollection of some dream, and prepared himself to look the difficulties of his situation fairly in the face.

Not for another moment did he contemplate the idea of making his way anywhere in the direction of that mansion.

He turned his horse's head, indeed, in such a direction that it was quickly lost to view.

After a brief space he found himself close to the side of a narrow but well-kept road.

A thickly-planted hedge alone divided him from it.

Before venturing to pass this obstruction, Tom thought it would be no more than prudent to listen.

In his present position he could not be over cautious, for he was now unfitted for a long, fatiguing ride.

Pausing, then, he listened with great intentness, and soon had good cause to congratulate himself upon the course he had adopted.

Scarcely a second elapsed before the faint but perfectly clear and distinct sound of horses' feet reached him.

He continued to listen, and as the sound grew louder he could tell that a single horseman was approaching.

From a single horseman surely he had nothing to fear, and so he might have continued on his way.

But, then, it was important he should keep out of sight, and so he resolved to wait until this traveller had passed by.

His patience was not put to a very severe trial, for the approaching horseman came on at a sharp pace until he got within a few yards of where Tom was concealed, and then he gradually checked his horse.

The hedge of which we have spoken was so high and grew so thickly that Tom felt perfectly certain he had but to remain stooping down in the saddle in order to be perfectly invisible to any person who might pass by.

This, then, was the position that he took up, though, nevertheless, he was able to obtain a tolerably good view of the road beyond.

Peering through the interstices of the hedge, he quickly saw a man dressed in a kind of livery make his appearance.

He was mounted on a splendid horse, and over one shoulder was a strap, to which was attached a large leather bag.

There was an expression of cunning and villany in this man's face that Tom perceived at once, and, in consequence, he felt a deep and immediate interest in all this man's proceedings.

He continued to rein-in his steed until he brought it to a standstill at a spot not many yards distant from where Tom was hidden.

This done, his next proceeding was to draw the sleeve of his corduroy coat across his face.

"It seems all quiet enough," he muttered, half to himself and half aloud, "and yet I heard something, too; but it must have been my fancy—yes, yes, my fancy. I wonder what there is I could hear to be afraid of?"

He looked around him with a half-defiant expression, which was strange enough to see, and which greatly increased the amount of curiosity and interest the highwayman already felt.

Nor did the man's succeeding actions serve in any degree to diminish these feelings.

Allowing the reins to fall upon the neck of his horse, he carried one hand to the leather bag that has been mentioned, and brought it round until it rested on the pommel of the saddle.

When it was in this position, Tom could see it plainly, and had no doubt whatever as to its character.

It was such a leather bag as would be used for the purpose of carrying letters to and from a post-office.

The man hesitated, and seemed to tremble.

Then, with a quick movement, he thrust his fingers into his waistcoat pocket and produced a small key.

He gave another suspicious glance about him before he ventured to introduce it into the lock.

A sharp click followed, for the key turned with difficulty, as though it was a false one, and then the bag was opened.

Eagerly and rapidly, the man drew forth a handful of letters.

He glanced at them quickly, and selecting one, placed the others back again in their receptacle.

"That's it!" he muttered, glancing at the superscription of the one he held—"I would swear to the handwriting, although so many years have passed away since I saw him last. Curses on him! He shall rue the day when he first made up his mind to interfere with my designs."

He placed his fingers near the seal, then listened once more and glanced about him.

The silence that prevailed reassured him, and the next moment the letter was torn open.

His eyes glanced rapidly over its contents, and as they did so such an expression of evil came over his forbidding countenance as made Tom King shudder to gaze upon.

With the same evil, threatening look, he thrust the letter into one of his pockets; then closing the bag, he locked it again, and restored it to its former place.

This done, he dug his heels viciously into his horse's flanks, and in a moment was lost to Tom's view.

This sudden departure was something that Tom King had scarcely anticipated, or it is possible he might have tried to prevent it, though had he reflected upon his own weak condition he would scarcely have made so rash an attempt, for the man was of a powerful, muscular build.

But the incident was one which set Tom thinking, though all his thought did not enable him to arrive at any definite conclusion respecting it.

"It cannot be any concern of mine," he muttered, "and I am not in fit condition now to follow up the adventure, especially as it is broad daylight. No, no—I must push on, and find some place where I can lie down and rest."

He drew back a little way from the hedge as he spoke, and, glancing first to the right, then to the left, perceived a little gate that had hitherto escaped his notice.

Towards this he directed his horse's footsteps, and then, passing through it, gained the road.

Without a thought—indeed, quite unconsciously—he gazed in the direction the man had taken, and as he did so his attention was immediately arrested by the appearance of a small white object lying near the verdant bank on the summit of which the hedgerow had been planted.

A second glance showed him that this white object greatly resembled a letter, and, impelled by curiosity, he walked his horse slowly towards it.

He soon found this conjecture verified—a letter most certainly it was.

There was little difficulty in guessing by what means it had reached there.

The man, in pulling the others out of the bag, had allowed this one to fall.

It was small, and had fluttered to the ground unnoticed.

Tom dismounted, and, picking up the missive, glanced at the address.

He had some little difficulty in making it out, for the handwriting was a straggling one, and the paper had become soiled by cantact with the road.

The following words, however, he managed to decipher:

"Sir Ralph Cromer, Wilfirs Cross."

"Wilfirs Cross?" he muttered, repeating the last words. "I wonder where that may be? Surely close at hand. No doubt the house I saw a little while ago."

This was a probable enough conjecture, seeing that there was no other habitation visible for miles.

Tom lapsed into an attitude of deep reflection, during which his eyes were fixed upon the letter, though in reality he saw it not.

"It may be," he murmured at last, "that this is a favourable chance thrown in my way. Who can tell? The question is, shall I avail myself of it?"

He glanced down at his disordered dress while he spoke; then set to work to improve its appearance as well as he could, from which it may be inferred that he had come to a decision.

The letter he had placed carefully and securely in his breast pocket, and, when all his preparations were completed, he remounted his steed.

Following the route already taken by the dishonest servant, he made his way along the road, which he was not long in finding was a private one, leading only to the mansion he had seen, and towards which he had felt so mysteriously attracted.

"Surely," he thought, as he rode slowly onwards, "the service I shall render them is of some importance. The chances are that they will never recognise me, then surely it would not be too much to ask for a little aid and shelter. Could they possibly refuse such an appeal?"

A few moments afterwards, Tom found himself in front of some massive wooden gates, so high that he could not see over the top of them.

His approach evidently had been heard, for one half was slowly thrown open, and the form of a good-looking, middle-aged female made its appearance.

She curtsied respectfully to Tom, who, in answer to her inquiring gaze, said:

"I suppose this is Wilfirs Cross, is it not?"

"It is, sir," was the reply.

"The residence of Sir Ralph Cromer?" continued Tom.

"You are quite right—it is."

"Then I have business with him."

"Pray come in, sir," was the reply. "Follow this path, it will bring you to the front door of the hall. Sir Ralph is an early riser; you will no doubt find him at breakfast."

Tom tossed a guinea to the woman, and rode through the gates.

She was accustomed to receiving presents from the different visitors who passed by, but this was a greater amount than she had ever had before, and when Tom reached a bend in the avenue and looked back, he saw that she had not recovered from the effects of his munificence, for she was curtseying still.

The next turning brought Tom in view of the hall, which was a much more imposing structure than it had appeared to be from the distance.

A momentary hesitation came over him, for he began to think that it was really carrying the force of impudence too far to intrude himself into such an abode.

A sharp twinge of pain making itself felt at this moment changed the whole current of his thoughts, and so, with renewed confidence, he continued his course towards the mansion.

CHAPTER CMXXXIX.

TOM KING INTRUDES INTO A STRANGE HOUSEHOLD.

As Tom King drew nearer and nearer to the hall, the thought uppermost in his mind was how happy, peaceful and contented all its inhabitants must be.

To him, the quiet serenity of the scene around him struck him all the more forcibly when contrasted with his own violent, turbulent career.

A glimpse which he had through one of the large windows on the ground floor served to strengthen this impression.

He caught sight of a large fire burning briskly in the grate, and its bright rays were reflected with great brilliancy from the massive silver ornaments upon the table, and from the gold frames of the pictures against the walls.

He saw, too, that the table was spread for the morning meal, and that around it several persons were seated.

Once again he hesitated, but now hesitation came too late.

He had gone too far to retract, for his advent had been noticed by the occupants of the breakfast-room.

Half a dozen steps more brought him to the portico, where he dismounted.

Scarcely had his feet touched the ground than a servant approached, who took charge of his horse, and then the front door was thrown open, and an invitation given to enter.

Tom complied, and then said:

"I have particular and important business with your master. Tell him so. It is useless for me to give my name, as I am as great a stranger to him as he is to me."

The servant seemed rather unwilling to convey this message; but when Tom presented him with a gratuity his reluctance vanished at once.

"Sir Ralph is at breakfast," said the servant, "and as he is almost an invalid, he wishes you to enter at once, and make known your business to him."

Tom bowed acquiescence.

The hall was crossed, a door thrown open, and he found himself upon the threshold of the apartment of which he had caught so transient a glimpse.

At the first glance, he saw an elderly man, rather thin, with a slight fringe of short white hair around his head, seated in a capacious easy chair, engaged in looking at a letter.

At the head of the table sat a lady, much younger than Sir Ralph—young enough, indeed, to be one of his daughters.

But there was something in her confident, authoritative manner that made Tom immediately aware that she was mistress of the hall.

One other person alone was present.

This was a young girl of such rare beauty that Tom King bent before it in respectful admiration.

Naturally, Tom expected that the baronet would address him, and, indeed, the feeble old man seemed about to do so, but the lady at the head of the table, gazing somewhat scornfully at Tom, inquired:

"Well, sir, what may be your business? Be good enough to explain the meaning of your intrusion."

The words were uttered in sharp, cutting accents. Nothing certainly could be further from a welcome.

Tom bowed again, for he was not ready with his reply.

He had noticed several things which struck him as being strange.

In the first place, the lady who had spoken to him had her hand resting upon the letter-bag, from which, it appeared, that she drew forth the letters, opened them, read them first, then handed them to the baronet.

The second was, that this lady's countenance reminded him of a face that he had somewhere seen before.

Where, for a moment puzzled him.

But he quickly recollected.

In the contracted brow, the cunning expression of the eyes, the cruel lines about the mouth, he recognised a close resemblance to the man whose movements he had watched in the lane.

That man, however, evidently was a servant, and this lady was the mistress of the mansion.

Was the resemblance between them accidental, or were they really related?

It was easy enough for Tom to ask himself these questions and speculate upon them, but he had no means of arriving at any satisfactory reply.

"I trust," he said, after his brief and scarcely-noticeable hesitation—"I trust you will excuse this most unseasonable intrusion on my part; but, as I stated, I have called because I have particular business with Sir Ralph Cromer."

"Sir Ralph is here," said the lady, indicating the old man in the chair.

"Yes, I see it," said Tom, "but what I have to say is private—it concerns him alone."

"Ellen, my dear," said the lady, addressing the young girl, "you may leave the room."

"Pardon me," said Tom, "I fear you do not understand me. What I have to say is solely for Sir Ralph's ears."

The lady started angrily to her feet, and drew herself up erect.

"You make a great mistake," she said, in shrill, querulous tones, "if you think Sir Ralph has any secrets from me! No matter how private your communication may be, you must speak it in my presence. I am quite in the baronet's confidence, so hesitate no longer—speak at once."

Now, if Tom had been unwilling in the first place to speak in the presence of this lady, he was now ten thousand times more so.

His perceptions were all sharp and keen, and especially so on that morning.

An insensible something came over him that made him feel things were not going on as they should—that some evil influence was at work—an influence which he might be able to counteract.

He saw that the young girl looked pale, and sad and suffering.

He saw that the baronet was wholly, both for good or for evil, under the dominion of his wife.

"You must really excuse me," said Tom, "if I beg to differ from your ladyship. It is not indeed a matter for me to judge. When I have made my communication to Sir Ralph, it will be for him to decide whether he acquaints you with it or not."

The lady's eyes flashed, and she stamped her foot angrily upon the ground.

"Speak out, sir," she said—"speak out and begone! We want no intruders here!"

Tom King bowed and then, in faint, trembling accents, the old man said:

"My dear—my dear, pray don't be so violent, there is no occasion for it—none indeed! But when you get so fierce and angry you terrify me—with such weak nerves as I have you terrify me to a degree."

"Then," was the quick, stern answer, "if such is the case, bid this stranger disclose his errand—that is all that is required."

"But, sir," said Tom with great respect, "I should prefer acquainting you with it alone."

"Well, well, so you shall. Why should he not, my dear? Let him have his own way, and I will tell you what he has said afterwards."

"No, sir," said the lady—"I demand that this subject be spoken out before me."

"Well, well, let it be so—let it be so."

Tom King looked with the greatest pity and distress at the poor old man who spoke these words.

It was dreadful indeed to think that any human being's mind should be so shattered—vacillating.

"I regret this," Tom said, breaking the silence—"I regret this very much indeed; but I can assure you my instructions are so peremptory, that if I do not deliver my message to Sir Ralph in private I must depart with my errand undisclosed."

This was a threat that made the lady hesitate a little.

She began to feel that Tom King was not one to bend and bow before her authority, and so, with quite a sudden change of demeanour, as though she had been struck by a fresh and sudden thought, she said:

"Very well, sir—very well! Since you choose to create dissension in a household by your obstinacy, and since you choose to act with so much discourtesy, I will oppose you no longer—you shall have your own way. You can remain here with Sir Ralph."

The young girl called Ellen had already left the breakfast-room, and now the baronet's wife, with a haughty, angry mien, walked hurriedly to the door, passed out, and closed it.

Poor Sir Ralph witnessed this act with the greatest surprise.

It was to him something unparalleled, and he began to look upon Tom with feelings very closely approaching awe.

"I trust you will pardon me, sir," Tom said, advancing more closely to him. "Perhaps when I come to tell you my errand you will think that I have made a needless fuss about it; if so I must entreat your forgiveness. Rest assured that all I have done has been with the best intent."

"Well, well, young man," exclaimed the baronet—"sit down there in that chair, and make yourself comfortable. Now, what have you to say?"

Tom sank his voice to a whisper.

"I am sadly afraid," he said, "that we shall be overheard."

"Oh, no, no—there is not any fear of that!"

"Excuse me, but I should like to satisfy myself upon that point," and, while he spoke, Tom King, with a light and rapid tread, crossed the room.

There was a look of great satisfaction on his countenance as he did so, for the fact was, he believed that he had come to the right conclusion as to the cause which had induced her ladyship so suddenly to alter her demeanour.

He paused a moment near the door, then, placing his finger on his lip, turned the handle softly.

At the same moment he pulled the door open with great suddenness, and closed it again with equal quickness.

A blundering sound, a sharp crack, and a stifled cry resulted.

"Ah!" said Tom, with a smile, "I am afraid some one has been hurt! Let us see."

He opened the door again as he spoke.

But the hall was clear—no trace of anyone could be seen.

"I rather think that will do," he added, closing the door. "I really thought some one was there!"

The baronet looked greatly astonished, but on all occasions he was so accustomed to yield to others that he never even in this instance thought of asserting his authority.

But he knew perfectly well that her ladyship must have received a very sharp blow from the panel of the door, and he trembled for the consequences.

"Young man," he said, in trembling tones, as Tom approached him, "do you know what you have done?"

"Yes," said Tom, quietly, "some one has had rather a sharp crack on the head, which will not be forgotten very easily."

"Yes," said the old man, sinking his voice still lower, "but that some one is my wife. Oh," he added, glancing wildly around him, "she is a dreadful woman—oh, a dreadful woman, and so you will find out!"

"I thought so," said Tom; "but I don't care that for her!"

He snapped his fingers contemptuously as he pronounced the words.

"And," he continued, "if I might make so bold as to give you my advice——"

"Well, young man, speak out—I like you."

"Why, you will set a bold front on as I do, and say the same thing."

The baronet half started up, as though some glimmering thought had crossed his mind that he should be able, by making one sudden effort, to place himself in his true position as head of the mansion.

But the feeling lasted only for a second.

He sank back again into the chair in a condition of hopeless senility.

"And now," said Tom, "we have wandered all this while from my original purpose. Listen, sir, and I will tell you something that I witnessed a short time ago."

Tom King then very circumstantially and minutely made the baronet acquainted with those circumstances with which the reader is already familiar.

He was listened to in the utmost surprise—almost in disbelief

"Well, sir, concluded Tom, "you may say, and truly, that it was no concern of mine; yet I thought it my duty to make you acquainted with the facts, and have done so simply because of my firm conviction that something was going on which should not. Now, sir, here is a letter which will give some confirmation of my story. That rascally servant of yours dropped it in the road unconsciously, and I picked it up. It may be of importance or it may not."

The old man's hand shook to such an extent that he could scarcely take the letter from Tom King.

When he did so, he looked attentively at the seal.

"Why—why," he said "it has not been opened!"

Tom was amazed at such a remark.

"Opened? No, I should not be capable of such a deed."

"I—I mean," added the baronet, hastily, and in some confusion, "my wife has not seen this letter!"

"Oh!" ejaculated Tom; then he added: "And if you will be guided by me you will never let her see it. Open it now and read it while you have the opportunity."

It was really wonderful to see what an ascendancy Tom had already obtained over this old man. It was the power of a strong will over a weak one.

But the highwayman did not know and could not guess what means had been taken and what time expended to reduce this old man to his present pitiable plight.

It was not without a great deal of timidity that he ventured to tear open the letter.

Then adjusting his spectacles, he began to read.

Whilst he was so employed, Tom sat looking intently at him.

His countenance began to be a perfect study.

It lighted up all at once with an expression that was new to Tom.

The dim eyes began to brighten, a smile seemed on the point of breaking forth, and altogether quite a look of happiness overspread his visage.

No sooner had he finished reading the letter, however, than a sudden recollection seemed to come across him.

His head drooped, and once again he became the poor imbecile creature who elicited so much of Tom's commiseration.

"My boy," he murmured, while tears trickled slowly down his withered cheeks—"my poor boy, Roderic, would indeed that you were here! And yet, no—no! What am I saying? I forget myself! Young man," he added, looking up, "I am much obliged for this service you have done me. Is there any recompense that I can make you for it?"

"None whatever," replied Tom, "except—"

"Except what?"

"Why, sir, you see I have met with an accident. My horse fell, and I have broken my arm. It causes me great pain and inconvenience; I am weak from escape of blood, so that if you would afford me the shelter of your roof for a few hours I should ever remain under the deepest obligation to you."

CHAPTER CMXL.

IN WHICH TOM KING BEGINS TO COMPREHEND THE TRUE CONDITION OF AFFAIRS AT WILFIRS CROSS.

"I AM sorry," stammered the baronet—"very sorry; but you have asked me almost the only favour which I cannot grant. My wife, I am sure, will never allow you to remain beneath this roof."

"Then," said Tom, "I take my leave; but at the same time you must allow me to express my regret that a gentleman like yourself should permit a woman thus to rule you, and to make your whole life unhappy. Let me entreat you for the sake of your own happiness to cast off these trammels and once more appear in your own proper character, which, if I read aright, is one incapable of doing any mean or sordid action unless at the powerful suggestions of another."

"You speak truly, young man," was the reply, given with a little extra firmness of tone—"you speak very truly. I should have proffered resistance long ago; now I fear it is too late."

"Believe me," exclaimed Tom, impressively, "it is never too late to do right."

"If I could only think so," continued the baronet "if I could only feel that I had the slightest chance of success."

"Try," said Tom—"try."

For some moments there was a profound silence, during which it would appear that the baronet was thinking deeply.

After a time, however, he raised his head and looked Tom King full in the face.

"Who you are," he said, "I know not, nor do I care, but you have done me a disinterested kindness, and something, I know not what, draws you towards me—I feel impelled to ask your advice in another matter—to request you to give me your assistance."

"You do me too much honour," said Tom, with a bow. "You have but to speak, and I will do all I can. Believe me, I shall feel more content if, when I quit this place, I know that I have left you happier."

"Well, well—listen. I have not much to say, but every word is of importance. You must believe, then, that I have not always been the weak, miserable object you now see. No, I was once robust, strong, and possessed of a powerful will. In a word, I was happy.

"My first sorrow was when my wife died, leaving two children to my care. You saw one—Ellen—the other, my eldest, is Roderic."

"Then," exclaimed Tom, "I presume that the lady I have seen is your second wife."

"Yes, yes—she is, and I have ever since regretted the day on which I made her mistress of the hall. My boy, Roderic, was with me then, but very soon his impatient spirit chafed under the restraint that was continually laid upon him.

"I heard all kinds of complaints concerning him, and, like a weak fool, listened to them and reproved him.

"The end of this you already guess. He left me years and years ago. He ran away, and from that time to this I have not heard from or seen him.

"Indirectly I have been told of his doings, and they have always been such as to make my whole blood boil with sorrow and indignation.

"Now, however, I for the first time learn something different. Read this—you have a right to do so—and it will save me much explanation. It is from my oldest boyhood's friend."

With very great surprise, Tom took the letter that was extended towards him, and with still greater astonishment read as follows:—

"MY OLD, OLD FRIEND,—

"Years—many years have passed away since we met or communicated in any way with each other. You remember our parting, do you not? It was an angry one. I blamed you for the part you were taking against your son, under the instigation of the woman you raised to your high position. You resented what I said, we quarrelled and parted, and I smarted to such a degree under the injustice that I made a firm determination never to be the first to extend the hand of friendship to you again.

"Circumstances have made me alter that decision.

"A few days ago, in a manner I will not stop now to relate, I met your only son Roderic. He has grown a fine, broad-shouldered man, now greatly resembling you when you were young. But he has suffered more—far more than I can tell. He went forth to fight the battle of life, and he has come off second best in the encounter.

"His heart, I soon found, yearned towards you, towards his early home, and towards his sister, and so, with much difficulty, I have persuaded him to write to you to the effect that he is very, very sorry for the past, that he asks your pardon for all that he has done to offend you, and wishes to see you once again.

"He will follow hard upon his letter—do not feel surprised if you see him within twelve hours after you receive it.

"And now, my old friend, before I close this letter let me ask you to remember all the past, to welcome your son back, and to place him where he should be, at the head of your household.

"From your faithful friend,

"RICHARD."

Tom read this letter hastily, and then looked inquiringly at the baronet.

"You have read that letter?" he said, interrogatively.

"I have."

"And what do you make of it?"

"It opens up to me a long and painful story," replied Tom. "I can see the noble, high-spirited son thrust on one side for a worthless second wife. I can see her hatred of the heir, and I can guess the means by which she contrived to poison your mind against him, and to make home so uncomfortable that he was forced to leave it, and to leave it under your displeasure."

"You are right," said the old man, in a broken voice —"quite right. Heaven help me—I have done very wrong! I do believe," he added, "that at one time I hated him. Poor Roderic!"

"And," continued Tom, "I imagine that there is a tie or link of some sort between her ladyship and the man I saw this morning carrying the letter-bag. Can you tell me why he should utter those vindictive words when he singled out that one particular letter? Can you tell me why he intercepted it?"

"I dare not think of it," was the response. "My poor boy's letter has never reached me, and but for you I should have remained in ignorance of it, for my wife would have carefully kept this one from my sight."

"I am rejoiced," said Tom, with great earnestness, "to find that you are so rapidly assuming your own character. You are throwing off all that abjectness which pained me so to witness."

He was responded to by a feeble smile.

"I have great cause for self-reproach," he said—"great cause. Not only did I drive my boy forth a beggar, but have disowned him, cast him off, disinherited him!"

"But if you feel that you are wrong," said Tom, "surely it is not too late to make the needful change. Have you committed your intentions to paper?"

"I have—I have. Do not blame me," he added, hastily, as he observed Tom's reproachful look. "You cannot guess how much I have suffered or how my poor weak nerves have been played upon."

"But again I say it is not too late, provided that you are willing to welcome back your son."

"Willing?" ejaculated the old man. "I would give all I am possessed of if I could but see him stand before me at this moment; but I fear—I sadly fear—there is a dreadful presentiment in my mind that I shall never—never see him again, and that such will be my punishment for having acted as I have."

"Do not give way to such fears as those," said Tom, kindly; "but, if you really feel inclined to do your son justice, destroy the paper of which you spoke. Then all is well, for, of course, no one could gainsay his right to everything as the eldest born."

"Would that I could!" said the baronet, wringing his hands, and with fresh tears coursing down his cheeks—"would that I could! It is impossible—quite impossible—quite—quite!"

"How?" said Tom—"tell me in what way?"

"My wife has it!"

"Your will?"

"Yes."

Tom paused in deep thought.

"How will all this end?" murmured the old man. "I tremble and grow weak again! I feel—I feel that she is coming!"

"Then," said Tom, "if that is the case, put on what show of boldness you can. Announce your intentions, and abide by them. You will find all you have to do is to maintain the appearance of resolution. It will be difficult at first, but try."

At this instant the door was thrown violently open, and her ladyship appeared upon the threshold.

"Well," she said, in her sharp, commanding tones—"well, may I ask if you intend to remain here all day with this fellow? Ah! I see by your nod that your conference is over."

Then, turning to Tom King, she said, imperiously:

"Go, sir—go—quit the hall at once! You see Sir Ralph desires it."

Tom King looked appealingly at the baronet.

He was sorry—truly sorry—to perceive what an effect the mere presence of this woman had upon him.

He had shrunk up in his chair into the smallest possible compass—he had held up his hands as though he would protect himself from the attack of some assailant, while he trembled from head to foot.

He had given no sign indicating that he wished for Tom's departure, but his wife chose to consider that he had, and trusted to his weakness and imbecility not to dispute her words.

She had resolved to make a bold effort to recover her former position.

Tom waited in vain for the baronet to contradict the words his wife had uttered.

But he was resolved that this infamous woman should not perfect her shameful plans, and so, with a bow of mock respect, he answered:

"I am very sorry indeed to intrude upon your ladyship, but, at the same time, I must beg most emphatically to assure you that just before you entered the room Sir Ralph was pleased to request me to stay here for some time, and I have accepted his invitation."

"Yes, yes," stammered the old man, brightening a little, for he seemed to feel that while Tom was by he had a protector who was able and willing to aid him.

"What," shrieked her ladyship—"what do I hear? Would you speak thus to my face? Sir," she continued, turning to Tom, "you are a scoundrel—an infamous scoundrel! You see the condition of my lamented husband's mind, and you have taken advantage of my absence to play upon it for your unworthy ends! Begone, sir, or I will summon assistance, and have you forcibly expelled!"

"I regret," said Tom, "that I should be the cause of any discord, but I beg to assure you that I shall remain here until Sir Ralph tells me to leave, and let me caution you against attempting to use any force!"

Her ladyship shook again with rage, and, advancing to her husband, she took hold of him by the shoulder, and shook him roughly.

"Ralph—Ralph," she shrieked, "do you hear what that fellow says, or are you insensible to his words? Command him to leave—order him to quit this roof at once!"

"Sir Ralph," said Tom, solemnly, "now is the time—now is the opportunity to do justice to yourself and to those you love! Assert your authority in this case, and you will be the better able to assert it in another. Do not fear any consequence. I will stand by and shield you from all harm. Is it your wish that I should remain here or not?"

"That you should remain," said the old man, with a sudden effort, and speaking in a tone of voice so unlike his own that it made her ladyship fairly stagger back several paces—"that you remain! And you, madam," he added, "quit this room, and do not enter it until I give you permission! Mark me—I will be obeyed!"

Thunderstruck, stupified, amazed beyond measure, her ladyship, unable to articulate a word, suffered herself to be half bowed, half pushed out of the apartment.

Then Tom closed the door, and locked it.

Tom was only just in time.

When he turned round, the sudden accession of courage which had enabled the baronet to speak as he had done departed, and he again sank helpless and inert into his chair.

Tom perceived it with regret; but banishing that expression from his countenance, he spoke as cheerfully and kindly as he could:

"Do you see the result of a little firmness?" he exclaimed. "Take my advice, and in a short time all will be well."

"I—I am amazed."

"No doubt you are—it is only natural that you should be. Let me tell you, however, that you have only to continue to present the same resolute front, and your object is gained—your wife will sink down into her true position, and justice will be done."

"It shall be done!" murmured the old man. "Do not leave me—do not leave me—remain at my side! While you do so I can be bold and resolute."

"I will with joy," said Tom, "if you will give me your word that when Roderic comes he will have your welcome and your blessing."

"He will—he will!" was the reply. "Would that I could see him now!"

"Most fervently do I re-echo that wish! And now, sir, as you were kind enough to grant me the favour of allowing me to remain here for a short time, I think I shall be able to requite you it."

"You have done so already."

"No—no. You forget the will. By some means or other that must be obtained and destroyed, otherwise it will be the source of endless unhappiness."

"But how is it to be obtained?" said the baronet, again in the deepest dejection—"how can it be done?"

"Leave it to me," said Tom. "If I have your permission to remain beneath this roof I will do my best to recover possession of it, and as I have set my mind upon this matter, it will be strange indeed if I do not succeed."

The old man gazed upon him in unqualified surprise.

Such vigour and resolution were strange to him.

But he looked childishly pleased and happy as he said:

"Do that, young sir—do that, and you will ever be entitled to my gratitude!"

CHAPTER CMXLI.

EVENTS AT WILFIRS CROSS BEGIN TO ASSUME A DEEPLY-INTERESTING ASPECT.

THE deep interest which Tom King could not help feeling in these strange events with which he had been so singularly identified and mixed up, caused him to forget all about the wound in his arm, and probably he would have continued to do so had he not been most disagreeably reminded of it by feeling a sharp twinge of pain, which he could not prevent showing itself on his countenance.

The baronet looked at him in surprise.

"My good sir," he exclaimed, "what is it ails you?—what is the meaning of that strange expression?"

"You will pardon me," said Tom, "but the fact is, I met with an accident while riding a short time ago—nothing very serious I believe; but just then I felt a sudden return of pain; even now it has not subsided."

"You must have a rare amount of fortitude," was the reply, "to behave as you have, and all the time suffering from a recent injury. But what can I do to assist you?"

"I am afraid nothing," said Tom, "for, of course, you have no surgical assistance in the house?"

"I am sorry to say none."

"Well, then, I will just bear with the pain a little time longer while we talk over our position. You must pardon me for this extra trouble, but I have lost some blood, and it seems to have had a confusing effect upon my mental faculties, so that I am not quite sure I fully understand the proper aspect of affairs."

"Of what is it, then, that you are in doubt?"

"I cannot say that I am in doubt about anything—at all events, we may come to several conclusions. The first is, that the letter taken from the bag by your servant was the one written to you by your son Roderic."

"Yes, no doubt of it—no doubt of it. And yet, after all, Roderic's letter may be upon the table, for, you see, her ladyship, in hastily quitting the room, has forgotten that she has left all the letters on the table."

"But that point can soon be ascertained, can it not?"

"Oh, yes! My old eyes are dim, but yet they seem brighter than they did a short time ago. I feel sure that I could recognise my poor boy's writing at the first glance."

He rose, apparently by a painful effort, from his chair, and stooping over the table, sorted the letters over quickly.

He gave one glance to each, then shook his head.

"No, Roderic's letter is not there," he said. "There can be no doubt that is the one you saw intercepted."

"I am perfectly certain. But you have not told me what situation this man holds in your household."

"That would be hard to say," was the strange answer. "He was engaged some years ago by my wife, and since then has occupied himself I scarcely know how, chiefly as an assistant to my steward."

Tom nodded.

"I was certain some tie existed," he exclaimed—"I felt a conviction of it, and it is easy now for me to comprehend why he broke forth into such vindictive expressions when he caught sight of your son's letter."

The baronet looked at Tom in some surprise.

"I am not certain," continued Tom, "whether you fully realise your exact position; but I am perfectly assured that a plot is now on foot, and has been for some time, to wrest from you all your possessions. One great step has been gained by the disinheritance of your son, another in the will you have been persuaded to make. Justly, then, they must fear any return of your son as likely to undo all that they have accomplished."

"I understand you."

"I am glad you do. And now I can assure you that the pain in my arm so much increases that I shall not be able to endure it much longer. Can you tell me where I shall be likely to meet with surgical aid?"

"In the next village," was the answer; "it is not more than a mile and a half away, and one apothecary lives there who has quite a reputation for his skill in broken limbs and such matters."

"Then, with your leave," said Tom, "I will ride over to him."

"Do so—do so."

"And that," continued Tom, reflectively, "suggests to me another plan—an amendment in my course of operations. I will leave here as though I intended to depart for good, especially we will try to make your wife and her accomplice believe that I am going and shall not return again."

"But why?" inquired the old man—"why?"

"Simply because while I am here they will watch my movements very closely, and be circumspect in all they do; when I am gone it will be different."

"I see."

"You may depend upon it," continued Tom, "that I shall return here as quickly as possible; but I shall do it secretly—no one shall be aware of my presence if I can help it; but I will keep the closest watch upon everything, and if I see cause to interfere will do so."

"But you are putting yourself to much trouble on my account."

"No, no," said Tom—"believe me, none at all. You can more than repay me for anything I do by finding me a shelter for the space of a few days, until, in fact, my arm is well."

"It is a simple request, but I grant it readily."

"Thanks! And now let me ask you to try your best to remain as you now are—that is, something like yourself. The change which has taken place during the last half hour is surprising; let me hope that it will continue."

"I will try to be firm—I will try to assert my own independence."

"Hush—hush!"

"What is it?"

"I fancy I can hear some one approaching. Wait, and I will unfasten the door."

With a noiseless step, Tom crossed the room, and as noiselessly turned the key; then, sinking his voice to the lowest whisper, he said:

"I am now going to take a farewell of you—I mean a farewell in appearance. You do what you can to persuade me to stay, and I will declare how impossible it is. Act your part well, and your wife will be quite deceived."

The old baronet nodded, and scarcely had this understanding been arrived at than the door was flung rudely open, and her ladyship, looking very flushed, made her appearance.

Tom was standing with his back to the door, and took not the least notice of her entrance.

The first words that reached her ears were:

"No, sir, believe me, it causes very great regret on my part to refuse your kind offer, but the business I have is so pressing and immediate that I cannot remain with you. At some other time I shall be proud and glad to avail myself of your hospitality."

A slight change came over the baronet when he was conscious of the presence of his wife; but he studiously strove to prevent his eyes from meeting hers.

With a deep sigh, which told how much sincerity there was in the words, he replied:

"I wish I could persuade you to remain, but since I cannot, let me know when you will be this way again—when I shall have the pleasure of seeing you?"

"Not for a month at least," said Tom. "And now, as I have lingered too long already, perhaps you will permit me to take my departure. I am glad you do not think ill of me, though my errand was an unwelcome one. Until I heard your view of the case I believed your son Roderic to be deeply injured, and that's why I ventured to become his intercessor. What you have told me has, however, changed my opinion."

These words for a moment or two mystified the old man greatly; but her ladyship, for whose ear they were especially intended, looked intensely surprised.

"It is hard," added Tom, "for a father and a son to be parted, and so I hope the time will come when you will be reunited. Now, sir, farewell!"

He made his bow, and turned round.

Her ladyship looked at him scrutinly.

"Farewell, my lady!" said Tom, with another bow. "I am sorry I behaved with so much rudeness to you; but, then, it seems I have been altogether led astray."

The baronet's wife could scarcely understand all this; it was so entirely different to what she had expected.

She had made up her mind to rave and storm and by main force to have Tom King driven forth.

Now she found him in the act of leaving.

As he quitted the room, however, Tom King gave one parting glance at her countenance, and surely if any face ever spoke, hers did then.

The thought that occupied her mind was plainly to be read.

It was:

"Go—go! I am glad to be rid of you! And when you are once outside these walls I will take care that you do not re-enter them!"

Quitting the room, Tom King found himself in the spacious hall, which reached from the front to the back of the mansion.

In the centre was a broad flight of stone steps, leading to the upper story.

Tom turned at once in the direction of the door that opened in the rear of the mansion, as his object was to go as quickly as he could to the stables, obtain his horse, and ride off.

The pain he felt was something terrific, yet he bore it like a martyr.

He was rather surprised to find no servants about, and not desiring to create any stir, for he felt that the fewer persons by whom he was seen the better, Tom strode quickly along the passage.

On his way, he passed one door that was a little way open, and as he did so, some sweet, girlish tones reached his ears.

"Not now, Ernest," said the voice—"not now! I dare not remain here. To-night, at the old spot near the plantation, I will meet you."

Tom did not wait to hear the response, but hurried on.

He attached no particular importance to what he had overheard. It was not until afterwards, indeed, that the circumstance was brought back to his memory.

Crossing a lawn which extended itself at the rear of the hall, Tom bent his steps towards the outbuildings.

Reaching them, he was still surprised to notice the absence of any servants.

The first door he came to evidently led into the stables.

It was standing partly open, and Tom paused upon the threshold.

Looking in, he saw seated on a corn-bin, with his back towards him, the man whom he had witnessed opening the letter-bag.

He was so intent upon something he was doing that evidently he had not heard Tom King's approach.

Everything this man might do had a special interest in Tom's eyes, and therefore the highwayman waited and watched his movements with great attention.

Not at first, however, was he able to make out what the object was that the man held.

It looked almost like a slender steel rod, and this he appeared to be polishing vigorously.

Suddenly, however, the other end was raised, and when Tom King caught a glimpse of it he perceived at once that it was some singular kind of firearm, the like of which he had never before seen

It was just at this time that the man, turning round for the purpose of obtaining some more oil, caught sight of Tom standing in the doorway.

He uttered a cry of surprise, and he exhibited great signs of consternation.

He recovered his presence of mind sufficiently, however, to raise the lid of the corn-bin, drop the singular weapon into it, and then turn the key in the padlock.

Then, with great servility, he took off his cap, and spoke to Tom in fawning tones.

"I beg your pardon, sir!" he said. "I did not see you! May I ask what you want?"

"Merely my horse," said Tom, who, wishing to throw this man as much off his guard as possible, thought the best thing he could do was to pretend to be unaware of what the man was about.

"Very good, sir," was the answer. "I will call the groom. Yours is the grey horse, I believe?"

"Yes, that is right. But as the groom is not here, do not trouble yourself to call him. If you will assist me, I will soon have the saddle and bridle on. I stayed with your master rather longer than I intended, and I am now anxious to make up for the time I have lost."

Tom did not wait for the man to consent or refuse, but going at once to the grey horse, he began to saddle him.

The under-steward, if such he may be termed, assisted him, and while he was doing so he was cunning enough to ask, in a pretended, offhand way, as though it did not concern him in the least:

"Shall you be back again soon, sir?"

"No," replied Tom. "I should if I could, but business calls me. I trust to call again in about a month, or it may be more."

"A month?" said the under-steward, with a cough, and stroking his chin with his hand—"a month? That's a long time! Many changes take place in a month sometimes!"

"Yes," said Tom, who could not help thinking there was a deeper meaning in what the man said than appeared at first sight.

By this time the horse was saddled and brought out into the yard.

Tom drew his hat closely over his face, buttoned up his coat, which he had a good excuse for doing, for the air was very cold, then vaulted into the saddle.

"If I follow that lane," said Tom, pointing over a stone wall, "it will take me to Wilfirs Cross, will it not?"

"To the village, sir? Oh, yes! Wait a moment! I will open the gate for you. Then turn to the left, and you will find it rather more than a mile and a half away."

"Yes, yes," said Tom, "I know perfectly well. Accept that as a recompense for your civility."

He dropped a crown-piece into the man's hand as he spoke, then turning his head in the requisite direction, rode rapidly away.

"Confound the rascal!" muttered Tom, between his teeth. "It went sorely against the grain of me to give him anything, and yet it is important he should be thrown off his guard, and I believe I have well succeeded.

"Events will grow interesting ere long, I feel certain. What an evil-looking scamp he is, to be sure!" he added, a moment afterwards. "'Villain' is stamped upon his face. And what could he want with that strange firearm, I wonder, for firearm I am sure it is? No good! Anyone could tell that by the confusion of his manner, and by his great anxiety to conceal it. Well, well—we shall see! Perhaps by nightfall we shall witness a perfect revolution in this household!"

CHAPTER CMXLII.

TOM KING HAS A RARE ADVENTURE WITH A PIOUS APOTHECARY.

WHILE indulging in these reflections, Tom King trotted his horse rapidly in the direction he wished to take—partly in order that not even the faintest breath of suspicion should cloud the under-steward's mind, and partly because he was exceedingly anxious to have his arm looked to, for the anguish it occasioned him was almost more than he could bear.

Under any other circumstances than the present it is possible that Tom might have hesitated a little before he made up his mind to visit the village.

But the peculiar nature of the events by which he was surrounded, and the pain of his wound, made him forgetful of all ordinary caution.

Certainly, as he journeyed on he saw nothing to create the least amount of uneasiness in his mind.

Around him all that he could see was a wide expanse of well-cultivated land, forming part of the domain of Sir Ralph Cromer.

The village, as he suspected, he found scarcely worthy of the name, and was inhabited only by those people employed directly or indirectly by the baronet.

There was an ale-house, with a large swinging sign; and just beyond that, lying rather back from the road, was a small house, on the front of which was painted: "Elisha Coles, apothecary."

The appearance of Tom King in this remote and little-frequented place caused an immense amount of excitement—an excitement that would have been greater still had he arrived at any other portion of the day.

But just then it happened that the majority of the inhabitants were absent pursuing their daily occupations.

Tom was just beginning to think that surely this quiet little retreat was one in which nothing of him or his comrades could be known—some place where the police officers would never penetrate—when he discovered that it was quite a delusion.

He absolutely started indeed when he saw posted upon a wall a bill similar in appearance to many he had seen before.

It was some distance off, but he did not desire to approach it any closer.

He could tell very well that the figures at the top represented the amount of the reward offered for the apprehension of himself and his companions, and that below was a full description of the personal appearance of each.

After seeing this, Tom might naturally hesitate before he ventured to trust himself in the apothecary's abode.

But pain quickly banished that hesitation, and he looked around him with a somewhat pleasant smile, feeling that he could if necessary, vanquish the whole village.

Perceiving that a stranger had stopped before his gate a small, thin man, with scanty grey hair, opened the front door of the house, and advanced with a stooping gait.

"Good morning, sir!" he said, in a voice between a whine and a drawl. "Heaven be praised, I can say it—good morning, sir! May I ask what you want with me!"

Tom King thought this a very singular address, and stared at the speaker with surprise.

His amazement lasted only for a moment, and then he inquired:

"Am I addressing Mr. Coles?"

"Yes—praise the Lord, for all His mercies—such is my name."

"Then," said Tom, "I have been sent down from the hall, by Sir Ralph; he tells me that you are clever in surgery, and you see I have met with a slight accident to my arm."

"Oh, Sir Ralph is too good—much too good, and yet not good either, if I may contradict myself—he is an evil-minded man, quite dead to all true piety and religion. May I hope, sir, that you are a believer—that you have been saved?"

"Oh, decidedly!" said Tom.

"If not," continued the pious apothecary, "either allow me to convert you, or else depart—I will give no assistance to the ungodly."

"I need no conversion," said Tom, "none at all, I can assure you."

"I rejoice to hear it," was the reply—"greatly rejoice! Please to enter, my good sir, and while I am attending to your hurt we can have a little edifying conversation upon grace."

Luckily, just then, Tom turned round, for he could not suppress a smile at the idea of one of his profession having any such conversation.

Somehow or other he had taken an invincible dislike to Mr. Coles, in spite of all his professions of piety.

Tom's own opinion was that, like many others he assumed religion only as a cloak.

Whether this was so or not really did not much signify to the highwayman, provided he was really expert in dressing wounds.

"I am a poor, weak, trembling worm," he said, as he ushered Tom King into a small parlour at the back of his little shop—"a poor, trembling worm, weak in body, but I trust strong in grace."

Tom gave a sympathetic sigh and shook his head, which he thought were the best things he could do by way of reply.

"Sit down my dear sir—take this chair, and allow me to examine the nature of the injury."

Tom gladly complied, for just then he really felt quite ill and faint, and instead of one apothecary he saw fifty at least spinning round before him.

"Why, gracious powers, is it possible?" ejaculated Mr. Coles. "Why, this is a wound you have received from some kind of firearm!"

"Yes—yes, you are quite right."

A look of surprise and curiosity appeared on the apothecary's face as he said:

"How strange for you to speak of it as an accident; I never saw anything look less accidental in my life."

"No matter," said Tom, very faintly—"see to it, I beg I feel now as though all the life had ebbed out of my veins."

One glance into Tom's countenance was ample confirmation of the truth of what he had just said.

His eyes were half closed and his face deathly pale.

Mr. Coles now bestirred himself in good earnest, and, by the way in which he went about his work, justified the opinion Sir Ralph had expressed concerning him.

Tom grew fainter and fainter—he became insensible of all pain.

He knew that the apothecary was busy with his arm, and had some dim idea that a bullet had been extracted, for he fancied that a voice miles and miles off had whispered something to that effect in his ear.

When he recovered himself, he found his arm carefully bound up, and Mr. Coles standing over him, gazing very attentively into his countenance.

Tom opened his eyes suddenly—so suddenly, indeed, that the apothecary gave a start and uttered an ejaculation that did not sound particularly pious.

At the same time, Tom saw him cram something rather hastily into one of his pockets, but what it was he could not make out.

"Ahem!" he said, in some confusion. "You feel better now, sir, I hope?"

"Yes, decidedly better," said Tom, in a very faint voice, and pretending to be much weaker than he really was, for he thought by this means he should be able to understand the meaning of the apothecary's confusion.

He had his eyes all the time fixed upon the coat-pocket into which that something had been thrust so hurriedly.

"Have you nothing to revive me—something in the shape of a stimulant?"

Mr. Coles had been watching Tom with half-closed eyes, in an attitude and manner strongly resembling the way in which a cat will regard the movements of a mouse.

"Yes," he said, "I have something that will do you good, and after that we will return thanks for your narrow escape and complete restoration."

The apothecary turned round and opened a drawer.

While he was so engaged his back was turned towards Tom, who leaning quickly forward, dipped his fingers into the gaping coat pocket and drew forth a crumpled up piece of paper.

Before he had time to look at it the apothecary turned round and said:

"Here, my dear sir, is the stimulant I spoke of."

Then, in a tone of voice strikingly at variance to that which he had all along employed, he exclaimed:

"Tom King, I know you, and I claim the reward! Do you feel that pressing against your forehead? Do you know what it is? It is the muzzle of a pistol—a pistol carefully loaded, and if you stir or offer the least resistance I will blow your brains out and say I did it in self-defence!"

It cost Tom a great effort, but nevertheless he sat perfectly still, except that he partially unfolded the crumpled up paper, and saw that it was one of the bills containing a description of himself.

"You are weak," said the apothecary, excitedly—"you have not the strength of a mouse; and remember, this pistol is at your head. Show your good sense, then, by immediate surrender."

Tom closed his eyes, and seemed as though he had quite swooned away for the second time.

The action threw the apothecary partially off his guard, and Tom took the utmost advantage of this circumstance.

With a sudden movement, he wrested the pistol from the apothecary's hand, while at the same time he seized him by the throat with a powerful grasp.

The pain he endured was something fearful, but he did not care for it now.

"You rascal!" sa om "this is your piety, is it? Keep still! D n't move or speak, or " will be the worse for you!"

The apothecary's limbs trembled to such an extent that he could not stand.

Tom did not possess the strength requisite to hold him up, so he slipped down and sat on the floor in a very ignominious manner indeed.

"Go!" he said to Tom. "Go away, and leave me here—I will not try to molest you any further!"

"I cannot believe you," said Tom, "or place the least trust in your words. I am going to take such measures as make my safety certain."

Tom glanced around him, in search of something by which he could secure his prisoner.

He saw nothing, however, save some cloths, or rather towels, some of which had been used in the dressing of his arm.

Taking up one, he twisted it rapidly into the shape of a rope; then, when Mr. Coles opened his mouth to speak again, he thrust it between his teeth, and with nimble fingers tied it tightly at the back of his head, so that he was most effectually gagged.

A dismal, moaning sound, inaudible at any distance, was all the noise that he could make.

Two more towels served excellently well to confine his arms and ankles.

Then came the consideration, where should he be disposed of until such time as Tom could get safely away?

This was rather a puzzling question, for some of the people belonging to his household might enter the room the moment he left it, and raise an alarm.

This above all things Tom was anxious to prevent and at last he believed he had hit upon the means of doing so.

By the side of the fireplace he perceived the door of a large cupboard.

The key was sticking in the lock, so Tom unhesitatingly turned it and pulled open the door

An ejaculation of astonishment—almost of terror—escaped his lips, for he suddenly found himself face to face with a most unexpected object.

This was the skeleton of a man, so placed as to appear to be standing upright in the closet.

The white, polished bones, and the glittering pieces of wire by which they were fixed together, had an awfully ghastly look.

Tom turned round and looked at the apothecary, and he could tell by the expression of his face that he rather enjoyed Tom's discomfiture.

But the highwayman did not allow it to be manifest, for, pointing to the skeleton and addressing Mr. Coles, he exclaimed:

"A friend of yours, I suppose? Well, I think there is room for both. You shall go in there and keep him company."

The apothecary shook his head violently.

"No, you sha'n't," said Tom. "I have an idea—a very good idea."

What it was will quickly be seen.

The apothecary, with glaring eyes, watched every one of Tom's movements, all the while feeling a most uncomfortable sensation in his breast.

First of all, Tom found that the skeleton was suspended in the cupboard by means of a piece of wire hooked over a nail.

To take the framework of bones down was therefore an easy matter.

Having done so, he dragged it with him a short distance, and placed it in the old-fashioned arm-chair in which the apothecary usually sat.

A cloak was hanging up behind the door, and in this, with a little trouble, Tom carefully enveloped the skeleton.

Then pulling off the apothecary's wig and spectacles, he placed them on the skeleton's head, surmounting the whole by a three-cornered hat that he had found hanging up along with the cloak.

The appearance produced by this object was horrifying in the extreme, and would surely be sufficient almost to terrify to death anyone who came upon it at unawares.

The white, polished, long face had truly a horrible appearance, which was heightened by the incongruous objects placed about it. Most especially did the huge horn spectacles add to this appearance.

Tom had a little trouble in forcing the skeleton to sit sufficiently upright, but even this difficulty was overcome, and then he carefully arranged the folds of the cloak in such a manner that one of the white, ghastly skeleton hands was plainly shown upon the black cloth, which made its whiteness appear all the more striking.

This done, Tom stepped back a pace or two, and regarded his work with an eye of admiration.

Not so the apothecary.

He gazed on all with the greatest wonder and apprehension.

"Now," said Tom, addressing him, "I have a great mind to hang you up in the cupboard in the same way that you hung up the skeleton. I will not do so, however, but I will place you there, and take good care you do not get out."

It required all Tom's present strength to drag the body of the apothecary across the floor of the little parlour and prop him up in the closet.

But, as has been stated, he was a thin, diminutive man, and his weight was a mere trifle.

Having got him upon his feet, Tom pushed him close against the wall at the back of the cupboard.

The apothecary was inclined to resist—he did not like the idea of being locked up in that confined space.

And so, being perfectly helpless, he fell forward much in the same manner as a corpse might have done.

But Tom pushed him back with some vigour, and the next moment the door of the closet was closed.

Then came a dull, heavy thump.

The apothecary had tumbled up against it.

The highwayman turned the key, took it out of the lock, and consigned it to his pocket.

Then, tapping on the woodwork, he said:

"Good morning, Mr. Coles! I hope you will make yourself as comfortable as circumstances will admit! I rather think you will remain there for some time. Whoever comes into the room next will be rather startled."

Just then Tom heard a footstep approaching, so he considered it was high time to be off.

He gave one parting glance at the skeleton, whose aspect appeared to be even more horrible than at first, and then opened the door.

On the threshold he met some one that he took to be a maid-of-all-work.

She started on seeing Tom, and then said:

"Oh, if you please, sir, is Mr. Coles in his room?"

"Yes," said Tom, "and I don't think he wishes to be disturbed."

"Oh, never mind his wishes!" was the reply. "Missis wants him, so he must come!"

With these words the girl brushed past Tom King, pushed open the door of the room abruptly, and advanced about half a dozen steps before she noticed the figure seated in the arm-chair.

The cloak—which, oddly enough, the apothecary sometimes wore indoors, because he complained so of the cold—the three-cornered hat, and the wig were quite familiar to the girl's eyes, but she caught a glimpse of the skeleton's face and the bony hand.

She stopped short, and uttered a dismal shriek.

At the same moment a horrible, rumbling, thumping noise assailed her ears, accompanied by a muffled groan.

The girl responded by another shriek, and fell down face foremost on the floor.

Tom heard more footsteps approaching, and so beat a precipitate retreat.

"I should like to know how it all goes on," he murmured, "but can't stay. I rather fancy there will be a slight commotion in the village before many hours pass away. Well, so much the better—they will be all the less likely to think about me."

With this philosophical remark, Tom mounted his horse and rode off.

Just as he did so, he saw a window in the apothecary's house was dashed open, and a female voice shrieked out:

"Oh, murder—murder! Help—help! Murder!"

Tom King took no further notice, but, trotting round a corner of the lane, was in a moment lost to sight.

CHAPTER CMXLIII.

DESCRIBES HOW A TROOP OF POLICE OFFICERS ARRIVED RATHER UNEXPECTEDLY AT THE VILLAGE.

BEFORE following Tom King and relating the further adventures which befel him at the hall, it is necessary that we should take a brief glance at the proceedings in the village—proceedings that resulted in very serious consequences, for Tom was quite wrong in thinking that he had heard the last of the joke.

The violent outcry, then, was made by the wife of the apothecary, who was almost beside herself with terror.

She had caught one glimpse of her servant girl lying, as it appeared to her, dead upon the parlour floor, and of the skeleton seated in the arm-chair.

In the deep, sleepy silence which invariably prevailed in the village, her outcries were distinctly heard, and soon several neighbours came hurrying forwards to learn what was the matter

"Murder!" shrieked Mrs. Coles. "Oh, murder—murder! There's a double murder in the house!"

On receipt of this intimation, those who had drawn near the apothecary's house drew back, uttering dismal shrieks.

Soon, however, men were seen running hastily towards them.

Some came from the alehouse, others from the places where they had been engaged in working.

Strangely enough, the first man who passed through the garden gate was the landlord of the alehouse, and he was so short and so stout, so scant of breath, and so chronically red in the face, that it was quite a wonder now he could have contrived to move himself so quickly.

The unusual exertion deprived him of the power of speech, and after his arrival all he could do was to goggle his eyes fearfully, and gasp like some huge fish suddenly thrown upon the shore.

Then came the smith, and after him the cooper, who also filled the office of parish constable, and behind him again came his assistant.

"Come in!" shrieked Mrs. Coles, weeping and wringing her hands. "Oh, do come in—somebody come in and see the awful sight!"

"What's the matter?" asked the blacksmith, hoarsely.

"Matter? murder is the matter!" was the answer. "Why don't you come in and look? I can see you there, Mr. Peters; why don't you set the example of coming forward?"

This was addressed to the parish constable.

"I am coming ma'am," he answered—"I am coming; but perhaps you'd be kind enough to run downstairs and open the door, or shall we break it in?"

"No, no—I will come down," was the reply. "Wait a minute, I'll come down."

She disappeared at once from the window, and then the constable, facing round and addressing the men, said:

"I call upon you all, as good men and true, to assist me in this matter! If it is murder, the guilty man may be in the house, and if so, you must assist me to capture him."

Just then the front door was thrown open, and Mrs. Coles made a dash to get outside.

The constable stepped out of the way immediately, and addressing the others, he cried after the manner of some gallant generals:

"Forward—forward! Enter! I will follow!"

But the villagers by no means saw the force of this arrangement; they resolutely refused to stir, while they cried:

"No—no, Mr. Peters, it's your place to go first. Come now, no shirking, we'll back you up!"

Mr. Peters looked as though he should prefer backing out of the whole affair, but he was afraid to say as much

At length the villagers fairly clustered round him, and drove him to the front door of the house.

In spite of all his struggles and resistance, the shop was entered and crossed, and the door leading into the little parlour reached.

They stopped a moment on the threshold.

"Th—th—there's nobody here!" said Mr. Peters, speaking as well as his chattering teeth would allow him—"th—th—there's nobody here!"

Just then an awful cry came upon their ears, yet it was not a cry either, nor a groan, nor a moan, nor, in fact, any specific sound for which there is a name.

It was something compounded of all these, yet seeming dull and muffled, and mingled with it was an odd, lumbering, thumping noise.

"Murder!" roared the constable—"murder! Let me out—let me out! I can't stay here!"

But by this time the apothecary's shop was filled with people, and so densely packed were they that it was impossible for those who had already entered to pass out again.

Not one who heard the horrible sounds could control their consternation.

Faces dirty and begrimed by labour turned ghastly white, and, what was the greatest phenomenon of all, the ruby countenance of the alehouse landlord blanched also.

The fearful sound was repeated again and again, or it would be more correct to say it never ceased.

"It—it comes from that room," remarked the constable, presently. "What can it be?"

"Push the door open a little wider," was the reply. "There can be no harm in doing that. Then perhaps we shall see."

Fortunately for the constable, one of the villagers had entered armed with a pitchfork, and this he passed over the heads of the rest as he said:

"Here, Muster Peters, just gi'e the door a poke wi that!"

The constable complied with this demand, and slowly and creakingly the door was pushed open upon its hinges.

Then truly was an awful sight presented to their notice.

The servant girl still lay stretched insensible upon the floor, and there sat the skeleton in the apothecary's arm-chair, looking, if possible, more hideous than ever, for the slight wind coming through the open window, which had blown the door to again, had also disarranged the bony framework so that the head was inclined to one side, after the manner of the attitude some people are apt to assume when they wish to appear particularly knowing or cunning.

Such a sight as this was one for which the villagers were not prepared.

They stood as if suddenly turned to stone; literally they were rooted to the spot—not one could have stirred, had his life depended upon it—it became, indeed, a difficult matter even to breathe.

Then the horrible noise came again, this time somewhat louder than before.

The lumbering was more unmistakable, and, as if by a common instinct, all turned their eyes in the direction of the cupboard behind which the apothecary was standing.

That, beyond all doubt, was the source from which the noise proceeded, but who was there among them bold enough to enter that awful chamber, and, opening the cupboard, ascertain the cause of the disturbance?

Who would venture to approach the fearful object sitting in the chair?

Certainly no one of those present.

Then the girl began to show signs of returning consciousness.

She moved slightly and uttered a moaning sound, both of which increased the terror of the villagers, if such a thing could possibly be.

"Oh!" she groaned, "what have I seen? Murder—murder!"

"Take notice of that," said the constable, in a deep and warning voice—"take notice of that! Her first words were—'Murder—murder!'"

Those whom he addressed nodded, and looked as wise as they were able.

Then the girl, raising her head, once more caught sight of the ghastly figure in the chair.

This time, however, she did not faint, but, in some incomprehensible fashion, rolled, crawled, and tumbled over the floor until she reached the threshold; then, gaining her feet, she turned round and endeavoured to fly.

But the constable, with a sudden accession of valour, seized her and held her tightly.

"No," he said, "not so fast! You are my prisoner, and must explain the meaning of all this!"

This completed the girl's terror, and she found herself unable to speak at all.

Meanwhile, the bumping inside the cupboard continued at a prodigious rate.

"Speak, wretched girl!" said the constable, with surprising boldness—"speak, I say, and explain all this!"

Just then there was a louder bump than usual against the cupboard door—so loud a one, and given with such force, that the woodwork could not withstand it.

Suddenly the door flew open, and out rolled the apothecary.

Then such a fighting and scrambling to get out of the shop when they beheld this strange, singular apparition—for no one recognised the apothecary—was something fearful.

Shrieks and cries of every description rent the air.

The apothecary knew that help was near—it will be remembered that Tom King had not deprived him of his sense of hearing—he knew all that had taken place, and so, most exasperated at the turn of affairs, he wondered how his neighbours could be so stupid.

The roll of cloth in his mouth effectually prevented speech; but in his struggles, he had got one hand partially at liberty, and now, after having rolled over a few times on the floor, he disengaged it entirely.

When this was done, it was by no means so difficult to untie the towel that bound his feet, and also the one that gagged him.

No. 195 will be Published next Monday.

By the time he had accomplished these operations not a soul was left in the shop, which presented a scene of terrible ruin and disorder.

Heedless of all this, and heedless of his own appearance, and intent only upon vengeance, Mr. Coles rushed forth.

He saw the villagers flying before him like a pack of sheep.

He shouted to them at the top of his voice—he waved his arms, and called to them to come back.

But the more he shouted the faster they ran, and eventually, tired and breathless, he stopped at the extreme end of the village, while his neighbours continued their headlong flight.

The apothecary wiped the blood and perspiration from his face, while he gave utterance to some very impious exclamations.

He was now quite alone in his native village—it was deserted by every human being.

He was engaged in speculating upon the means he should adopt of rejoining his companions, or calling them to his side, when he perceived, approaching from an opposite direction, a small troop of horsemen.

The apothecary cleared his clouded eyes, and gazed upon them.

"Officers!" he cried, with a shriek—"they are officers! Now—now I shall be repaid for all that I have suffered—now, indeed, will the tables be turned!"

Without another word, he scampered off in this fresh direction.

The officers saw the singular figure bounding towards them at such a rapid rate, and viewed it with surprise, for every now and then the excited apothecary would miss his footing and fall heavily to the ground.

Then he would not stay to rise again, but continued rolling over and over in a most inexplicable way, until finally he rolled up on to his feet, and continued at full speed again.

When he at last reached the officers, he found himself unable to articulate a word; wisely, therefore, he forebore from making the attempt; he knew if he waited a moment he would soon recover command of his breath.

Having done so, he exclaimed:

"The reward—the reward! Mark you, I claim the reward! I am fully and fairly entitled to it, so don't try to cheat me out of it!"

"What reward?" asked one of the officers. "Speak out, and tell us what you mean."

"Why, for the apprehension of Tom King!"

"Tom King?" they ejaculated, in surprise. "What, have you seen him? Do you know where he is?"

"I have seen him! Curses on him!" was the reply. "He has left me in this awful plight! Can you not see?"

"We do—we do; but are unable to comprehend it!"

"Then I will explain. But come on, follow me the while; I can tell you while we are walking!"

Accordingly, the apothecary did so; but there is no reason why we should follow his version of the affair, since the facts are well known already.

The officers listened with surprise, and, very much to the little man's indignation, roared heartily at the concluding portion of his narrative.

"But," said the officer in command, "do you mean to say this has just happened?"

"Well, only a short time ago."

"And you tell us that Tom King actually rode away?"

"Well, I have every reason to believe he did. He came on horseback, and it is fair to suppose he would depart in the same way."

"Then it's very odd we have not seen him," continued the officer, "for we have been closely on the look-out for some hours past. We knew well enough that he must be in this part of the country, but could not tell exactly where."

While he was speaking, the officer raised himself in his stirrups and looked keenly around him.

He was not able, however, to catch a single glimpse of the highwayman.

"Which is your house?" was the next question.

The apothecary pointed to it.

"Then we'll pay a visit there," was the reply.

"Perhaps by looking around us we shall be able to obtain some clue as to the direction he has taken."

This was a very reasonable idea indeed, and all felt it to be so, especially the apothecary, who stepped forward with greater briskness than before.

"There's many a slip betwixt the cup and the lip, is there not, old fellow?" said the chief officer, with a grin. "You thought you had Tom King all safe and sure; but he turned the tables upon you."

"He did. But he cannot have got far away; remember, it is broad daylight—he must be close at hand."

"I am surprised that he should venture out during the day; but, of course, it would be the pain of his wound that would force him to adopt this course. The rascal is well mounted, and unless we can get a change of horses I fear we shall stand but a poor chance of capturing him, for ours are completely knocked up; we are looking about indeed for some place where we can give them an hour or two's rest."

"Well, then, no fresh horses are to be had in the village," answered the apothecary. "What is to be done?"

"I don't know yet," was the answer; "but if he is badly hurt, as you say, he can't have got far off; we must come up with him ere long."

By the time these explanations had been completed the village was reached, and the officer in command, with a ready thought, dismounted, ordering his companions to do the same, save one, in whose charge the horses were left.

"Now ride down to the inn yonder with them, and let them have some hay and water and a rub down; that will be better than nothing: in the meantime we will look about."

They pushed through the gate in front of the apothecary's house, and as soon as they had done so, the villagers, having recovered a little from their absurd alarm, came creeping slowly back again, their courage reviving in a very great degree as they caught sight of the police officers.

The first visit was to the parlour, where the grim skeleton still sat.

The officers no sooner saw it than they roared with laughter.

"It's a good joke!" said the one in command, wiping the tears from his eyes—"it's a capital joke, and no mistake! Why, old fellow, you will never have such another chance of laying hold of five hundred pounds in your life!"

"But I claim the reward!"

"Claim away," was the response. "Don't you wish you may get it? Now, my lads, we've seen enough here; just let us look round outside."

To the outside accordingly they went.

The apothecary pointed out the place where Tom's horse had been tied.

Marks of his hoofs were distinctly visible, but only just on the spot where he had been standing.

The road was hard elsewhere, and showed no trace whatever.

But the officers considered themselves to be well on the scent.

The apothecary's cottage was a centre from which they could strike out in all directions, and their hypothesis was that Tom King would seek the nearest place of shelter he was able to find, in the hope of being able to lie there concealed until the friendly shades of night should gather around him.

CHAPTER CMXLIV.

RELATES THE STRANGE ADVENTURES TOM KING MET WITH IN THE WOOD AT WILFIRS CROSS.

Leaving the police officers to follow out as best they may the clue they had already found to Tom's whereabouts, we will return to the highwayman himself.

When he trotted away so composedly from the apothecary's cottage, he little thought that the police officers were so near at hand.

And yet, perhaps the very boldness and confidence which this want of knowledge gave him added considerably to his success in reaching unperceived the grounds belonging to the hall.

At one side of this building was a long, peculiar stretch of woodland.

In some places the trees grew so densely that it was almost impossible to force a passage between their trunks, in others the trees were wide apart.

Nevertheless, the line of what might almost be called forest was unbroken.

It stretched away for a distance of upwards of two miles—one end far in the open country, the other close to the eastern wing of the hall.

So conspicuous an object as this could not fail to be perceived, and Tom King immediately made his way towards it at the nearest point, feeling sure that beneath its umbrageous shades he should be better secured from observation than elsewhere.

Just then, before the officers reached the summit of a hill commanding this portion of the country, Tom King trotted his horse gently beneath the overhanging boughs.

He was in a moment lost to sight.

He glanced around him with considerable curiosity and interest.

The wood was one of great antiquity, as was evidenced by the gigantic size of some of the trees, and he could also tell that human footsteps rarely pressed the ground over which he was then passing.

Under cover of this dense foliage, it was the easiest matter in the world for Tom King to draw quite close to the hall without being seen by anyone, and this was the first thing he set about attempting.

He came at last to one portion which had evidently been set aside as a plantation.

Game was abundant, and at every step he disturbed so much that Tom began to feel apprehensive that the unusual commotion among the inmates of this place would betray his presence.

For this reason, he turned off to the right, intending to skirt the plantation as much as possible.

In doing so, he found that its width was not great, and that one side of it bordered the road leading from the village up to the hall.

From the plantation a full view could be had of the road for a considerable distance; but as no one seemed near, and as no sound broke the silence, Tom pushed steadily on.

Passing the plantation, he came to what was probably, many years ago, a shrubbery.

But now the dwarfed trees of which it was composed had been suffered to grow wild.

The winding paths were choked up with weeds and brambles, and the whole place had that aspect of neglect and desolation which so soon shows itself when any cultivated piece of land is allowed to return to a primitive wildness.

This was as near to the hall as Tom thought it would be prudent to venture.

Accordingly, he seeked a retired spot, which he only reached by forcing a passage for himself and steed through what was almost an impenetrable thicket.

Here removing some of the trappings of his horse, he unbuckled the rein on one side of the bit and used the thong of leather as a means to prevent his horse from straying too far away.

He secured him with it to the branch of a tree in such a manner, however, as not to prevent the horse from feeding at pleasure on the tall, luxuriant grass that was everywhere around.

The steed being thus disposed of, Tom began to look about him for some place where he might seek repose himself.

A long time had elapsed since he had taken any rest, and he was fully conscious that if he could only lie down somewhere and go to sleep, he should awake greatly refreshed, and that it would do his wound more good than aught else.

But for the pain he felt in his arm he would have climbed one of the trees and concealed himself among its dense foliage.

This, however, he felt to be quite out of the question.

It is certain that if the highwayman had had the least suspicion that the police officers were so near at hand—that, in fact, they were absolutely upon his track and searching for him in every direction—the thought of going to sleep would never have entered his mind.

Pushing his way through another part of the thicket, Tom suddenly found himself in view of a strange, ruinous, yet picturesque-looking building.

He did not need a second glance to show him that at some time or other it had been a summer-house, and there were indications that it had been most tastefully built and decorated.

Now the woodwork, of which it was chiefly composed, was thickly overgrown with green moss, the growth of which was not a little promoted by a large pool of stagnant water that partially surrounded it.

Although so close to Wilfir Hall, it would have been easy for anyone to believe this ruined summer-house to be miles and miles from any human dwelling.

Profound silence was around—such a silence as is found only in the depths of a huge wood.

"It seems to me," murmured Tom, to himself, "that no one has trodden these neglected, moss-grown paths for ages, and I should think few people would visit that rotten old summer-house from choice. I think I might venture to enter it, and lie down there to sleep—at any rate, let the risk be what it may, I will do so."

Without another moment's hesitation, then, Tom King stepped quickly across the little open space before the door of the summer-house, and entered the building.

A strong, disagreeable odour of dead leaves and decaying vegetation saluted his nostrils, and the atmosphere within was so damp that it sent a shiver through his entire being.

"Not over comfortable quarters," muttered Tom, his teeth chattering slightly as he spoke. "Yet still I may be safe, and, after all, that is the principal consideration, even though I do catch an ague by sleeping here."

A dim, dusky kind of twilight prevailed in the interior of the summer-house, and so he had to grope his way forward until he reached the side opposite to the doorway.

Then, selecting what seemed to him the darkest corner of all, he gathered together a number of dry leaves that had been blown in by the wind, and, having arranged them something in the shape of a couch, lay down to sleep.

So entirely was he overcome by long want of rest, fatigue, and the exhaustion consequent on the loss of blood he had sustained, that scarcely had he settled himself in a tolerably comfortable posture than his eyes closed, and in a few moments he was in a deep slumber, from which it would have required some very unusual noise to have awakened him.

How long he might have remained in this position he knew not, and had no means of ascertaining.

He fancied, however, at last, that he began to dream, and his dream was that two persons were at no great distance from him, conversing together in low but earnest tones.

He strained his ears and listened, but, to his surprise, could not make out a syllable of what was said.

Then shortly afterwards he became aware that he was not in reality dreaming, but that he had just woke up from his deep sleep.

He almost started with surprise when, on opening his eyes and looking around him, he found that the interior of the summer-house was much darker than it was when he closed his eyes.

Then it was only dusky and obscure—now it was profoundly dark, save and except that he could perceive through the open doorway a small patch of night sky.

But the voices continued, and the next thing Tom made out was that two persons were standing near the door of the summer-house conversing with each other.

"Do not think of leaving yet, Ernest," said a voice, the tones of which sounded strangely familiar to Tom's ears—"do not think of leaving yet. Who can say what changes may take place when Roderic returns?"

By the time the voice had finished speaking, Tom was able to make out where he had heard it before.

It was as he was leaving the hall early in the morning.

"I will stay, Ellen, if you wish it," said a male voice—"I will stay, because I can refuse nothing which you ask."

"I care not for the reason," was the faint reply, "so that you promise to remain. I have a kind of presentiment that Roderic will smooth over all matters and make your absence at all unnecessary."

"You speak like one ignorant of the world," was the reply. "Your brother cannot but be fully aware of his true position—he must know that, once again recognised as Sir Ralph's son, he will be entitled to rank with the first gentlemen in the county. He will naturally expect that you will do something to extend, or, at any rate, keep up his influence, and when he learns that you have been so unwise as to bestow your affections on a humble dependant like myself——"

"No, no—not unwise—surely not unwise!" she interrupted.

But her companion, without heeding the interruption, continued:

"And above all, when he learns that I have been so forgetful of myself—so base, so ungenerous as to make known my own affection, his breast will be filled with anger, he will forget the happy days we spent together years ago—he will have me driven ignominiously forth."

"Oh, Ernest," answered the young girl, speaking with difficulty through her tears, "you fill my heart with sorrow, and yet I trust that in all you say you may be mistaken. I know my brother better than you do; besides, there is my father, and if he could once be relieved from my stepmother's influence, I am sure he would gladly give his consent and approval, for you are a favourite of his, and he so much values my happiness that he would refuse me nothing."

"Well, well—it may be so," said the young man, soothingly, "but I am afraid to flatter myself with such hopes, lest my disappointment should be greater than I can bear."

"At any rate, promise not to be hasty; do not leave here until I have seen Roderic, and until you have seen him, too."

"I promise readily; and now, although I would gladly linger, let us leave this place; the air is cold and damp, and cannot but injuriously affect you. A few more moments of happiness, then we must part."

With a slow, lingering step, the lovers left the doorway of the summer-house.

As soon as they had departed, Tom King rose to his feet.

"Oh," he ejaculated, "that's how the land lies, is it? Well, I comprehend the situation of affairs at the hall much better than I did. And as for you," he continued, glancing in the direction the lovers had taken, "I will try what my intercession can do on your behalf. Now, then, for action."

When Tom emerged from the summer-house he glanced around him, but found no one in sight or hearing.

Accordingly, he gave himself another hearty shake, endeavouring by this means to promote the circulation of his blood, for his sleep on the damp leaves had chilled him to the bone.

This done, he looked to his weapons, and having seen them in proper order, moved off in the direction of the spot where he had left his horse.

When just about to break through the thicket, however, he heard a slow and heavy footstep somewhere close at hand.

He became motionless instantly, and bent all his energies to the faculty of listening.

The footstep became more and more distinct, and Tom fixed his eyes in the direction from which the sound came.

Then emerging and growing as it were out of the surrounding gloom, he perceived the bulky figure of a man.

Tom did not venture to breathe.

He trusted that the trees close against which he stood would render him invisible.

Nearer and nearer came this man, and on a closer approach Tom recognised him.

It was the man he had seen tampering with the letter-bag—the under-steward, in fact, for such was the post he was supposed to fill.

Tom began to be afraid that his intention was to penetrate the very thicket close to which he stood; but his alarm on this point was quickly dissipated, for the under-steward turned sharply to the left, walking on at the same sharp pace, and taking a course that was comparatively speaking free from trees.

Tom watched him until he was almost out of sight, and then he thought to himself:

"Surely the chief thing I have to do in this affair is to keep the closest possible watch upon this man and his proceedings. What can I do better than dog his footsteps and see where he is going at this lonely hour with so much secrecy and caution?"

Almost before he had finished these reflections, Tom King was treading stealthily and noiselessly in the steps of the under-steward, following him like his shadow, and screening himself from observation by means of the thick trunks of the old trees.

He was not long in finding that the direction the under-steward was taking led to the plantation.

He did not penetrate into its recesses, however, but kept upon its outer edge until he again turned to the right, and was almost lost to sight among the underwood.

Tom followed closely, but with redoubled caution, for not only was the nature of the ground such as to render noiseless progress almost impossible, but just then the full moon rose up clear and bright from behind a low bank of clouds on the horizon.

All at once the under-steward paused, and so did Tom.

The two men were then something more than a hundred yards apart.

Tom crouched down among the luxurious undergrowth, and fortunate it was that he did so, for the under-steward, turning round, and shading his eyes with his hand, looked peeringly and scrutinisingly in every direction.

Then, apparently satisfied that he was alone, he himself crouched down behind the massive trunk of a huge tree, that probably had been blown down by the wind.

So great was the thickness of this fallen trunk, that, when the under-steward crouched down behind it, he was almost hidden from observation.

Tom wondered what he could want there.

But for the rustling and sighing of the wind among the tree-tops, a profound silence prevailed.

Time passed on.

The under-steward made no movement, but Tom King, little by little, decreased the distance between them.

Higher and higher rose the moon, and presently Tom found, on getting nearer to the under-steward, that the position the latter had taken up was such as commanded a full view of the lane leading from the village to the hall, along which Tom King had himself so lately passed.

Just as he made this discovery, Tom King remembered the strange-looking firearm which he had caught the under-steward so sedulously polishing, and then it flashed into his mind with great suddenness and with the full force of a conviction, that this man was lying in wait there for some one, who would be favoured with the contents of the weapon.

Tom determined to creep closer still, so as to baulk him in his purpose, but just then he heard a faint sound, and directly afterwards the dusky-looking figure of a man, wrapped in a large riding-cloak, came into view.

As he advanced, the moonlight shining upon him displayed his form with great distinctness.

CHAPTER CXLV.

THE ASSASSINATION IN THE WOOD AT WILFIRS CROSS.

As quick as thought the under-steward raised his gun.

He rested the barrel upon a projecting branch of the old trunk, and took a rapid yet steady aim.

Tom guessed his fatal purpose, and sprang forward.

But his interference came too late.

There was no sound, no report, or puff of smoke, but the stranger in the cloak uttered an odd, gasping cry, clasped his hands over his breast, and fell heavily to the ground.

It was at this moment that Tom pounced upon the under-steward from behind.

A yell of fear and rage broke from his lips when he found himself roughly grasped.

"Villain—murderer!" cried Tom, closing with him, and putting forth his best strength; "you have been seen, and shall at least reap the reward of your villany!"

The sudden surprise bereft the murderer of all his strength and presence of mind.

He became immediately as helpless as a child in the highwayman's hands.

Tom picked up the gun, in which he felt strangely interested, and with the other hand twisted tightly into the thick neckcloth of the under-steward, he dragged him forcibly in the direction of the spot where the wounded stranger lay.

How bitterly Tom regretted not being in time, for his heart told him who this stranger was.

Most certainly it was the baronet's eldest, disowned son, making his way back to entreat his father's forgiveness.

Now he had been cut short by death, or, at least, Tom feared so, for the distance was so short, and the steward's facility for taking aim so great, that it was scarcely possible for him to have escaped a fatal injury.

Yet this was a point he resolved to ascertain without delay, and so, as we have said, he dragged his prisoner after him.

The plantation was only separated from the lane by a hedge so low that Tom had not the least difficulty in stepping over it.

The steward tried to step over it too, but he failed, and was scratched rather unpleasantly by the thorns.

"Down on your knees," said Tom, as soon as he reached the middle of the lane—"down on your knees, villain, and if you make a single movement it shall be your last! Mind that!"

Tom produced his pistol as he spoke, then bent down over the cloaked figure.

Tom did not perceive it just then, but a remarkable change now came over the under-steward's countenance.

Absolutely it seemed to stiffen with horror. His jaw dropped, and his eyes assumed a strange, glaring stare, his fingers worked convulsively, and he seemed as though he was struggling to gasp out some word.

He bent forward, too, as far as he was able, and in his anxiety to catch a glimpse of the stranger's countenance he evidently forgot his own peril—forgot everything.

But the stranger having fallen to the ground upon his face, Tom was under the necessity of rolling him over.

This was quickly done, and then his features were clearly revealed by the light of the clear, shining full moon.

The countenance disclosed was that of a young man, probably not more than five-and-twenty years of age, but upon whose face there was the mark left by long days and nights of dissipation, and although all the features were now in calm repose, the face was a most unpleasant one to look at.

An awful wringing cry coming at this moment from the under-steward's lips made Tom start up, then, looking at him, he noted the change we have described.

The murderer fought madly with his hands; he struggled and tugged at his throat as though there was something there that impeded his utterance—something that he could tear away.

At last, after many ineffectual efforts, he dragged himself forward on his knees for a few paces, and flung himself upon the inanimate body.

"Alfred—Alfred," he cried, in tones that were truly awful to listen to—"my boy, my son, look up! Do not remain so still! Surely you are not dead—you must not, cannot be! Awake—awake! Oh, what wild, foolish folly was it that brought you to this spot to-night? Speak—make some slight movement—show me that you are yet alive!"

But no movement followed, nor could the anxious man detect a breath.

With trembling, unsteady fingers he undid his son's apparel, and endeavoured to place his hand above the region of the heart.

This revelation, so awful, and made so unexpectedly, had for a moment or so the effect of paralysing Tom King completely.

He could only stand quite still, gazing on without sound or motion.

"Then this is not Roderic?" he managed to exclaim at last. "You are sure it is not the baronet's son?"

The under-steward looked up at him wildly, and with his face convulsed with anguish.

He seemed as though about to speak.

Whether such was his intention cannot be known, but just then they were interrupted by the sharp clatter of a horse's feet.

Tom King was on the alert instantly, and an ejaculation of annoyance escaped his lips.

The last thing he wanted was an interruption.

But the sound rapidly increased in loudness, and then, looking up, Tom perceived a single horseman come into sight.

At the same time it was evident this new-comer saw something unusual was taking place in the lane, for he checked the speed of his steed somewhat abruptly, as he called out:

"Hullo there! What's the meaning of all this?"

While speaking he did not discontinue his progress, but came on at a more gentle rate.

The under-steward crouched down and endeavoured to conceal himself from observation.

"Surely," thought Tom to himself, "this is the baronet's son. Had he arrived a little sooner that would have been his fate."

He glanced at the body of the under-steward's son while he spoke, then looking up and raising his voice, he exclaimed:

"Am I right, sir, in taking you to be Mr. Roderic Cromer, the eldest son of the baronet up at the hall yonder?"

"Yes," was the answer, given in pleasant, cheerful tones, "that is my name. How came you to know it?"

"I merely guessed it," was the answer. "Congratulate yourself upon your narrow escape from death."

"Death?" ejaculated Roderic.

"Yes," said Tom. "Give me your attention for a moment, and I will endeavour to explain all."

Then Tom, in as few words as he possibly could, made Roderic acquainted with all those particulars which the reader knows already.

His revelations were listened to in mingled anger, surprise, and incredulity.

While speaking, Tom had a good opportunity of gazing at the young man's face and figure with attention, and he could not help remarking to himself how great a contrast he afforded to him who now lay so motionless on the dusty roadway.

Roderic's countenance was open, manly, and had such a cheerful expression upon it as won all hearts, and attracted everyone towards him.

No traces of cunning, villany, or debauchery could be seen there.

"And it is you, Peterson," Roderic ejaculated at length, dismounting from his steed as he spoke—"it is you who have contemplated this dreadful deed! Well, the retribution that has overtaken you, though terrible, is no more than just."

"I am in doubt," said Tom, "whether the young man is really dead or not; it may be that he is only wounded."

Peterson looked up, and shook his head slowly and sadly.

In so doing his face was revealed, and Tom King started with surprise when he perceived how great a change had been wrought in it.

It seemed, indeed, as though in the space of those few minutes he had grown at least twenty years older, and such an aspect of suffering was visible that the heart would have been hard indeed that did not melt at the sight of it.

"He is dead!" he moaned, wringing his hands—"quite dead—dead by my hand! Let me go! I am a miserable, wretched man now, and this sorrow, which I shall carry to my grave, is surely punishment enough for what I have done! Let me go, and I will confess all—I will tell you everything!"

Tom King did not offer to speak, but left the decision with Roderic.

He, on his side, hesitated, for he scarcely knew as yet in what relation Tom stood to the whole affair.

"Do not refuse me!" pleaded Peterson—"grant my request, and I will tell you something well worth your knowing—will confide in you a secret which otherwise shall never pass my lips. Let me go, and let me take the body of my poor boy with me! That is all I ask, and you shall never see me again in life."

"Be it so," said Roderic—"I give you my consent. Go—depart freely."

"Then I will tell you the secret of which I spoke. To commence, I need scarcely inform you that it was through your stepmother's influence that the baronet's heart was steeled against you—that he at last drove you forth from the hall."

Roderic smiled bitterly.

"I do know it," he said—"I know it full well."

"Ah! then, but you cannot guess what is coming," continued Peterson. "Your stepmother is an artful, wily woman, full of all kinds of stratagems, and possessing an imperious will, which makes all things bend before it.

"I need not describe now how it was that she became Sir Ralph's second wife; let the fact be sufficient. But when she married she was already a wife, though she knew not where her husband was, or whether alive or dead.

"I was her husband," continued the repentant man. "I married her long years ago. I could not brook her evil, overbearing temper, and so we parted.

"We had one son—you see now all that remains of him; and yet I loved him with an intensity you cannot imagine.

"At last, after a rough life, I learned by accident what had become of my wife. I came here intending to expose her and have her driven forth, but she saw me; we had some conversation together.

"She asserted her old influence, and I fell passively into her plans. They were to deprive you of your birthright, and to obtain possession of all Sir Ralph's wealth and estates; and to do this all the more surely, our son Alfred was to be brought forward at a convenient time, and to be married to Sir Ralph's only daughter."

At these words, Roderic started and frowned, while an angry exclamation escaped his lips.

"Forgive me all this!" said Peterson, more humbly than before. "If I have sinned deeply my repentance is proportionally great. Our schemes have come to nought.

"At her suggestion, I posted myself in this place. I consented to become a murderer. I had intercepted your letter, and I knew that you would pass by this spot on your way to the hall. But that my boy Alfred should be anywhere in this neighbourhood at the present time I never for one moment guessed, and, in my haste and excitement, mistook him for you.

"My plans were all well laid. The assassination was performed with this air-gun, which, deadly as a musket, could be discharged without a sound. The place is lonely, and you would have had a grave beneath these bushes."

The young man shuddered from head to foot, and well he might, for few, if any, could hear such an avowal as this unmoved.

"Now, then," Peterson added, after a brief pause, "I have told you all—everything! You have but, on your return to the hall, to proclaim who and what your stepmother is—to call her by her real name—to cover her with confusion and discomfiture. What you will do with her I know not. I dare not intercede on her behalf, and yet I trust you will be merciful."

With these words, the under-steward again turned round, and, with a heavy, gasping sob, threw himself at full length upon the dead body of his son, where he remained convulsed by bitter anguish.

Roderic and Tom remained for a few moments gazing upon him; then the latter, by a rapid sign, beckoned for the other to leave the spot.

His wish was gladly enough complied with.

"Let him go," said Roderic—"let him go. I would not pursue him for the world. Truly enough has his own crime brought its own bitter consequences with it."

"It has," said Tom; "and I rejoice to find that you have acted in such a spirit!"

"And you," Roderic exclaimed, gazing at Tom, "I know not who you are. But give me your hand, for I am certain you are a friend to me and mine, and that is all I wish to know; henceforth we are brothers in friendship!"

The words were spoken in an access of generous enthusiasm, and Tom felt his liking for this young stranger momentarily increase, while he rejoiced to think he had been so instrumental in restoring him to his true position.

"Come," said Tom, "accompany me to the hall, where your father is anxiously awaiting you."

"Does he forgive me?"

"Freely—entirely! Ask him, and observe the result."

"My brain whirls," said Roderic. "I had anticipated nothing of this—I had no idea that such a conspiracy was afoot."

"Calm yourself," said Tom. "Say no more until we reach the hall; by that time you will be able to recover your composure. And as for myself, I have enough to do in thinking over my own future proceedings."

This seemed so strange a remark that Roderic fixed his eyes upon Tom's face with undisguised amazement.

Tom pretended to be oblivious of it.

Silently, then, and rather slowly, this strange pair made their way along the winding lane towards the hall, the picturesque roof of which quickly came in sight above the trees.

"There is the old place!" cried Roderic, pausing to gaze upon it. "I seem carried back years and years to the time when I was a happy boy. It glads my heart to see the old place once again, and to know that I return with the prospect of forgiveness before me."

"It is something more than a prospect," said Tom King; "you may look upon it as a certainty. Nothing will ever give your father so much joy as his reunion with you."

CHAPTER CMXLVI.

IN WHICH TOM KING FINDS THE DIFFERENT EVENTS AT THE HALL COME TO A CLIMAX.

It was easy to see that young Roderic Cromer was deeply affected by his return after his long absence, and though Tom's last speech was such as would naturally call forth some remark, he passed it over in silence.

Nor was another word exchanged between the pair until the entrance of the hall was gained.

Tom King knocked loudly at the portal, and at the same time rang the bell vigorously, when, addressing his companion, he exclaimed:

"You must be prepared to make a sudden rush as soon as the door is opened, otherwise, when it is known who we are, we shall be refused admission."

"Right!"

Just as he pronounced the words, the door was opened, and Tom King did indeed make a sudden rush, and a much more violent one than was at all necessary.

The hall porter, not at all expecting such an attack, was thrown completely backwards and jammed with great force against the wall.

"There," said Tom, as he stepped across the threshold—"I rather think that will do as a commencement!"

Roderic smiled sadly.

Then a door was abruptly flung open, and upon the threshold stood the baronet's wife.

Her face was crimson with rage.

"Villain—wretch!" she shrieked—"begone! You shall not stay beneath this roof another moment! Already you have caused more than enough unhappiness. Begone!"

Just then she caught sight of Roderic.

Although many years had passed since she had seen him last, she recollected his features well—recognition was immediate, and it caused her no little confusion.

She knew well enough what it was the under-steward had set out to do, and could not understand how it was he had failed in his mission.

"Ahem!" said Tom, placing one hand upon his breast, while with his other he took off his hat and bowed profoundly. "I can assure you we are very sorry to intrude thus upon you, Mrs. Peterson."

Tom King watched carefully to see the result produced by the pronunciation of this word.

He found it all that he had expected.

The woman's face turned to a ghastly paleness, and she staggered back as though about to fall.

"False—false!" she said—"it is all false! I deny it!"

"Deny what?" said Tom. "I have accused you of nothing."

"But why did you call me by that name?"

"Simply because I know no other by which to address

you. You have no sort of claim whatever to that of Cromer."

"Indeed, insolent!" she faltered. "But——"

No doubt she was going to give utterance to some threat, but Tom King interrupted her.

"All your plans are known," he said, "and if you are wise you will beat an immediate retreat, and be thankful to us for having allowed you the opportunity of doing so. Yes, I repeat, we know every detail of your scheme; we had it from your first and real husband's lips not many moments since. He has confessed all. Among other things, that you prompted him to take up a position in the wood and assassinate Mr. Roderic here as he passed by. Some one approached, and the dreadful deed was done, the stranger fell; but it was a mistake, and the wretched man discovered afterwards that he had shot down his own son."

A piercing shriek came from the woman's lips, and it was palpable that only a tremendous effort of her powerful will saved her from swooning.

"Alfred?" she gasped, half in a whisper.

"Yes, such is his name; and if you are speedy you will catch sight of him lying in the lane, near the plantation, and your husband with him. Go—quit this roof now while you are able, otherwise you will be expelled!"

Abashed, mortified, and humbled, Mrs. Peterson began to retreat, step by step, backwards towards the door opening at the rear of the hall.

Sobs and groans came from her lips; tears, too, rose in her obdurate eyes; but she struggled with all her might against these manifestations of emotion.

Tom pointed with his finger towards the door, and unable any longer to meet the gaze of the two young men, she turned round, and, opening the door, hastily disappeared.

"Now she is gone," said Tom King, "and this roof is rid of a most unwelcome tenant. Now for your father. Let me break the news of your arrival to him. Do not enter hastily, the shock will be too great."

Remembering the apartment in which he had formerly seen the baronet, Tom King made his way there once more, and found him seated in the same position in the easy-chair.

But he took not the slightest notice of Tom's entrance, and it seemed by his attitude as though he had expired.

The cry that this unexpected sight wrung from Tom King's lips reached the ears of Roderic, who was listening outside.

With a few sudden bounds, he reached the apartment; then, comprehending all, he sank down on his knees at his father's feet.

The first shock over, Tom approached, and as he did so he fancied the old man slightly breathed.

Finding quickly that he was not mistaken, he exclaimed:

"Look up, young sir—look up! He has only fainted."

Such was the case.

The old man had borne up well enough until he heard his son enter.

He had tried to rise from his chair and bid him welcome, but he was seized by a deathly faintness, and sank back, unconscious of the rest.

Knowing the scene that would ensue, Tom King, as soon as Sir Ralph was restored to consciousness, retired to another room, where he sat pondering deeply over this succession of strange events.

There he remained for some time; but at length he was aroused by the entrance of Roderic, who, extending his hand, said:

"Come with me, young sir—come with me. I can never thank you sufficiently for all you have done in my and my father's behalf; but at present we are strangers to your name. Who is it that we have to thank for this good service?"

"Never mind my name," said Tom. "It is one, I trust, unknown to you, and let it remain so. But if you feel yourself under any obligation to me, it will be more than cancelled if you will allow me to remain beneath this roof for a few days—until, in fact, my arm is somewhat better."

"Are you wounded?"

"Yes—only slightly, in the left arm; yet it occasions me great anguish and inconvenience. Rest is all that I require."

"Then you shall have it," said the impulsive young man, "and the best of surgical assistance that we can procure. But come—hasten with me to Sir Ralph, and let him hear again from your lips the narrative of all these strange occurrences."

Tom King complied.

But, of course, there is no need to repeat what was said on this occasion.

He availed himself of the opportunity, however, to speak of Roderic's sister and her lover Ernest.

By the cloud that gathered on the old man's brow, Tom fancied that at any other time than this his intercession would have availed little.

Now, however, he was unable to refuse any request.

The young couple were summoned speedily to the room, and when they entered they were surprised to see how great a change was wrought in Sir Ralph.

From the moment that he knew his second wife had left the hall—that there was no fear of her return, and that she had not the shadow of a claim upon him, he seemed to become a new man—twenty years at the least seemed to be taken off his age.

Before the mutual congratulations were over, the unexpected sound of the revolution of carriage wheels made itself heard, and directly afterwards a carriage was drawn up at the chief entrance.

"Who can this be at so late an hour?" exclaimed the baronet, in great surprise.

"I can give you an answer, I think," said Roderic. "It is your old friend Richard Grant."

"But at what an extraordinary hour to pay a visit!" ejaculated Sir Ralph. "What can be the meaning of it?"

"There I am quite as much at a loss as yourself," replied Roderic. "At my earnest solicitations he set out from his own residence, in order to see you personally in the matter of my return. He was to have made his visit first—in fact, he intended to arrive soon after his letter. What can have delayed him until now I cannot think."

At that moment a voice was heard outside in the entrance-hall, and no sooner did the tones strike upon Tom King's ears than he gave a sudden start.

There was something familiar in them—he was quite confident he had heard that voice before.

When, where, or under what circumstances, however, he could not possibly call to mind.

Nor was he left much time for speculation.

The door was thrown open, and a stout, florid, good-looking, yet rather aged man entered, accompanied by a lady.

Tom King shrank back slowly, and endeavoured to get out of sight.

He had recognised the old man at the first glance, and, what was more, remembered under what circumstances he had met him.

It was the very gentleman he had met and stopped the night before, and whose grey horse was even then in Tom's possession.

Whether this Mr. Grant would recognise him was another matter; but at any rate, the highwayman resolved to give him no more chance than he could help, so accordingly he stooped down over a side table and pretended to be busily engaged in looking at some magnificent coloured pictures in a book.

He listened eagerly, nevertheless, to the conversation that ensued.

The meeting between them was most cordial, and the two old men, who had been parted in friendship for so long, were quite overcome by their feelings.

Mrs. Grant, who was with him, was a tall, thin lady, with pinched features, and a general slenderness of outline.

She was of a restless, ever-moving disposition, and quickly engrossed the conversation to herself.

To such a degree did she rattle on, that scarcely anyone else had a chance of putting in a word.

"And would you believe it, my dear Sir Ralph—and yet, of course, you will believe it when I tell you—but how surprised you must have been at a visit at such an hour as this. Well—well, quite a long history is connected with our delay."

"Yes—yes," said Mr. Grant, interrupting her, trusting to be able to relate the whole of the circumstances in about one-half as many words as his good lady occupied. "I ought to have spoken of that sooner, and to have made you an apology."

"Oh, no apology is necessary from you."

"Well, but, d—n it!" exclaimed Mr. Grant. "Excuse me, I beg, but I have reasonable grounds for swearing. I was fairly on the road for this place last night—in fact, I was about fifteen miles off—perhaps more or less—when we were stopped by an audacious villain, in the shape of a red-coated highwayman."

"Highwayman?" ejaculated all present.

"Yes. It would seem that he had a great many of his companions concealed behind the hedge, or, at least, he said he had, but I scarcely think he spoke the truth. However, to make a long story short, he robbed me of my purse. I defended myself as well as I could, but the pistol I discharged, and the contents of which I hoped to lodge in the villain's skull, took effect upon his horse, and the animal fell down at once quite dead. Strange as it may seem," added Mr. Grant, "that fall saved the rascal's life, for my man, Thomas, with more valour than discretion, had, unknown to anyone, climbed up on to the top of the coach, where he stood with his long, heavy wand in his hand, with which he was in the act of dealing the highwayman a terrific blow, when the horse fell. The consequence was, the wand swinging through the air encountering nothing, and such was the force of it that it threw Thomas off his balance, and down he fell head foremost into the road."

Ejaculations of astonishment greeted this extraordinary narrative.

Mrs. Grant made a great many attempts to join in, but her husband held his ground manfully.

"Not content with robbing me of my purse," he continued, "the villain declared that, as I had deprived him of one horse, I should furnish him with another, and so he had the consummate impudence to cut one of my leaders out of the harness, saddle and bridle him before my eyes, and then ride off.

"But Mrs. Grant," said Sir Ralph—"was not she frightened to death?"

"Literally to death," replied the lady, seizing upon the opportunity to speak—"in fact, when I saw the odious ruffian, and learned his errand, I fainted clean away."

"And consequently know nothing of what happened," interrupted her husband.

"Until I saw the officers arrive," she put in.

"Just so—just so. The officers came up very opportunely; they saw the highwayman mounted on my steed, and gave him good chase. I don't think they had the ghost of a chance of success, for their own horses were miserable things and dreadfully jaded, while the one he had got was the best grey in my stable, and quite as fresh as a daisy."

"But yet," said Roderic, with a smile, "if this happened last night—or, rather, I should say, the night before last, for it is already morning now—it, I fancy, scarcely accounts for so much delay as this."

"True, my young friend," was the answer—"true! But after the officers had disappeared from view, we had to turn our attention to Thomas. He was dreadfully hurt, and no sooner did my wife see him than she went off into another fainting fit. There was I, with only three horses to the carriage, and fifteen miles from your house. Luckily, I remembered that a friend of ours—you may know him: Mr. White—lived at hand, so we managed to get there as well as we could. After our arrival, my wife became much worse, but Thomas got better. However, in a short time everything was arranged, friend White lent me one of his horses, and away we started once more. But fate was surely against us, for in the middle of a narrow lane the hind wheel came off the carriage, and brought us unpleasantly to a dead stop. However, I pass over that to say that we got it repaired with much difficulty, and at last reached here."

"And all this trouble has been on my account," said Roderic. "How can I express my thanks?—how can I show my obligation?"

"Why, by saying nothing about it, to be sure."

In a hasty, fragmentary fashion, Mr. Grant had been made acquainted with what had occurred at the hall.

Tom listened with great uneasiness, and wished himself out of the room, but he saw no chance of retiring unperceived.

All at once, Roderic exclaimed:

"What we should have done but for the aid of this generous stranger, I know not. In all probability, I should not be living at the present moment. Let me make him acquainted with you. Ah! he is there!" Roderic continued, as, looking round and not seeing Tom at first, he afterwards caught sight of him near the table.

Our old friend was now in a rare fix, but he could only hope that Mr. Grant would not recognise him; and certainly nothing could be further from his thoughts than to imagine that the man who had robbed him should be standing beneath his old friend's roof.

"Here he is," said Roderic, leading Tom King forward. "I have much pleasure in owning that he is henceforth my bosom friend."

"Oh! just so. Glad to—to see you, sir. But God bless my life and times! Eh?—what? Is it so?"

Mr. Grant rubbed his eyes vigorously before he could recover himself from his state of bewilderment.

His wife, who had been scanning Tom's appearance, uttered a shriek.

"That's the villain!" she exclaimed—"that's the villain! There's the rascal who robbed us, and rode off on our horse. Seize him—seize him! He's a highway man!"

"Surely," said Roderic, laughing, "you are both the victims of some extraordinary delusion."

"No, no!" said Mrs. Grant, with great excitement. "No delusion at all; or if I am, these gentlemen will quickly set me right. Look—look! As I live, yonder police officers are coming. Well, who would have thought of meeting with them twice running, just at the very moment you wanted them?"

These words produced more effect upon Tom King than upon anyone else in the room.

This may easily be imagined.

He turned quickly to ascertain the truth or falsity of what the lady said, and then, to his intense astonishment and surprise, beheld rather a large troop of police officers, and among them was the familiar form of Elisha Coles, the apothecary.

"The game's up!" murmured Tom, to himself. "I'm done! That villanous old druggist has somehow contrived to get the police officers upon my track. However, I'll make one bold rush to escape."

CHAPTER CMXLVII.

TOM KING FINDS HIMSELF PURSUED BY NOTHING BUT ILL LUCK.

It would require many pages to describe minutely the different feelings which occupied the minds of those persons assembled in the breakfast-parlour at Wilfirs Cress, and even then it is doubtful whether anything like a clear conception of them could be conveyed.

It will be best to leave it to the imagination of the reader, and to proceed with an account of the incidents that so rapidly followed.

Roderic still held Tom King's hand within his own.

He was speechless with surprise; but certainly most incredulous respecting all that Mr. Grant had said.

He believed him the victim of an extraordinary delusion.

Tom King saw this, and determined to turn it to his advantage.

"I have done you good service," he said—"you admit that, and therefore you ought not to care who I am. Let me confess I did stop your friend last night on the highway, and I am known generally as Tom King. You start, and with surprise; perhaps something like anger finds a place in your breast, yet I feel it is not asking too much of you to assist me to escape."

"I will defend you with my life," was the impetuous reply. "Who or what you are I care not—it does not alter in any degree the service you have rendered."

"Well spoken," said Tom, moving swiftly to the door. "But I shall not require any such sacrifice at your hands."

Just then a tremendous hammering came upon the front door of the hall.

[CLAUDE DUVAL AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK HOLD A CONSULTATION.]

Mrs. Grant, with another shriek, sprang across the breakfast-parlour, and dashed the window open.

"Officers—officers!" she cried. "This way—this way! He is here! The villain has robbed us all this way!"

Tom King waited to hear no more, but shut the door behind him, and turned the key in the lock.

"Now I am all right!" he exclaimed, addressing himself to Roderic. "Farewell! It is doubtful whether we shall ever meet again—farewell!"

He wrung his hand as he spoke.

"But," said Roderic, "where are you going? How can you hope to escape these men?"

"I know where I have left my horse," was the reply, "and can gain him easily. Leave me to myself; do not get into trouble by appearing to aid me. Rest assured that all is well, and that I am now tolerably safe. Again farewell!"

"Farewell!" said Roderic, sadly, at the same time releasing his grasp.

With rapid bounds, Tom King hastened to the door, the position of which he was so well acquainted with.

Then, having passed through it, he took his course in a direct line for that portion of the plantation where the ruined summer-house was situated, and close to which it will be recollected he had left his horse.

In the exciting events which had occurred, all remembrance of the gallant creature had been driven from his mind, otherwise he would have seen that it had been better taken care of.

And yet it is questionable whether Tom King did not owe a great deal of his safety to this forgetfulness, for had the horse been placed in the stable it would have been unsaddled and unbridled, in which case much delay must have taken place in getting it ready for the road.

Now the horse had all his trappings on him, and Tom had nothing to do, after gaining his steed, save to vault into the saddle

Just as he plunged among the trees in the shrubbery, he looked back, and saw the officers coming round the angle of the hall at full speed.

They raised a loud shout, and from this he judged correctly that he had been seen.

With flying steps he made his way to the summer-house.

On gaining it, he paused a second for breath, and then dashed through the thicket, heedless of the injuries he received in doing so.

His heart bounded with joy when he saw his horse was there just as he had left it.

Seizing it by the bridle, he again pushed through the thicket at the least densest part, then wound rapidly among the trees until he reached an open space, when he sprang into the saddle.

He made his way now towards the lane.

He reached it easily and quickly, yet not before the officers had seen him and given another loud, thrilling cry.

That they were fully in earnest Tom did not for a moment doubt, and so he gave his steed the rein, and determined to trust the rest to its fleetness.

The officers came on in rare style, and here we may take occasion to remark upon what may at first sight seem rather strange, namely, that they did not make their appearance at the hall sooner.

But the fact was, Elisha Coles himself and all the officers looked upon Tom's assertion that he had been sent down to the village by Sir Ralph as an impudent, false assertion made for the purpose of gaining his ends.

Therefore, all the time they had been searching about high and low, though it was pretty clear they did not penetrate the thicket where Tom had left his horse.

At length, however, they had made their way to the hall.

This movement was owing chiefly to the police officers, who believed they were once more baulked, though they had an excellent excuse for going to the hall and making a few inquiries, trusting in the event of doing this that some refreshment and hospitality would be offered to them.

The result is known to the reader, and so need not be dwelt upon any further.

One more fact remains to be stated, and that is, in their search during the day they had managed to get so far as the next town, where the closest inquiries satisfied them that no one resembling Tom King in appearance had passed that way.

Here they were so fortunate as to be able to secure fresh horses in exchange for those they had ridden so far. Moreover, these steeds were of rather more than average quality, therefore the police officers were delighted accordingly.

It will thus be seen that they had every advantage in their favour on the present occasion.

They had got a clear view of the highwayman, and all they had to do was to hang persistently upon his trail until they ran him down.

Tom King, however, by no means despaired.

Not only had he a most excellent opinion of the merits of the grey horse he had so singularly come into possession of, but he had received from the owner of the animal a very flattering testimonial, for it will be remembered Mr. Grant called it the best there was in his stable.

By this time, however, the eventful night had almost passed away.

Morning had not yet come, but it was cold, chill, and miserable.

Without the occurrence of any particular incident, the chase was continued for a long time across the level open country, Tom King keeping a tolerably straight line, choosing his course where the land seemed best adapted for speed.

He pushed his horse to the utmost, for he knew morning was coming on, therefore he was anxious while it was yet dark to find some place of concealment or some means of baffling his foes

The aspect of the sky had altered greatly.

Numberless clouds had made their appearance, and it was only at occasional intervals that the moon poured forth her light.

This was in the highest degree favourable to Tom, and he noted it with the utmost satisfaction.

Still, as time passed on, he began to grow anxious.

His chances of finding some hiding-place before morning had much diminished.

All that remained for him to do was to continue urging his horse onward, and this he did until the speed attained was dangerous in the extreme.

So rapid was it that Tom noticed with great joy that the officers kept dropping further and further in the rear of him, until at length, when the moon broke out clear and bright from among the clouds, he looked back and failed to perceive any sign of them.

But the country was level and open about that part, affording him no chance of concealment, and therefore, although it appeared that urgent speed was not quite so pressing as it had been, he did not draw rein in the least.

Suddenly, however, the faint report of a gun reached his ears.

The sound came from so far off that he was unable to determine its precise direction.

Yet he glanced all round him keenly, and shortly afterwards another discharge reached his ears.

While galloping on at this fearful rate he came suddenly upon a hedge dividing the meadows from the high-road.

He could not check the progress of his steed, so the obstacle was cleared, and the hedge on the other side of the road as well.

Then he heard a loud and, as it seemed to him, an angry shout.

He turned in the direction of it, and to his intense astonishment found himself close to another troop of officers, so close that it was the greatest wonder in the world he had not ridden over them.

"Twice," he muttered, "I have had this ill-luck. Why, the whole country must be up in arms. Well, no matter, I have escaped hitherto, and my horse is good for another long gallop."

So saying, he applied the spurs with great vigour, and before the officers had time fairly to get in pursuit of him he had succeeded in obtaining a tolerable start.

The reader will well understand this incident, and remember how Dick Turpin was at that time concealed in one of the trees, though this was an idea that never once entered Tom's imagination.

The report he had heard proceeded from the carbine which it will be recollected the guard of the mail-cart fired so many times into the trees in the hope of dislodging Dick Turpin.

While the officers continued the pursuit they were not a little mystified at the incident which had occurred.

They could not for the life of them make out by what means Dick Turpin could have obtained a horse so quickly, and marvelled how he should come riding back in that direction.

That it was Tom King who was before them, and not Dick himself, they never guessed, and even had they known it, no alteration would have been made in their actions.

One highwayman was to them almost as good as another.

They were anxious to obtain the reward offered for their apprehension, and nothing further.

It was the first chance too that these country constables had had of pursuing the redoubtable highwayman whose name was so familiar to their ears, and they continued on their way, running a hundred risks of their lives, intent on effecting a capture, and quite undaunted by the many failures that had attended others.

Tom King's horse, however, was now beginning to show signs of great exhaustion.

It was with difficulty only that he kept him going at the same pace, and every now and then he could feel the gallant animal tremble and stagger beneath him.

On such occasions as these Tom King would contemplate pulling up, and he would glance back at his pursuers.

On each occasion, however, he saw them distinctly, for the officers flogged and spurred their own cattle most unmercifully

And all this time Tom had been looking for a hiding-place.

Dimmer and dimmer became the moon as she sank still lower in the western sky, and every moment he expected to see her light succeeded by the grey dawn of early morning.

If during the darkness he was unable to shake off his foes and to conceal himself, how could he hope to do so when morning was pouring its full rays upon him?

As he asked himself this question an anxious, distressed look came over his countenance.

He wiped away the perspiration that gathered in large bead-like drops upon his forehead, and again looked back.

The officers were in sight, though he fancied the distance between himself and them had slightly increased.

He tried to improve this advantage by accelerating his horse's speed.

But in this attempt he failed most signally, and began to grow apprehensive that ere long the horse would founder altogether

Struggling on, he again reached the high-road.

With a last, despairing, convulsive effort of strength, the horse leaped over the low hedge which divided the meadows from it.

It came down heavily and almost fell, but Tom, by a sudden jerk upon the reins, saved it.

Then he felt that whatever his horse might be able to accomplish now, certainly it would never be able to take such another leap.

Under these circumstances, then, he had no resource save that of continuing his way along the high-road, and this, as will be remembered, was a thing Tom always shrank from doing even under the best of circumstances.

A disagreeable conviction that ere long he would be overtaken began to creep over him.

He tried to shake it off, yet vainly.

Soon afterwards the police officers reached the high-road as well—in time, indeed, to perceive Tom King making his way at some distance.

They noticed with exultation the exhausted condition of his horse, though the animals they bestrode were scarcely in better condition.

Yet they shouted and waved their arms, and encouraged each other to keep up the chase with unabated speed.

Tom King at length coming to a narrow lane which branched off from the high-road he was pursuing, pulled up abruptly and turned down it.

It was dark, and so thickly overshadowed with the branches of huge trees planted on each side of it that it seemed almost like riding into a tunnel.

Again a disagreeable feeling came over him like a shudder, and after he had turned down this lane he regretted having taken the step, though without knowing wherefore.

Once more making the effort to shake off this nervousness, as he termed it, he bent all his energies towards urging his horse onward.

It was just possible that the officers might not notice he had taken this narrow turning.

The lane was very serpentine in character, and underneath the horse's feet was nothing but soft, springy turf, showing how very rarely travellers passed that way.

It was fortunate for Tom, for his horse's hoofs made scarcely any sound.

Suddenly, however, the aspect of this lane changed.

The trees were succeeded by high stone walls in no place less than ten feet in height.

Tom glanced from side to side of him with apprehension.

But there was no such thing as turning back, even had he wished it, for already he could tell by the faint sounds that floated to his ears that the officers were making their way along the lonely lane.

A few yards further on was another abrupt bend.

Turning round it, Tom King uttered an ejaculation of vexation and despair.

The end of the lane was before him.

It was composed like the sides of a high stone wall, which in the centre was pierced by a massive iron door large enough to allow any vehicle passing down the lane to go through it.

But this door was closed, and, by the manner in which it was overgrown with moss and ivy, had not been opened for very many years.

"Trapped," said Tom, as he wiped the perspiration from his face once more—"trapped at last: there's no escape; here they come!"

He had paused, and having looked at the high stone walls and massive gates, feeling sure that it was impossible to proceed further in that direction, he had turned his horse's head round, so that now he faced his pursuers.

He could hear them coming on at great speed, and from the cries and shouts to which they gave utterance, he fancied they were well acquainted with the nature of the place in which he had taken refuge, and that they were full of joy at having trapped him so securely.

A dark, angry look, expressive in the utmost degree of determination, settled upon Tom King's countenance.

He allowed the reins to fall on to the neck of his panting, exhausted steed, then deliberately produced his pistols, and having examined their primings, waited, with one in each hand, for the officers to approach.

In another moment at the most they would turn the last bend in the lane and be upon him.

CHAPTER CMXLVIII.

FOLLOWS FOR A BRIEF SPACE THE SINGULAR FORTUNES OF SIXTEEN-STRING JACK.

The pale, grey morning light that, creeping over the whole face of the earth, making all things more distinctly visible than they had been before, and which found Tom King in a position of so much peril, was the same that reached Dick Turpin and Maud in the recesses of the old stone quarry.

Gladly would we return to them, or relate what further happened to Tom King, but having brought the narrative up to this point, it is necessary to go back and relate the adventures that befel Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack during the three days and nights when their comrades underwent so many strange vicissitudes.

This done, all will once more flow on smoothly.

It will be remembered, then, that when the highwaymen parted in the wood at the rear of the Three Spiders Inn, they each chose different directions, and in doing so it happened that Tom King and Dick Turpin emerged from the western side, so that the open country lay immediately before them.

Sixteen-String Jack, with whom we will deal first in choosing an opposite course, of necessity emerged on the eastern side, or that which was nearest to London, and though he made use of all the circumspection in his power he was not able to leave the shelter of the trees unseen.

A loud voice, coming from he knew not where, it reached his ears so suddenly, cried:

"Surrender!" and scarcely had the word been pronounced than a pistol was discharged.

The bullet was a harmless, useless one, for Jack, by a rapid movement, had altered his position—this rapid movement being consequent upon the start of surprise he gave when he heard some one call out so near to him.

Yet that movement most unquestionably saved his life.

Knowing his danger, he at once set spurs to his horse's flanks, and the next moment was flying off at full gallop.

So rapidly did all this take place that Jack had no time to consider which direction he should take; all his thoughts, indeed, were centred upon getting away from his pursuers as soon as possible.

It was not until he had gone for some considerable distance that he turned his thoughts in this direction, and having done so, he looked around to ascertain where he was.

He found himself upon the Oxford Road, with his horse's head in the direction of London, to which place he was galloping at full speed.

"It won't do to keep this course," thought Jack; but although he was fully aware of it, he did not just then see any chance of making a change.

He paused soon afterwards and listened, and, though faintly, yet he could hear distinctly in the distance the clatter of horses' hoofs—a greater clatter than could be produced by a single pursuer, and therefore he imagined that the officer who had made so treacherous an attack upon him had met with some of his companions, who had agreed to join him in the chase.

"Forward yet!" said Jack. "There's nothing better, I am convinced. In a little while something to my advantage will probably turn up."

He galloped on again, nor did he draw rein until he perceived dimly in the distance before him the dusky-white outline of a turnpike gate.

He gazed at it for a few seconds, then listened

This time, however, although he stretched his sense of hearing to the utmost, no sound of his pursuers was audible.

Then he dismounted rapidly and placed his ear upon the ground.

This made a great difference, for he was now able to detect a succession of rapid shocks.

"They come," he said—"they are still upon the road, and, if I linger, will be soon upon me."

So saying, he vaulted again into the saddle.

"Now which way shall I take," he murmured. "Why, that must be Tyburn toll-gate, yonder. Let me see—Tyburn—Tyburn? Surely that was the gate where Tom King found so warm a friend; it may be that the man is still there, and if so, the stratagem that served Tom so well may serve me also."

Jack was half inclined to make the trial, for he knew nothing would be of so much advantage to him as getting the officers on the road before him, so that he could turn back and retrace his course, in which case he would have the extreme satisfaction of knowing that every step he advanced took him two steps away from his foes.

Debating this point in his mind, he rode slowly up to the toll-gate, unable to decide whether he should try to make a friend of the keeper or not.

As the hour was late—or more strictly speaking, early—the gates were closed and fastened, so upon reaching them Jack had no other resource than to call out to have them opened.

In a few moments a man appeared, whose appearance corresponded tolerably well with the description Tom King had given.

"Open the gate," said Jack, "and be quick about it!"

"All right, governer; but don't be in such a blessed hurry! Blowed if I haven't left the key indoors!"

"Then," said Jack, as he pulled a guinea from his pocket and tossed it to the man, "perhaps that may enable you to move with a little extra speed."

The tollkeeper looked searchingly into Jack's face, and then putting his finger by the side of his nose in a very waggish, knowing manner, he said:

"Many thanks to you, captain! I know you are one of the right sort; you have no need to say another word to convince me of it. Perhaps you may have heard something of me before; but at any rate, if you want a service done, just say the word, and pay me well, and I'm the man to do it."

These words, and the manner in which they were muttered, enabled Sixteen-String Jack to come to a decision.

"Good!" he said. "I have heard of you; and you once rendered a service to a particular friend of mine and I should be glad if you would render one to me as well Do you know what I mean?"

"Well," said the tollkeeper, removing his pipe, "I think I do. Your friend was the one that I shut up in the house here, along with his horse. Aha! that was a good joke! Whenever I think of it I begin to laugh, and when I begin I never know when to leave off It was a very rich—so very rich indeed!"

"I can reward you well for this service," said Jack; "and you will believe me when I say that the officers are in full chase of me, and not very far in the rear. Listen, and you will hear the hoofbeats of their horses."

"I can hear 'em, captain; I heard 'em from the first. Lor' bless you, you don't think I've been tollkeeper here all these years without being able to tell what was coming a long distance off? I'm quite used to it."

"No doubt," said Jack. But if you intend to conceal me, be quick about it; there cannot be much time to lose."

"There is not," said the man. "Wait half a second; I will fetch the key."

He vanished into the toll-house, and appeared again almost immediately, carrying the key in his hand.

With this he unlocked the gate, and allowed Jack to pass through.

Then, carefully fastening it again, he said:

"Now dismount, and lead your horse in by the bridle. I hope it is a quiet animal."

"Pretty well," said Jack. "I think I can control it."

"Well, you'd better. You will remember, of course, how much depends upon silence. If your horse neighs, or snorts, or tramples about with her feet while the officers are outside they will know what's o'clock at once; then you'd find yourself in rather an awkward fix."

"I should indeed!" said Jack, slowly, and with a certain amount of misgiving. "I have scarcely dwelt upon that; it is truly running a great risk."

"Why, so it is; you speak truly."

"As great a risk as it would be to gallop on," continued Jack, speaking more to himself than to the tollkeeper.

"Well, there I can't agree with you," was the answer, "so, if you are going inside, make up your mind at once; it will never do to stand dallying thus."

"I will risk it," said Jack, suddenly. "Tom King managed safely—why should not I?"

"I see no reason why not. Come on, captain, I'm sure you've chosen rightly."

Jack slipped off his horse, and, taking the animal by the bridle, he patted it for some time upon the neck, so as to quiet it into as composed a state as possible.

The tollkeeper then held open the door of his little house, and Jack led his horse over the threshold.

As soon as the animal was fairly inside, the door was closed again.

"Now, captain," said the tollkeeper, "I just recollect that somewhere or other I've got a handful of oats and a little bit of hay; if we put this down it will, ten to one, do more towards keeping your horse quiet than anything else."

"Very likely," said Jack. "But you must be speedy in your movements, for I can hear the officers now quite plainly."

"Oh, all right, captain! You leave them to me," said the tollman, in a very confident tone.. "I know how to manage them, I rather think."

The oats and hay were produced and given to the horse, who began to nibble away at the provender with very great satisfaction, seeming quite inclined to remain perfectly quiet.

Directly afterwards there was a prodigious clattering of hoofs outside, and a loud shout coming from many throats.

"Gate—gate!" they cried. "House—house! Open quickly! Do you hear?"

"Oh, go at it!" said the tollkeeper, quite composedly, and never offering to move an inch. "Go it, my ancient cripples! You will have to call again before I come out!"

Sixteen-String Jack did not feel any easier than he had done—in fact, we may safely say that his uneasiness increased as every moment elapsed.

The officers bawled out again, and this time they accompanied their words with shaking violently at the gate, and hammering away upon it with the butt ends of their heavy riding whips.

"Had you not better go?" said Jack. "You will exasperate them—perhaps awaken their suspicions by this delay."

"No, captain, not a bit. You leave this 'ere job to me; I know how to work it You look after your horse, and don't interfere; if he gets frisky the game's spoilt for both of us."

Jack knew this well enough, but was in a fever of impatience for the tollkeeper to go out and let the officers through.

His anxiety was soon at an end, for the man, having considered that the officers had waited long enough, opened the door and stepped out.

No sooner did he make his appearance than he was greeted by a whole volley of imprecations.

"Oh, then," ejaculated the tollkeeper, apparently taking no notice of the state of rage the officers were in, "so the gentleman was right, after all?"

This was a very enigmatical remark as much for Jack as the officers, who stared at him in surprise.

"Why, you skulking idiot!" cried one, "what do you mean by that?—what are you talking about?"

"Oh, he's right—he's right!" said the tollkeeper, and as he pronounced the words he advanced with the key in his hand, and undid the padlock.

"Here—here, my fine fellow," said the chief officer, as they passed through, "what do you mean by keeping us waiting like you did?"

"Why, because I thought it was all gammon."

"What was 'gammon?"

"Why, what an inquisitive man you are! Would you stop on your business, and keep me here in the cold, just for the sake of answering few questions?"

There was a silence among the officers at this, and they waited for the one who had command of the party to speak.

This officer advanced a little from the rest, and, sinking his voice to what he intended to be a very solemn and warning tone, he cried:

"Look here, Mr. Tollkeeper: I've had my suspicions of you for some time, and I shall keep an eye upon you—mind that! You know who we are—we are officers of police."

"Ha, ha, ha!" roared the tollkeeper, pretending to be convulsed with mirth—"ha, ha, ha! Why, so you are! Well—well, now, that's what I call an excellent joke—oh, it's capital! I never guessed it would be half so rich as this!"

These words put the finishing touch to the officer's patience.

"You grinning fool!" he exclaimed. "What do you mean by talking such d—d nonsense? What is there to laugh at, I should like to know?"

"Well, wait," said the tollkeeper—"wait, and in about two words I will tell you all about it. Are you all listening?"

"Of course we are!"

"Well, then, about five minutes ago, or it might be ten, or perhaps even more than that."

"Oh, d—n you! Never mind being so particular about the time!" roared the officer, in his impatience. "Can't you see we're in a hurry?"

"Well, I thought you were," said the tollkeeper, composedly, "but why do you stop here?"

"To know what you have to tell us," was the answer. "In one word say have you seen a man mounted on a first-rate bay horse?"

"Oh, yes," said the tollkeeper—"many a time!"

"But I mean to-night, you fool—I mean within the last few minutes!"

"Well, yes, I have," was the reply. "That was just exactly what I was going to say."

"Oh, was it? Well, go on, then—why don't you speak out?"

"I thought I was," answered the tollkeeper, with great gravity. "But, however, I should think it must now be nearly a quarter of an hour ago since I heard some one ride up and bawl out 'Gate—gate—open the gate!' So I jumped up in a minute, and ran out to see who was there."

"Well—well, what did you see?"

"Why, a man in a tall hat seated on the back of a first-rate bay horse."

"That's him," cried the officer—"that's him—that's him!"

"I know that."

"Oh, you know it, do you? It strikes me you are too knowing by half, and I shouldn't wonder if some day your knowledge doesn't bring you into trouble."

"Well, there's some consolation in thinking," replied the tollkeeper, "that you will never have to fear anything on that score—I'd warrant that for a thousand pounds!"

At this there was a roar of laughter among the officers—a roar of laughter at the expense of their chief, who was so furious with rage that he swayed to and fro in the saddle like a drunken man, and seemed in imminent danger of pitching to the ground.

"As I said," continued the tollkeeper, not wishing, perhaps, to push matters too far—"as I said I saw this chap on a bay horse, so says he to me:

"'Open the gate quickly—I'm in a hurry.'

"So I did, and I said:

"'Tuppence—tuppence!' And what do you think he gave me?"

"A guinea, perhaps?" guessed one of the officers.

"Yes," said the tollkeeper, with pretended admiration. "You must be a conjuror! That was exactly the amount. So I said, 'Wait a moment, sir—wait a moment, and I will fetch you the change.'

"And then says he:

"'Oh, no, my good fellow—keep it for yourself. I'm in a hurry; but a party of friends of mine are on the road behind me. I have outstripped them, my horse is such a good one. But they will be coming on at full pelt, so, when you hear them, let them through the gate, and take the money for doing so out of that guinea. The change you can keep yourself.'"

"Why, d—n his impudence!" roared the chief officer, recovering himself. "Do you mean to tell me that he said that?"

"Do you mean to call me a liar?"

"Oh, stuff—stuff! Why don't you answer my question?"

"Well, of course he said it! Didn't I tell you as plainly as ever I could speak that he said it? And no sooner had he spoken the words than he was off towards London like the wind. But I was only half awake, you know," continued the tollkeeper, "and didn't notice him particularly, and I thought he was quite in earnest in what he said. I never dreamed he was a highwayman, and that officers were in pursuit of him. But, oho! what a rich joke it is. Why, I shall never forget it to the last day of my life! It's grand!"

But the officers did not seem to appreciate the joke half so well, and the one in command, riding back to his fellows, said, in a low voice:

"I've got my suspicions of this fellow, but we'll serve him out another time. I can see through the scheme quite well—perfectly well!"

"Oh, can you?" was the whispered question coming from the lips of many officers.

"Yes; no doubt Sixteen-String Jack bribed him to delay us all he could, and he has managed it very cleverly—I must say that. He counted upon getting a good start, and now he's got it, and no mistake! We cannot do better than ride on. We must learn news of him before we go much further. Are you agreed to that?"

"Oh, quite—quite!"

"Then follow me," was the answer, and then the chief officer, turning round to the tollkeeper, who had strained his ears in a vain attempt to catch what had been said, he exclaimed: "Good night to you, my clever friend—good night! But it's d—d odd to me if I don't interfere with your pleasant little occupation one of these days, and put a stop to it."

"You be blowed!" said the tollkeeper, sulkily, and as he uttered the words he turned round, walked into his little wooden house, and slammed the door shut behind him.

CHAPTER CMXLIX.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK MEETS RATHER SUDDENLY AND UNEXPECTEDLY WITH HIS OLD COMRADE CLAUDE DUVAL.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK, as the reader will readily believe, felt by no means comfortable while this humorous scene was taking place between the police officers and the tollkeeper—in fact, it may be affirmed that he saw nothing humorous in it, and bitterly repented having trusted himself with this man.

He considered that to behave as he was behaving was like playing with a lighted match close to a barrel of gunpowder.

However, the highwayman was at last released from the tender hooks of suspense on which he had remained so long, by the tollkeeper returning to his house.

Just as the door was slammed the police officers, with a parting curse, struck spurs into their horses' flanks and galloped off.

The idea that had taken possession of their minds was a very reasonable one indeed. What could be more probable than that this tollkeeper should undertake to keep them waiting at the gate as long as he was able?

Convinced that nothing else would help them but speed, they continued at a rapid rate, and soon the sound of their horses' feet completely died away.

Not till then did Sixteen-String Jack venture to speak.

He first drew a long breath of relief, then he ejaculated:

"Thank goodness, they have gone at last!"

"Yes, at last," said the tollkeeper, wiping the tears from his eyes, which laughter had brought there. "Oh, I shall never forget this night! It's a glorious joke!—a magnificent joke! I would not have missed it for a thousand pounds!"

"Well," said Jack, "whatever I may have felt a short time ago, I am by no means disposed to quarrel with you now, because I cannot help admitting that you have brought affairs to a very happy conclusion. I am much beholden to you, and you will find that I am the last man in the world to allow any favour to go unrequited."

"I am glad to hear you say that," said the tollkeeper, "as I shall not be above receiving whatever you in your generosity may feel disposed to give, simply because there is no knowing what charge the officers may bring against me, or how soon they may get me turned out of my present situation; then I should want some kind of recompense."

"You shall have it," said Jack, "and have it freely. I will give you my word that before many nights are over you shall receive much more in return for this service than ever you could expect."

"Right!" said the tollkeeper. "You come by your money easy enough, and therefore you ought to part with it freely. Upon my word, it's a jolly life, and I've a good mind to turn highwayman myself."

"Just as you like," said Jack. "But I think now, with your permission, I will make myself scarce."

"Yes, yes," said the tollkeeper, "by all means. I ought to have told you that myself. There's a probability that they will stop somebody and make inquiries before they go much further. It is impossible to say, indeed, how soon they may learn that no one answering your description has passed along the road."

"That's precisely what I thought myself," was the reply; "and so, as they are riding so comfortably on to London, I shall take just the opposite direction, and very soon there will be a good distance interposed between us."

"So there will," said the tollkeeper; "and though I am sorry to part with you, yet I cannot ask you to stay."

"Open the gate then," said Jack, "and I will be off. I needn't tell you who I am. Perhaps you may guess it."

"Yes—Sixteen-String Jack, or I am much mistaken."

"The same," was the answer. "And if you know anything of me you must be aware that when once I pass my word for a thing I never go back from it. I have spoken to you about the reward: depend upon it it shall be yours ere long."

"That's quite sufficient. And now just wait a moment or so while I open the gate."

With these words the tollkeeper passed out into the open air again, his object being not merely to open the gate, as he stated, but also to ascertain that there was no one loitering about.

He glanced around him as well as he could in the darkness which prevailed, but saw no one, and he was just about to insert the key in the padlock when the faint but unmistakable sound of a horse's feet reached his ears.

He listened attentively for a few seconds, then hastened back to Jack.

"There's some one coming!" he exclaimed.

"On horseback?"

"Yes, listen, and you will hear the sound."

Jack listened, and then cried:

"Yes, I hear it plainly, but it is only one horseman who is approaching."

"Right," replied the tollkeeper—"it is probably only some chance traveller; still, if so, let him ride by without seeing you, otherwise the officers will soon get on your track."

"You are perfectly right," said Jack. "I will wait until he passes."

"He is coming along in good style," was the tollkeeper's next remark, "and he is going towards London. It may be one of the police officers who has been left behind by his companions."

"If such is the case," said the highwayman, "the closer I keep myself the better. However, our suspense will soon be over."

"True," responded the tollkeeper, as he knocked the ashes out of his pipe and refilled it. "Here he is now, close enough."

By the time he had completed the operation of igniting the tobacco, the horseman arrived at the toll-gate.

He struck sharply upon it with his riding-whip, and called out:

"Gate—gate! Open!"

When Sixteen-String Jack heard those words, he uttered an ejaculation.

"Hush—hush!" whispered the tollman. "What on earth is the matter? Why, you will be heard to a certainty!"

"No matter," said Jack—"that's a friend of mine: I know his voice well enough! I would swear to it from a thousand! What in the world can bring him in this direction?"

"Are you sure it is a friend?" said the tollkeeper, anxiously.

"Yes—yes!"

The hammering on the gate was repeated, and another loud outcry made to be allowed to pass through.

But the tollkeeper seemed to think that part of his duties consisted in making everyone wait who happened to arrive when the turnpike gate was closed.

He sallied forth at last, striving all the time to keep Sixteen-String Jack back.

But the highwayman followed him closely, and took the first opportunity of peeping over his shoulder at the horseman so as to make sure there was no mistake.

The oil lamp that was burning dimly on one of the posts shone on Claude's countenance with sufficient distinctness to enable Jack to recognise it at once.

He darted forward with a cry of satisfaction, but Claude, never suspecting such a meeting as this, stood immediately on his guard, for he could not tell but what this meant a sudden attack upon him.

"Claude—Claude!" cried Jack. "Is it possible you do not know me? It is your old comrade Sixteen-String Jack!"

"Impossible!"

"Look at me and see! I have by the merest chance in the world escaped from the police."

"I am glad to hear it," replied Claude, shaking his comrade warmly by the hand; "I was full of alarm on your account."

"It would have gone hard with me," said Jack, "but for our friend, the tollman, here. He is the same who did Tom King such a good turn some time ago. Do you recollect?"

"Yes, perfectly well. Is your horse inside?"

"Yes, I will bring him forth."

"I should never have suspected it," said Claude. "I should think it is a trick that might be played upon the officers over and over again."

"I should never like to try it another time," said Sixteen-String Jack. "You cannot imagine how I felt standing there inside while they were surrounding the place, and, as I might say, within reach of me."

"Not very pleasant either, I expect; but come, the sooner we make a move the better."

Jack was entirely of this opinion, so while the tollkeeper unlocked the gate, he led his horse out and mounted.

"Remember," he said, as he trotted through, and placed himself by the side of Claude Duval—"remember what I have promised you. I shall not be able to keep my word to-night, nor could I say for certain I shall be here to-morrow; but wait a reasonable time with patience, and you will find there will be no room for complaint."

"Right, captain—that's quite enough. Good night to you both!"

"Good night!" was the answer, and as the words were pronounced the highwaymen put their steeds in motion and trotted off.

"Well," exclaimed the tollman, rubbing his hands briskly together and shutting himself up in his house, "if the officers don't come back here before long and kick up a jolly row it's odd to me!"

This reflection, however, did not deter him from very deliberately making every preparation for retiring to rest.

Here we will leave him, and follow our two friends who had met thus unexpectedly.

They trotted on at a rapid rate for some distance without exchanging a word, and then Sixteen-String Jack, unable any longer to restrain his curiosity, tightened the rein a little, and exclaimed:

"Come, Claude, tell me how it is I find you here? What can have happened to bring you to Tyburn Gate?"

"You will laugh at me, no doubt," was Claude's rejoinder, "but after we had made up our minds to separate I felt far from comfortable. We have been so much in the habit of going together everywhere that I felt lost without you. While giving way to these thoughts, I gradually rode out of the wood, and emerged just in time to see that treacherous attack made upon you, and to witness the officer start off in pursuit."

"Indeed!" said Jack, "I never guessed that. But what followed?"

"Why, the officer soon got others to join him, and away they went after you like so many hounds after a fox. I stood considering for a little while, wondering which way I should go, then took it into my head the best thing I could do was to pursue the officers."

"Pursue the officers?" exclaimed Jack.

"Yes, I knew you would laugh at so droll an idea, but mark you, I intend to keep a safe distance from them. I thought while I was riding—and I was quite certain they were on the road before me—there was little to fear from them."

"True enough," said Jack. "And that's what brought you here?"

"Well, partly. But you must also know that I indulged in the hope of being able to come up with you before long. I made quite certain that you would adopt some stratagem or other to throw your pursuers off the scent, and so I had resolved to make inquiries—of course with caution—all along the road until I learned something of you."

"But fortunately," said Jack, "there was no occasion. You don't know how rejoiced I felt when I heard your voice."

"No doubt," said Claude, "and it is agreeable that now we have met we should continue together during the time that has been fixed?"

"Yes, with all my heart! I should like it above all things."

"That, then, is comfortably settled; and now, Jack, for an account of your adventures."

"You know all, or nearly all; however, I will give you the details."

Jack did so, and concluded by saying:

"Now you see, Claude, we left the Three Spiders in such a hurry that I neglected to provide myself with any money at all, and I suppose you are in the same predicament?"

"Precisely."

"Well, then, I have promised the tollkeeper he shall be rewarded."

"He deserves to be."

"I feel it so, and therefore I propose that we take advantage of the first adventure that presents itself and turn it to good account."

"With all my heart once more!" said Claude. "And it is so long since I had a little sport on the highway that I look forward to it with real pleasure."

The two highwaymen being thus of one mind, got on quite capitally together.

Having made their arrangements so far, and listened for any sounds that might betoken the presence of police officers, they carefully set to work to examine the condition of their weapons.

Claude's pistols were unloaded, but luckily both himself and comrade were well provided with ammunition—in fact, they took good care never to travel anywhere unless thus provided.

"We shall miss the comforts of the old inn," said Claude, as he rammed a bullet into his pistol. "We have had no difficulty in getting ammunition lately, or whatever else we required—now we shall find it very different."

"Very different indeed!" said Jack. "If we had only had a little notice we might have provided ourselves with a supply that would have lasted some time."

"Make the best of it—make the best of it! We have managed well hitherto, and I see no reason why we should not continue to do so."

"Yes," was the answer. "But I would give much to know what took place at the inn after our departure from it. For that, however, we must wait—it will not do for us to venture near."

"Not on any account. But hark! something is coming."

"Are you sure?"

"Quite. Listen!"

Both highwaymen stopped, and then, distinctly enough, they heard a horse approaching, the clatter of his feet being accompanied by the rattle of wheels.

"It's a gig," said Claude, "or something of that kind. Very likely we shall get our little business over at once. At any rate, be the approaching traveller who he may, he shall be stopped."

"Yes," said Jack, "I am quite determined upon that point. Remain where you are. I will take up a position on the opposite side of the road."

Sixteen-String Jack carried out his intention while he spoke.

Having crossed the road carefully, he backed his horse as close under the hedgerow as he could, so as to remain concealed in the shadow.

Claude Duval did the same thing, and certainly it would have required a very piercing vision to have made out their figures as they stood there.

A profound silence was now maintained.

The highwaymen had got their weapons in readiness for instant use, and they listened with a slight degree of impatience to the ever-increasing noise made by the rapidly-approaching vehicle.

CHAPTER CMI.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK AND CLAUDE DUVAL HAVE AN ADVENTURE ON THE HIGHWAY.

"CLAUDE," said Sixteen-String Jack, in a low tone of voice, "keep where you are; I will manage this little affair, which I consider as being peculiarly my own."

"As you like," returned Duval, carelessly. "I will remain a looker-on, unless I see something which may make my interference necessary."

"Good; no more. Silence, or we shall be overheard."

Not another word was spoken, and the highwaymen, as they looked along the road, perceived with a tolerable amount of distinctness that it was a kind of gig that was nearing them, drawn by a large light-coloured horse, and seated in it could be perceived the dusky forms of two persons.

In a few seconds afterwards the gig was near enough for Jack's purpose, so he rode out with great suddenness from his place of concealment into the middle of the road.

"Hold!" he said. "If you value your lives, pull up! Hold, I say!"

His sudden and unexpected appearance evidently took both travellers by surprise, and perhaps it was more the astonishment into which they were thrown than a desire to comply with this strange demand that made the one who was driving tighten the reins.

Sixteen-String Jack easily kept up by the side of the gig.

He had his eyes wide open, and keenly on the watch for everything.

Yet he was taken by surprise by the rapidity with which one of the travellers drew a pistol from his belt, and, quickly cocking it, pulled the trigger.

There was a snap and a flash, but no report.

"Don't try another," said Sixteen-String Jack, "otherwise I shall feel bound to try a shot. As it is, I am willing to let you both go uninjured provided you will only allow me something you can well spare."

"Our money, watches, and so forth," said the one who was driving, in an angry voice—"that's what you consider we can spare, is it not?"

"Just so."

"Then, Jim," he added, in a different tone of voice, and addressing his companion, "may I be d—d if I am here by your side and submit to be robbed by one man! We'll make an effort to keep what we have got!"

"You are playing with your safety," said Jack. "It would have been easy for me to have returned the shot that was aimed at me, and rely upon it there's no fear that my pistol would miss fire. Quick! Hand over what I require, and you may continue your journey as if nothing had happened."

"That's cool!" said the traveller. "Nothing happened, indeed! No, no, my spark—you will have no money or valuables from either of us without fighting for them!"

"If that's your humour," said Jack, "I will accommodate you. But two to one is rather long odds, so I must have assistance."

Jack purposely raised his voice while uttering these words, in order that Claude Duval should hear them.

Scarcely had the last word left his lips than, with a sudden bound, Claude Duval placed himself on the opposite side of the gig

So swiftly did he make his appearance, that it really seemed as though he had either sprung up from the earth or else been dropped from the clouds.

The appearance of another highwayman altered the feelings of the travellers altogether.

The one who had proposed to fight it out, quietly took down his whip, and began to rummage in his pockets.

"I give in," he said—"I give in. I have not sufficient value about me to make it worth while to risk my life to retain it. Take this—it's what ready money I have. I have bank-notes in my pocket-book, but they will be no good to you, for the numbers are all taken."

Claude took from the traveller a considerably weighty purse, and, as he dropped it into his pocket, he exclaimed:

"Hand over your watch, and you may keep your bank-notes. Do not say that I have not treated you fairly."

The traveller laughed, but in a most unmusical manner.

With great reluctance he pulled his large watch from his fob, and dropped it into the highwayman's outstretched palm.

In the meanwhile, Sixteen-String Jack had been similarly occupied.

The man who had endeavoured to shoot Jack had lost much of his self-possession by the failure of his attempt, and certainly he never for a moment dreamt of contesting with two men.

"There you are," he said, giving Jack his watch and purse—"take them, and let us drive on. But hark you, my fine fellow, I've had a good look at you, and sha'n't forget your appearance for some time, and if I can put the officers on your track, depend upon it I shall do so!"

"Thanks—thanks!" said Jack, in an indifferent tone, as he made an ironical bow. "You are now quite free to drive on."

The travellers did not wait to be told twice but the one who was driving took up his whip again, and gave his horse a smart cut with it, and away they went with a rush.

"This is luck!" said Jack. "Between us, surely we have enough to satisfy the tollkeeper. I have half a mind to ride back to him, and so get the matter over at once."

"I think it would be best not," said Claude. "Morning is close at hand, and we ought to be on the look-out for a good place of shelter. Rely upon it, the country will be up in arms in a very short time."

"It will be best. The more we keep out of sight in the daytime the better. Where do you propose that we should bend our steps?"

"I hardly know. But hark! I fancied just then that I heard the sound of approaching horsemen."

Jack assumed a listening attitude immediately, but just then a slight squall of wind had sprung up, which made an odd whistling noise among the tree-tops, effectually drowning all slight sounds.

"I hear nothing," said Jack, at length—"at least nothing but the wind."

"Nor I now, but still we will push onward as fast as we can; we are as yet much too near to London to be safe."

Just then the wind dropped, and, to the astonishment and no slight alarm of the highwaymen, they heard with great distinctness the approach of a large body of mounted men.

Looking back in the direction of London, they could perceive a troop of officers galloping towards them, and a little in the rear could be seen the gig with the two travellers seated in it.

They were waving their arms in an excited manner, and pointing along the road.

"Confound it, Jack," said Claude, "they have got close upon us, and quite unawares. We shall have to look sharp now, you may make up your mind to that."

"I should only like to know," said Jack, "whether the officers are the same who passed me at the toll-gate: if so, they will be so enraged at the trick that has been played them that they will strain every muscle to capture us."

While these few words were exchanged, the highwaymen had been making their way onwards at a rapid speed.

Still, despite their efforts, the officers were much too close to them to be pleasant.

At length Claude spoke.

"Jack," he said, "I have an idea, and I hope you will fall in with it at once."

"What is it?"

"Part us separate."

"Separate? Why, I thought you said a little while ago——"

"Yes, yes—I know that! But separate only for a short time. Don't you see, if we do so, the effect will be that our pursuers will be divided. In that case, shall we not have a much better chance of effecting an escape? Recollect how close it is to daylight."

"It's a good plan, Claude, and we will adopt it. But where shall we meet, and when?"

"To-morrow night," said Claude. "Suppose, now, that you turn to the left and I to the right? We will make our way in a kind of semicircle—do you understand?—and to-morrow night we will meet somewhere on this road. I will wait for you till daybreak."

"Agreed! Let us part now, for the officers are disagreeably close."

"No matter," said Claude—"our manœuvre will discompose them in no slight degree, or else I am altogether mistaken."

The officers were quite overjoyed to think they had managed to approach the highwaymen so closely, and they did all in their power to decrease the distance which now intervened between them.

Suddenly, however, to their great consternation, they saw the highwaymen divide, one taking to the meadows on one side, the other on the opposite one.

"Curse them!" said the one in command. "That's double trouble! Still, we have no resource but to divide also. I will go after that villain yonder, and you, Hopkins, take charge of half the men and follow the other one."

The police certainly deserved some credit for the rapid manner in which they divided themselves into two parties; and having done so, they each took to the meadows, so that in a much shorter time than Claude had believed, he found they were again upon his track.

The two travellers, however, were compelled to pause in the middle of the road.

It was impossible for them to continue the chase any further, though they would have liked above all things to do so.

They remained watching the officers until they disappeared from sight; then, with a most crestfallen air, they turned their horse's head once more towards London.

But quick as the officers were, the highwaymen had managed to obtain a very excellent start, and Claude, having only himself to look after, beat the whole of his efforts to the task of urging his horse onwards at its utmost speed.

Preserving the course he had mentioned, he galloped rapidly on.

The ground favoured him exceedingly, being composed of little else but smooth pasture land.

But whenever he looked behind him to observe how near his pursuers were, he perceived the faint grey tinge of light in the east growing brighter and brighter.

[DICK AND MAUD, IN THE OLD QUARRY, LISTEN TO THE APPROACH OF THE OFFICERS.]

He did not draw rein until he had succeeded in reaching the summit of a piece of rapidly-rising ground.

Then from this elevated position he took a careful view around him.

The light had gradually increased, and by its aid he was enabled to see for a considerable distance, yet, though he scanned every tree and every hedgerow, he was unable to catch sight of his foes.

But although they were invisible to him, he might be plainly seen by them, so he resolved without delay to quit his exposed position.

The descent of the hill was quickly made, and then Claude perceived at no very great distance a dark, dense mass of trees, either a park or else, what was more likely, a small wood or coppice.

"That's the place," he ejaculated; "if I can once get beneath the trees unseen all will be well, they may look for me afterwards as long as they think proper."

He at once made his best speed towards this place, and gained it just as a bright red flash in the eastern sky showed the sun was about to rise.

Just before he passed beneath the shadow of the dense mass of trees he looked long and scrutinisingly in the direction he had just come.

Yet, as before, he was unable to see anything of the officers.

"I only trust," he muttered, "that Jack has been as fortunate and has met with as little trouble as I have. If I am not disturbed, this wood will serve most excellently well as a place of concealment till nightfall.

With these words Claude faced about, and rode as far as he could into the little wood.

When, at length, the density of the vegetation prevented any further progress of this kind, he dismounted and led his horse slowly forward.

Having at length penetrated to a sufficient distance, he paused, secured his horse, and sat down to rest.

By instinct he assumed a position of listening, but though he stretched his hearing to the utmost, no alarming sound reached him

He congratulated himself again and again upon his good luck, and afterwards, feeling oppressed by the intense silence which prevailed in this place, he found himself insensibly sinking off into a slumber.

Fully aware of the great danger there would be of sleeping in such a spot as this, he tried his best to keep himself awake.

With much difficulty he succeeded, but again and again the heavy slumbering feeling would come over him, and in the end, unable to struggle any longer against it, he sank off into a sleep so deep and dreamless as might have been envied by many.

At length, with a shiver and a start, he awoke, and then the first thing he noticed was that the day was rapidly drawing to a close.

When he remembered the length of time he had remained in so helpless a condition he fairly shuddered.

But the next moment his good spirits returned, and he thought only of his good fortune in having escaped so well.

But he now began to be very keenly sensible to the pangs of hunger, and wondered in what way he should be able to satisfy the craving for food.

"I will creep to the edge of this wood," he muttered, "and before night quite closes in will have another good look around me. Then if I see nothing of my foes I will run the risk of making a brief halt at the first inn I can find."

Having come to this decision, Claude lost no time in carrying it out.

He retraced his steps as well as he was able to the very spot where he had first gained entrance to the wood, and stood there for a long time watching earnestly.

In the distance he saw a few farming men walking slowly across the meadows, evidently making their way homeward at the close of their day's labor.

But except these, he was unable to make out any other human beings.

Encouraged by this result, which was almost more than he had dared to hope for, Claude sprang upon the back of his steed and trotted off.

Coming at length to a cross-country road, he determined to pursue its windings, feeling tolerably certain that before he had proceeded any great distance he should arrive at a roadside inn.

Fortune seemed inclined to favor him again, for before he had gone more than a mile he perceived before him just the kind of habitation he wished to gain.

It was a small, rustic, peaceful-looking dwelling, and seemed to have all around it an aspect of shelter and safety.

Perceiving it, Claude quickened his speed, and riding up to the front door he drew rein near the large moss-grown horse-trough, out of which his steed commenced drinking greedily.

"House—house!" he cried. "Now, ostler—quick!"

The words had scarcely passed his lips before he was startled by a tremendous uproar, though coming from within this peaceful building.

He heard loud voices in contention, and the rush of hasty footsteps.

Wondering, but never guessing at the cause of this commotion, Claude sat perfectly still upon his horse.

The front door of the inn was closed, but now it was suddenly dashed open, and, to Claude's intense surprise, out rushed several police officers.

Pistols were in their hands, and they no sooner gained the open air than they discharged them.

But such was their state of excitement and flurry, that not one paused to take aim.

The whole of the weapons were discharged at random.

With a shout of astonishment, Claude Duval put spurs to his horse and galloped off, leaving the police officers in a frantic, excited throng in the middle of the cross-road.

The landlord, and ostler, and other persons who happened to be in the inn at this time were beyond all measure amazed.

"The horses," roared the one in command—"the horses—bring them out! Why, d—n the fellow's impudence! The idea of riding up to the inn in that fashion! Quick—quick, bring the horses, I say!"

Not finding his requests attended to with sufficient alacrity, he set the example of darting off to the stable and saddling his own steed himself.

CHAPTER CMLI.

CLAUDE DUVAL FINDS HIMSELF ENVIRONED BY MANY DIFFICULTIES.

SPEEDY as the officers were in entering the stables and getting their horses ready for the road, yet of necessity some time elapsed, and so by the time they were fairly on the road, Claude Duval had got so good a start that it seemed quite hopeless to attempt the task of overtaking him.

Yet, enraged beyond measure to think that they had missed their man by so narrow a chance, the officers, without pausing to use any reflection whatever, whipped and spurred their already-exhausted animals in a most unmerciful manner.

The fact was, as the reader may surmise, these officers were those who had given chase to Claude Duval at the time when the two highwaymen separated from each other.

They had spent very many hours fruitlessly searching around, and at length, feeling completely tired out themselves, they had determined to rest for a short time at this roadside inn, the only dwelling they had come in sight of for a long time.

Scarcely, however, had they done so than, by a strange fatality, Claude Duval drew up to the front door in the manner we have described.

It was now fairly night, and, though the moon occasionally broke forth from the many clouds that were constantly drifting across the sky, it was very dark, these occasional glimpses of light only serving to make the darkness greater by contrast.

Claude Duval did not gallop far before he felt quite sure that he had nothing particular to fear from those who had so hastily set out in his pursuit.

Their horses were no match in point of speed for his own.

Accordingly, then, in a very short time, he gradually decreased his rate of progress, and began once more to look around him for a place where he could obtain a small supply of food, for the pangs of hunger increased in severity.

He came at length to a small cottage, built near the corner of a lane, and apparently the abode of some poor laboring man.

The stoppage of the horse's feet outside this humble tenement caused those within immediately to approach the door.

It was thrown open, and on the threshold Claude perceived the form of a man and woman, the former carrying a candle, and the countenances of both expressive of a great amount of curiosity.

"I am weary and faint for want of food," said Claude Duval, in a low tone of voice. "Bring me anything you have—no matter how rude the fare may be, it will be welcome; and rest assured you shall be well rewarded for it."

So great was the astonishment and surprise of the cottagers that at first they were unable to reply; but after the lapse of a moment the woman recovered her presence of mind sufficiently to say:

"Well, we are just sitting down to our poor supper, and if you like to dismount and join us——"

"Yes—yes!" said the man, advancing, "and I will take care of your horse."

"Thanks—thanks!" said Claude. "But I cannot dismount, nor can I linger. Bring me something, and I will eat it here."

This request was complied with at once.

The food was rude indeed, and roughly prepared, yet Claude thought that never in all his life had he eaten anything with so much relish.

A draught of weak home-brewed ale washed down this frugal repast.

As he handed back the jug, Claude Duval heard behind him the clatter of horses' feet.

"They have kept well upon my track," he muttered;

"but no matter, I feel more than a match for them now. Hark ye, my friends," he added, in a louder tone, turning to the cottager and his wife, "take my advice: Enter your cottage, shut the door, and if any question is asked of you, say nothing about my presence here to-night. I ask this more for your sake than my own. Can you hear that sound? Hark!"

Filled with amazement, the couple listened, and then replied:

"We do."

"You know what it is?" said Claude, interrogatively.

"Yes, horses' feet."

"Well, then, they are police officers. I am a highwayman! Without knowing who I am, you have given me succour, yet should it be known to these men, that would not make any difference in your favor—you would be liable to imprisonment for having aided and abetted me, therefore say nothing about it, and take that as your reward."

He tossed them a guinea as he spoke, and before the woman had time to stoop down to take up the glittering coin he had disappeared round the corner of the narrow lane which we have mentioned was near the cottage.

Whether these people were prudent enough to take his well-meant advice Claude had no means of knowing, and in a short time, engrossed with his own thoughts, he forgot all about the circumstance.

With low, encouraging cries, he now urged his horse on by the use of the spur.

The end of the lane was quickly reached, and the highwayman found himself once again upon the high-road.

He hesitated a moment as to which way he should turn; but having made up his mind as to whereabouts he was, he turned round sharply to the right, and galloped on.

Soon, however, he heard other sounds mingling with those produced by the beating of his own horse's hoofs upon the hard roadway.

He stopped at once and listened.

Just then the moon again made her appearance between the interstices of a cloud, and, although the light was misty and obscure, yet Claude was able to make out a dark body some distance before him, which he knew well enough to be a troop of police officers.

To turn round and retrace his steps would probably be only to come in contact with those officers who had hung so steadily upon his heels.

He had, therefore, no other resource than to leap the low hedgerow, and take to the open country.

This he did so quickly after having caught sight of the officers in advance, that one would scarcely have thought he had time to hesitate as to his mode of action.

His horse, once more feeling the soft turf beneath his feet, put forth his best powers of speed.

"Confound it!" said Claude, tightening the rein at last, "the whole country seems to be up in arms! Every road appears to have a troop of officers upon it! I must seek shelter somewhere, that's very clear! But Jack? I am forgetting him! How shall we manage to meet again?"

Claude reduced his horse's speed to a walk, for the animal was greatly distressed by the exertion it had been compelled to make.

Claude observed this with regret—he knew how much his own safety depended upon the condition of his steed.

Wishing to give it an opportunity of recovering its wind, he determined to make a halt, being perhaps moved to do so by feeling that rain was beginning to fall, and seeing at no great distance in advance a rude, rambling kind of building that seemed almost like a barn belonging to some farm-house, only this building stood completely by itself, and out of sight of any other.

Towards this Claude Duval directed his horse's steps.

Being at no great distance, it was quickly reached.

The door was swinging half open, so he had no difficulty whatever about making an entrance.

He dismounted and tried to look around him at the interior of this barn, but found it to be well-nigh impossible, owing to the darkness that prevailed.

Through many chinks in the roof, however, the moonbeams found their way, and after a time Claude's eyes became accustomed to the obscurity.

Straw was at hand in abundance, and with some of this he rubbed his horse down, nor did he pause in this labor until compelled to do so by sheer fatigue.

Going then to the doorway of the barn, he endeavoured to take a good look around him.

He believed, and with good reason, that he had entirely shaken off his pursuers, and now he began to wonder which way he should turn in order to meet with his old comrade.

"Comfortable as these quarters may be," he muttered, at length, "I shall have to leave them, though I would fain remain Jack may wait about in expectation of meeting me, and so uselessly expose himself to great danger. At all risks, I must endeavour to find him."

With these words he turned back into the barn, and took his steed by the bridle.

He was about to lead him forth and mount, when he fancied a low, murmuring, distant sound reached his ears.

He was all attention immediately, and, once more looking out, he was astonished to perceive quite a dense throng of people approaching.

They were all on foot, and most certainly not police officers, though what they were Claude could not guess.

He observed with some surprise that as they came along they indulged in many wild and furious gestures, and every now and then a cry like one of deep anguish would arise, making itself heard above the humming, murmuring noise which at first attracted the highwayman's notice.

Concealed by the deep shadow of the barn, Claude stood watching them intently as they made their way across the vast meadow.

He could not make up his mind whether to remain where he was until they had passed, or gallop off without taking any notice of them.

Well aware, however, of the importance of keeping unseen as much as possible, he paused, though afterwards he deeply regretted having done so.

To his surprise, the approaching crowd of persons suddenly changed their course, and, from the manner in which they now advanced, no doubt could be entertained that their intention was to make their way direct into the barn.

Discovery now was imminent, for Claude had so many enemies that he could not look upon these now-comers as friends.

To ride forth now unseen by them would be impossible, but yet he thought he might well be able to remain concealed within the building.

A certain amount of curiosity to know who these people were and what was their errand to so strange and lonely a place at that late hour may in no slight degree have influenced Claude in coming to this decision.

At any rate, grasping the reins tightly, he led his horse as silently as possible to the most distant corner of the barn.

Pausing here, he was surprised to find before him a small door leading into another part of the barn which, for some reason or other, had been divided from the rest.

Considering now that he had every chance of remaining securely hidden, Claude congratulated himself upon the decision he had arrived at.

He crossed the threshold quickly, and closed the door

Fastening it had none, but he groped about until he found a stone lying on the damp flooring, and by means of this he was able to keep the door closed.

By the time he had done this, the murmuring sound had much increased in loudness, for the approaching crowd, quickening their steps, had almost reached the barn.

Claude's only fear was that some movement or noise made by his horse might betray his presence.

In this respect, however, he would have to trust to his good fortune.

Overhead a large patch of the roof had been removed—probably had been blown away by some furious gust of wind, and through the laths by which it was crossed and recrossed there came down a very tolerable amount of light, sufficient to enable him to look around him.

For the present, however, he confined himself to listening.

He had before been struck with the idea that the sounds given forth by these approaching persons were those of woe, and this idea was confirmed, for sobs and lamentations of sorrow could now plainly be distinguished.

Then suddenly the trampling of footsteps ceased, the outer door of the barn was closed and secured as well as the means at hand would permit.

Then some one uttered a singular word, though what it was Claude could not make out; evidently it was a word belonging to some language of which he was in utter ignorance.

He guessed afterwards that it was a call for light, for in a few moments the other half of the barn where the strangers stood was illuminated.

Claude then noticed for the first time that the wall which divided the barn into two compartments reached up to only a few feet above his head.

Between the top and the roof were many huge time-blackened beams.

However great the highwayman's curiosity might in the first instance have been, it was now very much increased, and upon making this discovery his first idea was that by climbing up he should be enabled to assume such a position that, while being unseen himself, and his presence unsuspected, he should be able to take an accurate observation of everything that took place.

The chief difficulty was to climb up without making any sound that might attract attention.

But, by feeling with his hands, Claude discovered that the wall was rough and crumbling, and presented many places into which he could insert the ends of his fingers and toes.

Drawing himself up at length, he seated himself upon one of the cross-beams, and from this elevated position he found, as he expected, that he commanded a perfect view of the other half of the barn.

He waited a second or two, in order to make sure that the slight noise he could not avoid making had remained unnoticed.

He soon found this was the case, which was not at all surprising, for the whole of these strangers seemed quite intent upon their own affairs.

It was in truth a singular scene of which the highwayman thus unexpectedly found himself a spectator.

By means of several torches, consisting only, so far as he could perceive, of pieces of wood of a resinous quality, all around was plainly revealed.

The garb of these new-comers was without exception, miserably poor, and torn, and ragged.

Members of both sexes were present, some with skins dark and swarthy, others comparatively fair.

But the object that immediately riveted Claude's attention was the bowed, bent form of a very aged man, whose white beard and hair were of so great a length as to conceal a great part of the upper portion of his body.

This old man had been propped up into a tolerably comfortable position upon the straw.

The others all stood around him in various attitudes, all of which, however, were expressive of the utmost grief.

The old man showed little signs of life, except that now and then a kind of shudder seemed to convulse him.

At length he looked up, and the light, falling upon his countenance, enabled Claude to perceive that his features were pinched and shrunken, and carried upon them the impression of extreme age, and beyond all doubt this old man had long outlived the average duration of human life.

Claude began to think that these people were members of a large family of gipsies, and yet, by their attire, they did not seem to be so.

They looked rather like a band of mendicants.

Having raised his head, the old man made several ineffectual attempts to speak.

In a moment a profound silence overspread the group—scarcely a breath could be heard.

"Remember—remember," the old man gasped—"do not forget that I have now no descendant—that it remains for you before my departure to elect my successor. Be—re——"

He strove hard to continue; but after a brief and useless struggle, his gaze fell, and he sank back upon the straw quite dead.

CHAPTER CMLII.

CLAUDE DUVAL AT LENGTH DISCOVERS THE OBJECT OF HIS SEARCH.

In a moment the air was filled with sounds of sorrow coming from the throats of every one of the strange people there present, and the various cries by which grief was expressed were continued for some time without intermission.

Then one advanced from the rest, and going to the old man, placed his hand upon his breast.

There was a deep silence for several seconds.

Then this man, removing his hand, exclaimed:

"There is no longer hope—life has fled!"

Again came the wild burst of sorrow; but this man interrupted it by raising his hand.

He was a young man, tall, well formed, and muscular, and was attired in the garb of a sailor, though Claude's practiced eye detected at once that this dress was nothing more than a disguise.

"You heard his last words," said this young man—"you know what you have to do, and you know what relation I bore to him, and what were his wishes; the rest is left to you."

"We know—we know," was the answer. "You, Bamfylde, shall fill his place—no one is more fitting than you."

At the mention of this name, Claude Duval gave a start of surprise, for it sounded familiarly in his ears.

"Is it agreed," said the young man, who had been called by the strange name Bamfylde—"do you all consent?"

"We do."

There was a flush of triumph in his eyes.

"That is," added one, "as far as we can decide until the full meeting takes place."

"Precisely so"

All present were now quite prepared to look upon this young man as their leader and ruler, and he assumed his position immediately.

Glancing round him with a keen eye, he detected the small door in the partition wall, through which Claude had passed.

"This is no place for him," said Bamfylde, pointing to the inanimate form of the old man. "Let him be carried in yonder, and left alone for the present, until all necessary things are arranged."

Without the slightest hesitation, this command was obeyed.

The words of an absolute, despotic monarch could not have received a prompter attention.

Claude now saw that his discovery was certain; but the knowledge of this fact did not discompose him in the least.

He had good reasons for believing that this strange and altogether unlooked-for adventure would turn out well for him in the end.

Accordingly, while they were advancing to the door, he dropped down from the beam, and, grasping his horse by the bridle, calmly waited for the new-comers to appear.

When they dashed open the door, and raised their rude torches above their heads in order to look around, they uttered an ejaculation of dismay, not unmingled with rage.

The young man Bamfylde came forward with hurried strides.

"There is no occasion for anger or fear," said Claude. "With your permission, I am willing to become your friend."

Bamfylde advanced, and seizing a torch, held it so that the ruddy light fell full upon Claude's face and form.

He gazed at him for a little while in silence, then he ejaculated:

"I believe you, for your name is——"

Claude raised his hand and checked him.

Bamfylde advanced a few more paces, then placing his mouth close to the highwayman's ear, whispered in faint tones:

"Your name is Claude Duval."

"It is."

"I knew it. Give me your hand. Under all circumstances I will be your friend"

The other persons present looked at this little incident with wondering eyes.

Bamfylde observing this, turned round and addressed a few words to them in that strange language which they had once before employed.

Then bending again towards Claude, he whispered:

"Do you know that poor old man we brought hither just in time to die?'

"Know him?" ejaculated Claude, in astonishment

"Yes; do you not recognise his features?"

"I did not."

"Well—well, he may have been greatly changed by age and other causes, but his name you will recollect at once. That poor wasted body is all that remains of the once famous Bamfylde Moore Carew."

"Can it be possible?" ejaculated Claude, in the utmost amazement. "I thought that he had been dead many, many years ago."

"No," was the answer; "his age is extreme, but he has survived till now."

"And you," said Claude—"you bear the name of Bamfylde—you are a descendant?"

"Yes, his grandson," was the answer. "Many, many times have I heard him speak about the Claude Duval he knew in his young days."

"I have heard," said Claude, "that they had many strange adventures together."

"Yes, many—very many, and the closest friendship and good feeling subsisted between them. As we are their descendants, let the bond of union be preserved."

"With all my heart!"

"It must some day stand you in good stead," returned Bamfylde, "for our fraternity grows every day more powerful, and I will make you acquainted with a sign known only to the initiated, which will enable you at all times to claim the aid and protection of any of the band."

"That would be a useful service, truly," said Claude, "for I have few friends."

"Look!" and, as the young man spoke, he made a strange sign upon his breast, which Claude, after several attempts, succeeded in imitating.

"There," he said, "that will do. You have only to remember and make that sign, and you may command them to the death!"

A loud shout of welcome arose from those assembled, then one and all pressed round, offering assurances of their friendship.

Bamfylde was eager for the highwayman to remain with them for some time; but Claude declined, alleging as his reason for doing so the necessity he was under of looking for his comrade.

Tossing his purse to this strange people, he said farewell to their leader, and departed.

"It may be," he muttered, as he rode away, "that some time or other I shall have occasion to feel rejoiced at this chance incident. It may turn out to the benefit of us all."

Although immersed in these reflections, Claude did not forget his caution, and continually looked around him, to make sure that no officers were near.

At length, gaining an elevated piece of ground, he paused to take as accurate a survey of his position as was possible.

At last he determined upon the direction to take that would be most likely to enable him to meet his companion, and, having chosen his course, he set forward at a much more rapid pace than he had hitherto made use of.

After more than half an hour's riding, the high-road was gained.

Here he waited for some time, listening; but, hearing no sound, he rode gently along it, looking out on every side for some indication of the presence of Sixteen-String Jack.

He looked in vain, however, and continued to look for a long while, for when morning dawned it found him still at his task.

The most serious fears now began to press upon his mind.

He knew there would be some difficulty in meeting with each other, as no precise place was agreed upon; but yet he could not help feeling the conviction that, had his comrade escaped as well as himself, he should ere this have seen something of him.

The morning broke cold and chill, and over all the meadows hung a dense white vapour, thus making it impossible to see for any great distance.

When the sun rose, however, this vapour was by degrees chased away.

So soon as ever the atmosphere was clear, Claude once more paused to look around him.

Just then he heard the clatter of a horse's hoofs, and turning sharply round, saw his comrade approaching him.

The next moment their hands were firmly grasped, for Sixteen-String Jack had been not less full of anxiety than his comrade.

"You wonder doubtless where it was I sprang from so suddenly," said Sixteen-String Jack, with a laugh, "but the fact is, I heard some one approaching, and not knowing that it was you, took the precaution to conceal myself behind yonder bushes. As soon as I recognised you I rode forth."

"And how have you fared?" said Claude.

"Oh, excellently! I have had scarcely any trouble. Over yonder is a little inn far removed from all other dwellings, and around which there is always a perpetual calmness. There I remained the greater portion of the time, and there, if you are willing, we will conceal ourselves during the day."

Sixteen-String Jack pointed across the country with his whip while he spoke, in order to indicate the position of the inn he had just mentioned.

"Are you sure it will be safe?" said Claude.

"Well, as safe as anywhere," was the reply. "But come; at all events, we will ride in that direction, and while doing so I will tell you all that has happened to me; it will be comprised in a few words."

"Do so," said Claude; "I am full of curiosity."

"And afterwards," said Jack, "you shall tell me your adventures, for I fancy by your way you have something of far more importance to communicate."

"Well, that may be; but begin."

"Well, then," said Jack, "by pressing my horse hard I got away from the police officers without much trouble; nevertheless, I did not bate my speed, but kept pushing on in the direction that we had agreed upon."

Claude nodded.

"It was soon after sunrise that I found myself in front of the inn I have already spoken of. The aspect of the place took my fancy at once, and as my horse was exhausted, I was certain I could not do better than halt there, if only for a short time, and while doing so keep a good look-out for the officers."

"And is it possible," said Claude, "that you were so fortunate as to remain there unmolested?"

"Not only possible," said Jack, "but true. My horse was comfortably placed in the stable, and as the hours slipped by without bringing me a sight of the officers, I came to the conclusion they had abandoned the pursuit altogether."

"And the landlord of this place?" said Claude.

"There is none."

"Landlady, then?"

"Yes, she's a widow, and lives there a solitary life. I suppose you were about to ask me whether I thought she had any suspicions?"

"Just so."

"Well, I don't believe for a moment that she has. Customers are so rare at that out-of-the-way-place that she scarcely knows how to show them enough attention."

"I like your description of the place well enough," said Claude, "and I believe that the best thing we can do is to take refuge there."

"Decidedly."

"Let me tell you," continued Claude, "that all the roads that I have been upon to-night have been patrolled by officers. I have scarcely been able to ride a mile without seeing them."

"I have found much the same thing," said Jack, "while watching for you, and I began to fear that they had succeeded in capturing you."

No—no, I was safe enough."

"Well, then," said Jack, "push on at a more rapid rate; the sun is rising, and soon many people will be abroad.

We cannot do better than keep out of sight as much as possible."

"How far is this inn?"

"A quarter of an hour's gallop will take us there with ease."

"Lead the way, then," was the response. "Rest assured I shall not be far behind you."

Sixteen-String Jack needed no second bidding—he was, in truth, most anxious to return to the place of concealment which had served him so well.

In something less than the time he had mentioned, the front of the inn was reached, and on observing the situation, Claude exclaimed:

"This is, in truth, the most out-of-the-way nook I have seen for many a day! I am glad you persuaded me to come, for I am almost worn out with fatigue."

Sixteen-String Jack had prepared the landlady of the inn for the appearance of a companion, and she now came forth in a most obsequious manner.

"No ostler is kept here," said Jack. "We must see to our own horses—that is something you will not mind any more than myself."

"Certainly not," said Claude, as he dismounted—"in fact, I rather prefer it than otherwise."

The landlady stared a little at this remark, and Claude felt that he had been rather imprudent in making it.

However, he trusted that it would pass off unnoticed.

Jack led the way to the shed, which, for his own convenience, had been turned into a stable.

Here they attended to their horses, making them as comfortable as possible, and at the same time merely removing the bits from their mouths, and loosening the girths of the saddles, so that they might be got ready for the road at a moment's notice.

Claude Duval, however, could not make himself quite at ease in his new quarters, though Jack set him the example of doing so.

Some time was whiled away by the relation of the events which had happened since their parting.

Then, with anxious faces, they began to speak of the probable position of their companions.

As the hours passed on without anything occurring to disturb the intense quiet that prevailed around the inn, Claude gave way to its influence and slept, Sixteen-String Jack in the meanwhile promising to keep guard.

In this way, alternately watching and sleeping, the time passed, until once more the welcome shades of evening began to creep over the earth.

"So soon as ever it is fairly dusk," said Claude, "we will depart. I cannot make myself content to remain here any longer; the chances of detection are too great."

"I differ from you," said Jack. "I consider we are lucky in having fallen into such comfortable quarters. You know how closely all the roads are watched; if we venture forth to-night we must of necessity encounter the police officers."

"It may be so," said Claude, "but I have an idea that we shall be best abroad."

"Well, then, I am willing to fall in with your views. It is dark enough now, if you are so anxious to depart."

"I am then," said Claude, "though why I can scarcely tell you."

With these words, he rose from his seat and made his way to the stables.

Jack remained behind to settle with the landlady, and his pay was so liberal and so far beyond her expectations that the good woman could not express her thanks, but only stared with astonishment.

In five minutes afterwards the highwaymen had left the premises.

Crossing an open piece of land in front of the inn, they immediately plunged among some bushes, which offered them partial concealment.

Before going many paces, Claude exclaimed:

"Down—down, Jack! If you stoop down we shall, ten to one, remain unseen! I can hear horsemen approaching!"

Jack heard them too, and so dismounted without another word.

The bushes then tolerably well concealed their forms and those of their horses.

Raising their heads a little, they were able to command a view of the inn and of much of the flat country around it.

All at once, Jack uttered a faint ejaculation:

"See," he said, "yonder are officers!"

"Yes," returned Claude, in a whisper, "I see them; and I think we have taken our departure just in time."

"So think I. It is in truth a narrow escape. Let us be moving."

"No," said Claude; "wait a moment—we will watch their movements."

A rather large body of police officers now came fully into sight, and it seemed that as soon as they perceived the inn they turned their horses' heads towards it.

The highwaymen continued to watch them until they pulled up in front of the door.

"Now, then," said Claude, "let us be off. Our friend, the landlady, will be able to tell them enough to put them on our track; and Jack, my friend, just congratulate yourself on my uneasiness. If we had remained, as you proposed, we should by this time be in a most awkward fix."

"You are right," said Jack, as he sprung into the saddle—"quite right. And unless great good fortune attends us, you will find that we shall have some trouble yet."

CHAPTER CMLIII.

IN WHICH SOME CONFIRMATION IS GIVEN TO CLAUDE'S STORY.

Almost before a dozen words had been exchanged between the police officers and the landlady of the inn, the former discovered that they had by great good fortune got upon the right scent at last.

Trembling with fear, for she knew not how serious the consequences might be to herself—and the officers did not forget to threaten—the landlady pointed across the piece of waste land, in the direction the two highwaymen had so lately taken.

The officers eagerly followed the direction of her finger, and the next moment a cry burst simultaneously from their lips.

"There they are," they shouted—"there they go! Now, my lads, spur hard, we have but to keep them in sight until we are joined by the rest of our party!"

The officers gave a loud cheer, for they were one and all inspirited by the prospect of overtaking the fugitives.

At this time the moon was shining, and with some amount of distinctness, and at no great distance, flitting over the fields like shadows, they could perceive the forms of the flying highwaymen.

"Push on, Claude," said Jack—"a sharp touch is the best; it will be useless to think of tiring them out; let us get out of sight as quickly as we can."

Claude made no other reply save that of burying his spurs deeply in his horse's flanks, thus accelerating the already frightful pace at which they were going.

"Keep to it, Claude," said Jack, after they had gone a considerable distance, "we get further and further from them every moment. Try to keep up your present rate, and we shall soon be out of all danger."

Claude wanted no urging upon this point; he was to the full as anxious as his companion, and moreover, he was filled with the apprehension that ere long they would come full tilt against some other party.

This, indeed, was their chief danger, but they knew it, and kept a sharp look out in advance accordingly.

By gradual, yet perceptible degrees, the police officers dropped still further and further in the rear.

Their mortification was excessive, but there was no help for it, their horses could not compete in speed with those possessed by the highwaymen, and what was more, not one had fully mastered the art of riding.

It was this which so very often gave the highwaymen the advantage over their pursuers.

"I think we may venture to take it easy now," said Claude; "to gallop up this hill will only distress our horses needlessly."

"You are right," said Jack; "we have little to fear from our foes at the present time, and when we gain the summit of yonder hill, I should not be surprised to find them out of sight."

"Let us hope so, at all events."

At a gentle walk the two highwaymen permitted their horses to ascend the steep hill that lay before them.

The poor beasts panted for breath, and the violence of their exertions had covered them with foam from head to foot.

"Jack," said Claude, after a brief pause, "it seems to me quite certain that it will never do for us to continue riding over the country in this manner."

"But how is it to be avoided?"

"Why, by finding some remote or inaccessible place where we can remain quiet until the nine days have expired. While we are thus hunted from place to place, and occasionally kept in sight, the officers will indulge in the hope of eventually capturing us."

"That's true enough," said Jack, "and if we can only hide somewhere, they will soon grow tired of riding about to no object."

"Precisely; and that is why I think we ought to turn our attention to discovering some place that will answer our purpose."

"Yes, that's all very well," said Jack, "but the difficulty is where to find it."

"Can you suggest anywhere?"

"Not at the moment, I can't. You see the worst of it is, the officers pop up everywhere, and in places where you least expect them—at that inn, for example."

Claude laughed.

"You were over confident of your safety there, Jack. But let us keep our object steadily before us. I have been thinking during the past few moments that there is, or was years ago, some miles from here, an old castle, or rather the ruins of one."

"Indeed!" said Jack. "Where?"

"Not far from a small village called Nealham."

"Nealham—Nealham?" repeated Jack. "I fancy I have heard the name before, yet cannot recollect it."

"It is very likely," said Claude. "Many, many years have elapsed since I saw the place, but I remember thinking at the time how well-suited it was for the purpose which we now require."

"How far should you think it is?"

"Not more than an hour's good ride, and I believe that if we could only be so fortunate as to gain the shelter of its crumbling walls unseen, we might make certain of remaining there in safety and unsuspected for a much longer period than that which we have to look forward to."

"I like the idea," said Jack, "and certainly cannot suggest anything better. But stay—as the summit of the hill is reached let us pause and look back."

The highwaymen did so; but at the time the moon, being hidden by clouds, prevented them from seeing to any great distance.

"I cannot perceive them," said Jack.

"Nor hear them," added Claude. "Come on, Jack—don't linger. The moon will soon break forth again, and when it does we are much more likely to be seen up here, than the officers are below."

"You are right; and so, without any more discussion, turn your horse's head in the direction of the ruined castle you speak of; when we see it we shall be better able to come to a conclusion concerning it."

"It may have greatly changed since I saw it last," said Claude; "but that is a point only to be ascertained by actual inspection. But we need not go so fast as to distress our horses, nor to prevent our conversation."

To this his comrade assented, and at an easy trot, which, without greatly fatiguing the horses, yet which got over the ground in very good style, they made their way in an oblique line across the country.

The clatter of their horses' hoofs, however, and the rapidity of their motion proved a great hindrance to speaking, and so before very long perfect silence reigned between them.

But although they spoke not, their thoughts were busy, for whenever they turned their attention to the probable position of their companions they had ample food for conjecture.

As they journeyed on, the clouds to a very great extent dispersed, leaving the sky clear.

Claude Duval was the first to break the silence which had been for so long maintained.

"Look, Jack!" he exclaimed, slightly reining-in his steed, and pointing with his whip—"do you see yonder, in the distance, something dim and shadowy, on which the moon is shining?"

Jack strained his eyes to the utmost.

"I think I do see a something," he replied, "but I scarcely know what."

"You see the ruins of the castle I spoke of," responded Claude. "In a few moments you will be able to perceive them with much greater plainness."

This quickly proved to be the case, and Sixteen-String Jack looked with a very great amount of interest upon the scene that lay before them.

"There lies the village some distance to the right," exclaimed Claude, "and that's why I am approaching the castle in this direction; I think we have all the better chance of reaching it unseen."

Jack nodded, but made no other reply, the fact being that his attention was wholly taken up by what he saw.

Certainly, the ivy-grown walls had a most striking appearance.

"I see scarcely any alteration at present," was Claude's next remark. "I could imagine that only a few hours had elapsed since I saw it last, so little change has taken place. But let us wait here under the shadow of these trees for a few moments. Do you see yonder cloud which is hurrying up? In a short time the moon will be covered by it, and then we shall be almost certain of gaining the interior of the ruins unperceived."

Jack paused at once.

His eyes happened to be fixed upon the large black cloud at the moment when Claude spoke, and some similar idea had suggested itself to his mind.

They had not long to wait.

In a few moments the light of the moon was entirely obscured, and what might be termed double darkness prevailed, for so it appeared in this sudden withdrawal of light.

"Now, then, forward!" exclaimed Claude. "Follow slowly and carefully in my footsteps, for the ground hereabout is rugged, and in many parts there are deep places, into which a fall would be unpleasant."

Sixteen-String Jack at once dropped into the rear, and Claude Duval took his way onwards with a great amount of confidence, considering the nature of the ground and the length of time that had elapsed since his last visit to this spot.

Soon after, and without any accident, the interior of the ruins was gained.

Claude led the way across the dismantled court-yard, and through a low-arched doorway, into what had evidently been at some time or other a chapel connected with the edifice.

Walls surrounded it; but there was no roof, and on the ground grass was growing thickly.

"This will do excellently well, both for ourselves and for our horses," was Claude's first remark. "If we can contrive to keep them near all will be well; and while we keep within these walls there will be little fear we shall be seen."

"How intense the silence is!" said Jack. "You could almost imagine it a city of the dead."

"Yes, so you might. I did not tell you, I think, the reason why this place is left so much deserted?"

"No, you did not."

"Because of the strange stories current respecting it. You are not afraid of ghosts, I suppose, neither am I, but the inhabitants of this district are, and so the place is shunned by all—not from one year's end to another does a human foot penetrate these ruins."

"It seems so," said Jack, glancing around him with scarcely comfortable feelings. "I never before witnessed such complete desolation."

"It is desolate," said Claude, "and we ought to rejoice at it. At any rate, while we are here, should anyone be foolhardy enough to approach, I will undertake to give him such a fright that he will never venture here again!"

"But what's the story, Claude?" said Jack, following Claude's example by sitting down on a fragment of fallen masonry.

"I don't know the legend," was the answer; "but I have been told that strange sounds have been heard, lights seen in the night, and once, many years ago, a stranger, who had boldness enough to approach the ruins after nightfall, averred that he saw a form resembling that of a monk. He described very accurately the long gray cloak, and afterwards affirmed that he had seen the monk's face, or as much of it as was visible, for the lower half was entirely covered by silvery hair that reached down almost to his waist."

"And I suppose," said Jack, "people were sufficiently terrified at this to feel afraid of coming any more?"

"I suppose so; but no doubt it was all imagination, or else a freak played by some one upon the traveller. Still," he added, "the place is large enough, and if there are ghosts there ought to be room for them here as well as for us."

By the light manner in which Claude Duval spoke, it was evident that he placed but a very small amount of credence in the story he had just related.

Not so Jack, however, who recollected with a very peculiar shuddering sensation the strange events which had happened to himself at the Three Spiders Inn, and recalled, with anything but comfortable feelings, the sequel to them.

He marvelled much that Claude made no allusion to these circumstances; he could only account for it by supposing that they had slipped his memory, and such being the case, he thought it not worth while to revive so disagreeable a subject.

"Well, now, Jack," said Claude, after a pause, "tell me what you think of this place; is it not likely that we shall be able to remain here concealed for the length of time agreed upon?"

"I think there is a strong probability of it; and at any rate, no one could approach us very closely without our knowledge, and one great advantage about the nature of the building is, that we could easily make our way out at any point."

"You are right," said Claude, "but it is very strange to me if we are troubled by the coming of anyone."

While he spoke, Claude took from his pocket one of his pistols, and in a very leisurely, business-like way began to take it to pieces for the purpose of giving it a thorough cleaning.

While thus engaged, the two highwaymen held a consultation as to their future movements, and it was then fully determined that unless something unexpected took place that they would remain in the shelter of the ruins till the time came for them to set out for Hampstead.

The intense silence that prevailed in the ruins had a most chilling and depressing influence upon Jack.

In vain he tried to struggle against it, and to turn his thoughts into some other channel; if he succeeded for a few moments his mind was sure to dwell upon the original subject.

And now once more the moon broke forth from behind the clouds, and shed her silvery lustre upon the time-worn walls.

By this time Claude had carefully loaded his pistol and placed it ready for immediate use, and no sooner did he perceive that the moonbeams were pouring down with full force than he started up and exclaimed:

"Come, Jack, now that it is a little lighter, follow me, and we will make as good an examination as we can of our new quarters."

Jack rose slowly and quietly.

His comrade noticed his manner in a moment, and exclaimed, with a slight laugh:

"Why, Jack, one would think you were no better than the rest—that you were frightened at the thought of some spectre making its appearance."

"No, no—not exactly that," said Jack. "But why not change the subject?"

"Just as you like. But come—look here, and tell me whether you ever saw anything more beautiful?"

Claude pointed to the large courtyard, which was now fully lighted up in every part by the moon's rays.

"It is truly beautiful," said Jack; "but—but——"

"But what? Why do you hesitate?"

"I was thinking that those stones yonder resemble a hyard more than aught else."

ense, Jack," laughed Claude—"you really get worse!"

"Perhaps so, and I may as well confess at once that I cannot prevent my thoughts from dwelling upon that strange circumstance that occurred a short time back—I mean when we saw the shadow on the wall."

Pensibly, Sixteen-String Jack sank his voice while he spoke.

The words no sooner reached Claude Duval's ears than he gave a slight start.

"Was it so?" he said, endeavouring to appear composed. "I had quite forgotten all about it. Confound it, man! why did you mention such a thing as that at the present time?"

"Hark!" said Jack. "What's that?"

The faint but clear sounds of a clock striking the hour, floating through the silent air, came gently to their ears.

Jack counted the strokes half aloud.

"It's the church in the next village," exclaimed Claude. "How strange that we should hear it so far off!"

"And midnight," said Jack.

"Yes, the hour when——"

He paused abruptly, for Sixteen-String Jack just then grasped him by the arm with painful tightness.

At the same instant he raised his other hand and pointed to the extremity of the courtyard.

"Look—look!" he gasped. "What do you see there? You see, the story you were telling me has some truth in it after all."

Claude tried hard to preserve his usual calmness, but, for all that, his cheeks grew white and his form quivered.

Clearly, distinctly, and fully revealed by the moonbeams, he saw on the other side of the courtyard a dark, shadowy form, yet one whose outlines were well defined.

The figure was one wrapped in a long gray cloak, the cowl of which was drawn forwards to its full extent.

Then, while they gazed, the figure paused, the cowl was thrown back, and they saw a thin and wasted countenance, with a huge white beard descending in heavy, wavy masses.

The highwaymen both gazed until their eyes ached; then, unable to look longer, they averted their eyes.

When they recovered themselves sufficiently to look around again, they saw at a glance that the figure had disappeared.

CHAPTER CMLIV.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK AND CLAUDE DUVAL EXPLORE THE RUINS OF THE OLD CASTLE.

Upon making this discovery, neither spoke.

Sixteen-String Jack gave one glance at his old comrade; then, walking back with an unsteady step, reseated himself upon the piece of stone-work, and wiped the perspiration from his forehead.

"This is too much," he murmured—"too much! Claude, let us depart at once."

"You seem strongly overcome, Jack," answered his comrade. "Shake off these superstitious terrors—be more like yourself."

Sixteen-String Jack only shook his head slowly.

"I can't forget," he said, "what I have seen. Explain that if you can, then I shall be more composed."

"To what do you refer?"

"The shadow that we all saw upon the wall."

"Bah! why not forget that incident, and think about the present? For my own part, I am glad rather than otherwise that we have received this confirmation of the truth of the old legend."

"Glad!" ejaculated Jack, in wonder.

"Yes—because it is very strange to me if that figure, whatever it is, goes out of its way to harm us; and while it remains, do you not see that it will be a most effectual protection to us by scaring away all other people."

"But how dreadful to remain," said Jack—"to know that——"

"Be silent and listen. I looked well at that strange figure, and I must say that never in my life did I see anything that looked more substantial or real."

"Do you think, then, that the——"

"I think it was no spectre," answered Claude, "but a man."

"You say that, but you do not mean it; you think by making this statement that you will reconcile me to remaining here."

[THE POLICE OFFICERS MAKE TOM KING A FAST PRISONER.]

"Not I. I speak what I believe."

"How was it, then, that the figure appeared and disappeared so rapidly and mysteriously?"

"That we have to find out. Unfortunately, it seems we both averted our eyes at the same moment, and while we did so there was ample time for anyone to get out of the way."

"But should it be a live man, what object could he have in keeping up such a mummery as this?"

"Ah! there, now, you put a question to me I am no better able to answer than yourself. Yet how easy to suppose that some one may, like ourselves, be anxious for remaining in concealment, and if so, what is more natural than to adopt the dress described to be worn by the ghost, and imitate the movements of a spectre as closely as possible?"

"That might be," said Jack, after a momentary silence, "but still——"

"You don't think it," interrupted Claude. "That's what you mean by your hesitation. Well, time will prove. If you take my advice we shall remain here in our present quarters, and the task of probing this mystery to the bottom will find us with an occupation."

After that, Sixteen-String Jack was silent.

It was clear he by no means relished the proposition of his comrade, yet he did not like to confess as much, and when we come to remember the strange circumstances under which the shadow first presented itself to him, we shall not be surprised that he should suffer on this occasion an extraordinary amount of agitation.

"Look here, Jack," said Claude, "we will give up our idea of roaming about the ruins to-night. I can tell you want a little calm, peaceful slumber if you can have it. The difference it will make to you will be surprising Take my advice; throw down your cloak in yonder corner, wrap it round you and go to sleep. In the meanwhile I will sit here and keep watch, and while I do so, nothing mortal or ghostly shall approach to do you harm."

"No—no, Claude, I cannot sleep."

"Well, try, and after you have done so, I will take your place and you can have mine. By this means we shall surely obtain safety."

After some little persuasion Sixteen-String Jack complied with his companion's wishes, but although he threw himself down in the darkest corner and covered himself with his cloak, his eyes refused to close in sleep

At length, however, fatigue and silence combined to bring a drowsy feeling over him.

Claude called to him in a faint tone of voice, and finding he received no reply, concluded rightly that Jack slept.

The temptation came very strongly over Claude to leave his comrade where he was and take a ramble through the ruins alone.

But he remembered the assurance he had given, and determined to be as good as his word.

The time passed wearily and slowly away, for he had nothing to occupy him save his thoughts, and he experienced no little difficulty in keeping himself awake.

Jack slept during the remainder of the night, nor did he awake until the sun had fairly risen.

He started up and glanced around him in confused bewilderment, when his eyes lighted upon Claude, who looked pale and worn out with watching.

"What's the matter, Jack?" he asked; "you look quite scared."

"I have been dreaming, and the vision was so vivid that I could scarcely persuade myself it was not reality."

"Do not trouble yourself to tell it," said Claude, rising. "I have managed to keep my eyes open till the present moment, but now they must close, and when they do, let me ask you not to wake me up unless something important takes place."

Jack readily gave this assurance, and in a few minutes Claude Duval was quite insensible to all around him.

Sixteen-String Jack was much refreshed, and he looked around him at the crumbling walls with very different feelings to those he had experienced on the night before.

Yet still, when he recollected what he had seen, his feelings were far from comfortable.

Claude slept till long past noon, and his first question on awaking was whether Jack had heard or seen anything.

"Nothing whatever," was the answer—"the silence is as profound now as it was at midnight."

"That goes to show we are alone. Then, Jack, my friend, I feel more and more convinced that we have come to the right place at last. The officers will never think of looking for us here."

"I hope not. But would there be any risk in taking a good look around us?"

"I think not," said Claude. "I was about to propose a ramble. If we are careful we can keep well under cover of the walls, and so be in no fear that we shall be seen. Come this way."

With these words the highwaymen quitted the ruined chapel and occupied themselves for a long time in wandering about the remains of the castle, and making themselves acquainted with its position.

In doing this they saw no signs or token that pointed to the fact that any human beings save themselves had trodden on this ground for years and years.

From time to time they peeped forth from various chinks and crevices, and every time saw nothing but the fair, open country.

At last they reached the keep or this old structure, and, doubtless from the fact that it was more strongly built than the remainder, it had withstood more successfully the ravages of time.

An iron-bound, heavy oaken door was swinging upon its hinges, and beyond this they perceived the commencement of a flight of spiral steps.

"Let us go this way," said Claude. "If we can manage to reach the top of the keep, so much the better; we can crouch down so as to be out of sight; and think what a glorious view of the surrounding country we shall have! We can here have ample warning of the approach of friend or foe."

"Let us try the ascent, then."

"With all my heart!"

This was enough for Claude.

He sprang forward and commenced ascending the steps rapidly.

In many places they were broken, and everywhere slippery and treacherous to the feet.

As they ascended small fragments of masonry were perpetually dislodged, causing them no little apprehension.

In the end the summit of the keep was reached, and at the first glance they took around, neither of the highwaymen could repress ejaculations of delight.

In good truth the scene was a most charming one, such as would have well repaid anyone to have travelled miles to look upon.

Remembering their danger, however, the highwaymen set to work to scan every bit of country attentively.

While so engaged they did not speak, but when at last they had travelled round in a complete circle, Claude observed:

"There's nothing to fear at present, Jack—I'll be sworn no police officers are anywhere near us."

"Yes, I think we may safely assert that."

"Well, is not this the right place to stay in for a time?" asked Claude, somewhat triumphantly. "Why, if we choose to keep this elevated station we shall have timely information of anyone's approach."

"Yes, it's all very well," said Jack, "but yet I can see one objection to it—one difficulty in the way."

"What is it?"

"Why, just at the present time I am most forcibly reminded that a long while has elapsed since I tasted food. Can you tell me how we are to obtain it in this lonely place?"

Claude Duval rubbed his chin reflectively.

"I have not thought much about it," he added, "and yet it seems to me the difficulty is one easily to be got over."

"How so?"

"Why, look! Yonder lies the village, and beyond all doubt there's an alehouse in it."

"Well?"

"It is well," said Claude, "for when night comes we can wrap ourselves in our cloaks, set out on foot, and walk to the village. We shall pass easily as travellers, and at the alehouse we shall be able to get a substantial meal."

"But there's the danger of detection," said Jack.

"Of course there is, and so there will be everywhere."

"And then what should you do on the next occasion?"

"There—there," said Claude, with a laugh, "you ought to know by this time it is perfectly foolish for us to arrange what we shall do at any future time. Let us be content with the present."

Sixteen-String Jack was thus silenced, for he was unable to think of any better plan of operations.

With great anxiety and impatience, however, he watched the decline of day.

He longed most ardently for night to come.

At length, when dusk began to creep over the meadows, they descended from the keep, and, having secured their horses in such a manner that there was no fear they would stray away, the two highwaymen, enveloping themselves in their cloaks, set out at a sharp pace to the village.

Before quitting the ruins, they were most careful to ascertain that no one was in sight who might observe them, then they made their way to the point they wished to reach by the most devious and circuitous route they could think of.

It was getting very late when they entered the long, straggling High Street of the village, and, ere they had gone many paces, they perceived a large, substantial-looking inn, with a huge swinging sign in front of it.

"That's the place," said Claude. "How cheerful and comfortable it looks. If we can only manage to keep quiet there, I shall be in no hurry to take my departure."

"Nor I either."

No more was said until the front of the inn was fairly reached, then they paused a moment, for the sound of some one singing in a most uproarious voice came upon their ears.

A blind of many colours had been drawn down over the window, yet so carelessly as to leave a place through which the highwaymen could peep and take a glance at the interior.

They saw rather a large, comfortable-looking room, with a huge fire burning on the hearth, the flames of which shot up to a tremendous height, and lighted up the room with a pleasant, cheerful glow.

This was, indeed, the only kind of illumination but it was amply sufficient for those who were present.

Seated around were several persons, who, by their appearance, evidently were inhabitants of the village or the surrounding parts.

"That looks cheerful and welcome, does it not, Claude?" whispered Jack.

"Yes, very. Let us enter—I feel unwilling to remain in the cold a moment longer."

"But shall we go in there, or ask for a private room?"

"Whichever you like."

"Nay, which would be best?"

"Well, I am for entering and making one of this good company. We shall be stared at when we first enter, beyond a doubt. But we shall be able to find some shady corner, as there is no other light than comes from the fire, and after a time we shall be unnoticed."

"And be able to hear all that goes on as well."

"Yes, certainly. That may be an advantage. Let us enter."

With these words, the highwaymen drew their hats down over their foreheads, and pushed open the front door.

They had no difficulty in finding their way to the room they had taken a peep into the interior of.

A burly-looking man was in the midst of one of those long old country ditties.

He did not stop when the two strangers entered, and so they were enabled to sit down in the corner near the chimney without attracting very much notice or remark, though searching glances were cast upon them by many.

At the conclusion of the song, the landlord entered.

"A cold night, gentlemen," he said, addressing our friends—"such a night as makes a seat by the fireside most welcome."

"You are right," replied Claude, "and therefore we have entered to partake of such hospitality as you may offer."

"You can have anything you like to ask for, gentlemen," was the reply, "and that of the best."

The order was given, and very soon a most temptinglooking repast was laid before the two highwaymen, who did it ample justice, listening all the while to the conversation of those around.

In this, however, they found little to interest them—the subjects were those which, for the most part, they were unfamiliar with.

During a brief silence that all at once came upon the assembly, a sound was heard betokening the arrival of another traveller.

One and all turned their eyes towards the door, which soon after was pushed open, and a tall, military-looking man, wrapped in a cloak, made his appearance.

"Good evening, friends," he said, with a slight inclination of his head. "I am chilled to the bone, and greatly fatigued. Perhaps you would allow me a seat in front of the fire."

One was immediately offered him.

He sat down, and stretched out his feet towards the blaze.

"It's a bitter cold night," he said, "or else I feel it more severely than usual. I've been used to rough weather, too, in my time."

A glance at his countenance, now plainly revealed by the ruddy beams of the fire, would have been ample warrant for this assertion.

Apparently he had ordered brandy of the landlord before he entered, for just then that individual came in, bearing a tray before him.

"Mix it, landlord," he said—"plenty of sugar, and don't be too liberal with the water; and while you are doing so, just tell me what confounded place you call that over yonder."

"Which place?" asked the landlord, in some surprise.

"Why, those ruins."

'Oh, of the old castle!"

"Yes, now you come to speak, no doubt it is the remains of a castle."

At these words, Sixteen-String Jack and Claude could not help exchanging glances.

Nevertheless, the next moment they assumed as much indifference as they were able, while, in reality, they waited with breathless eagerness for the next words that might pass the stranger's lips.

"Well, does anyone live there?" he inquired.

"Live there?" ejaculated the landlord. "Heaven forbid! No one would dream of such a thing!"

"Then how was it that I saw a light there a short time since?"

"A light!" was echoed simultaneously by every voice.

"Yes, certainly! But bless me, what's the matter? Why, you all look scared to death!"

The landlord handed his guest the brandy-and-water while he exclaimed, in a trembling voice:

"You don't mean to tell us, sir, that you have seen a light among the old ruins to-night?"

"I most certainly have. The fact is, I lost my way among those confounded winding lanes that you have got in this part of the country, and as I seemed to be doing nothing else but bend round about first one way and then another, I resolved to take a short cut across the meadows, in the hope of finding some place of shelter."

"Well, sir?"

"Well, I thought it was well indeed, for in a short time I caught sight in the distance of a faint glimmering light, such as might proceed at the present time from your window. I galloped towards it, and at length found myself close to a ruined wall."

There was a breathless silence while the stranger went on.

"Then, to my intense annoyance, the light suddenly disappeared. I looked around, but could not see it, and the place certainly appeared as though it had not been visited by anyone for years.

'Directly afterwards I heard a laugh—a wild, mocking laugh—which echoed and re-echoed among the ruins to such a degree that I could not for the life of me make out from whence the sounds at first proceeded. I searched hastily, but without result, then, feeling far from comfortable, I turned my horse's head in the direction of this village. Now, Mr. Landlord, don't look so terrified, man—just tell me the meaning of what I have seen and heard."

The landlord shook his head to and fro several times, and waited so long before he began to make his reply that the stranger fairly lost his patience.

"Sir," he said, at last, "be thankful—be rejoiced that you have escaped to tell this tale!"

"Escaped?" exclaimed the stranger. "I had no difficulty whatever."

"It seems incredible," said the landlord—"quite incredible. But let me tell you that for hundreds of years that ruined castle has been haunted by a spectre!"

"Bah!" said the stranger, contemptuously.

"Strange sights have been seen ere now, such as lights flitting to and fro, strange noises heard, as of rumbling thunder underground. There are some who have described how they have seen the spectre. For those there was no hope."

"What do you mean," exclaimed the stranger, half angrily—"what do you mean? Why do you not speak out fairly and clearly, not keep alluding to things in that fashion?"

"If you will listen," said the landlord "I will tell you all."

CHAPTER CMLV.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK AND CLAUDE DUVAL FOLLOW THE MYSTERIOUS FIGURE.

CLAUDE DUVAL and Sixteen-String Jack were beyond all doubt more deeply interested in this little episode than any other persons present.

The first thing they did was to congratulate themselves upon having been so fortunate as to quit the ruins at the time they had; otherwise, had they lingered, there was a strong probability that they would have been discovered by this military-looking stranger, who by his manner, seemed quite insensible to fear.

But especially Claude waited with impatience and anxiety for the landlord to commence his story, for he hoped, by paying great attention to its details, to be able to turn it to good account.

Our two friends and the stranger were the only three persons in the room unacquainted with the legend connected with the ruined castle, and yet, so great a fascination was there in the theme that the others, knowing every word that was about to come, sat still, and prepared to listen as though it was something new.

"You must know, then," the landlord began, "that a great many years ago that castle was in a perfect state of repair, and tenanted by a powerful lord, the last of his race—a proud, passionate, vindictive man. For some offence or other—I know not what, for it has been variously stated—this proud lord slew the father confessor of the castle. You doubtless know, without me telling you, what was thought in those days of such a crime as this.

"The dying monk with his last breath cursed the hand that had laid him low, and prophesied that, ere many years rolled by, that proud castle should be a ruin, and that the owner should be mouldering in the dust. The monk died, and the prophecy was fulfilled. The castle became the ruined place you now see it, and its proud owner died, and with him died the title, for he had no successor."

"Well, well," said the stranger, "what of all this? Surely you are not so absurd as to believe——"

"Wait a moment, sir," interrupted the landlord, with an assumption of great solemnity—"wait a moment, and you shall hear. From that time, at occasional intervals, flitting lights were seen among the deserted walls, and the strange noises heard of which I have spoken. Then one day a man came to the village, who said that, as he passed by the castle, he caught sight of a strange, dim, shadowy figure. The form, he felt certain, was that of a monk. He was closely enveloped in a large gray cloak, the cowl of which was thrown back. He saw an aged, pinched, wasted countenance, the lower part of which was completely hidden by a huge white beard."

"Well, what of that?"

"He was believed by some, disbelieved by others. The ruins were searched, but no trace of a living being found. Then this man died suddenly, and within nine days after the time he had seen the spectre. This happened again and again, until it began to provoke attention; and as all those who had seen this apparition died within nine days of doing so, there was only one reasonable conclusion to be arrived at, which was, that the appearance of this figure was a sure forerunner of speedy death."

As the landlord finished speaking, the rest of the company nodded their heads, while others murmured:

"That's true—quite true, and we never knew anyone who had seen the spectre live long afterwards."

It may seem strange, but this narrative produced a very deep effect upon our two friends.

Strive as they would, they could not altogether shake off a certain superstitious feeling that came creeping slowly over them.

What if there should be some truth in this wild legend?

They had seen this figure, beyond all doubt—the description given corresponded with its appearance; how, then, should it be if it foretokened their own death?

Nevertheless, they listened with attention to the reply the stranger made.

"A very pretty story," he said—"very good indeed—just what I should have expected under the circumstances."

"Then you don't believe it?" said the landlord, aghast.

"Certainly not; I would refuse to give credence to any such rubbish."

"Rubbish?" repeated the landlord. "It is true. I have not lived here all these years without knowing it. We began to think at one time that the ruins had been said to themselves—that the spectre would trouble us no more. All at once, however, he was seen, and from that time no one has ventured to go near the place, nor would anyone who had the least regard for their own lives."

"Bah!" said the stranger, more contemptuously than ever. "Get me another glass of brandy, landlord—a little stronger than the last; and, while you are about it, bring one for yourself, at my expense, and after you have drunk it you will laugh at the idea of having entertained these superstitious follies."

"Never fear, sir," said the landlord, as he rose up to execute this command—"I know what I know, and a glass of brandy will make no difference to my feelings."

The stranger smiled again, but remained silent until the landlord returned.

"Hark ye, my friend," he said. "I am bound on rather pressing business just at present, but when I again come this way, if I can spare the time, I will pay a visit to those ruins, and if I see the figure you describe, my sword shall find out what it is made of."

"Then, for your own sake," said the landlord, "as you seem a brave, generous gentleman, though rash and venturesome, I hope that you will never come again. I should be grieved if any mischief overtook you."

"Thanks," said the stranger; "but I shall not forget, and before many days are over you may expect to see me. I have laid many a ghost before now in foreign lands, and if time was less pressing I could give you the account of several; but I must stay no longer. Good evening!"

He drained his second glass as he spoke, and sauntered in an easy, careless manner from the room.

He had ordered his horse to be ready at a certain time. It was at the door waiting for him, and those within the inn, having listened for a moment, heard him depart, setting forward at a rapid rate.

"There are people," said the landlord, breaking the silence, "who believe nothing that they cannot understand, and I take it this gentleman is one of them. If anyone would offer me untold gold I would not venture within half a mile of the old ruined castle."

"Nor I," said Claude. "I should think any man who did so had more foolhardiness than true courage."

This was a sentiment very much approved of by all present, and it was applauded accordingly.

Claude continued:

"As our worthy landlord says, there are plenty who profess to believe nothing, and to fear nothing. I have known many such, and yet have found that whenever they have been put to the test they have been found wanting."

"You speak most sensibly," said the landlord, "and like a man of experience and discernment."

"I speak as I feel," said Claude Duval, "though I thank you for your compliment all the same."

In conversation such as this the hours slipped quickly by, until it became very late indeed.

The guests one by one took their departure, until only our friends were left, so at last they, with great reluctance, rose to depart.

They failed, however, to learn any additional particulars respecting the ruins and the legend attaching to them.

"It is late to set forth on foot to-night, gentlemen," said the landlord, when they had expressed their determination to leave. "You can have here the best of accommodation."

"I don't doubt it," said Jack, "and we would gladly stay if our business was less important; but you must allow us to know best, and so good-night."

With these words our friends departed.

The landlord came with them to the door with the intention of fastening it after them.

Observing this, the two highwaymen took a direction that led them directly away from the castle, so that there should be no fear of giving rise to any suspicion.

They walked on rapidly and in silence until they judged they had got to a sufficient distance to make it safe to bend round towards their destination.

At length they did so, and Sixteen-String Jack broke silence by saying:

"Claude, my friend, what do you think of all that we have heard to-night?"

"Think of it?"

"Yes. Does not the description given by the land-hard agree exactly with the appearance we have seen?"

"It does indeed!"

"And suppose," said Jack, hesitatingly—"suppose there is some truth in it, after all? Suppose what we have witnessed heralds our own death?"

"I refuse to entertain the idea at all," said Claude, "though certainly the legend is more likely to be verified in our case, I take it, than in any others, for who runs such continual narrow escapes from death as we do?"

"Don't mention it, Claude," said Jack—"or, at any rate, in that tone."

"I will not. Do you know that I felt strongly inclined to remain at the inn until early morning, and then take our departure."

"And why did you not?" said Jack. "How much more pleasant it would have been!"

"I should have done so but for one determination."

"And what was that?"

"Why, I was resolved, if possible, to set this affair at rest without delay. Understand me distinctly. I hope, Jack, that you will second me in all I intend to do."

"Well, say on."

"In the first place, then, I am more convinced than ever that it is some person who has a motive for remaining in concealment who has chosen to play the part of this apparition. At any rate, should we see it again, I am determined to follow it closely, and learn whether my conjecture is well or ill founded."

"I will be with you to the utmost, Claude," was the reply, "for it would be a great satisfaction indeed to my mind to discover that what we have seen is nothing more than a human being like ourselves."

"Come on, then, move quickly, and we shall reach the ruins before midnight. We must not forget that stranger—he is a bold, resolute man: I read it in his eyes."

"You are right. He will be as good as his word, I'll warrant, and the next time he comes he will make a narrow search."

"Well, we must take our departure before then. Recollect that to-morrow will be the fourth day. We shall not have much longer to wait."

Shortly afterwards the highwaymen reached the ruins of the castle.

Their first act was to make their way immediately to the place where they had left their horses.

They were much rejoiced to find that the animals were safe.

Yet they had a look of distress that puzzled them.

"What ails the animals?" said Claude. "How odd they look! One would think that they had seen the ghost."

"Bah—nonsense!"

"But hark! I can hear midnight pealing forth from the village church. Leave the cattle to themselves awhile, and watch with me."

Filled with an irrepressible curiosity, Sixteen-String Jack obeyed.

They took up as nearly as possible the positions they had assumed on the preceding night, and gazed with fixed attention on the spot where the figure had made its appearance.

The night was not so favorable for their purpose; but their eyes had become tolerably well accustomed to the obscurity.

As the last stroke of the hour of twelve died away, Claude pressed his companion's arm, and whispered:

"Look, it's there!"

For a few fleeting seconds, despite their resolution, the highwaymen could not stir.

Slowly the figure advanced, walking steadily, and appearing as though it intended to make a complete circuit of the courtyard.

The highwaymen shrank farther back into the shadow.

"He comes," whispered Claude—"he comes, and if he passes this spot we will step forth and follow in his track wherever he may lead."

Sixteen-String Jack did not reply. All his faculties were bent upon watching the mysterious figure, which approached with a slow and steady motion.

On it came, nearer and nearer still.

The silence was so profound that the highwaymen were compelled to hold their breath. It seemed to them the slight noise made by breathing was sufficient to discover their presence in that place.

As the figure drew nearer, a distinct rustling sound reached their ears—such a sound as would be made by any person walking in a large and heavy cloak.

No footfall was, however, audible.

Directly afterwards the figure passed them, and as soon as it had gone forward a few paces Claude Duval murmured, with great emphasis:

"I will stake my life, Jack, that what we have seen is no spectre, but a man. Come quickly—follow in my footsteps; but use all caution. We will track him, and solve the mystery."

Noiselessly the highwaymen emerged from their place of concealment, keeping close under the shadow of the huge walls.

They advanced with the utmost caution, pausing every now and then, when the figure seemed about to turn round and look back; but it continued its solitary walk, not turning its head either to the right or to the left.

After going a little further, Claude noticed that they were proceeding in the direction of the keep.

Dimly defined in the darkness they could see the doorway through which they had previously passed.

The figure approached it, and then in a moment became lost to view.

This disappearance was, however, easily accounted for by the darkness, which was so dense in this part that Claude almost lost sight of his companion.

"We have lost him, I fear," he whispered. "But come on, Jack. If he has ascended the steps we have him sure."

Groping their way forward, the highwaymen crossed the threshold, and, reaching the foot of the stone steps, began to ascend as rapidly as they were able.

They listened, thinking perhaps to hear a footfall, but if so they were disappointed.

All was silence, save the whistling of the wind among the walls.

The summit of the keep at last was reached, and then they glanced around them quickly.

No sign, however, of the mysterious figure could be found.

They searched narrowly into every corner, and convinced themselves that no one was in hiding.

"He has disappeared," said Jack, in rather a changed tone—"vanished utterly!"

"Yes, he is out of our sight," said Claude; "but I see nothing extraordinary in that. These ruins must possess many chambers, the existence of which are unknown to us; in some one of them this figure must have sought shelter. Let us descend and keep a closer watch; it is possible we may see him even now."

Jack shook his head; but, nevertheless, willingly enough followed his companion down the staircase.

They paused again just outside the doorway.

Claude was about to speak, when all at once, a strange, odd rumbling noise assailed their ears.

"What's that?" asked Jack, suddenly—"what is it? The ground fairly seems to shake under my feet."

"It does—it does," said Claude.

"And do you remember what the landlord said," added Jack. "He spoke of thunder underground. Is not that just what this sound resembles?"

"It does. But hark! let us listen, and try to follow in its direction."

They advanced a few steps; but the rumbling increased.

Then there was a sudden noise, as of an explosion.

After that all was silent.

CHAPTER CMLVI.

CLAUDE DUVAL AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK MAKE A MOST IMPORTANT DISCOVERY.

"We shall soon be into the heart of the mystery, I take it," said Claude Duval—"that is, if you, Jack, will aid me in probing it to the utmost."

"I am always with you."

"Yes; but not so heartily on the present occasion as you often are; but never mind, we will not speak of that now. We must search."

"But it is dark."

"Very true; but a light can be quickly and easily obtained."

"Think of the danger."

"It is not worth consideration," was the reply. "If any chance passer-by saw it, which at this time of night is scarcely likely, it would be set down as some doings of the ghost."

While he spoke, Claude Duval advanced a few steps, and paused when fairly across the threshold of the keep.

Here the darkness was intense.

"I am convinced," he said, "that the man we saw went this way."

Jack was silent.

Claude, however, busily scattered a small quantity of gunpowder on the ground.

"Jack," he said, "you have some small pieces of wax taper, have you not?"

"Yes."

"Get one ready, then, and I will soon have a blaze."

While Sixteen-String Jack produced a small piece of taper from his pocket, Claude Duval snapped the lock of an unloaded pistol.

As the flint struck against the steel a shower of sparks came forth.

The gunpowder ignited, there was a momentary light, and then he picked up the piece of paper on which the gunpowder had been placed, and which was now fairly in a blaze.

The candle was quickly lighted, and as soon as it had burnt up a little and sent forth its full amount of illumination, the highwaymen looked around them with the greatest possible amount of curiosity.

Nothing of a more striking character than rough crumbling walls met their view, but Claude searched closely and narrowly, and at last uttered an ejaculation.

"Here you are, Jack," he said—"here's something like convincing proof, and we are on the right track."

He pointed as he spoke to what bore some resemblance to a door, though time had changed its aspect and that of the wall in which it was placed so much, and had, so to speak, so assimilated them, that it was hard to tell one from the other.

What struck Claude's notice, however, was a small piece of gray cloth that appeared to be sticking out from two stones in the wall.

Sixteen-String Jack, whose attention was called to it, bent down and examined it attentively.

"There," said Claude, with great complacency, "that looks as though I was near the mark. Take hold of it, Jack, and tell me whether that cloth has not a most material feel."

"It has indeed."

"Well, then, as I never heard of a ghost walking abroad with a substantial cloth cloak wrapped around him, we may conclude that what we have seen is no spectre at all."

Sixteen-String Jack began in good earnest to think so—yet, strange to say, he was not altogether convinced.

Claude continued:

"I knew the fellow went this way, and in passing through this doorway you see he has shut part of his cloak in with it, and then has impatiently torn it away—a very incautious proceeding on his part; but perhaps, now, immunity from interruption has made him over bold."

"And shall you open this door, Claude?"

"Certainly I shall, if I am only able, and that I doubt not."

Even while he spoke, Claude Duval felt industriously all over the door, but failed to discover any kind of fastening.

At length, however, after much searching, he discovered a small knob of iron, that was scarcely raised above the level of the woodwork.

This he pressed upon with all his strength, and the door creaked slowly open.

The very moment, however, that it swung back upon its hinges, such a gust of smoke and dense, disagreeable vapor poured forth that the highwaymen staggered back before it, and gladly retreated to the open air.

The smoke followed them in strange, waving masses, and, curling upwards in fantastic shapes, was quickly lost to sight.

The two friends regarded each other for some time in silence, and at last Sixteen-String Jack said:

"You seem perfectly correct in all your assumptions, Claude; one would think that you had some knowledge of this affair beforehand."

"Why so?"

"Because you have insisted all along that everything we have seen has been real and not supernatural—among the rest, this explosion, and here we have the smoke."

"Yes, that's what puzzles me," said Claude—"I can't make out what has caused the explosion. I expected to smell gunpowder; but this vapor is altogether unlike it; it seems poisonous."

"It does indeed."

They lingered for some time longer; then, when they considered that sufficient time had elapsed for all the pent-up smoke within the doorway to disperse, they relighted the taper, which had been extinguished by the wind, and again advanced.

Gazing across the threshold of this hidden doorway, they now indistinctly made out a rude flight of steps, descending spirally, as it seemed, into the depths of the earth.

They approached nearer and listened.

But no sound reached their ears.

Although the dense vapor was no longer visible, yet they were still sensible of its presence, for the air was hot, and seemed to scorch their lungs as they breathed it.

It seemed, indeed, as though the atmosphere was loaded with some powerful acid.

Nevertheless, they descended cautiously the flight of spiral steps.

They had not far to go to reach the bottom; then, looking around, the highwaymen perceived, branching off in various directions, what seemed to be an extensive series of vaults.

No doubt, in former times, they had served as the cellars of the castle.

All these passages, save one, seemed bathed and dripping with moisture; that one, however, presented a remarkable contrast to the rest, for it was completely dry.

This, then, was the direction the highwaymen took, and soon they saw before them a wide-open door.

At every step they now advanced, the impurity of the air perceptibly increased.

They experienced great difficulty in breathing.

Yet, impelled by the strongest curiosity, they struggled on.

Reaching the door, they saw, by its appearance, that it had been suddenly and forcibly wrenched open, no doubt by the force of the explosion which had unquestionably taken place.

Having penetrated thus far into the recesses of the castle, a strange sight was revealed to the view of the highwaymen—a sight which well repaid them for all their trouble.

In a spacious vault that was lighted by a bright fire, burning in a singular-looking iron basket, they perceived, ranged along the walls, numberless strange, fantastic objects, most of them unfamiliar to Sixteen-String Jack, but not to Claude Duval; and it is probable that these objects, as well as those suspended from the ceiling, would have attracted much more of their notice had not their attention been suddenly directed and wholly absorbed by another object, that was lying at full length on the ground near the centre of the vault.

This was evidently a human form.

They shrank back a little upon beholding it, then rapidly advanced.

Stooping down, then, they perceived the body of a man well advanced in years.

He was strangely and fantastically attired, and his whole frame was reduced to such a degree of attenuation that the bones seemed ready to break through the skin.

A large beard covered his breast, doubtless it had been white, but now it was shrivelled, scorched, and blackened by smoke.

The features also were perfectly black, and so fearfully convulsed that the two highwaymen turned away, unable to look longer upon them.

Sixteen-String Jack turned an inquiring gaze upon his comrade.

"All this looks strange enough to you, Jack, no doubt," said Claude, "but if you will remember what I told you of my early life you will believe that it is fully comprehended by me."

Jack nodded.

All these strange-looking vials, bottles, alembics, and retorts are used in alchemy, and this man, beyond all doubt, was one of those dreamers who believed it was possible to discover some preparation of drugs that would have the quality of prolonging human life to an indefinite extent, and also that some substance might be found that would change baser metals into gold."

"Yes," said Jack. "I have no doubt that such is the case. But how do you account for his death?"

"Oh, it is very simple," said Claude, pointing to the ruins of what had served a short time since for a furnace. "In some of his experiments he has made use of some explosive compound, and you behold the effects."

"Yes," said Jack. "But do you mean to tell me, Claude, that you had no certain knowledge that this was the actual state of affairs?"

"I assure you I had not, but from the first I believed that all these supernatural stories had sprung from some such cause as we have traced them to. This man, no doubt, for his chemical experiments, has been in danger of his life as a magician, therefore he has come here to screen himself from notice. He has been wholly given up to the pursuit of his art, and, knowing how credulous all these country people are, he has had no difficulty in causing all those strange sounds which were believed to be caused by supernatural agency. Leaving him for a moment out of the question, however, it strikes me that we have made a most important discovery for ourselves and for our friends."

"How so?"

"Is it possible the idea does not suggest itself to you?"

"What idea?"

"Why, have we not been turned out from one place of refuge, and have we not, in the most extraordinary manner, discovered another equally as good—perhaps, for aught I know, better?"

"Do you allude to this place?"

"I do. Just think for a moment how easy it would be for us all to take up our quarters here unseen, and then, having done so, how we can keep off all intruders by personating the spectre occasionally. As for the rumbling noises, no doubt I shall find among the materials here the means of producing them."

Sixteen-String Jack remained for a few moments plunged in deep thought.

Then he exclaimed:

"Safety is a point to be borne in mind before every other consideration, is it not?"

"questionably."

"Well, then, safety is promised us if we remain in this gloomy subterranean abode, but I confess nothing else than that would reconcile me to it."

"Pooh—pooh! You will soon become accustomed to it. Moreover, it is only requisite that we should have some place of concealment to which we could retire whenever circumstances made it necessary. We can clear this vault of that"—Claude pointed to the body of the alchemist while he spoke—"and we can also sweep away all this lumber. Rely upon it this can be turned into comfortable quarters."

Sixteen-String Jack began to think so, but, above all, he was impressed by the probability of security that was held out to them by remaining here.

It needed only a little more conversation with his companion to make him resolve upon this course, and, having once arrived at a determination, Claude instantly set to work.

In the first place, the body of the old alchemist was rolled up in his cloak, and then, between them, they carried him out of the vault and up the steps into the open air.

In a remote corner of the ruins they scooped out a narrow grave by means of their swords.

In this they placed him, and then returned to the vault.

In less than an hour a wonderful difference was made in its appearance, and Sixteen-String Jack began to look forward quite hopefully and confidently to the future, and to congratulate himself upon having been so fortunate.

The door at the top of the steps had been closed, and, therefore, they felt particularly secure from interruption, and, worn out by the fatigue they had undergone, both lay down to slumber.

Claude especially was much gratified by his discovery, for he guessed how well it would be appreciated by Dick Turpin.

And, moreover, there was the satisfaction in his mind of knowing that his conjectures had turned out to be perfectly correct.

"With a little management," he said, to Jack, on the following morning. "this place can be made to answer all our wants. I only wish the time would pass away that has to elapse between now and the date fixed for our meeting on Hampstead Heath."

"So do I," said Jack.

"For one thing," Claude added, "we can surely remain here without making any movement that may attract the notice of the police officers, and that will give us all the better chance of reaching the appointed spot unmolested."

"Stay," said Jack. "There's one thing you have forgotten altogether."

"What's that?"

"Why, the promise that I gave to the tollkeeper who proved so truly my friend."

"Yes," said Claude. "I admit I had forgotten that."

"And, what's more," continued Jack, "unless you can show me a full purse, I fancy another adventure will be necessary before we have sufficient to give him. Mine was much lightened, I can assure you, during my stay at the inn."

"And mine," said Claude, "I tossed to those gipsies, or mendicants, or whatever they were. I did so without a thought of the consequences."

Jack shrugged his shoulders.

"That's always the way—always the way; not that I regret it, for this little incident will serve to break the monotony of our stay in this place."

"And yet," said Claude, "there are many reasons that make it advisable for us to remain quiet."

"I grant that; but what I propose is that we gallop away to a considerable distance from this spot, then lie in wait for an adventure. If it should prove profitable, we will ride off at once to Tyburn Gate, afterwards get some refreshment for our horses and ourselves, and then return here before daybreak."

Claude laughed.

"That is scarcely like keeping in concealment. Depend upon it, if your intention is carried out, we shall raise all the country again."

"But I have given my word," said Jack. "Remember that it must not be broken."

"It must not," was the answer, "and so let us determine at once to set forth at nightfall."

Sixteen-String Jack was satisfied, and said no more.

He looked carefully to all his weapons, and to his supply of ammunition; but as the time came on he continued to exhibit greater and greater signs of impatience and restraint.

Night came at last—just such a night as he could have wished for—cold, dark, and miserable, with a violent wind blowing in sudden gusts, and every now and then carrying with it a scud of rain.

"There could not be a night more to my taste," said Sixteen-String Jack, pressing his hat tightly down upon his head as they rode away from the ruins. "The officers, I take it, will be more inclined to get under the roof of some inn than remain patrolling the roads. We shall have the coast clear, and I never felt in better trim for an adventure."

"Forward, then!" said Claude—"follow me. I will lead the way. All we have to do at present is to take every precaution to remain unseen."

Sixteen-String Jack glanced round him while his companion thus spoke.

The darkness was so great that he could not see far, yet he believed that they were quite alone.

The next moment he followed Claude's example of setting spurs to his steed, and the horses at once broke into a long, stretching gallop, that in a short time carried them away from the ruins of the old castle.

CHAPTER CMLVII.

RETURNS TO DICK TURPIN AND MAUD IN THE OLD QUARRY.

At length we return to the deep, moss-grown excavation where Dick Turpin and Maud had found a refuge.

It will be recollected that after Dick had congratulated himself upon the safety of the place they were in, Maud had suggested at the same time its disadvantages, and while she spoke, Dick felt, with an uncomfortable sensation at his breast, that should the officers become acquainted with his whereabouts, he would be in a trap indeed.

They would only have to guard the one outlet, and then advance and take him prisoner, alive or dead.

Painfully apparent as this was to his own mind, he strove to make it appear otherwise, and affected only to laugh lightly at Maud's fears.

But she by this time knew him too well to be so deceived.

Her heart sank, therefore, within her breast, for the momentary gleam of satisfaction that she had experienced was quite extinguished.

At every slight sound she would start nervously and shudder; then, bending forward, stretch her sense of hearing to the utmost.

But the thousand and one odd noises that broke the silence of that deserted place passed over without any result; but by the time morning dawned she was completely worn out with nervous agitation.

It was not until long after daylight prevailed above that the glimmer of dawn made itself visible in the depths of the old quarry.

By slow and imperceptible degrees, however, the light increased, and one by one, the rugged features of the place were brought into view.

Dick and Maud both looked around them with a curiosity not unmixed with admiration, for the huge masses of stonework looked picturesque and grand.

The bottom of the quarry was of a much greater extent than Dick had at first imagined.

The ground of which it was composed was broken and uneven, yet, strangely enough, vegetation thrived there, and in many places trees of a tolerable size were growing.

There was a little cascade also, the dancing waters of which made pleasant rippling music, and which, when the sun's rays shone upon them, looked beautiful indeed.

"Come, Maud," said Dick, in as reassuring a voice as he was able to command, "look around you, and feel thankful for the shelter you have gained. Surely, now, if we can but escape the linx eyes of the officers we shall be happy and contented enough until the time of meeting arrives."

Maud sighed heavily, as she said:

"I hope so, Dick—I hope so."

"Do not despond. Come a little nearer to the waterfall; you see it is in the most sheltered portion of all. How soft that mossy turf looks. Lie down there upon it and sleep; you can wrap my cloak around you, and depend upon it, I will keep good guard."

In spite of the anxieties that were crowding at her heart, Maud, who was worn out by the excessive fatigue she had undergone, looked longingly to the spot to which Dick pointed

It seemed, indeed, like some naturally-made couch.

"You are sure," she said, pleadingly, "that you will wake me at the first approach of danger?"

"I will—I promise you faithfully I will."

"Then I am content."

Wrapping herself up in the cloak, as Dick had suggested, Maud laid herself down to rest, and so perfectly was she worn out, both physically and mentally, that slumber soon stole over her.

Dick remained watching by her side for some time after she slept; then, finding, at length, that she was quite unconscious of all that was going on around, he turned aside, and muttered:

"Now, then, I will take the opportunity of making a thorough search all over this place, and ascertain whether there is any other means of leaving it than that by which I descended."

Thus speaking, Dick moved off, and for a long time was occupied in searching all the nooks and corners at the bottom of the quarry.

As he fully expected, however, he found that there was only one pathway by which the surface of the earth could be regained.

"That, at all events, is one comfort," he remarked, as he folded his arms and fixed his eyes upon the side of the excavation. "I know now that my foes can only approach me at this point, and while I keep watch there, all will go well."

A faint cry at this moment reached his ears.

He recognised it, and turned round suddenly.

Half a dozen leaps took him to the spot where he had left Maud.

She had partially risen to her feet, and there was an expression of terror on her face.

"Oh, Dick," she cried, "why—oh, why did you leave me?"

"Simply to look around. All is well, Maud—quite well, for the impression left upon me by my search is, that no human feet save ours have tredden in this place for years and years."

Maud gave a sigh of thankfulness.

"Moreover," said Dick, "you need not fear the unexpected appearance of anyone while you keep your watch upon yonder pathway. You can see how it winds zigzag down the side of the excavation. That, then, I am assured is the only means by which a descent into the quarry can be effected."

Maud turned her eyes in the direction Dick had indicated, and no sooner had she done so than a frantic cry of alarm escaped her lips, while she clung frantically to his breast.

"They come!" she said—"they come! Look—look, they come!"

"Who?"

"The officers! Look—look, there!"

Dick followed the direction of her finger, and then, at the very brink of the old quarry, he saw several small moving objects—so small that they scarcely seemed like human beings.

A second glance, however, assured him that they were, though, owing to the fact that they stood back a little way from the edge of the precipice, he was only able to discern the upper part of their bodies.

"They may be officers, or they may not," said Dick; "but at any rate, do not give way altogether to alarm—be of good heart. Follow me quickly; we will get to the shade of some projection, and then, let the officers be as keen-eyed as they may, I will defy them to detect us."

Maud was half fainting with terror, and Dick found it necessary to raise her in his arms, and carry her to some little distance.

He paused when fairly standing in the dark shadow cast by a huge overhanging piece of stone, the appearance of which was truly terrifying, for it seemed as though about to fall down on their heads.

Although satisfied that he was thus tolerably well concealed, Dick had taken up his position in such a manner that he was still able to command a view of the narrow pathway and of the moving figures at the top.

Whether they were officers or not was more than he could tell at that great distance, for the sun's rays shining down into the quarry dazzled and confused his eyesight.

Both listened, too, with the utmost intentness, in the hope that some words uttered in a louder tone than others might be borne floating upon the air.

But no such words reached them—the distance was too great.

Dick Turpin's agitation and alarm—more on account of his companion than himself—were much greater than anyone could have imagined by his manner.

At length the officers, if such they were, retreated so far from the edge of the excavation as to be invisible.

At that moment Dick drew a long breath of exquisite relief.

"They are gone, Maud," he said—"they are gone. All will be well."

"You say so," she replied, with a wan and sickly smile,

[CLAUDE DUVAL AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK AT THE RENDEZVOUS ON HAMPSTEAD HEATH.]

"In the hope that you may induce me to believe it, but I know as well as you do that our position is a fearful one, and that if the officers should take it into their heads to descend, nothing could save us from destruction."

"Hush — hush," said Dick, "let us remain silent! Although their voices may not have descended to us, yet ours may ascend to them: at any rate, we cannot be too cautious."

In this remark Maud fully acquiesced, and became silent accordingly.

Slowly—very slowly and wearily the hours dragged away, until the sun passed the meridian and began to sink down slowly to the west.

Of the officers they saw nothing more.

Maud noticed with regret the signs of exhaustion visible in Dick's blanched countenance, and at length she urged:

"Why not gain a few moments' rest yourself, Dick? Fear not—I shall be able to keep good watch. I will sit here, upon this piece of stone, and never remove my eyes from the pathway. If I see anyone upon it, or if anything else peculiar occurs, trust me I will rouse you instantly."

"Then if you will, indeed, perform this service, I shall be truly thankful," said Dick. "I did not like to make the request, lest you should be fearful. However, as you say, you will be able to give me timely warning of the approach of danger."

"Yes, yes," she murmured, anxiously, in reply—"you can trust me."

Dick knew this well enough, and therefore hesitated no longer to comply with her request.

He was glad to accede to it, for he thought never before had he experienced such a frightful sense of utter exhaustion.

This cannot be wondered at when the amount of exertion he had gone through is recollected.

Wrapping his cloak around him, he lay down upon the bank of moss, and closed his eyes in perfect confidence of safety, and was soon asleep.

No words can tell, however, what an amount of anxiety Maud suffered while he was thus unconscious.

With painful intentness she fixed her eyes upon the narrow zig-zag path, and remained gazing upon it till her eyes ached and every object swam before her.

Wearily and slowly the time passed on, yet Dick did not so much as move.

To all appearances he was as likely to sleep for some hours longer.

Maud became somewhat more assured as time passed on, and she discovered that she was not interrupted by any sound whatever.

She felt impelled many a time to arouse her sleeping companion, but every time she overcame the inclination, knowing well how much depended on his strength for the safety of them both.

It was not, in fact, until after the sun had sunk, and a chill air filled the old quarry, that Dick awoke.

He struggled desperately, and seemed as though engaged in a conflict with some one.

Maud's voice recalled him to himself.

"Bah!" he said. "I have been dreaming."

"And no wonder."

"Why, it is almost dark!"

"It is. Do you not feel rested?"

"I feel like myself," was the heartily-uttered reponse.

"And you have heard nothing—seen nothing?"

"Nothing at all," answered Maud. "The place has been as silent as the grave."

"So much the better, then. Rely upon it, we have found at last a place of shelter. Only one thing is necessary to make it perfectly comfortable."

"And what may that be?"

Dick laughed as he replied:

"Why food, Maud—food! We cannot live without it; and now I have awoke I feel so confoundedly hungry that I could set to work on these hard stones."

Maud smiled, but it was only feebly and wearily.

She was faint and sick for want of food, yet had shrunk from saying so.

Dick noticed the change in her countenance at once, and divined the reason of it.

"Come—come," he said, "cheer up! Don't imagine this any obstacle. I shall speedily overcome it, rest assured."

"How—how so?"

"Why, I will only wait until it grows a little darker, then I will cautiously make my way to the top of the quarry. When certain no one is near to observe my movements, I will cross over the fields to the nearest dwelling I can find, and there obtain what we require."

"But the danger, Dick—the danger?"

"It must be braved and met!" was the response. "We cannot remain and starve here! Rest assured, however, that I will be cautious to a degree."

Maud was silent, for she felt unable to urge him to remain.

"It has grown dark very suddenly," said Dick, looking around him. "Ah! I see now, that huge black cloud has come up, and if we do not have a storm before long it is very odd to me."

"A storm?"

"Yes; do not be alarmed. How is it, Maud, that the least thing seems to agitate you so dreadfully?"

"Hark—hark!"

Maud held up her hand while she spoke, and just then, the low muttering, rumbling sound of distant thunder reached their ears.

"I prophesied aright!" said Dick.

Scarcely had these words passed his lips than the dark cloud he had pointed out overhead discharged its contents, which came down not like rain, but like a perfect sheet of water.

"Back, Maud—back!" said Dick. "The rocks will shelter us to a great extent."

They moved back rapidly while he spoke.

And the rain continued to fall without showing signs of any abatement.

The rumbling of the thunder, too, increased in loudness, and began to be accompanied by lightning, each succeeding flash of which seemed more vivid than the preceding one.

The peals of thunder at length became truly deafening, and when the lightning flashed the whole interior of the quarry was brilliantly lighted up.

Maud was greatly terrified, and clung anxiously to her companion's arm.

"We have nothing to fear here," he said, noticing her tremor, "and while the elements are thus at warfare we shall be secure from all interruption."

While Dick spoke, another vivid flash of lightning came for an infinitesimal portion of time.

Every crevice in the rock-work around was clearly revealed.

Maud uttered a faint, low shriek, as she replied:

"No—no! See—see there!"

"See where?" ejaculated Dick, hastily.

"You are too late now," said Maud, "all is dark."

"But what was it you fancied that you saw?"

"It was no fancy—my eyes were fixed upon that particular spot."

"Well, then, what was it?"

"Something like a human form!"

"A human form?" Dick echoed, being unable to say anything else in his surprise.

"Yes—yes; I am sure of it."

"And where was it?"

"Near the top of the pathway, down which it was slowly and with difficulty making its way."

"Nonsense, Maud—nonsense; your fears have deceived you. At any rate, be prepared for the coming of the next flash of lightning, which will doubtless be here in a few seconds; I will watch keenly too, and we will clear up the doubt. Are you sure there was only one?"

"I only saw one," was the answer. "There may have been others—I cannot say."

CHAPTER CMLVIII.

DICK TURPIN WATCHES THE MOVEMENTS OF THE STRANGER IN THE OLD QUARRY.

EARNESTLY and intently Dick Turpin kept his eyes turned in the direction of the path, while he waited with the utmost anxiety for the coming of the next flash of lightning.

Although inclined to believe that Maud had seen what she had described only in imagination, yet he waited in great suspense to be satisfied whether she had been mistaken or not.

Although scarcely probable, yet, for all he could tell, the police officers might in some extraordinary way have managed to track him to the old quarry.

Then again he thought that surely they would wait until the fearful storm had ceased.

The rain which had been descending in such torrents now partially subsided.

But the thunder still rolled heavily.

Then came a tremendous flash of lightning, more vivid and intense, Dick thought, than any he had witnessed.

He was, in fact, half blinded by it.

Maud again uttered a despairing cry.

An ejaculation at the same time escaped Dick's lips.

During the momentary illumination he had caught sight of what was certainly a human figure descending the narrow, dangerous path.

The glimpse he had was so brief that it did not enable him to ascertain whether this individual was habited as a police officer or not.

He was, however, satisfied that he was alone.

"Did you see him?" asked Maud, as soon as the next peal of thunder had sufficiently died away to enable her to make her voice audible—"did you see him?"

"I did—I did; but only one person. Did you catch a glimpse of anyone else?"

"I did not."

"Then," added Dick, "the circumstance is most strange and peculiar. Who on earth could he be who would on such a night as this venture to make the descent of this perilous path? It was dangerous enough when we descended—how must it be in such intense darkness as this?"

Maud did not reply to this question, but asked:

"Was it an officer, Dick? Do you think it was an officer?"

"No, I am almost sure it was not, for no officer would make his way here alone. But keep silent. Let us wait for the next flash, which no doubt will reveal to us something more. At present do not fear—from one enemy we have nothing to dread."

Nevertheless, Maud clung very closely and tightly to the highwayman.

Another flash of lightning quickly came, and this time both the watchers were better prepared.

They saw, with great distinctness, a man slowly and carefully creeping along the pathway.

Despite the darkness and the many difficulties that were in the way, he had managed to accomplish a considerable portion of the descent, a circumstance which strongly excited Dick's wonder, since it showed that the man must either be urged onward by some powerful motive, or else he was very familiar with the nature of the path which he trod.

"Silence now, dear one," said Dick, in a whisper. "We may be in no danger of being heard, yet let us be careful. Let it be some sort of consolation to you to know that this new-comer, whatever may bring him here, is not a police officer."

"Yet he may be in search of you."

"I scarcely think so; but, at any rate, from one man we have nothing to apprehend. If he sees us I will take good care he does not leave these gloomy depths to communicate the intelligence to others! Now hush—silence!"

Maud was still at once, and after that neither spoke, but both occupied themselves to the utmost in watching the perilous descent of this new-comer.

At every lightning's flash they found that he had managed to accomplish a still greater portion of the descent.

The vivid flashes now came at longer intervals, the thunder only rumbled, and there was every indication that the storm was rapidly passing over.

At length, when the stranger had almost reached the bottom of the pathway, Dick whispered to his companion:

"I have been thinking, Maud, that it is of the highest importance we should gain some knowledge of the motive that brings this man here."

"Surely, yes," was the response; "but how?"

"Do not interpose an obstacle," said Dick, "but promise to assist me."

"I will—I do."

"Then what I have to ask is, that you will remain here, standing beside Black Bess."

"And you?"

"I will creep cautiously across the bottom of the quarry. I am familiar enough with it now to be able to avoid all obstructions, and the darkness will conceal me from view."

Maud trembled excessively as she said:

"You would creep, then, close to this man, and watch his movements carefully?"

"I would take care to keep out of sight and hearing."

"But cannot I come too?"

"You cannot, because then any slight sound that would be made by the progress of one would be doubled, and it is most important that our presence here remains unknown."

Slowly and reluctantly Maud unclasped her arms, and Dick no sooner found himself free than, with a slow and cautious footstep, he began to make his way in the direction of the bottom of the pathway.

The darkness was profound, yet not so great as it had been a short time before, for the clouds above were becoming lighter in color.

Nevertheless, it was no easy task to avoid the many fragments of rock strewn everywhere around, and still more difficult to proceed without creating noise enough to attract attention.

Dick was full of the deepest curiosity to know what possible motive could have induced any person to descend by so dangerous a path into so desolate a place, especially during the raging of a storm.

In the hope that this curiosity would presently be allayed, he crept onward stealthily, and at last, to his great satisfaction, succeeded in reaching the bottom of the pathway, as he believed, unobserved and unsuspected.

He had only just time to crouch down behind a large jutting piece of stonework before the stranger came into view.

He was not more than two feet distant, so Dick saw him with tolerable plainness, and felt perfectly sure that he was no police officer, or at any rate, not in the garb of one.

When the bottom of the old quarry was reached, the stranger paused and looked above.

A deep groan then came from his lips, and he half muttered some words, the purport of which Dick could not catch.

Then, with a somewhat hasty tread and a firm step, the stranger crossed the bottom of the quarry in an obliquo direction.

"What on earth can be his errand?" Dick murmured to himself. "Certainly he is fully impressed with the notion that he has this place all to himself, or he would be more careful to be silent in his movements."

While these thoughts were passing through his mind, Dick carefully emerged from his place of concealment and proceeded to follow in the footsteps of the stranger.

This he had no great difficulty in doing, and the thick green moss which was growing almost everywhere enabled him to tread with an almost noiseless step.

The storm by this time was quite over.

The sky was clearing fast of clouds, and there were indications that the moon would shortly make her appearance.

The stranger did not pause until the opposite side of the quarry was gained, a spot not far from where Maud was standing—so close to it, indeed, that Dick feared he was making his way directly there, and justly dreaded a discovery.

This fear proved groundless.

"Oh for a gleam of light!" Dick heard the stranger say, in low, deep tones. "But it is useless to think of it; the moon will never light up these recesses. I forget—I forget—my brain reels!"

These disjointed exclamations were in themselves highly provocative of curiosity, and Dick watched more absorbed than ever.

For the next few moments he was scarcely able to make out what the stranger was about, but at last he discovered he was occupied in igniting a small lantern that he had taken from one of his pockets.

He closed the door with a snap, and then through the thick convex lens in front came a broad beam of light, which revealed with great distinctness every object on which it fell.

Dick shrunk down again in concealment, fearful lest the stranger, before entering the recesses he spoke of, should flash the light around him in order to make quite certain that he was alone.

This caution was unnecessary.

Never dreaming that anyone was watching his movements, the stranger, timidly and reluctantly as Dick thought, entered a small crevice or fissure in the side of the rock, so small, and of such an appearance, that anyone gazing at it would have imagined that it was simply an accidental rift in the stone such as is often seen, and penetrated to a depth of a few inches only.

The stranger, however, quickly disappeared.

This proved that it was in reality the entrance to some cavern.

Dick crept forward once more, and, as soon as he reached the indentation in the rock, redoubled his caution.

Gazing in, he could perceive the faint glimmer of the light some distance off.

It was too feeble to enable him to see what kind of place it was into which he was intruding, but extending his arms well in front, he walked forward on tiptoe.

He found the ground beneath his feet tolerably smooth and firm.

Having gone a little distance, he discovered that the light became stationary.

Creeping onward again, and scarcely daring to breathe lest the slight sound should be heard, he at last paused, and found himself in a tolerably large cavern, that beyond all doubt was the work of nature.

In one corner of it the stranger was standing, and Dick after a hasty glance around glided towards him.

The lantern was raised high in the air, but as it was furnished with a bull's-eye, the light fell in one direction only, leaving all around in a darkness that seemed doubly great by contrast.

Dick found that the stranger was speaking in a low, murmuring tone, and at first fancied he was addressing some one.

Ere long, however, he found this to be an error.

Either from some strange habit, or else, perhaps, because he fancied the sound of his own voice took off in some degree the loneliness of the place he was in, the stranger spoke his thoughts aloud.

"It is a foolish fear," he said, as though endeavoring to persuade himself into something he could not believe —"a vain and foolish fear, and to satisfy myself that it is so I will take another hasty glance, even though the sight should drive me mad; it would repay me for all—to make certain that my apprehensions were groundless, to be able, in fact, to laugh at my own fears!"

There was, so to speak, a ghastly kind of cheerfulness in the manner in which the stranger spoke, and Dick wondered greatly what it was that he so longed yet feared to look upon.

Venturing to creep even closer still, he watched with a keen eye the stranger's further movements.

The lantern was placed down upon the ground in such a manner as to throw its light in the direction required.

Then the stranger, advancing to the wall of the cavern, stooped down, and seized hold of a huge piece of rock.

Grasping it with both hands, he pulled and tugged with all his might, striving to dislodge it from its position.

As he did so, small masses of earth and stones fell continually upon him from the wall of the cavern, which, oddly enough, seemed to be composed of some soft material.

Heedless of all this, the stranger continued his frantic efforts.

Dick marvelled greatly at his strength, for the huge piece of rock was, inch by inch, drawn further out into the cavern.

At last, after incredible exertion, it was quite removed, and then a small opening was disclosed not much larger than would allow a man to crawl through it.

This the stranger, having picked up the lantern, prepared to do

He cast one hasty, timorous glance around, then, evidently nerving himself for a great effort, and summoning up all his courage, he crept through the opening.

As he disappeared, Dick drew closer, and endeavored to ascertain where the stranger had gone, and what it was he was looking for.

The opening in the side of the cavern was not of any great extent, and Dick caught sight of him only a few feet distant.

"Yes, yes," the stranger said, and his voice sounded odd and muffled, owing to the strange place he was in, "I know I have been needlessly terrifying myself! The evidences of my awful crime are safely hidden where they will never be found. I feel it—I know it! But yet, if I could only summon up my courage for one glance, I should then be sure—quite sure! And if I go away without, all my old tortures may return. I will do it!"

The last words were pronounced with great determination, and the stranger crept a little way further in.

Then he raised the lantern for a moment, turning its beams full before him.

Then Dick saw something which, when he afterwards came to consider upon it, he fully believed was the remains of some human being.

The glimpse he had was a most transient one—the stranger turned his lantern away almost instantly.

But then Dick's attention was distracted by a circumstance which was well calculated to do so.

He had noticed, on first approaching this opening in the cavern, that the soft earth fell down continually, and all at once he became conscious that the fall was greater every moment.

Then, beyond all doubt, he felt that this opening through which the stranger had passed was gradually closing up.

The earth above, unable to sustain its own weight, was rushing down.

Instinctively he drew back, and at the same moment he uttered a warning cry.

"Quick--quick!" he cried. "Escape—escape while you have yet time! This support of the cavern is falling in!"

A dead silence followed his words.

Then came a wild shriek and an awful, mocking laugh that raised many strange echoes in that gloomy place.

The lantern fell from the terrified stranger's trembling grasp, and it was extinguished instantly.

Almost at the same moment, with a hideous rush, the earth descended, and the opening in the wall of the cavern was choked completely up.

So suddenly did all this take place, and so singular was the whole affair, that Dick Turpin remained for some time motionless in the dark cavern, for the simple reason that he was unable to collect his faculties sufficiently to stir.

Then all at once there broke in upon him a perfect understanding of his own great danger.

He was in a huge cavern, from which, for aught he knew, there might be several modes of egress.

In the intense darkness that prevailed, how would it be possible for him to discover the right way out?

His heart beat rapidly, each throb seeming to send the blood with greater force into his brain.

He grew faint and dizzy.

"Courage, Dick," he muttered, at last—"courage! This will never do! I have only to preserve my coolness, and then in a little while all will be well."

Although he said this, Dick could scarcely bring himself to believe it; but as soon as he had finished speaking, he began to grope his way forwards, as he believed as nearly as possible in the direction of the exit from the cavern, through which he had so lately passed.

But the darkness altogether confused and baffled him.

Onwards—onwards he crawled, and it seemed to him as though he should never be able to reach the opposite side.

Could he but once place his hand on the rock-work he would then have better hopes.

At last he succeeded.

The walls were damp, slippery, and smooth.

He passed his hand rapidly over them as he advanced, and having taken many steps, he stopped to think, for no trace of the wished-for opening could he find.

CHAPTER CMLIX.

DICK TURPIN IS RECOGNISED AT THE FARM-HOUSE.

A FEELING of intense and horrible despair overspread Dick Turpin's heart.

He thought how fearful a thing it would be to remain pent up in the darkness of that cavern, unable to grope his way back again to daylight.

He raised his voice and cried aloud, but no response whatever, save the dull, mocking echo of his own voice, reached his ears.

Then, all at once, he recollected something, which it is wonderful indeed he could have forgotten for so long.

That was, that he had about his person the means of procuring a light, by the aid of which what would be more easy than to escape?

His anger with himself upon making this discovery knew no bounds—he was unable to account for such strange forgetfulness.

It is not at all wonderful, however, when it is considered how well calculated such an adventure as he had just met with was to throw the mind of anyone off its balance—in fact, while seeking to escape in the darkness he had, so to speak, confounded himself with the miserable denizen of that inner and smaller cavern.

For him there was no hope, and all the time while groping forward, Dick had fancied that the darkness took strange shapes, and in imagination he could see the stranger vainly endeavoring to effect his own release.

Having the prospect of the fate of this unhappy wretch so prominently before his mind deprived him of all his usual coolness and self-dependence.

Now, however, quite a reaction came over him, and he began hastily to feel in his pockets for the objects he required.

They were ready to his hand, and in a few moments more, literally speaking, the darkness of the cavern was made visible by the flame of a tiny wax taper.

Dick waited till it had burnt up a little, then, the moment he cast his eyes around him, uttered a cry of surprise, in which satisfaction was strongly mingled.

In fact, only a few paces before him was, he believed, the very identical opening in the rock through which he had so recently made his way.

Even in the darkness, had he groped forward half a dozen steps at the utmost he would have discovered it.

Near the walls of the cavern the ground was damp and wet, so that every step he took left a distinct impression behind it.

Noticing this, he looked closely down at the flooring of the passage he had just discovered, and was rejoiced to find traces of recent footprints upon it.

With rapid, flying steps, he hurried on, and the next moment, with a sigh of unutterable, inexpressible relief, found himself once more standing in the open air.

He could scarcely believe even then in the reality of his escape and of the extraordinary events that had so recently occurred.

Did not the presence of the stranger and his awful fate seem more like a wild dream than aught else?

He was recalled to a full and perfect consciousness by hearing his name pronounced by a voice whose accents he knew full well.

He uttered a word in reply and hurried on.

Fain would he have kept from Maud the horrifying details of the scene he had witnessed, but she was persistent in her inquiries, and he had no resource but to tell her all.

She was overcome with horror and dismay, and when the final catastrophe was described, shuddered from head to foot.

"And—and," she exclaimed, with blanched lips, "do you really think that there is no means of freeing him from his present terrible situation?"

Dick shook his head.

"None whatever," he replied. "The nature is such that hundreds of tons of earth must have fallen down and choked up the mouth of the passage, and it would require the labor of many hands for a long period to open it again."

"And before that time——"

"He would be dead," added Dick, "if he be not so already."

"But his object in coming here?" said Maud—"what can have induced him to do so? How strange that he should walk thus to his own death!"

"Strange indeed! But from the muttered words I overheard, and from the momentary glimpses I obtained of the inner cavern, I feel sure that that man, whoever he may be, had murdered some one, and, in order to conceal his crime, had placed the remains of his victim there, blocking up the outlet with the huge mass of rock I spoke of."

"Horrible—horrible!"

"Truly so; but what a strange retribution there is in it all. I feel certain that the poor wretch had been haunted and terrified by continual apprehensions that the body of his poor victim was not safe—that by some means or other it had managed to escape; that feeling had grown and grown upon him until he could resist it no longer, and so, you see, he had made his way to this lonely spot, perhaps choosing to do so on this night of fearful storm, because he would then be more likely to be unobserved."

As she listened, Maud's terror seemed to grow greater and greater.

Probably she began now fully to realise the awful event.

She sank back slowly, and would have fallen had not Dick stretched out his arm to save her.

"This has been too much for you," he exclaimed; "I feared it would be, but you were so persistent, that I could not refuse."

"No—no," she murmured, feebly, "it is not that, Dick, so much that causes this dreadful feeling of faintness as it is the want of food."

"Of course it is!" cried Dick, whose pangs of hunger had for the time passed away—"of course it is! I forgot that. You shall not remain much longer without what you need."

"No—no, Dick, do not—do not leave me!"

"But I must. Believe me, you will be quite safe. I will hasten back with all possible despatch. There is no difficulty in the matter—none whatever; I shall soon return."

Not without much difficulty did Dick succeed in tearing himself away.

Having at last parted, however, he hurried quickly towards the foot of the pathway, and ascended with much greater speed than was at all consistent with his personal safety.

Full of eagerness, he bounded on, never pausing until close to the brink of the excavation.

Then he stopped a little to recover his breath and to glance around him.

As he fully expected, yet, nevertheless, to his great satisfaction, he found that no human being was in sight.

Cautiously, then, he raised himself up, until he fairly stood upon his feet in the meadow.

The night was still squally and dark; every now and then the wind blew furiously, and at times a few drops of rain would be carried towards the earth with terrific violence.

"So much the better," muttered Dick, as he took note of the aspect of the weather—"so much the better. I am less likely to meet with any person abroad."

Quite at random he struck across the meadow, hoping ere long to find himself near to a small village, or else some habitation where he should be able to obtain the articles he required.

Presently, feeling certain that no one was near, he increased his speed, for he knew full well how lonely Maud would be left to herself at the bottom of the excavation, and was desirous of returning to her as soon as possible.

As he advanced he looked scrutinisingly around him, and at length uttered an ejaculation of satisfaction.

Far away in the darkness he could perceive a faint twinkling light, evidently proceeding from the window of some habitation.

What kind of place this might be he had of course no idea, yet he hastened towards it full of hope.

From its position, and the nature of the ground around, he was not long in coming to the conclusion that it was a farm-house, and having made this discovery he paused awhile, scarcely knowing whether to apply there for what he wanted.

But time was precious, and as he looked about him he could not see a trace of another human dwelling.

It might be that he would have to travel miles before he came to a village.

This probability decided him, and at once quickening his steps, he made his way in a straight line to the farm-house.

Having reached it, he knocked loudly at the door.

Some delay took place before it was opened.

A ruddy-faced girl appeared upon the threshold, who invited him to enter.

The scene that now met Dick's view was one that contrasted very strongly with that which he had just left.

A place more bereft of comforts than the old quarry could scarcely be imagined, and certainly it would be hard indeed to find a place where they were more manifest than at this farm-house.

The huge kitchen was lighted up by the ruddy glare of the fire piled high upon the hearth.

Around were seated several persons of all ages, chiefly comprising the family of the farmer.

An eager gaze was turned upon Dick as soon as he entered.

It was quite an event for anyone of his appearance to cross their threshold.

Dick took off his hat and bowed politely.

"Well, sir," said a voice, proceeding from the chimney corner, "will you be good enough to tell us what you want?"

Dick looked towards the fire, and there saw a small red-faced man seated in a high-backed, old-fashioned chair.

"I have come to ask a favor," said Dick. "It is that you will supply me with a basket of provisions, for which I am willing to pay you liberally."

This probably was about the strangest request that anyone of Dick's appearance could possibly make.

He thought so himself, and wondered what reason he could give for making it.

He was rewarded by a general stare of astonishment, and then the old farmer, slowly removing his pipe from his mouth, echoed:

"A basket of provisions?"

"Yes," said Dick—"a large one. You wonder, no doubt, that I should ask for such a thing, but the fact is I want it for a poor, almost starving family, who have rendered me a service, and I take this way of repaying them."

The farmer could scarcely refuse compliance with this demand, so he answered:

"We have no objection, sir, certainly! What would you like to take?"

"That I leave to you," he responded. "Fill up the basket with whatever you please."

He produced a handful of money as he spoke, and then he noticed, with some surprise, that all fixed an eager, hungry look upon the coins, more especially the old farmer.

The task of filling the basket was now proceeded with, and Dick, jingling the money in his hand, asked what he should pay for it.

To this there came no response.

"Well, then," he said, "take this guinea—that surely will suffice. The remainder you can divide among your young ones."

"Ah! sir," said the farmer, as he took the coin, "you are happy!"

Dick smiled doubtfully.

"What a thing it is," continued the old man, "to be possessed of money! Here have I been toiling all my life, and behold the result. I have had one bad season after another, until to-night, when preparing myself for rent day, which is to-morrow, I am short of many pounds."

"Indeed?" said Dick, thoughtfully.

"Yes," said the farmer. "And the worst of it is, I have mortgaged my property to one who covets it for himself. Any failure of payment on my part will cause utter ruin—we shall be driven forth quite destitute. I am convinced he would show no pity. Hitherto I have managed, in some fashion or other, to meet my engagements; now I see not the remotest prospect of it—nothing but beggary stares us in the face."

"I am sorry," said Dick, "to hear of your misfortunes, and sorry, also, I cannot assist you; otherwise, I would gladly do so. Yet, in return for the kindness you have done me to-night—which is, perhaps, a greater one than you imagine—I am willing to lend you whatever money I have about me, and you can repay me when better times arrive."

The farmer made some faint and feeble protest against receiving money from a stranger, but Dick took not the slightest notice of his words.

It will be remembered that he had not a very large sum about him, yet he counted it out to the last guinea.

"There," he said, "take it and welcome. When I hear that you are in better circumstances I will come back and claim it."

With these words, Dick rose abruptly to his feet, for he saw the basket had been brought.

He picked it up at once, and, unheeding the cries that were made for him to remain, he opened the door and passed out into the darkness.

CHAPTER SIXTY.

THE FARMER'S SON RESOLVES TO DISCOVER DICK TURPIN'S HIDING-PLACE.

No sooner had the door closed behind Dick Turpin than a youth, who had been sitting in a dark corner, rose suddenly, and came to the fire.

He thrust his hand into his pocket and produced a paper, at which he glanced eagerly, spelling it over to himself word by word.

So much absorbed were the rest by the strange incident which had just occurred that they paid no attention to him, nor did he attract their notice until he exclaimed, with loud vehemence:

"I thought so—I thought so. Father, you have let a prize slip through your fingers."

"A prize?" repeated the farmer, gazing at the money in his hand.

"Yes. Don't look at those few paltry guineas. You might have had two thousand and more if we had only been a little quicker. That man who has just left is Dick Turpin, the highwayman—the description is exact. He is hiding somewhere close at hand—that's why he wanted the provisions."

"Well—well," said the farmer, "he behaved liberally enough to me, and in a manner that I imagine few else would, and as he has never done me or mine any harm in his life I wish him none."

"But, father," said the boy, "you have always called me an idle, skulking rascal; now you will find that in point of cleverness I shall be a match for any of you. I have made up my mind to find out where this Dick Turpin is hiding, and I will do it! Don't you know the reward is offered for him alive or dead, and I'll watch my chance, and fetch him down with this. It will be easy enough to say afterwards it was done in self-defence, and no one will trouble themselves to disprove it."

While he spoke, this hopeful son, whose disposition, being so foreign to that of his parents, had caused continual unhappiness, stepped up on to a chair, and reached down from over the mantelpiece a large double-barrelled horse pistol, which all knew well enough was constantly kept carefully loaded.

"Well, Jack," said the farmer, "you are joking sure? Have you no sense of gratitude or humanity left? Didn't that man do for us all he could? and yet you would go out and murder him!"

"You're a fool, father," said Jack, as he bounded towards the door, "and you'd better be civil if you want to make a friend of me. Your troubles have all been brought upon you by soft-heartedness, and serve you right! When I have got the money I fancy you will alter your tone towards me."

"No—no, Jack, never—never! Nothing would tempt me to touch one farthing of money so obtained!"

"Then there would be the more for me," said Jack, putting on his hat preparatory to leaving the farmhouse.

But the farmer rose quickly to his feet, and said:

"Jack, you have always set me at defiance, but now I will use my authority—I will be minded!"

"Catch me if you can!" was the response. "I'm off, and when I come back I shall be worth more than two thousand pounds! I will find him if it takes me a month; he cannot be far away."

With these words, Jack, having flung open the door, bounded out, and was in a moment lost to view in the darkness.

The farmer and his family gathered around the threshold in a dense throng.

They appealed to the boy to return, their voices going into one chorus, but the sounds were borne away upon the wind, and left unheeded.

"It is useless," said the old man. "He has gone, and all the harm that I wish him is, that he may fail in his villanous design. For my own part, I will take good care he never stands beneath my roof again."

And if to show practically how firm he was in this determination, the farmer shut the door, and closely barricaded it.

Of all this, of course, Dick Turpin was quite ignorant, otherwise he might not have stepped across the field in so confident a manner as he did.

All the way back to the quarry he was indeed congratulating himself upon the fortunate turn affairs had taken.

He considered that by promptly rendering up his purse he had secured the gratitude of the farmer and his family, and that if by any chance they found out who he was that they would not betray him.

The darkness of the night was such that Dick had some little difficulty in finding his way back to the quarry, therefore it is no wonder that Jack should see nothing of him.

Most certainly, however, was this ungovernable boy a foe to be dreaded.

With rapid strides, Dick descended the pathway, and no sooner did he reach the bottom than he heard a faint, low neigh.

Directly afterwards, despite the darkness, he perceived Black Bess standing close to him.

She uttered again a neighing sound, which almost resembled a cry of distress.

Then, turning round, she led the way across the quarry.

Dick followed her with a foreboding heart.

He feared some evil had befallen Maud.

Reaching, at length, the spot where he had left her, his presentiments were verified, for he found she was lying upon the ground in a state of total insensibility—so total that it seemed like death itself.

With much difficulty, Dick restored her.

Her joy was great at finding he had returned in safety—so great that another relapse seemed imminent.

Dick, knowing full well what had produced her swoon, persuaded her to eat, and in a short time he soon perceived that she was better.

The remainder of the night passed away devoid of another incident.

But when the morning came, both Dick and Maud looked around them with more contented eyes than they had done hitherto.

The supply of provisions Dick had brought was not large, yet they fancied by care they would be able to make it last during their stay in this place.

That day, too, and the night which followed it, passed away without any kind of interruption whatever.

On the next morning, soon after daylight, Maud uttered a faint cry of alarm.

Dick turned in the direction she pointed out, and saw, near the top of the zigzag path, the form of a youth, who carried something carefully in his hand, but what it was they could not from that distance make out.

"Another visitor," said Dick, who little guessed who it was or what was his errand. "Well, no matter, Maud, if he brings no one with him all will be well."

"He seems alone."

"He does; and what can be his motive for coming here passes my comprehension."

As the reader will guess, this was no other than the farmer's son, Jack, who had passed the time which had elapsed since we saw him last in searching carefully all around.

The country for miles about was well known to him, and there were many places that he knew of well calculated to serve as hiding-places.

These he had visited first, for, oddly enough, the quarry never once occurred to him.

When, however, he recollected the existence of this place, he felt a conviction that he was at last on the right track, and still carrying the huge holster pistol, he made his way towards it.

He had almost shrank from making a descent into the gloomy recesses of this place, and even now, when he had so strong a motive to urge him on, he hesitated.

This was not surprising, for it required no ordinary amount of nerve and coolness to attempt to walk down so narrow and slippery a path.

Growing stronger in resolution, however, he at length began to descend.

Dick watched him as he came lower and lower, still looking more like a tiny puppet than a human being.

All at once, a shriek escaped Maud's lips, drowned by the loud, hoarse shriek that Dick gave utterance to.

From some cause or other—who could tell what?—the boy Jack in his descent had lost his footing.

Whether it was that he was seized by sudden vertigo, or whether his foot slipped upon the treacherous moss which overgrew the rockwork, they could not tell. Certain it is that, after a frantic but vain attempt to retain his balance, he plunged headlong into the depths of the quarry.

In his fall, he struck from time to time against the many rough projections, and each time with a dull, sickening sound, perfectly audible to Maud and Dick.

Finally, he dropped into a stunted tree, where he remained for a second or two, then fell heavily to the earth.

Dick at once rushed forward to his assistance, though he feared no human aid could avail him.

He expected, indeed, to find nothing but a mangled, shattered corpse.

What was his surprise, then, to hear a faint, deep groan?

This caused him to increase his pace; but when he saw the fearful object lying among the rocks he felt that it would indeed have been a mercy had death come upon him earlier.

Consciousness had not left the unhappy wretch.

Although he had struck so many times upon the rocks, yet the only effect of this was to bruise and lacerate his flesh, and the continual bounding from point to point broke the full force of the fall.

Had he remained among the branches of the tree it is possible that he might have recovered from his hurts.

That last fall on to the mass of broken stones, whereon he lay, had wrought fearful injury.

"My poor lad," said Dick, compassionately, "what can I do to aid you?"

With a painful movement, the boy's face was turned towards him.

No sooner did he catch sight of Dick's countenance than he uttered a cry of despair.

"Curses on my luck!" he said. "I have found you at last; but the discovery is no good—it comes too late!"

"Found me?" repeated Dick, recoiling in astonishment.

"Yes!" said the boy, suddenly and painfully raising himself. "And take that—it will at least be a satisfaction to me!"

While speaking, he suddenly raised a pistol, to which, during his fall, he had clung with a grasp like that of death.

With the speed of thought, he placed it on full cock and pulled the trigger.

No explosion followed, however, for the powder had been shaken out of the pan.

He dropped the weapon with a curse.

Then, with an awful shriek that seemed to pierce through and through Dick Turpin's brain, the wretched lad threw up his arms and fell backwards on the stones quite dead.

CHAPTER CMLXI.

DICK TURPIN FINDS HIMSELF THREATENED WITH A FRESH DANGER.

"ANOTHER tragedy!" Dick murmured, as soon as he had satisfied himself that life was really extinct. "How strange too!" he added. "He was evidently in pursuit of me, yet surely never so mad as to dream of effecting my capture single-handed?"

A fragment of paper was protruding from one of the pockets of the dead youth, and Dick, impelled by a curiosity which he did not attempt to resist, stooped down and possessed himself of it. Spreading it open, he then found that it was one of the bills offering a reward for himself and his comrades, accompanied by a full description of the appearance of each.

"He was dazzled by the hope of obtaining so large a sum," Dick muttered. "Well, all is over with him now, and I imagine I have little to fear from anyone else. If he had confided his secret to anyone he would not have visited this place alone. Why he should seek for me here baffles me completely."

This might well seem mysterious to Dick, who did not notice Jack while in the farm-house, yet when he came to ponder upon the circumstance, he came without much difficulty to the conclusion that he must be some member of the farmer's family.

Long and anxious was the consultation that took place between Maud and himself upon the subject.

Maud was for quitting the quarry at once, but Dick lingered.

He felt somehow that while there he was safe, and that if he attempted to find any other place of shelter he would only run into greater danger.

The event proved that he was right.

Time passed on very slowly and very wearily for them, but it did pass, and at length the morning of the last day dawned.

"Only a few hours more, Maud," said Dick, "and we shall quit this place, where we have remained unmolested rupted so long—only a few hours. And I trust that the others have been as fortunate as ourselves."

Dick had long made every preparation for starting, and so he had nothing else to do but to sit down idly and wait for the coming of night.

Under these circumstances, this one day seemed positively longer than all the rest of the time which had preceded it.

To them, it appeared as if night would never come.

At last the sun sank, and so great was Dick's impatience to depart that he could scarcely control himself so far as to wait until dusk had overspread the earth.

The fate of the farmer's son was to them a caution and a warning as to the manner in which they made the ascent.

For himself, Dick felt little apprehension; all his fears were centred in Maud.

She, however, feeling how much depended on her own coolness, tried her best to retain her calmness of mind, and so by this means the ascent was at length accomplished.

On gaining the level ground once more, both gave a long, deep-drawn sigh of relief.

After that, Dick's spirits seemed to return to him in a wonderful manner.

"Come, Maud," he cried, "all is well now: and look, Black Bess is as impatient as we are for a gallop! We are a long way from Hampstead, but not so far but that we shall reach it long before the appointed time. No matter, I could wait better there than elsewhere."

Carefully considering his whereabouts, Dick determined on the direction he ought to take.

Then, placing Maud on the back of Black Bess, he mounted also, and, despite her double burden, the bonny mare set forward at a speed that few steeds could equal.

When Dick felt himself in his accustomed place, and found that he was getting over the ground in such gallant style, his heart throbbed with joy, and he experienced that elation of spirits that can scarcely be produced by anything else than a good ride on horseback.

He seemed at once to throw off all his cares and fears, and his manner had a proportionately cheering effect upon his companion.

He looked on all objects with hopeful eyes.

The darkness rapidly increased; but he trusted entirely to the sagacity of Black Bess to keep clear of all obstacles lying in her path, and therefore made no attempt to restrain her progress.

Under these circumstances, the rough, open country was passed over rapidly in perfect safety; but had Dick taken the management of the reins entirely into his own hands the chances are a thousand to one that he would not have guided her so far without accident.

This he had learned by long experience, and therefore felt none of that timidity which would naturally oppress anyone in a similar situation.

At last he paused near a large white gate, on the other side of which could be seen the smooth high-road.

He listened for some moments, but not the faintest sound was carried to his ears.

"I have a good mind to risk it," he muttered.

"Risk what?" was Maud's anxious inquiry.

"Why, a gallop along the high-road. It will not fatigue Black Bess half so much as the heavy ground she will otherwise have to pass over, and of late, you must know, her food has been none of the best."

"Use your own judgment," answered Maud. "You ought to know far better than I what to do under such circumstances."

"Then we will try the road," said Dick, decidedly. "You must remember that the hour is very early yet—too soon almost for the officers to expect to find us abroad; no doubt they will be off their guard."

With these words Dick slipped down and unfastened the gate.

He held it open to allow Black Bess to pass through, then secured it again by means of the chain attached to the gate-post.

Once more he mounted, and Black Bess, with a neigh of satisfaction, resumed her former speed, and it was soon manifest that she galloped now with much less exertion.

Fortunately the road was deserted, and this circumstance, strange as it may seem now, was then nothing to be wondered at, for so unsafe were all the highways, and so liable were all passengers to be interrupted by the police officers, that none save those who were compelled by pressing circumstances ventured to travel in the darkness.

Suddenly, however, Dick paused.

He brought Black Bess completely to a standstill, then bent forward and listened.

"What is it?" Maud asked.

"Hush—hush!"

Dick listened for a few seconds, then replied:

"Horsemen are on the road before us—a long way it is true, yet they are approaching, and ere long shall meet."

"But there will be danger then."

"No doubt there will—great danger, for the probility is that these horsemen are police officers."

Maud looked terrified.

"Don't be alarmed," said Dick—"all is well now that we have timely notice of their approach."

"But what shall you do?"

"Seek out a shelter. If we can hide ourselves somewhere, the officers will pass by, and then we can resume our journey."

Dick looked around him while he spoke.

The most noticable object in the landscape was a picturesque-looking little village church, and on this his attention at once settled.

"There is the place," he said—"there!"

"That church?" she echoed, in some surprise.

"Yes. Having no suspicions of our presence here, the officers will never dream of looking for us there. Quick—in a few moments we shall be out of sight."

Dick had satisfied himself that there was no one at hand to observe his movements, and so he made his way at once in a direct line to the church.

The piece of ground surrounding it was bounded by a low stone wall—so low that anyone could with ease have surmounted it, and Dick knew that Black Bess would clear it easily.

She faced the obstacle, and then gave one bound into the air and alighted upon the soft earth in the graveyard.

"Quick—quick," Dick cried—"on—on! I can hear the officers more plainly now, and we must be out of sight before they come much nearer!"

Black Bess picked her way among the tombstones, and at last reached the huge overhanging porch of the church.

Dick dismounted and assisted Maud to alight, then taking Black Bess by the bridle he led her fairly into the porch, and stood with her close to the church door.

A very deep gloom prevailed about this spot, so dark indeed were the shadows cast, that Dick felt perfectly certain that although the church was near the roadway no eye could possibly detect him.

Nevertheless, both Maud and himself listened with a certain amount of anxiety to the clatter of the horses' hoofs, which increased in loudness at every second.

On the horsemen came at a slashing pace.

They we not visible, being concealed from view by a tall, thickly-planted hedge.

"Another moment," Dick whispered, "and they will have passed."

Scarcely had he uttered the words than he was sensible that the whole troop had slackened pace, and then immediately afterwards they all drew up their horses in front of the rustic wooden gate opening from the high-road into the churchyard.

Maud could scarcely suppress a shriek, but clinging tightly to Dick's arm, she whispered, with white lips:

"Surely—surely, Dick, they have not seen us enter this place! If they have, what is to be done?"

CHAPTER CMLXII.

RELATES HOW THE POLICE OFFICERS MADE TOM KING A PRISONER, AND DESCRIBES THE MEANS THEY ADOPTED TO KEEP HIM SECURE.

It is necessary now that we should go back and describe the incidents that befel Tom King, for, as the reader will remember, he was left in a very ticklish situation.

Above him was the sky, on three sides of him stone walls, so high as to be insurmountable, and in front a dense throng of police officers, who completely choked up the roadway.

A cry of gratified surprise and triumph escaped their lips as soon as they came round the bend of the lane and saw the fugitive standing at bay, with all retreat cut off.

They pulled up in some confusion; but in the twinkling of an eye a pistol appeared in every hand.

It was the greatest wonder in the world that these officers did not save themselves all further trouble by simultaneously firing a volley at the highwayman as he sat so calmly before them.

The reward offered was the same whether the prisoner was captured alive or dead.

Had the officers belonged to London, or had been any of those who had been put to so much trouble by the highwaymen, there is no doubt that Tom's career would have been here cut short.

But this was their first adventure of the kind.

They came from a neighboring town, and had great confidence in their own powers.

Instead, therefore, of shooting Tom down like a dog, one of them, who seemed to hold command of the rest, cried out:

"The game's up now—the race is at an end! Give in quietly, and I will take care that you are not hurt."

No. 200 will be Published next Thursday.

To this pacific speech Tom only replied by raising his pistols.

"I hold the lives of two men here," he said, in a calm voice, "and I warn you, if you do not allow me to pass by unmolested, I will discharge both my weapons, and do my best to cut a way through you."

"Pooh—pooh!" said the officer who had before spoken—"none of that nonsense! If you are not a natural born fool you must know I have only to say the word, and a volley from these pistols will bring you to the ground; not that I want to have your blood upon my hands. I shall be content by capturing you, and handing you over to the proper authorities."

Tom saw at once that this was a dogged, determined man, and could not be dealt with in any ordinary fashion.

Lowering the muzzles of his pistols, he said:

"But if I surrender, what guarantee have I that you will use me fairly?"

"Whatever guarantee you like. I have heard of you before, and if you will give me your solemn word not to attempt to escape I will not handcuff you, or confine your limbs in any way."

"I shall give no such promise as that, rely upon it."

"Then I must take all the precautions I can to keep you safe. Now, then, make your choice. You must know that you are wholly in our power, so which will you choose—death or capture?"

"Capture," answered Tom, at once, across whose fertile brain a plan of escape had flashed—"capture, of course, for then I do stand a chance of my life."

"Well, so you may," answered the officer; "but you will not escape from us—I'll wager my head you won't! But come, you shall not say I have not dealt reasonably with you, so decide. Will you surrender quietly and easily, or shall we use force? We are ten to one, so what could you do on your own behalf?"

"Nothing," said Tom, assuming a more dejected air than he felt. "I give in."

It was plain to see that this was just the answer the officer wanted.

"Very good," he said. "Just give me your pistols, and you must not refuse to submit to any measures that I may take in order to keep you in safety. If you do, it will be quite in vain. Now, then," he added, addressing his men, "get the rope ready, and two of you pull out the largest plank of wood that you can find in yonder fence."

He pointed along the lane while he spoke.

Two men darted off to obey this command, leaving Tom filled with wonder as to what they intended to do with a plank.

"Aha!" said the officer, rubbing his hands gleefully, "those London fellows have made a great fuss, but I fancy we have done them nicely after all! How mortified they will feel! Ah, it's good! It's an honor to all of us!"

The police officers looked vastly pleased, and then immediately afterwards the two men appeared, carrying with them a piece of oak planking of tolerable size.

"The very thing," said the officer—"it could not be better. Now then, Tom, dismount."

Tom complied, but rather reluctantly.

He almost regretted that he had chosen his present course, and wished that he had run the risk of breaking a way through the officers' ranks.

Now he came to look at the men, he fancied it might have been done.

He was still more in this frame of mind when he found himself suddenly seized by powerful hands, and, in spite of the resistance and struggles that he made, was bound round with ropes, and tied very securely with his back on to the plank.

Most especially were they careful to secure his hands and feet, and as they outnumbered him to such an extent they had little difficulty in doing so.

At length, when their work was completed, the men stood aside in order to allow their chief to take a look at what they had done.

His eyes grew bright with triumphant joy.

"That's the ticket! Tom, my boy," he said, addressing his captive, "how do you feel now?—not very comfortable, I should think, and by no means sanguine of making an escape! An escape? Aha! I fancy you or anyone else getting out of Joe Blogden's clutches! I don't mind telling you my plans, Mr. Tom, I feel so sure of keeping you safe. I mean to carry you all the way from here to Newgate just in the position you now are, and no pretext of yours, no matter how good, shall induce me to loosen one of the ropes. There, now, what do you think of that?"

Tom's heart failed him, for he felt that his chance of escaping was so slight as to be scarcely a chance at all.

Yet he would not allow the officers to perceive what was the true state of his mind, so, in as off-handed a tone as he was able to assume, he cried:

"You're not such a bad fellow after all, Mr. Blogden, and I'll do you a good turn one of these days."

"Aha," said the chief officer, "I am sadly afraid that you will take a turn rather sooner than you expect or desire, by-the-way."

The officers all laughed in chorus.

Tom knew this was intended as a joke upon his being turned off at Tyburn, but he would not understand it so, and replied:

"Yes—I shall take a turn for the better, and, rely upon it, I shall owe you no ill will at all. You have done your duty as pleasantly as a man could."

The officer made a mock bow.

"But," said Tom, "I'll wager you any amount you like that, in spite of all your care and pains, I shall give you the slip before we are half-way to London!"

"Well—well, we shall see," said Blogden, pleasantly. "I am not at all alarmed, and so I give you free leave to try your best."

Then turning round to his men, he said:

"Come—come, we have all the rest of the day before us for our little enterprise, and if we stick to it we shall manage to reach London late to-night."

"But what do you wish us to do, Mr. Blogden?"

"Why, four of you will dismount, and lift that plank on to your shoulders, and carry the prisoner in that manner. Your horses will be taken care of in the meanwhile, and when you have gone a certain distance you shall be relieved, and four others will take your places."

It was evident that the men scarcely liked the idea of this march to London, and Tom King noticed the effect with a great amount of satisfaction.

Already his brain was busy with devising a means by which he hoped to regain his freedom.

His reflections were somewhat disturbed by the officers coming to him and raising the plank in the air.

They were by no means so careful in doing this as they might have been, and even when the corners of the plank were carefully settled upon their shoulders, Tom King found it about as unpleasant a mode of conveyance as could have been thought of.

Mr. Blogden was in the highest possible spirits.

He rode along by the side of the prisoner, and as he drew his cutlass and placed it against his shoulder, he made quite an imposing appearance.

One turn of the rope had gone quite across Tom's throat, and was secured underneath the plank, which compelled him to keep his head in a very uncomfortable position, for if he tried to raise or move it in the least the pressure on his throat became so great as to render breathing impossible.

"I am helpless enough now," he thought. "I wonder what is to be the end of it?"

As they journeyed on, and turned from the lane to the high-road, a fresh danger occurred to Tom's mind, which diminished his chances of escaping most materially.

Indeed his courage failed him when he thought of it.

Before these officers could go far, they would, beyond little doubt, meet with some others, who would join them at once, and then, with the number of his guard doubled, or very likely trebled, how was Tom to slip away from so many watchful eyes?

A cold, clammy feeling came over his heart; but in a few moments it passed away, leaving behind it a much better kind of feeling.

This was a determination to watch carefully for the very first opportunity that presented itself for him to make his escape.

Somewhat to his surprise, they travelled on along the highway without meeting with a single person; but, then, the hour was early—just after sunrise in fact, and at that hour it was not likely many people would be abroad.

The first four officers carried their burden well; but at length they grew too tired to proceed further so four others took their places.

In this way they journeyed on at what was, taking all things into consideration, a very tolerable rate of speed.

Their first halt was made at a road-side inn, a little after eight o'clock in the morning.

This inn had somewhat a lonely situation, for neither human beings nor dwellings could be traced in its vicinity, for it seemed as though it depended altogether upon passers-by for custom.

Upon seeing so strange a procession approaching, every inmate of the place turned out at once into the roadway to catch a glimpse of it, and as they viewed it from the distance many and various were the speculations indulged in by them as to the nature of the object the officers were carrying.

When it was found to be a man, they concluded at once that he was dead.

Great, therefore, was their surprise when the officers, stopping in front of the building, put down their burden and they discovered it was a live man, securely bound with cords.

The plank was placed in a rather slanting position against the tall, massive sign-post which stood in front of the inn.

The position was a very uncomfortable one for Tom King, yet he felt grateful for the change.

It was irksome to remain for so long in a horizontal position.

Moreover, as the officers walked along with irregular steps, his head continually went bump, bump upon the hard wood.

He was well aware that expostulation on the subject would be quite in vain, and therefore said not a word, contenting himself with catching an occasional glimpse of the countenance of the chief officer, Joe Blogden.

He had noticed, as they journeyed on, that the expression of his features had gradually undergone a great and remarkable change.

That aspect of joviality which he had at first worn quite disappeared.

His forehead was furrowed up into reflective wrinkles, his mouth worked as though he was perpetually saying something to himself, and his eyes shone with a bright and peculiar glitter.

What could be passing through his mind Tom had not the remotest idea, nor did the officer drop one hint that served him as a clue.

The apprehensions and curiosity of the dwellers at the inn were quickly put an end to by a statement made by the officers to the effect that they had just been successful in capturing the notorious highwayman, Tom King, and that they had adopted the means they saw for keeping him in safe custody.

The officers were then highly complimented upon the ingenuity they had displayed.

Although pressingly invited by the landlord to enter the inn, they declined to do so, but had a loaf and a huge piece of cheese brought outside, together with some ale, and on this they regaled themselves in the open air.

Tom felt that one draught of the ale would be a most wonderful refresher, but scorned to ask his captors for even so small a favor as that.

Joe Blogden was not, however, a very ill-natured sort of officer, and therefore, when his own wants were supplied, he turned his thoughts towards the prisoner.

"Don't look so down, Tom!" he exclaimed, smacking his lips after the last draught of ale. "You seem quite rueful! What do you say to a drop of this old October? Upon my life, it's the best I ever tasted."

"It would be very welcome indeed," answered Tom; "and if you will put your hand to my waistcoat pocket you will find a guinea there. I am sorry to give you so much trouble," he added, with a smile, "but I cannot help it."

"You mean you cannot help yourself," said Blogden, coming towards him.

"Just as you like. But with that guinea, suppose you order a drop more ale all round, and let me have a mouthful of it, for I assure you I am choked with the dust."

Joe Blogden loved a drop of ale, and he had not sufficient command over himself to resist indulging himself in it whenever he had the opportunity; and as for the rest of the officers, Tom readily believed they were nothing loath.

But for this love of liquor, Joe Blogden might have asked himself the question as to how far it was expedient to supply ale to his men.

If his suspicions had been on the alert as they ought to have been, he would have perceived in this offer of Tom King's the first move towards an ultimate attempt at escape.

He did not, however, but with a loud voice called for more ale all round, insisting that Tom should drink a whole quart of it, and declaring that he, Tom King, was the very best fellow in the world.

Presently the ale was brought.

Then Joe Blogden, taking a large foaming measure full, walked towards Tom King and put it to his lips.

"There," he said, "drink away, old fellow—it will do you good."

Tom did drink, and that right heartily; but he did not finish the measure.

Some little time was occupied in discussing this second supply of ale, but at last Joe Blogden gave the order to mount.

Ere doing so, however, he turned towards his prisoner and thus addressed him:

"Tom King, old fellow," he said, "you are one of a good sort, and the more I see of you the better I like you, and that's what makes me repeat the offer that you refused a little time ago."

"What offer was that?" asked Tom.

"Why, you must be aware," continued Blogden, "that while you are tied to that plank and watched by us, you cannot possibly stand a ghost of a chance of escaping, therefore is it not a pity that you should suffer so much discomfort and inconvenience? Now, as I said before, if you will give me your word to make no attempt to escape, you may mount your own horse and trot comfortably by the side of us."

CHAPTER CMLXIII.

TOM KING IS FRUSTRATED IN HIS EFFORT TO ESCAPE.

"I SHOULD be very glad indeed to change places," said Tom King; "the back of my horse would be much more comfortable than this board; but you must not ask me to give you any such promise, because you may depend that I shall take the first opportunity I can find to get away."

"Then stay where you are, and be d—d to you!" replied Blogden, angry that this considerate offer should be refused.

"Don't lose your temper," said Tom. "I am all right, and if you will let me get on the back of my horse, I shall be much obliged to you."

"No," said Blogden, in a sharp, angry voice—"you have made your decision, and you shall abide by it! While you are there I know you are safe, and shall not trouble myself about anything else but keeping you so."

Now the cause of Joe Blogden's anger was that Tom should refuse to mount his steed under the conditions named because, had he consented, much fatigue and dissatisfaction would have been saved his men, and, moreover, the journey to London would have been performed in about one-fourth of the time it must necessarily occupy under the present condition of affairs.

Like a wise man, however, he resolved to say no more upon this subject, but, having seen his men mounted, except those who were appointed to carry the plank, he turned towards the landlord of the inn, and said:

"We are anxious to get to London. Which do you consider the best and shortest road?"

"Well, I can't say," was the landlord's reply. "I can tell you which is the best, and I can tell you which is the shortest."

"Well—well," said the officer, "that's what I mean—the shortest is sure to be the best."

"I don't know about that," responded the landlord,

"for you must understand that if you follow this highway for about eighteen or twenty miles, it will bring you out upon the London Road, which it crosses. You will then only have to turn to your right, and your destination lies before you. And the road is as good every inch of the way as it is about here, so you cannot deny but what it is the best route."

"Yes, so it is," said Blogden, "only it is such a confounded long way. Yonder is the direction to London. Is there no road by which we could take our way across the country, and so cut off that tremendous corner? It's quite out of our way to ride straight on for ten miles and then turn round."

"Well, there is a road," said the landlord, "and that's the shortest; but, understand me very distinctly, it is by no means the best."

"What's the matter with it?"

"Well, then, it's a cross-country road, and I daresay you know what that means. In some parts it is broad and level, and as good as this, but in others so narrow that only about two of you could ride abreast, and with the mud so deep that it will take those who are walking up to their knees."

"Pooh—pooh!" said Blogden, "not after such a season of dry weather as we have had! The road may be muddy, but it is not so bad as you would make it."

"Well," said the landlord, rather huffed, "perhaps you know best."

"Well, but how much shorter is this road?" persisted Blogden. "If we go that way, how many miles shall we save? That's the point I wish to arrive at."

"Well," replied the landlord, "the road is not very direct—it winds and curves about a great deal, but yet I should say you would save ten or a dozen miles."

"Half a day's journey!" ejaculated the officer, in astonishment, for he did not expect that the difference would prove to be so great. "Why, that's the road for us, by all means, even though it should not be quite so comfortable underfoot as this."

"You ought to be the best judge of that," answered the landlord; "but if I had a good nag before me, I know which one I should prefer."

"No doubt," said the officer. "But just tell me whereabouts this road branches off?"

"About three-quarters of a mile further on. You will see an old finger-post up there, which shows you the way. The entrance is dark and narrow, but after you have gone a little way you will find it wider and the ground much improved."

"Thanks!" said Blogden. "That's the way for me, and for you too, my lads! I should think you are not so fond of walking that you prefer to go a dozen miles further round."

The officers assented at once.

"Well, then, as we are all ready," cried Blogden, "we will start. Good-bye!"

With these words he mounted his horse, drew his cutlass again, and assumed the same attitude as before.

He looked very sulkily and angrily at Tom King, and so did the men, for he was considered to be the cause of the present arrangement.

However, the cavalcade set off without any grumbling being heard.

The cross-road was found with an old battered finger-post at the corner of it, just as the landlord had described.

But the entrance was dark and narrow, and, after going a few feet down it, they came to a kind of slough or quagmire caused by the waters of a rivulet that flowed across the road, but which at the present time was almost dried up, leaving its soft, oozy bed exposed.

Through this the officers with difficulty floundered, and when they emerged on the other side the boots of those who were on foot presented a very dirty, disagreeable appearance, for the mud was green and slimy.

However, they marched onward, hoping ere long to reach an improved part of the road.

Here again the landlord proved to be right.

Without the occurrence of any particular event, they continued their slow march.

Tom King began to feel his head ache terribly, owing to the number of bumps it had from the hard plank.

This might, too, be partly ascribed to the ale of which he had partaken, and if so he felt content, for he judged it would not be without its effect upon his captors, no matter how well seasoned their stomachs might be.

Of course, his mind was still intent upon making his escape, though how this was to be effected he could not at present decide.

When changing bearers, the officers generally paused for a few minutes, placing him, or, rather, the plank, up against a tree, or fence, or whatever might come nearest to hand; and for these brief periods of rest Tom was inexpressibly grateful.

He was chiefly occupied on these occasions in watching the countenance of Joe Blogden, which had again changed, and now presented that peculiar, hungry, anxious look that he had before observed upon it, only that this aspect seemed intensified.

There was one question, however, which Blogden and the officers recollected they had omitted to ask the landlord, and this was, what inns they should meet with upon this road, and how far they were apart.

Now there seemed to be no chance of obtaining this knowledge, for they had not met with or seen a single human being of any description; and it did not appear as though this cross-road was much travelled, for, as a rule, it was overgrown with grass.

In fact, Blogden began to think that, after all, in his anxiety to save distance he had made a great mistake, and heartily wished that he had taken the landlord's advice and proceeded by means of the high-road.

It was too late for this now, and therefore useless to regret, so he continued to urge his men onward, whose grumblings now began to make themselves heard, and which quickly increased in loudness.

The hour of noon approached, and when it came, the officers found themselves still upon the cross-road, and to all appearances no nearer to an inn than they had been for many a mile.

So weary did they become that Blogden was compelled to allow them to pause.

Tom King was put down, and the officers rested themselves by sitting on the grassy embankment upon which the hedgerow was planted.

"I'll tell you what I'll do," said Blogden, addressing them. "I don't want to remain idly here, so I'll leave the prisoner to your charge while I gallop onward for a few miles and ascertain whether there is a public-house anywhere close at hand."

To this proposal the officers raised not the faintest objection, and accordingly Blogden sheathed his cutlass, struck spurs to his horse's side, and was quickly out of sight.

Now Tom King could not help considering this a favorable opportunity, and yet he was unable to see by what means he could avail himself of it.

He had satisfied himself by repeated trials that the ropes were so firmly tied about him that it was quite out of the question for him to unfasten them without the aid of another person.

He was forced to admit that he was perfectly helpless and powerless, and that all his captors had to do to keep him secure was to fix their eyes upon him from time to time.

Yet he did not despair, and his brain was busily at work devising schemes, when all at once he heard the clatter of a horse's feet, and, looking up, saw Blogden returning with satisfaction beaming from his countenance.

"Up with him again, my lads," he said—"put your shoulders to it; there's a capital inn not much further along the road, where we shall be able to make ourselves comfortable for a little while. I have ordered something good to be prepared, so that it will be nearly ready by the time you arrive."

These words had a very inspiriting effect indeed upon the police officers.

They picked up their burden with right good will, and trudged it manfully.

Nevertheless they were all so fatigued that they had to change repeatedly, even in going the short distance that intervened between them and the inn.

At length they came in sight of a poor, wretched-looking dwelling, from the exterior of which a truss of straw was suspended in the place of a sign, and this, indeed, was the only token there was that the house was one of public resort.

A little further on they perceived a place where the cross-road was joined by several others, so that if the inn had not been here they would have been greatly puzzled to know which was the way to London.

In expectation of their arrival they found a small group of persons waiting outside this hut, for it was scarcely deserving of any better appellation, though on coming nearer and looking more attentively at it, it was evident that at some distant period it had been a substantial, good-looking dwelling, but it had been allowed by neglect to fall into its present miserable and dilapidated state.

A scene of considerable confusion now ensued.

The wonder of the landlord, his family, and dependants was extreme.

Never before in their recollection had so strange or exciting an incident occurred at their doors.

After a time, however, the horses were all stowed away in the rambling, broken-down sheds which existed in plenty at the back of the inn.

Tom King was raised a little, and thus was enabled to take a good look at his halting-place.

As he gazed upon it he became conscious that at some time or other he had seen this inn before, but when it was he could not for the life of him make out.

The countenance of the landlord was certainly a strange one to him.

Matters having been so far arranged, the officers again picked up the plank and carried Tom King through the front door, along the passage, and into the large kitchen in which they had agreed to take up their quarters.

This kitchen was at the back of the inn, and commanded a view of the littered, untidy yard in the rear, and the tumble-down stables beyond.

As before, the plank was placed on end, with the top resting against the wall.

"Now, Tom," said Blogden, "I owe you no ill-will, although you refused my offer before, and therefore I renew it. Your limbs must be cramped by remaining so long in one position, and you must be hungry as well; why not give the promise I require, and then you can sit down among us quite comfortable?"

"No," said Tom, "I very much prefer remaining as I am to making the promise you are so anxious to have. But let me tell you all my bones ache; I am cramped from head to foot by being thus tied to the board. Surely it is not asking too much to request you to release some of the bonds, so that my blood may have a chance of circulating."

"No," said Blogden, decidedly, "you will find me immovable. If you will comply with my conditions, well and good; if not, stay as you are; you can make your own choice."

After that Tom was silent.

A tolerable repast was then spread upon the table, and when he caught sight of the various eatables, Tom King experienced the pangs of hunger very sharply.

Yet he resolved to say not a word.

The officers ate voraciously, and drunk in due proportion, the liquor being as before, strong, home-brewed ale.

When the meal was over, the effects of it and of what they had drunk, and of their fatigue, made themselves manifest.

One by one they dropped off into a doze.

Tom watched them anxiously.

It was quite clear that sleep had stolen upon the officers unconsciously.

Every one who had closed his eyes had left the task of watching to the others.

At last Tom King felt that the opportunity he had been looking for, which seemed so far distant, now had come.

Now was the time to make a vigorous effort to escape.

Carefully and yet vigorously he tugged away at the ropes which confined his wrists.

To his joy they slackened a little—a very little, yet enough to endow him with courage and determination.

Time wore on, and the officers still slumbered.

Incredible as the feat may appear, Tom actually succeeded in getting his hands at liberty.

When this was the case he felt that the remainder of his task was comparatively easy.

He went on most vigorously with his work, and so intent and so wrapped up did he become in it that he omitted to glance every few seconds at the countenances of his sleeping captors.

When, however, he at last looked up and saw Joe Blogden's eyes wide open and fixed upon him, he gave quite a nervous start of surprise, and dropped the knot he had been attempting to untie.

"Aha!" said Joe, "so you have given me a taste of your quality, have you? Thank you—I am much obliged to you. Doubtless you thought I was asleep. What a mistake! Why, Tom, I have been watching you all the time; and as you have been so clever and done what I believed to be impossible, I shall know what to expect from you if we are in the least degree neglectful. Ho! wake up there!" he bawled, in a voice that seemed powerful enough to lift the roof off.

The officers awoke instantly and sprang to their feet.

Tom King's desperation and anger knew no bounds.

He was almost free, and this made his disappointment all the more bitter.

He resolved not to submit, however, without a desperate struggle.

In his efforts to extricate himself, however, he pulled the plank over, and fell heavily to the ground.

The next moment, all the officers were upon him, the ropes were again crossed and recrossed over his body in all directions, and, indeed, wherever there was a chance.

At last he found himself much in his old position, except that the ropes were tighter, and caused him greater pain than before.

When all was done, Blogden approached and cautiously examined every knot.

"Now you are right, Tom, my friend," he said—"quite right. If you can get out of that, I give you leave to make your escape. You little thought I had my eyes upon you, but—aha!—catch a weazel asleep, Tom, and then you may stand some chance of finding Joe Blogden napping! Aha!"

The officer was so overjoyed at his own preternatural cleverness that he hardly knew how to restrain himself within proper bounds.

The officers of course laughed heartily, and were vastly amused, but the incident terminating so disappointingly to Tom King was a very good lesson to them, since it taught them the necessity of not relaxing in their vigilance for the future in the least degree.

CHAPTER CMLXIV.

IN WHICH JOE BLOGDEN MAKES A PECULIAR PROPOSITION TO HIS COMPANIONS.

So impressed were the officers with this idea, that for some time after the occurrence of the event just described they did nothing but sit stock still with their eyes fixed upon their prisoner.

Observing this, Tom smothered his anger and disappointment as well as he was able, for he knew that if he allowed it to appear in his face the officers would enjoy it and triumph over him.

At last, when they had calmed down a little, Blogden turned towards them and said:

"Now, my lads, just let me know when you think you will feel rested enough to set out again on your journey. It is a disagreeable job, I know, but still, the sooner it is over the better, and when we once get him to Newgate, all the trouble will be off our hands."

"So it will," murmured the officers; "but we are regularly footsore, Mr. Blogden, and do you know how far it is to the next inn?"

"No, I don't; but that is well thought of—I will call the landlord in, and inquire."

Accordingly this was done.

"Now, landlord," cried Blogden, "just be good enough to listen. How far shall we have to travel before we come to the next inn, on the road to London?"

"Well, sir," was the answer, "I should say a matter of fifteen miles."

"Fifteen miles?" roared Blogden. "What do you mean by that? Curse you for a liar! You only want us to remain here in order that you can make plenty out of us! I suppose it is not every day that a large party stops here?"

"If you know better than I do," said the landlord, "what in the world was the good of asking me the question?"

"We don't know; but how can it be possible that the next inn is so far off?"

"Simply because it happens to be the case," said the landlord, with a grin.

The men looked at each other with a very disconcerted and crestfallen air upon receipt of this intelligence.

A considerable portion of the afternoon had now slipped away, for while in their present quarters time passed much too quickly to suit them.

"Why, we should have to travel all night!" ejaculated Blogden.

"That you would," assented the landlord; "and, moreover, if you found your way in the dark you would be a cleverer lad than I take you to be."

"What do you mean by that?" roared Blogden.

"Just what I say," was the response. "The road is so bad and so hard to find that it would be quite a task for a stranger by daylight, and at night would be altogether out of the question."

"Well, we can't stay here," said Blogden, in a decided voice—"that is perfectly certain. We must start off without much delay. But come, landlord, can't you suggest some means by which we can get to London?"

"Well, now you come to ask my advice," answered the landlord, "of course that's another matter; and besides, I am bound to do the best I can for my customers."

"Well—well?"

"Of course," he began, "your prisoner is the difficulty?"

"Just so."

"Well, then, I will tell you something which may perhaps interest you, and you can act upon the suggestion or not, just as you think proper."

"Go on, then; what is it?"

"Why, this evening, about six or seven o'clock, a carrier's waggon will pass here. I know the driver very well and he always stops to take a jug of beer, and nine times in ten the waggon is empty."

"And you would propose——"

"Simply that you lift your prisoner, plank and all, and put him inside the waggon. Some of you could ride inside with him, and the remainder, surrounding the vehicle, ride on horseback."

"Landlord," said Joe Blogden, in a voice of the utmost enthusiasm and joy, "you're a regular downright good fellow! Your advice is worth a heap of money, so just call for whatever you like to drink, and I will pay for it."

"You're very kind," said the landlord, and he glanced uneasily behind him. "But you must just ask my wife."

At this the officers gave a shout of laughter.

"Ask your wife?" said Blogden. "What for?"

"Why, you see, sir, she has a most unaccountable and unreasonable objection to any of the good things down in the cellar passing between my lips. It's too bad, that it is! She keeps everything under lock and key."

"And that makes you like a drop all the more, eh?"

"Well, perhaps it does."

"Then," said Blogden, "as you have got me out of my difficulty, I will get you out of yours; and, if you like, you can amuse yourself by getting blind drunk to-night, and your wife sha'n't know anything about it until too late."

"Don't speak so loud," said the landlord, who was an inveterate drunkard, and who, if not checked by his very strict, resolute better half, would long ago have drunk up everything they possessed.

"Well, first of all," said Blogden, "tell me what you like best?"

"Brandy."

"Then brandy be it! You shall have as much as you like."

The landlord looked at him incredulously.

"You see, I will call for it as if for myself and companions. Your wife will supply it, and I shall pay her; and you can have the pleasure of drinking until you are tired."

The drunkard's eyes gleamed at this prospect, and he licked his parched lips in eager anticipation.

Blogden was as good as his word.

Brandy was called for and brought in, but the manner in which the landlord poured it down his throat was something he was not prepared for.

When a huge quantity had disappeared, without producing, to all appearances, the least effect, he said:

"I don't wonder, old fellow, that your wife should lock up the cellar. Why, hang me! if the sea was brandy, you'd drink it dry, or die in the attempt."

"All right!" said the landlord, thickly. "A drop more—let's have a drop more."

But Blogden refused, for he wished this man to retain his senses sufficiently to enable him to make the bargain with the waggoner when he arrived.

"Leave us now a little while," said Blogden; "I have a little talk I want to have with my companions. You can come back presently, and then we'll have more brandy."

On these conditions the landlord left the room, and soon afterwards a tremendous commotion ensued.

A shrill voice, accompanied by blows, followed.

The officers winked and laughed at each other.

"She's paying him out for it now," said Blogden. "Well, no matter. You ought all of you to be much obliged to him, for we shall get our prisoner a good way on the road to London without any fatigue at all."

"Yes, it's a capital plan."

This was something Tom King could not help acknowledging, but oh, how he hated the landlord, who had so officiously made this suggestion!

He wished from the very bottom of his heart that he had long since been drowned in one of his ale barrels.

Tom King was, in reality, so disheartened by the failure he had met with that, coming as it did almost in the moment of success, he began in real truth to despair.

Just at this time, it should be mentioned, he looked again into the countenance of Joe Blogden, and was somewhat astonished to perceive that its expression had again changed to its former hungry, rapacious look.

Then, to his unutterable astonishment, he heard the chief officer address his companions as follows:

"My lads," he said, "as we have comfortably settled matters so far, there is something else that I've been thinking of nearly all day that I should like to submit to you, and I believe you will declare at once that it is a capital idea."

The officers crowded round him anxiously, and Blogden continued:

"I want to talk to you about the reward. You know how much it is—five hundred pounds—and we had better settle now beforehand how we intend to divide it, so that there may be no grounds for dissatisfaction in the future."

The men remained silent, but looked at him attentively, wondering what was coming next.

"Five hundred pounds is the amount," said Blogden; "and if you will count, you will find, including myself, there are just ten of us; so, if equally divided, that makes exactly fifty pounds apiece—does it not?"

"It does—you are quite right."

"Well, now, it strikes me that for all our trouble that's a very paltry and inadequate remuneration; so I have a proposal to make by which it can be made better worth our while."

"How so—how so?"

The men were eager, yet scarcely more eager than Tom King, who listened with a truly wonderful amount of interest to this conversation, which was something altogether different to what he had expected to hear.

"Now," said Blogden, "if the chief part of this sum could come to the share of one of us, why, then it would be a very good thing indeed for the lucky individual, and the others would not be so very badly off."

"But we don't understand."

"I will explain," said Blogden, whose fingers and mouth worked convulsively, while his features seemed to grow sharper and sharper. "It can be done in this way: We will draw lots for the prisoner—throw for him—raffle him—or decide it in what way you like. For instance, we all know how to rattle a dice-box—let that way settle it."

"But we don't understand," interrupted the officers.

"You will in a moment. Let us take fifty pounds from the whole amount—that will leave four hundred and fifty, will it not?"

"It will."

"Well, then, let the one who gets the greatest number of points be entitled to receive four hundred and fifty pounds, and let the remaining fifty be equally divided among the rest, by which means you see that there is a certainty of all of you making a very tolerable day's work, and there's the chance of one of us earning something worth our while to receive."

Blogden ceased, and watched, with eyes like those of a vulture, the countenances of his companions.

He was filled with anxiety to know how this would be received.

He was himself an inveterate gamester, and he was aware that those who were with him often passed away an idle hour or two with either cards or dice.

He soon found opinion rather divided amongst them, though it was plain to see there was not one who was not willing to take the chance of securing so large a sum.

"Take a hundred pounds from the chief amount," said one, and let that be equally divided among the losers, and let the principal amount be four hundred pounds instead of four hundred and fifty."

"I have no objection," said Blogden, "if that is more agreeable to you, and should we decide upon it, why, it will be the means of passing the time very pleasantly until the waggon arrives."

For the life of them the men could not resist the temptation to gamble.

They had already become sufficiently votaries of the vice to be infatuated with it, when Blogden cleverly produced from his pocket a dice-box, and dropped a couple of the spotted ivory cubes within it and rattled them.

Whatever scruples or hesitations may have remained in any of their breasts were banished.

Their eyes gleamed wildly with excitement, and they drew their chairs up closely around the table.

"Three throws shall decide it," said Blogden—"three throws each, and if there are any ties, three throws again."

This being agreed to, the dice were thrown for the first time by Blogden himself.

The others followed, and when all were done it was found oddly enough that four had thrown and obtained precisely the same number.

"Then you stand out," said Blogden, in a husky voice. "The matter will soon be decided now."

But again ties were thrown, and Blogden found that the chance rested between himself and the man who had proposed the alteration in the division of the amount.

The box was rattled, the dice thrown, then, with a wild shriek of triumph, Blogden announced himself the victor.

"Mine," he screamed—"mine! The money is mine! The hundred pounds will be divided among you!"

His associates shrunk back, and their countenances assumed a sullen, angry look.

Blogden observed it.

"It's no good grumbling now," he cried, "the bargain is made, and cannot be altered. I hoped that fortune would favor me, yet scarcely dared think it. However, I will behave handsomely to you. We'll have wine all round—that is, if such a thing can be found in the cellars—wine for all of us!"

He rose to go to the bar, and as soon as the door closed behind him his comrades whispered eagerly together for a few seconds.

Then the one who had been so close to winning rose also, and followed Blogden from the room.

What was his errand, Tom King could not guess.

He stretched his ears to the fullest extent in the hope of overhearing what the officers whispered among themselves.

But they spoke in such tones that he was unable to do so.

Nevertheless, he found all these different proceedings very distracting to him, while they annoyed him beyond measure, for he could not help taking notice of all that was going on around, and the events were so strange and varied that they prevented that amount of concentration of ideas necessary for devising some plan of escape.

The officers continued to whisper energetically until Blogden reappeared.

He was followed by the landlady, who was speaking to him in shrill, angry tones.

"I will send down in the cellar for what you want," she said. "But, mark this, not another drop more do you have afterwards! I will take care that you never enter my doors again!"

"I have no wish to return," said Blogden; "but then wine we must and will have! It will soon be seven o'clock, and as soon as the waggon comes up let us know, for we are going by it."

Blogden sat down, and, glancing around, immediately detected the absence of one of his companions.

"Hallo!" he said, "where's Cribbs?"

The officers preserved their countenances tolerably well, and one said, in a tone of indifference:

"He followed you from the room. I thought he would have been back before this."

"Mr. Blogden," said Tom King, "I wish to know how much longer you intend to keep me in this position? My limbs are all so cramped, that I suffer intense pain from head to foot. The circulation of the blood is completely stopped. Surely it is base and ungenerous to treat a prisoner in this manner?"

"It is your own fault," growled Blogden—"quite your own fault! If you had given me your promise you might have taken it easy."

"But that was what I did not feel inclined to do, and which I still refuse."

"Very well, then," said Blogden, "hold your row! You're worth four hundred pounds to me, and I'll take d—d good care that I never lose sight of you until you are safely under the roof of Newgate!"

"We shall see," said Tom King, quietly. "I believe there is such a thing as people being too clever."

"Aha! no doubt," chuckled Blogden—"no doubt—no doubt!"

It was while this conversation was going on between the leader of the officers and the prisoner, that the man who had been called Cribbs returned, and slipped quietly into his seat, exchanging, as he did so, a glance of peculiar intelligence with his comrades, unseen, of course, by Blogden, who had his back turned towards them.

CHAPTER CMLXV.

AFFAIRS AT THE INN TAKE A MOST EXTRAORDINARY AND UNEXPECTED TURN.

Directly afterwards the door of the room was thrown open by the landlady, who stood on one side in order to allow some one else to enter.

Being interested in everything that took place, Tom King languidly turned his eyes in this direction. He would have turned his head, but this was impossible, owing to the tightness of his bonds.

Then he saw enter the room a person he had not yet seen at the inn.

This man was dressed half like an ostler, half like a general servant, and in front of him he carried a kind of tray, on which several bottles of wine were laid.

Directly Tom King caught sight of this man's face he felt perfectly sure that he had seen him somewhere before, but in what place, or under what conditions, his brain was then too much harrassed and perplexed to allow him to remember.

"Here you are, gentlemen," he said, as he set the tray down on the table. "Prime, this 'ere is, and no mistake! I ought to know, 'cause I've fetched it out of the cellars."

"Then," said Blogden, who was inclined to be particularly liberal, "as you are a decent sort of a chap, I don't mind asking you to join us in a glass."

"Well, sir, I don't know as I should mind; but——"

"Jack," said his mistress, in her usual shrill, angry tones, "do you know what you are saying? Do you know I am here? Leave the room this moment!"

Very much in the manner of a kicked cur, Jack sneaked out of the room.

The landlady stalked after him, and closed the door.

"There's a nice better half for a man to have!" said Blogden. "Thank goodness she's not Mrs. B! Now, then, my lads," he said, "we'll drink this nice little drop of wine. You see I have ordered a bottle a-piece for us, and then we shall be in good trim for our journey."

It is worthy of remark that, no sooner were these words spoken than the officers all sprang to their feet, and each one seized hold of a bottle, leaving one on the tray, which, of course, fell to Blogden's share.

Tom King thought this circumstance peculiar; but Blogden evidently took no notice of it, for he picked up the bottle, and taking the corkscrow that was beside it, quickly tapped it.

"Now, my lads," he said, "follow my example. We must manage to get through this little business before the waggon comes. I am told we may expect it here in rather more than half an hour."

The other officers willingly enough drew forth the corks, then each simultaneously, or nearly so, poured himself out a glass.

"A toast," said Blogden—"a toast. Here's good luck to the winner!"

The glasses were drained.

The officers exchanged glances.

"Upon my word," said Blogden, "it's good! It's many a day since I tasted wine, or you either, very likely. I should take this to be a good old sort. It tastes as though it had been down in the cellar a very long while."

The glasses were quickly filled and emptied, then, for the third time, the wine was poured out, but on this occasion the glasses were allowed to stand before them on the table.

"It's d—d odd," said Blogden, after a pause, "but I can't think what's the matter with my head. That must be uncommonly strong wine, or else it's mixed with the ale. Ah! that's it—a mixture don't agree."

He carried his hand to his forehead while he spoke.

The other officers seemed to be to a considerable extent under the influence of the wine, for they one and all complained of the feeling they had in their heads.

It was rather odd, but every one placed his hand to his forehead, and then, leaning forward, allowed his elbow to rest on the table, so that they were all very nearly in the same position.

Some time elapsed, but not a word was spoken, nor did one move.

Tom King was overcome with astonishment.

Then he began to grow alarmed, and finally hopeful.

Yet he fancied that perhaps this was, after all, only a scheme to annoy him; perhaps they were pretending to be overcome by drink in order that they might have the pleasure of witnessing his struggles to get free.

This consideration kept Tom King for some time quite still, but at last he muttered:

"They are drunk—dead drunk, every one of them; it must be, I suppose, the mixture of the ale and wine, and yet I should have thought their constitutions strong enough to stand anything. Now, curses on it, if I had not made that other futile attempt, I could get free! It is impossible now—quite impossible."

Nevertheless, Tom King tugged away at the ropes, but all the effect he produced was to cut his wrists and arms severely.

All at once he stopped, for he heard a strange, faint tapping sound.

He looked up at once in the direction from which he imagined the sound had come.

Evening was now drawing on apace, and already the room in which the officers were seated was plunged in considerable obscurity.

The darkness had, however, come on so gradually that Tom scarcely noticed it until the present moment.

He looked about him then and saw nothing.

The tapping was repeated.

This time he felt certain that it came from the window.

He looked keenly, and then saw the face of a man.

For a moment a wild idea that he was about to be rescued came over him; but immediately afterwards he dismissed it as absurd.

Nevertheless, with perfect fascination, he fixed his eyes upon the face at the window.

He saw it move.

An arm was raised, and then the casement was slowly and cautiously opened.

The intruder listened for a few seconds, and when he heard the loud and deep snores proceeding from the sleeping officers, he seemed to nod his head with satisfaction.

Then, stepping lightly into the room, he trod on tiptoe past the table, and paused close to the plank to which Tom King was bound.

"Hush—quiet!" he said. "Are you all right?"

"Scarcely," said Tom. "But who are you?"

"Never mind just at present. Keep quiet while I untie these knots."

"You could not perform a more welcome service. But how is it that you, a perfect stranger, are willing to do this for me?"

"Ah! captain," said the man, almost with a sigh, "I find you have forgotten me, and it is as well for you today that my memory is not so short."

"I fancied I had seen you before," returned Tom, "but I behold so many faces, and it is hard to recollect every one."

"No doubt. Quiet—lie there; that knot is untied. Well, once upon a time you dealt liberally and kindly by me, and I am not the one to forget it. But I will explain more in a little while. How do you feel now?"

"Better I think—better!" said Tom, faintly.

The fact was, the loosening of the ropes removed the impediments to the free circulation of the blood, and this being done somewhat suddenly caused a dreadful feeling of sickness and faintness to come over the highwayman.

But Jack, the ostler, resolutely went on untying the knots, and really it was something wonderful to see the manner in which they came undone beneath the skill of his nimble fingers.

"There, captain," he said at last, "you are free. Hullo! though, that won't do!"

Tom King had endeavored to rise, but he failed.

His brain turned giddy, and he fell forward, and would have reached the ground heavily had not the ostler stretched out his arm and saved him.

"Gently—gently!" he said. "Just take hold of me round the neck, will you, and I will carry you out into the fresh air."

Tom had sufficient sense remaining to comply with this demand.

Accordingly, he clasped his arms round the ostler's neck, and that individual, by an exertion of the great strength he possessed, hoisted him on to his back and carried him across the room, through the window, and into the yard.

"There, captain!" he said. "Just keep your feet half a moment, while I shut the window. There, that's it—capital! Now come along with me."

Once again picking him up in a similar fashion, the ostler carried the almost insensible form of Tom King across the yard to the stable.

As soon as he was inside, he shook Tom roughly.

"Now, captain," he said, "you must rouse yourself up. The next thing you have to do is to climb up yonder ladder. I would carry you up if I could, but it's rather too much for my strength. You go first, and I will keep behind you."

Tom was anxious indeed to make his escape, and his faculties were in just such a condition as to make him willing to obey the commands of anyone who spoke to him.

Up the ladder he accordingly with great difficulty managed to climb.

Reaching the top, he found himself in a rather spacious hay-loft.

"Now, captain," said the ostler, "there's plenty of fresh, clean straw, and hay too, and all you have to do is to lie down on it, roll yourself in it, and you are safe for some time to come. Stretch yourself out, and have a good rest. I will answer for it the officers will not trouble you just yet."

Tom King did as he was told, but he had not assumed a recumbent position many minutes before he felt the benefit of doing so.

The blood, working more equally, circulated, and the dreadful aching in his limbs to some extent subsided.

"Now, captain," said the ostler, "just a wee drop of brandy—a wee drop, mind—will be the best thing you can have, and after that something to eat."

Almost mechanically Tom swallowed not much more than a table-spoonful of brandy, which the ostler gave him from a small bottle he produced from his pocket.

Tom's curiosity was greatly raised by the mysterious turn events had taken.

"Never mind me," replied the ostler to some of his inquiries—"I am your friend—let that be sufficient. I can tell you something much more interesting and to the purpose."

"And what may that be?"

"Why, don't you think it odd that the officers should all have dropped off dead drunk so soon after having had the wine?"

"Very strange indeed!" said Tom.

"Well, I'll tell you the whole truth about it, captain. I was sitting in the stable thinking about you, and cudgelling my brains to think of some method by which I could set you at liberty—for you understand, captain," he interrupted, "I recognised you at once, and determined to do what I could for you."

"I am much obliged."

"Oh, don't mention it!"

"Well, go on, you were saying you were sitting in the stable."

"Yes, I was; that was after Mr. Blogden, as they call him, made master dead drunk. My eye, what a rage the missis was in to be sure! However, I carried him up to bed, and he was all the time muttering something about the waggon."

"Yes," said Tom, "it was arranged that when the carrier's waggon passed I should be placed in it along with some of the officers."

The ostler nodded.

"I heard about the kind of raffle they had for you," he went on, "and was thinking perhaps that might be turned to your advantage, when all of a sudden who should come into the stable but one of the officers. He took a crown piece from his pocket and slipped it into my hand, as he said:

"'Jack, my lad, I have an important service I want you to render me, and if you do it well you shall have four times that amount for your reward.'

No. 201 will be Published next Monday.

"Of course I wanted to know what the officer wanted.

"'Well,' he said, 'you must know we have thrown dice for the prisoner, and all the reward is going to be taken by Blogden. Well, we don't believe he played fair for it, and so want to pay him off in his own coin. Now, I daresay about the premises you have got some kind of sleeping drug or other—I mean such stuff as you would mix with the ale.'

"'Oh, yes,' I answered, with a wink. 'I see you know all the tricks of the trade.'

"'I was in the public line myself once,' this officer said, and then he told me to draw the cork out of one of the bottles of wine, and pop enough of this drug into it to cause anyone to become insensible after drinking a couple of glasses or so.

"I promised, and just then the missis called me to go down into the cellar and fetch up the wine, so, you see, everything favored me."

Tom King listened to these revelations with the utmost amazement.

"Well, captain," said the ostler, "I saw this—that all was plain and straightforward—that I could set you free without any trouble at all, besides which I could play the officers a very good trick. So what do you think I did? Why, I drew the corks of every one of the bottles as fast as I could, and poured enough of the stuff into each; then corked them up again."

"Extraordinary!" ejaculated Tom. "I should almost have said incredible, only what has happened fully confirms all you have stated."

"Yes, captain, it's true—quite true."

"But how comes it," added Tom, "that the officers did not notice that the corks had been previously drawn?"

"Ah, captain, I see you don't know any of the tricks of the trade. Why, there's a corkscrew down in the cellar—a hair corkscrew, they call it—with wires almost as fine as a hair, and yet strong enough to draw out a cork. When it is done the cork can be put back again, and the hole that is left is so small that no one could find it unless they guessed it was there and searched very narrowly for it."

"That accounts for it at once," said Tom King. "But I feel that I shall never be able to thank you enough or to do sufficient to show you how much I appreciate the service you have rendered me. But fear nothing. You shall not go unrewarded—I will take care of that! I shall always remember that I owe you my life."

"There—there, captain, that will do—I don't want any more of that! I consider that what I did just serves the officers right. It's a case of the biter bit."

"Well, but how shall you proceed?" said Tom—"what's the next move?"

"Well, captain, that I leave to you. I thought, perhaps, you might be able to jump on to the back of your horse, and gallop off, but I sadly fear you are too weak and exhausted for anything of that kind."

"I don't think so," said Tom, and immediately he made an effort to rise to his feet.

He quickly found he had miscalculated his strength entirely.

He swayed to and fro for a moment, then fell back on to the mass of hay and straw.

CHAPTER CMLXVI.

IN WHICH TOM KING HAS AN AMPLE REVENGE UPON THE POLICE OFFICERS.

"THERE you go, captain," said the ostler. "I knew just how it would be. You are clean done up, and no wonder; and what's more, if you are able to move for the next day or two, it's an odd thing to me."

"Then," said Tom King, "I am as good as a dead man already, for I must get away from the inn before the officers recover their senses."

"Yes, yes," said the ostler—"either you must go or the officers. Yes, yes—that's quite right."

"What do you mean?" said Tom. "Do you for a moment suppose the officers will leave without making a rigid search of the premises?"

"Yes," said the ostler, "I think it very likely they will."

"But how long will it be before they recover from the effects of the drug?"

"Some hours, captain—I gave it 'em strong."

"Well, then, I have that much rest before me."

"So you have. But, captain, I've made my mind up to one thing."

"And what may that be?"

"Why, that you can't go away from the inn and ensure your safety that way. The officers must go instead, leaving you here snug and comfortable."

"You would be a clever man, Jack, if you could manage that."

"Well, I don't know; it seems to me nothing would be easier."

"You are jesting."

"Not a bit, captain. Of course I needn't tell you what the officers hoped to do was to leave Blogden here, overpowered by the drug, while they took you in the waggon to London."

"Yes, that was their intention, simply because he had won the greatest share of the reward."

"Well, perhaps you know how it was arranged for the waggon to be made use of?"

"Yes, I think I do."

"But," said Jack, very impressively, "that particular arrangement was made with master, and now he's lying on the bed upstairs as drunk as a pig, and it's a question who will recover possession of their senses first, he or the police officers."

"Well, but I can't see what you are driving at."

"Oh," said the ostler, with a twinkle in his eye, "it will be the richest joke that ever was heard of in this world! I will tell you, captain: When the waggon goes by, of course it will stop here—it always does; then I shall tell the driver that a party of gentlemen have stopped here, and, being overcome by liquor, wanted to ride back in his waggon to London."

"But the landlady," objected Tom—"she will tell him all."

"Not so," said Jack. "I will try to keep her out of the way if I can. And then, I must tell you that she hates the sight of these officers, simply because they have made her husband so drunk. Won't it be a good joke, captain? Can't you fancy what a lark it will be to carry those clever gentlemen one by one, and lay them down in the straw at the bottom of the waggon? Then away they will go, and ten to one if they wake up much before they reach London."

In spite of the pain he suffered, and the perilous nature of his position, Tom King laughed most heartily at this idea.

It was a thought that had never occurred to him.

"If it can be done, Jack—if it can only be done! Yet upon second thoughts, I think I had better endeavor to leave here."

"Why, captain—why?"

"Because discovery of the part you have taken is certain, and the consequences will be serious to you."

"I can't see that, captain—I can't see that at all."

"Indeed! Why not?"

"Because the officers, being all drunk alike, won't be able to reproach one another, and you may depend that those who are in the secret of drugging Blogden will be careful to hold their tongues. Then when they come back we have only to say that, not properly understanding the arrangement that had been made, and having no means of asking questions, we had done the best we could under the circumstances."

Tom King tried to rise again.

He would infinitely have preferred to leave the inn behind him; but, to his dismay, he actually found that he was more helpless and weak than he had been a short time before.

"You must leave it to me," said the ostler, decisively, "and if you will only let me carry the matter out, rely upon it, it will end quite well. Hark! As I live, I can hear the waggon approaching now. We shall soon know whether we are to be successful in getting rid of the officers or not."

Tom King was close to the opening in the loft, which served as a window, and being in this position, he was able to hear with tolerable distinctness the approach of the waggon.

The tinkling of the bells upon the horses' harness soon made itself distinctly heard, and then the ostler, after many injunctions to Tom to keep himself well covered with straw, descended the ladder, and made his way to the front of the inn.

It was only with difficulty that he could restrain his exultation and delight within something like reasonable bounds; he was almost bursting with laughter.

He walked straight to the bar where the landlady was standing.

"Missis," he said—"missis!"

"Yes, Jack, what is it?"

"Why, these gentlemen seem to have gone very quiet all at once, don't they?"

"Yes, the drunken wretches!" was the angry reply. "I daresay they are all insensible."

"Very likely," said Jack. "And here comes the waggon."

"Well, what of that?"

"Why, they agreed with master to ride in the waggon. Didn't you hear something said about it?"

"Yes, I did hear something; but I'm not going to trouble myself about such beasts; they should look after their own business; I don't intend to look after it for them."

"Well, missis, what shall I do?"

"Do as you like," was the answer. "I am not going to say a word to them, and trouble to wake them up if they're asleep, or ask a single question; I only hope their prisoner escapes."

With these words, the landlady flounced round and passed through the door into another room, where she began working away at a prodigious rate, turning every object topsy-turvy, as was her custom whenever her mind was perturbed.

"That's the ticket!" said the ostler, as he slapped his thigh. "It could not be better; now I can manage it first rate!"

At this moment in walked the waggoner. He knew the ostler at a glance, and nodded to him.

"Just see to my horses, will you, Jack?"

"Oh, yes!" Jack replied. "But, Ben, there's been such a lark here to-day, and ain't the missis just mad, that's all!"

"Why, what's the matter?" asked the waggoner. "Where's the gaffer?"

"Well, I'll tell you," said the ostler. "But wait a bit, I will draw you your jug. Missis has left me to look after the place."

A jug of ale was accordingly drawn, and then the ostler continued:

"Why, Ben, a party of the rummest fellows came here to-day; they look to me like police officers; but, however, they are out for a lark. They got master into the room and made him dead drunk, and now he's upstairs on the bed sleeping it off; and as for the rest of 'em they have guzzled down such a quantity of wine that they are as helpless as logs of wood."

"Well," said Ben, "but what of that?"

"Why," said the ostler, "of course some o' these chaps gave in sooner than the rest, and the remainder, knowing that about four were already so far gone as to be unable to ride on horseback, determined to ask you to give them a ride in your waggon. Well, now they're all in the same pickle, and I suppose what they want is to ride all together to London."

"Oh, ah!" said Ben, who probably smelt out something profitable to himself in the undertaking—"that's it, no doubt."

"Well," said Jack, "I should not like to take upon myself to say. Let us go into the room and wake one of them up and ask him."

This was agreed to, and to the room accordingly they went.

Most of the officers were still standing round the table in the position we have described; but some had fallen forward, and two had slipped under the table.

"That seems to be the head man," said the ostler, pointing to Blogden, "because he ordered everything and paid for it, and it was him that made master so awfully drunk. I should think we'd better try to wake him."

"Oh, just as you like!" said the waggoner. "I leave it to you."

Jack shook Blogden furiously for some moments, and at last was successful in extracting a kind of grumbling sound.

"Sir—sir!" said Jack, putting his lips close to his ear and bawling at the very top of his voice—"sir—sir!"

Another groan came by way of reply.

"The waggon's here!" bawled Jack again—"the waggon's come!"

These words seemed in some confused manner to reach the bewildered intellects of the chief officer, for he opened his eyes, and glared vacantly around him, like one half aroused from deep sleep.

"The waggon? Oh, yes, that's right! Put him in—put him in!"

"I told you that was what he wanted," said Jack to the waggoner.

Joe Blogden fell forward, and struck his head quite a sharp blow on the table, after which he remained perfectly still.

"Well, they're a nice lot," said the waggoner—"a very nice lot. But, however, as my waggon is empty, I may as well take 'em as not; they are sure to give me something for my trouble."

"Oh, yes!" said Jack, with a grin, "I shouldn't wonder if you don't find 'em to be very liberal."

"Come on then," said Ben, nothing loath; "you help me, and we'll carry them into the waggon pretty quick."

Jack lent a hand willingly enough.

The officers were one by one taken up and carried by the head and heels out of the inn and placed on the straw at the bottom of the waggon.

Some made a few convulsive movements.

In particular there was one on whom the drug did not seem to have produced so great an effect as the rest, for he opened his eyes to their fullest extent, and in a thick, husky voice, said:

"What's the matter? Where are we going?"

"Into the waggon," said Jack.

"Oh, all right," half-grunted, half-muttered the officer, sleepily, "the waggon, of course—I know—I——"

He lapsed off into silence, and the next moment was lying comfortably by the side of his companions.

When they had all been bestowed, and the waggoner's horse attended to, Jack and Ben returned to the bar to finish their jug, and just then, as fate would have it, the landlady came out of the inner room.

"Good evening," said the waggoner to her. "I've got a rummy load to-night, missis."

"The drunken wretches!" she said, wrathfully. "Have you put them in the waggon?"

"Yes, missis, I have."

"Well, it's more than I would have done for them; they deserve to be every one rolled into a ditch and left there till sober!"

The ale was finished, and as they went away the ostler nudged his friend in the ribs.

"Missis is awfully mad. The old man has not been drunk for months, and she thought she'd got him quite out of it. Won't there be a little bit of a row to-morrow!"

"Very likely," said the waggoner. "I shall most likely be back by about this time to-morrow night, or perhaps by daybreak the next morning."

"All right," said Jack, "and then you can let me know how you have got on with those gents."

"I can; but I say, Jack."

"What?"

"Suppose I was to go all the way to London and they were not to wake up?"

"Well?"

"What should I do then?"

"Well," said Jack, scratching his head with a half-puzzled air, "I scarcely know what to say. I don't mind telling you what I think, and if I do you are not obliged to carry it out."

"Eh! what?" said the waggoner. "I don't understand."

"Yes you do," said the ostler. "I believe these men are officers—judging from their dress, I should say they was, and judging from their actions I should say they wasn't, 'cause it isn't usual for police officers to go about the country getting drunk and riding back to London in a waggon, is it?"

"I never heard of such a thing before," said the waggoner.

"Well, if you should find them helpless when you get there," added Jack, "I should recommend you to drive to Bow Street police station, then you will know more about it. If they are officers, all well and good, and if they are not, why the police will take care of them until they come to their senses."

"That's a very good idea of yours, Jack—that's the proper thing to do," assented the waggoner, "and if in case they don't wake up, that's where I'll take 'em."

"Very well. Good-night."

"Good-night," said the waggoner, as he climbed up into his lofty seat. "Good-night, Jack, and you may depend on seeing me either to-morrow night or the following morning."

With these words the waggoner smacked his whip loudly and off set his team at a very tolerable rate considering the nature of the load they had behind them.

The ostler stood watching until darkness hid the waggon from his sight; then, unable any longer to restrain his mirth, he leaned up against the gate-post and laughed until the tears rolled down his cheeks, and until his sides fairly ached.

"Oh, it's too rich a joke—too rich! Won't they be mad when they wake up! I fancy I see 'em; I'd give one whole year's wages freely if I could only be invisible in the waggon at the time when they do open their eyes. Why, I shouldn't wonder if they were to get into a rage and set to work fighting each other like so many mad cats. Oh, it's too good! I can't take it all in yet—I feel I can't. But wait a bit—quiet, Jack, quiet; you have got a great deal to do yet, and above all things don't forget the captain."

CHAPTER CMLXVII.

TOM KING MAKES HIMSELF TOLERABLY COMFORTABLE IN THE LOFT.

While Jack, the ostler, muttered these words half-aloud, his countenance by degrees changed from an expression of uncontrollable mirth to one of extreme gravity.

He shook his head once or twice to and fro, from which it may be inferred that he was not altogether blind to the danger and risk he ran by thus aiding and abetting the notorious highwayman.

He made his way at once direct to the stables, and having entered, closed the door.

By the time he had ascended the perpendicular ladder and gained the loft above, his face had resumed its usual cheerful, jolly aspect.

"Hullo!" he said, in a faint voice. "Captain—captain, I've come back; it's all right."

There was no reply.

"What can be the matter?" thought Jack. "Surely he's not gone. No—no; but wait a bit, I'll get a light."

The loft was now so profoundly dark that it was impossible to see from one side of it to the other.

From the stable beneath, however, he produced a lantern, and by the aid of this in searching about he discovered Tom King lying upon the straw very much in the same position as that in which he had left him.

"He's asleep," said Jack.

This was indeed the fact, although at first it may seem strange, even unaccountable, that Tom King could fall off into a slumber in such a place.

But the fact was, his slumber was one produced by his state of utter and complete exhaustion.

He had sunk off to sleep quite unconsciously—in fact, he had almost swooned.

But the ostler satisfied himself that he was sleeping peacefully, and having done so, he turned aside.

"Let him rest," he murmured—"let him rest; he will wake up a fresh man. I'll see that he is perfectly safe."

Jack sat down at once to watch, choosing a position near to the circular window of the loft, which enabled him to hear distinctly all that might take place on side, and, should the moon break forth, would allow him a tolerable view of the country round.

Here, then, he remained patiently on the watch for a long, long time.

It may be that he dozed once or twice, for it was not until there were palpable indications in the east that the coming of the new day was not far distant that a slight sound was heard indicating that Tom King was rousing himself.

Jack turned round at once.

"Well, captain," he said, "I should think you feel better after that little bit of a snooze; do you not?"

Tom King pressed his hands to his head in a bewildered way; he could not understand at first where he was, and was beyond measure puzzled to know what had happened.

By degrees recollection came back to him, and then he sat up in the straw thoroughly awake.

"The officers," he asked, anxiously—"where are the officers? Tell me that!"

With great difficulty the ostler controlled his propensity to indulge in an explosion of laughter; he was only able to succeed by noticing the extreme anxiety with which Tom asked the question.

"They're gone, captain," he said, "don't be alarmed about them in the least—I assure you there is no occasion."

"Gone?" repeated Tom, incredulously.

"Yes. Just wait a moment, and I will tell you all about it."

Jack did so.

Tom King listened with unbounded wonder.

Then, in a grave voice, he asked:

"And do you really mean to say, Jack, that you have had the audacity to do this?"

"The what, captain? I don't know that word; but if you mean have I done it, why, I say yes. Aha! isn't it a good joke?"

"Jack," said Tom King, "it strikes me you will have to pay dearly for it. Where's my horse—I'll be off at once; and if you are wise, you will make yourself scarce as quickly as you can!"

"Gently, captain—gently—not so fast, if you please; I have not told you all yet."

"Indeed! What have you to say?"

"Why, this: I think I shall clear myself very well in the matter; I am not at all alarmed on account of that."

"But," interrupted Tom King, "the officers will be filled with rage when they find how they have been played with, and an immense troop of them will be sent down without delay."

"I'm not so certain of that," was the answer. "In the first place, they had never been this road before; I gathered that from what they said, and it's odd to me if I didn't give them enough of the drug to make them remain fast asleep until they were delivered at Bow Street station. Delivered! only just think of that now!"

Jack laughed again, and this time Tom King joined in heartily.

"Well, when they come to themselves," pursued the ostler, "they won't be able to tell just where abouts this inn really is; they will have an idea of its locality, and very likely will search closely until they find it, but that will take them some time."

"Yes," said Tom King, "that's true enough; I didn't think of that before."

"But I did, captain; and, what's still more to the point, either to-night or early to-morrow morning the waggoner will be passing this way again, and from him I shall learn full particulars, and until then, captain, my advice is that you remain quiet where you are, and get your strength up. Rely upon it you shall not be disturbed."

"Many thanks," said Tom—"many thanks; but I must be moving, and I think I cannot do better than take the opportunity of a parting now."

Jack looked disappointed.

Tom King rose quickly to his feet.

No sooner, however, had he assumed an erect posture than he became all in a moment conscious of the extreme state of weakness he was in.

He reeled and almost fell.

"Now, captain," said the ostler, decidedly, "you must not think of leaving here like that; besides, there is no earthly occasion—take my word for it, you are safe. Just keep still—that's all you have to do."

"But will not this loft be visited?"

"Not by anybody except myself, captain; I have the stables all to myself. I don't think master has been up here since the last lot of hay and straw was brought."

"Then," said Tom, rather faintly, "I will stay; I am not so strong as I should wish to be; besides, I have a wound which, though getting well, gives me much trouble, and—and——"

"What, captain?"

"If you could find me something to eat, and bring it here unknown to everybody——"

"That shall be done, captain; nothing could be easier. You leave that to me; why, I was just about to propose it."

Tom came closer towards the circular window, and looked out.

A fair, pleasant enough scene was spread before his gaze—one of those pretty, rural landscapes for which England is so famous, and upon which the eye is never tired of looking.

"You seem very quiet and lonely here," was Tom's remark as he turned away.

"Very quiet. We are not much troubled by customers; they seem to grow fewer and fewer every day, and if trade doesn't alter I shall look out for a fresh place."

"I will tell you what you shall do," said Tom King. "Such a service as you have rendered me shall not go unrewarded; I will take care to supply you with the means to enable you to set up in business yourself."

"Thanks, captain, and then I shall indeed be deeply in your debt, yet I shall hope for the coming of the day when I may be able to repay you."

"There—there, that will do."

"Well, captain, I'm off now—a fresh thought occurs to me."

"What is it?"

"Why, the officers, when they come, will doubtless approach the inn from the direction of London, will they not?"

"Almost certain."

"Well, then, a particular friend and companion of mine is at work in a meadow some little distance off—I say at work, but that's hardly right: I expect to near him go by the front of the inn every minute."

"Well," said Tom, "what of that?"

"Why, this meadow that he is in is near the top of a hill, and from it you can see for a very long way. He can be trusted, and I will tell him to keep a sharp look-out for police officers. If he sees any he is to come here and let me know."

"That would be doing a good service indeed," answered Tom; "I should feel much more content, because then I should have the chance of escaping."

"Of course you would."

"But are you sure he is to be trusted?"

"I will answer for him, captain."

"That is enough then."

"I'm off. Hark, I can hear him—he always walks along whistling like that."

The sound of some person whistling a very intricate, unmelodious tune could now be heard, accompanied by the tread of a heavy footstep.

Jack descended the ladder precipitately, and carried out his intention.

He also brought Tom King the materials of a rude repast, of which the highwayman partook heartily.

He was now tolerably at ease in his new quarters, for he trusted to having timely intimation of the police officers' approach.

"Now, captain," said the ostler, "don't you feel wonderfully better?"

"I do indeed."

"Well, then, just let me have a look at the wound you spoke of; no doubt it will be the better for a little bathing and fresh bandaging."

"Yes—yes," said Tom, "it pains me sadly."

His hurt was attended to by the ostler, who acquitted himself of the task in a very creditable manner.

When he had finished, he said:

"Now, captain, if you will only take my advice and condescend to be guided by me you will remain just where you are for a few days. Rest and quiet are the only things you require, and if you have them you will be yourself again."

Tom King felt the full force and truth of these remarks.

He had had enough of adventures during the few preceding days to make him desirous of a short interval of quiet.

He reckoned up the time that was still to elapse before the appointed hour of meeting, and having done so, felt that it would indeed be advantageous if he could remain in his present quarters until the time arrived.

Of this he said nothing to the ostler, who, however, watched the workings of his countenance with some anxiety.

Having at last arrived at a decision, Tom said:

"Well, then, my friend—for you have in good truth proved yourself to be such—I will follow your advice and remain here, unless the officers compel me to change my quarters."

"Don't be afraid of them," said Jack, almost contemptuously, "it will be two or three days before they reach here, I'll warrant."

In such conversation as this, much of the time was whiled away.

The extreme state of weakness to which Tom King was reduced made him require an extra quantity of sleep, and therefore much of the time that would otherwise have hung most heavily upon his hands was passed in the unconsciousness of slumber.

So soon as darkness set in, Jack the ostler, having apprised Tom King of his determination, took up his quarters outside the inn with the intention of watching patiently until his friend the waggoner arrived.

His impatience was great, although, as it turned out, he had to wait for a much less time than he had anticipated.

It was, indeed, rather before midnight that Jack's attentive ears caught the sound of the revolving waggon wheels.

"Now for the news," he ejaculated, rubbing his hands briskly together, and starting up from the horse-trough on which he had been seated—"now for the news. Oh, how I wish I could only have seen the joke out to the end."

At length the waggoner drew up before the inn door.

Jack peered up at him, and fancied that his face had a scared, frightened look.

"Hullo!" he cried, "what's the matter with you? Sha'n't you get down?"

"Not if I know it," was the emphatic reply.

"Why not—why not?"

"Why not?" echoed the waggoner. "Because I never mean to come near this place again, if I can help it."

"Then why are you here now?"

"Just to warn you."

"Of what?"

"That you will be taken prisoner and transported for life."

"Oh, stuff—rubbish! I know better."

"But just let me tell you that I drove along, never thinking of anything till I got to London."

"And didn't the gentlemen awake?"

"Awake? Not they!"

"What did you do with them, then?"

"Why, I followed your advice, and drove up to Bow Street. The officers were there, and I told them just the facts of the case. They came at once, looked into the waggon, and then burst out into a roar of laughter."

"Very likely," said Jack, rubbing his hands more vigorously than ever. "Go on."

"Well, then they discovered that they were not gentlemen at all, as you had fancied, but really police officers; and what on earth could have induced them to get into that condition and give out such instructions they could not imagine."

"What did they do?"

"Why, they dragged them all out with very little ceremony, and tried quite in vain to wake them up, then they wanted to detain me, for they said it was a suspicious affair altogether, but I took advantage of their indecision and drove off."

"And is that all?" said Jack, in a disappointed tone.

"Not exactly all," was the reply. "You don't know how it worried me, for I was certain there was something in the matter that I did not understand, so I made haste with what I had to do, put up my horses, and then returned on foot to the police office."

"What for?"

"Why, to make inquiries, to be sure!"

"And what did you learn?"

"Why, that the officers had been recovered from their deep sleep, and they had declared that they had captured Tom King, the highwayman, but had been drugged at an inn where they stopped, the people at which had assisted the highwayman to escape."

"Pooh—gammon!" said Jack. "They must have been drunk or dreaming!"

"Well, whether they were or not, their story was believed, let me tell you that, and orders were given that a party of police officers should be sent out at once. The only difficulty they were in was about the situation of the inn, and I heard it said that a reward was offered for the waggoner who had brought them. As it was, they suspected he was an accomplice, and, at all events, he could show them the way to the inn."

"But you got clear off, didn't you?" asked Jack.

"Yes."

"Then thank your stars for that. You have had a narrow escape, and, if you had been caught, would have got into trouble."

"I knew that," said the waggoner, sulkily. "I didn't think that you'd be the one to serve me such a trick."

"You shall know more about it some day," said Jack, "and perhaps you won't regret it so much, after all. But are you sure that officers were sent out to find this inn?"

"Quite certain."

"Then thanks for the news; I will make myself scarce, for should they return, they would, in their rage, do I don't know what."

"Very good," said the waggoner, as he cracked his whip and drove off. "Good-bye, Jack Ostler, for may I be blowed if ever I stop here again, or take up such a load another time as you supplied me with."

At as fast a rate as his horses would go, the waggoner drove off, leaving Jack standing outside the inn, scarcely knowing whether to laugh or be serious.

CHAPTER CMLXVIII.

THE POLICE OFFICERS MAKE THE OSTLER'S FRIEND A PRISONER.

This intelligence was duly transmitted to Tom King, who, upon hearing it, decided at once to make a move.

But he was overruled by the ostler, who assured him that he would have plenty of warning of the officers' approach.

And indeed, when the night passed away and the next morning dawned without anything of an alarming or unusual character having occurred, Tom King began to feel that in all probability he should be safer where he was than elsewhere.

That day and the following also passed away in quiet.

Nothing had been seen or heard of the officers, which, if the information given by the waggoner was correct, seemed strange indeed.

But the fact was the officers, when they had recovered from their stupor, could give only a very vague and indefinite idea of the situation of the inn whereat they had been so hocussed.

They knew that it was somewhere on the cross-road branching out of the highway, but there were many such, and it was impossible to say which was the right one.

Much time, then, was spent in vainly searching for the inn—unnecessarily spent, indeed, for the better plan would have been to go round to the inn where they had first halted with their prisoner, and from which they would have no difficulty in finding their way.

But this was many miles off; and the man to whom the command of the expedition had been entrusted was about the most obstinate, pig-headed officer that ever breathed.

He had made up his mind to conduct the search in a certain way, and nothing on earth could turn him from it.

At last, however, after going many miles, they came into an ill-kept, unfrequented road, which struck Blogden and his companions as being somewhat familiar to them.

"This is the place, I do believe," he exclaimed. "I fancy, if we ascend to the summit of yonder hill, we shall be able to command such a view as will decide the matter one way or the other."

This was agreed upon; but before they had ascended half-way, the eyes of the chief officer caught sight of the figure of a man running hastily across a large, open meadow

He pointed him out to his companions, and then Blogden exclaimed:

"I will lay my life we are on the right track. That fellow has been put there as a scout; he will give warning of our approach."

"Not if I can help it," said the chief officer. "Let those who have the best horses gallop at full speed in pursuit of him, capture him, and bring him back to me."

Several officers pressed forward at once, but there was one who, by the superiority of his steed, rapidly out-distanced his companions.

The man in the field had by this time gained the cross-road.

He heard the clatter of horses' feet behind him, and looked back.

The officer called to him to stop; but, paying no heed to him, he began to run more swiftly than before.

This man, as the reader must already be aware, was the one selected by Jack the ostler to give warning of the coming of the officers.

It was not long, however, before he discovered that, let him run as fast as he might, he had no chance of getting away from the well-mounted police officer.

Panting and breathless, at last he stopped, and the very next moment the officer was upon him.

With great suddenness and precipitation, he seized hold of him, and, in spite of all his struggles and entreaties to be set at liberty, he was dragged back to the remainder of the troop, who had followed on at a tolerably brisk pace.

"Now, then, rascal," said the chief officer, "confess where you were running to! If you refuse, or if you hesitate, or tell a lie, you shall be made a prisoner, and afterwards transported for life!"

This was a threat that alarmed the country laborer greatly.

His cheeks grew white, and his knees knocked together.

"Speak, villain!" roared the chief officer again—"speak!—tell me what you were about to do!"

In broken, incoherent sentences, this man told the officers all that had passed between the ostler and himself.

He was called upon by Blogden to give a particular description of Jack.

He complied to the best of his ability, and Blogden exclaimed:

"We're right! I recognise the villain now! He brought in the tray of wine! No doubt he has got Tom King in concealment somewhere!"

Upon receipt of this opinion, the officers all pushed forward with fresh vigor, and the unhappy laborer had the mortification of finding himself made a secure prisoner.

He had fancied that by confessing he should get himself out of his scrape.

Had he foreseen the result he would never have spoken.

"All that remains now," said the chief officer, "is for us to approach this inn with due caution, and surround it. We will take prisoners everybody we find there!"

No voice dissented to this arrangement.

By some strange ill-luck, neither Jack the ostler nor Tom King was looking out at this time.

They relied altogether upon the laborer, and the length of time they had remained undisturbed made them careless.

It would have gone hard with them, beyond all doubt, had not a voice suddenly exclaimed:

"Jack—Jack, you idle rascal, where are you? Can't you hear customers are coming? Make haste, will you?"

The voice came from the yard below, and the voice was that of the innkeeper, who had by chance seen a portion of the police officers riding towards his house.

Jack came at once to the little circular window in the loft that we have so often mentioned, and no sooner did he peep out of it than he caught sight of the officers, scarcely more than two hundred yards distant.

He gave a low whistle of alarm, and then, in a voice of tolerable composure, said:

"All right, master, I will be down in a moment."

The landlord at once made his way to the front of the inn, there to be in readiness to receive his guests upon their arrival.

"Captain," said Jack, in a whisper, "they're here!"

"Then," ejaculated Tom, starting to his feet- "we're betrayed!"

"I fear so; but whether we are or not, we must be off quickly. Your horse is already saddled in the stable below, and I have been at some pains to pick out the best from among those left by the officers. I told you I should have to leave the inn, and I shall do so more unexpectedly than I at all thought for."

While the ostler was uttering these words, Tom looked carefully to his firearms, which during the long rest of leisure he had had he had got into proper order.

A glance almost was sufficient to satisfy him that they were right, and as he restored them to his belt, in readiness for instant use, the ostler said:

"Now, captain, down the ladder as quick as you can, and in less than a moment we shall show them a clean pair of heels."

Tom did not reply, but descended the ladder very speedily.

With the utmost rapidity the ostler brought the two horses out.

They were both in excellent condition, and seemed impatient for a long gallop.

"Now," said Jack, "just look here, captain—I can put you up to a wrinkle. The officers will come direct to the stables, no doubt, so we'll bolt and bar the door—that's it!"

"But how are we to get out?" asked Tom. "Be quick—every second is of importance!"

"I know that, captain. Lead your horse after mine through this narrow door; they will follow you, never fear, for this is where the corn is kept."

Tom complied, and found himself in another compartment of the shed.

"Woa—gently now—stand still!" said the ostler to his horse, patting it upon the neck; then, letting go the bridle, he went to one side of the shed where the planks seemed loose and rotten.

Pressing his shoulder firmly against it, the whole mass gave way, leaving an opening quite large enough to allow them to pass through.

"There, captain, I thought that might be useful, so the other day I took the precaution of loosening all the planks. Quick, and we shall be off!"

The ostler led his horse through the opening, and bounded at once into the saddle.

As he did so, he uttered a cry of warning.

Tom mounted hastily, and drew a pistol.

Then he saw there were some police officers not many paces off, who were coming towards them with all speed, uttering loud shouts and cries.

"They mean having us, captain," cried the ostler, "for it seems they were trying to surround the place! But spur your horse well; he can go if he likes! I'll warrant that there's not a horse among all that lot that could come near it!"

This advice was scarcely needed.

Tom allowed the reins to fall loose upon his horse's neck, and at the first touch of the spur the gallant creature went bounding off at a tremendous gallop.

Jack the ostler had no little difficulty in keeping up with him.

The officers were quickly distanced, but it was daylight—a most unfortunate circumstance for Tom, since it enabled the officers to watch his proceedings at a great distance.

"Gently, captain!" cried the ostler. "I know you don't want me with you, and therefore, if you like, we will part now. That will divide the officers."

"No, no," said Tom, "you had better keep with me, under my protection."

"Thank you, captain, but I can shift for myself.

"I can readily believe that, yet I don't wish to desert you."

"It is no desertion, captain—none at all."

"But, then," asked Tom, "when are we to meet again, for, remember, I am under a deep debt of obligation to you, and I shall not rest until it is paid."

"Anywhere—any time, captain," was the reply. "So far from thinking there is any obligation, I am inclined to cry quits. But there's no time now for talk. Farewell! and, some day or other, I trust we shall meet again."

With these words, the ostler struck his spurs sharply into his horse's flanks.

The animal uttered a cry of pain, and the next moment was flying at full gallop over the meadows to the right.

Tom King chose the opposite direction, urging his horse onward to the utmost.

The police officers still came perseveringly enough in the rear, but it was evident that their horses were already so much fatigued by the distance they had journeyed that it was impossible to urge them into a rate of speed at all approaching that at which the highwayman's horse was going.

Although aware of this, Tom King's anxiety was considerable; but when he looked around and saw thick, dark clouds piling themselves up, giving token that darkness would set in much earlier than usual, he felt fresh confidence.

Directly afterwards he gained a cross-road.

He pursued it without hesitation, and as it wound about in a serpentine fashion, he was very quickly out of sight of the officers, for on each side a tall, thick hedgerow had been planted.

The chief thing he had to fear was a reinforcement, and that was scarcely likely to take place in so lonely a part of the country.

CHAPTER CMLXIX.

IN WHICH TYBURN TOLL-GATE COMES TO AN END.

We go back now to Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack.

It will be remembered that we left them riding at full gallop from the ruined castle wherein they had found so strange and secure a place of refuge.

The night was, in good truth, a most disagreeable and unpleasant one to be abroad in, yet the highwaymen found nothing to grumble at in it.

As a measure of prudence they did not attempt to draw rein upon any of the numerous roads which they crossed on their way from the castle, for they were exceedingly desirous that there should be no suspicion of their presence in that part of the country.

At length, however, Claude Duval cried out rather sharply:

"Halt!"

Sixteen-String Jack drew rein at once.

They were now upon a broad high-road, which they had gained by overleaping the hedge that divided it from a meadow.

"What's the matter, Claude?" he asked.

"Why, I fancy we have come quite far enough now. Surely there can be no risk in lying in wait in this place."

"Not much, I should think."

"Then," he continued, "we have arrived just in the nick of time, for I can hear a horse's hoofs quite distinctly."

"You're right," said Jack, after listening for a moment; "a single horseman is coming, though I don't think he will turn out much good."

"Why not?"

"Because his horse is a poor one, or it would never come at such a shuffling trot as that."

"Well, we shall see. Draw back into the shadow."

This was done, and directly afterwards, on looking down the road, they perceived, quite distinctly, something white, which, on a closer approach, turned out to be a white horse.

On this was seated a man, who was amusing himself by every now and then breaking out into a rude ditty.

As soon as he was near enough, Sixteen-String Jack and Claude both rode out.

"Stop!" they cried, as with one voice—"stop! Pull up! If you refuse, your death is certain!"

They presented their pistols while they thus spoke.

"Bedad thin," said a voice, which unmistakably proclaimed its owner to be an Irishman—"bedad thin, I'll be afther pulling up, for I'm not tired of my life just yet."

He stopped his horse with the greatest amount of coolness in the world.

"Now," said Claude, sharply, "be quick—we're in a hurry—hand over all the money you have about you!"

"Oh! thin it's highwaymen ye are, is it? Well, thin, divil a ha'penny will ye git out of me!"

"We shall see!" said Jack. "If you don't think proper to hand over quietly, we shall take by force what we require."

"Oh! shall ye now? Thin I'd be obleeged if you'd take as much money as ye could out of me pockets and give me a little back again, for it's none at all I can find there."

"None at all?"

"Divil a ha'penny, barring one crown-piece, and that I spint at the inn beyant, and where any more is to come from I don't know."

There was something in the man's careless tones and in the indifferent manner in which he treated the whole of the proceedings that impressed upon the highwaymen the belief he was speaking nothing but the truth.

"Then, if that's the case," said Claude, angrily, "ride on! Only take this caution with you: if you meet any body, don't say a word about us."

"Fakes, thin, I won't, if you will make me a promise in return. Of course you know where this road leads to."

"Yes, to London."

"Shure, man, you're right. Now jist take notice. If anyone should ax you for Patrick M'Gear—that's me, ye know—just say you saw me on the high-road, travelling straight for Oxford—do you understand that?—and I'll be obleeged to you."

With these words, the Irishman jogged on again, taking the road to London.

The highwaymen both laughed, in spite of themselves, though they were annoyed that the adventure should turn out so unprofitable, because the probability was the Irishman would ere long make some one acquainted with their presence on the road.

They had no time to exchange any words on the subject, however, for just then they distinctly heard the rattle of wheels.

"A light cart," said Claude Duval, listening attentively. "Now this, let me tell you, promises us a much better booty."

The sharp stroke of a horse's hoofs upon the hard road now became distinctly audible above the rattle of the wheels, and it was evident that the occupants of the cart were rolling over the road in capital style.

The highwaymen shrunk back again to their place of concealment, and, shading their eyes with their hands, strove to make out who was approaching.

Ere long they discovered that the cart was occupied only by one man, though he had as much superabundant flesh as to be big enough for two, and was in himself quite a big load for a horse.

"That's a farmer, or grazier, or something of that kind," said Claude. "And if he is on his way to market—and there's no doubt that he is—we shall have a profitable adventure. Keep quiet, and, if we both ride out suddenly, we shall, ten to one, frighten him out of his wits."

"If we frighten him out of his money," rejoined his companion, "that will be much more satisfactory."

The highwaymen were silent, for the cart was now very close at hand.

So soon as the horse's head was opposite to them, the highwaymen both pounced out.

Claude Duval seized the horse by the bridle, and forcibly brought him to a standstill, while Sixteen-String Jack presented a pistol at the farmer's head.

"Now, then," he cried, "your money—give it quickly, or I will find whether you are in the habit of carrying your brains in your skull or not!"

This was a threat that horrified the occupant of the cart in no slight degree.

The reins and whip dropped from his nerveless fingers.

"Spare me!" he ejaculated—"spare me! Pray, gentlemen, do not take my life!"

Beyond doubt he would have gone down on his knees in an attitude of supplication, only the shape of the vehicle was such as to make this an impossibility

"You are all right," said Jack—"no harm will happen to you if you give up your money-bags quietly."

With a deep groan the farmer unbuttoned his huge overcoat and thrust his hand into an inner pocket.

It lingered there for a moment or so hesitatingly.

Jack had his eye keenly fixed upon him.

"Come," he said, "no delay—time is pressing!"

With another heavy groan the farmer withdrew his hand from his pocket, bringing with it a good-sized bag.

Evidently, however, he could not make up his mind to part with it so easily, although in such a state of mortal fright.

But Jack saved him any further indecision by suddenly snatching it from him.

"There," he said, "that will do; and as the purse is tolerably weighty we will trouble you no further. Here, take the reins, drive off, and be thankful you have escaped with your life."

The farmer did not require a second bidding.

With the utmost alacrity he snatched up the reins and gave the horse a heavy slash with the whip.

He was quickly out of sight in the darkness, and as Jack tossed the purse up in the air and caught it again, he cried:

"It's heavy—very heavy—just enough for what we require."

"Then," said Claude, "if that's the case we cannot do better than ride direct to the toll-gate; I shall be glad to have that little business over."

"Agreed; I have not the least objection."

"Forward, then; we have but to follow this high-road and we shall reach it in a short time."

No more was said by either of the highwaymen, for the speed at which they were going was such as to make conversation a matter of difficulty.

After a hard gallop, they at length came in sight of the toll-gate.

Reducing their speed, they approached with a certain amount of caution, and it was fortunate indeed that they did so.

Suddenly, from out of the shade at the side of the road, about two hundred yards from the toll-gate, a man sprang.

Claude's horse reared and swerved, nearly unseating his rider.

"Captains—captains!" said a voice. "Is it you?"

"Who speaks?" asked Jack.

"Do you not remember my voice? I am the toll-keeper."

"Yes—yes, I recognise you now. Why are you here?"

"To give you warning," was the answer. "Do not linger here a single moment—pray do not!"

"Why not? What has happened?"

"Why, you see, they have turned me out of my situation. In fact, I have been taken up before the magistrate, and only escaped by the greatest wonder in the world. But there is not time to enter into particulars now—some other time must suffice."

"Well," said Jack, "I am glad we have met. Here's what I promised you."

"Thanks, captain, the amount comes most welcomely. And now I will tell you why I have been so anxious to waylay you here."

"What is it?"

"Why, the police officers have gone to work very cunningly. One of them has taken my place at the toll-gate. He dresses just like me, and inside are a lot of his companions."

"Then they must have got scent of our intention to return," said Claude.

"It looks like it," was the reply, "though I can't make out how they can have guessed it; nevertheless, they are there, and if you had galloped up to the gate you would both have been shot down or else captured—there was a certainty of one or the other."

"It seems, then," said Jack, "that we are indebted to you for our lives on this occasion."

"Yes, gentlemen, and I am indebted to you for this money, which will make me independent for the rest of my life. But hark!" he ejaculated. "Quick—quick! Be off—they'll see us in another moment, they will be in full pursuit."

The highwaymen looked towards the toll-gate while the man spoke, and then they caught sight of a dark-looking mass, evidently a troop of police officers.

"We can save ourselves easily," said Jack; "but how about yourself—how shall you fare?"

"Don't trouble yourself about me," was the answer

[DICK TURPIN, IN HIS DISGUISE, VISITS A BARBER'S SHOP.]

"I have arranged all my plans very nicely. Do you see that little bit of a glimmering yonder?"

The man pointed to one side of the road, where, in the darkness, something that looked like a bright red spark could be seen.

"Yes—what of it?"

"Why, I shall wait till the officers start, and then with that slow-match I shall touch a train of gunpowder which leads from here to the toll-house. There I have some gunpowder stored underneath, enough to blow the old timbers to a thousand fragments. I rather expect that will astonish the officers a little, and while they are recovering from their surprise I shall make off."

The highwaymen were themselves rather surprised by this announcement, and before they had time to make any remark the late toll-keeper exclaimed:

"Now, then, be off as quickly as you can—they are all on the road now. If you hear a slight noise behind you, don't be alarmed—it will only be the old toll-house going to ruin."

It was quite clear that the police officers knew that something unusual was taking place down the road.

They may have suspected the presence of the highwaymen.

At any rate, they rode forth to ascertain what was going on.

The tollman waited until they were at no great distance from him, then taking up the slow-match he applied it to the train of which he had spoken.

There was a rapid and bewildering flash of light along the roadway, then a slight but scarcely appreciable pause, which was followed by a furious roaring noise—a loud explosion and the crash of parting timbers.

A broad red column of light shot up high into the air, revealing for a moment all objects around.

After that a double darkness seemed to settle upon all things.

A universal panic seemed to seize upon the officers.

Their horses, alarmed by the explosion, and the terrific flash of light with which it was accompanied, became restive and unruly, while their riders, deficient of presence of mind enough to guide them, had many narrow escapes of being thrown.

All thought of continuing the chase after the highwaymen was at once abandoned, and the first thing they did upon recovering ordinary possession of their faculties was to ride back to the scene of disaster.

The whole occurrence was, however, shrouded in mystery.

Of the wooden toll-house nothing more than a blackened heap of smouldering ruins remained.

Fortunately no one was hurt

The ex-toll-keeper made his escape easily—in fact, he had no difficulty whatever in getting away, for the police officers never once suspected his presence.

The event startled the two highwaymen not a little, although they were prepared for it. As soon as the explosion was over, however, Claude Duval said:

"Forward, Jack—let us push on! The officers may not trouble us any further, still it is quite time we got back to our safe quarters."

CHAPTER CMLXX.

THE RENDEZVOUS ON HAMPSTEAD HEATH.—THE ARRIVAL OF TOM KING.

A CHANCE belated wayfarer passing over the south-eastern portion of Hampstead Heath on the night appointed for the meeting of the highwaymen would probably have perceived, glimmering in the darkness, a dull red speck of light.

The chances were, at the time of which we write, that no one would venture to cross the heath after dark. There were no well-kept roads intersecting it as now—no lights—no habitations near, except a few little cottages round the old ivy-grown church at Hampstead.

The night was profoundly dark—the ground itself could scarcely be distinguished beneath the feet, and a light, soft rain was falling, that materially increased the discomforts of those who were compelled to be abroad.

The red light, however, of which we have spoken, continued to make itself visible—indeed, as time passed on, it increased in brightness.

This light, as the reader no doubt suspects, proceeded from a fire kindled on the heath.

Standing over it were two men, and the firelight shining on their faces disclosed the familiar features of Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack.

"You were quite right to insist upon lighting a fire, Jack," said Claude Duval, as he stooped down and stirred the embers with a stick. "The night is a most disagreeable one."

"It is," said Jack, with a slight shiver—"there can be no mistake at all about that. What is the time?"

"Nearly eleven."

"Then we are full early yet. No matter; I would sooner wait here than elsewhere."

There was a perceptible amount of agitation in Jack's voice while he spoke. He was exceedingly anxious to know whether his comrades had been as fortunate as himself—whether they would be able to attend the place of meeting.

"I only hope," continued Claude, "that none of our enemies will see this light."

"There is little to fear in that respect, I think," returned Jack. "We have left no clue to guide them here, and who would be out on the heath on such a night as this?"

"Hark!"

"Did you hear anything?"

"I fancy so."

"What was it like?"

"A footstep—a slow, cautious footstep. Hush—listen!"

Both were silent immediately, and for several succeeding moments they listened intently.

But, beyond the low sighing of the wind as it made its way over the uneven surface of the heath, no sound was heard.

"You must have been mistaken, Claude," said Jack, at length.

"Perhaps so, and yet I scarcely think it."

"All seems still."

"Very."

Claude Duval produced his pistols.

"We must be on our guard against any sudden surprise," he said. "It is impossible to say whether we shall be attacked."

"I am ready. But hark—I am sure I heard the footstep then!"

"Who goes there?" cried Claude Duval, in true sentinel style.

"Tom King—Tom King!" was the reply.

The voice was low and faint, and though it evidently came from somewhere close at hand, yet it seemed as though it had travelled for a long distance.

Claude and Jack turned round, and at the same moment caught sight of their old comrade, Tom King.

But he was in his appearance so greatly altered that they shrank back with something like dismay.

"Why, Tom," ejaculated Claude, "where have you been? What ails you?"

Tom King smiled faintly.

"I look like a ghost, I suppose—do I not?"

"You do indeed!"

"Well, you would not wonder at it if you knew all I have gone through. But the captain—where is he?"

"We have seen nothing of him yet, Tom; but, as you may know, it wants quite an hour to the time of appointment."

"Yes, yes! I hastened here with what speed I could."

"We did the same," was the reply, "and, if nothing has happened, we shall see the captain ere long, depend upon it."

Tom King did indeed look pale and wan.

Since we saw him last, he had done scarcely anything besides riding about the country with the officers close at his heels, escaping them only with the greatest difficulty.

This exertion, the want of rest, and his anxiety of mind, caused his wound to assume an alarming aspect.

He was glad to seat himself near the fire, and as he did so he exclaimed:

"See to my horse, Jack—it is close here; I feel too exhausted."

"Then," said Claude, "try a little of this. I'll warrant that it does you good."

He produced, as he spoke, a bottle of brandy from his pocket, which he had obtained from the inn.

Tom felt wonderfully refreshed after a draught of it; but, as he said, it was rest and food that he required more than stimulants.

His state of exhaustion may be imagined from the fact that it was not until now that he appeared to notice the presence of the fire, or, rather, become aware that it might be the means of bringing their foes upon them.

"This is a great risk," he said—"by far too great."

"Do you think so?"

"I do."

"For what reason?" questioned Claude, quickly. "Do you know that the officers are anywhere at hand?"

"I do not—I scarcely think they are; but yet, in spite of all my precautions during the last day or two, I have not been able to keep out of sight of them many hours together. Through a practical joke that has been played them, I have incurred their bitterest animosity They are resolved to hunt me down."

"Pooh, pooh, Tom!" said Sixteen-String Jack. "Do not speak in that despondent voice. You don't seem like yourself. It is your wound and over exertion that makes you look at things in that light."

"It may be," said Tom—"it may be. I assure you I don't feel myself."

He leaned his head upon his hands while he spoke, and looked steadily at the fire.

"I will put on some more sticks," said Claude—"that will keep down the blaze a little, and I am in hopes that we shall not have to wait long until the captain is with us. When he comes we shall change our quarters."

Tom was so listless and apathetic that he never asked his comrades to what place they intended to go.

After this a long pause ensued.

Claude and Jack were busy thinking about their comrade, who, still sitting by the fire, seemed to have fallen into a state of stupor.

They were silent, too, because they were listening.

The wind made odd, confusing noises as it swept over the heath, and they were anxious to become aware at the earliest moment of the approach either of Dick or the police officers.

But the hour of midnight was slowly given birth by the church at Hampstead without anything whatever occurring to disturb them in the slightest degree.

Their anxiety now reached it highest point. Even Tom King roused himself and rose slowly to his feet.

"Surely," he said, "that was the old clock at Hampstead striking twelve?"

"It was."

"And no signs of the captain?"

"None at present."

Silence again succeeded these few brief sentences; but, although they listened long and intently, they failed to catch the sound they so much wished to hear.

Tom King's condition continued to increase the uneasiness his companions felt.

It was soon evident that he was incapable of standing for any length of time without support, and, with a weary sigh, he sank down again into his former position.

Here he remained, motionless and silent, until all at once he raised his head and exclaimed:

"They are coming now—they are coming now! I can hear them quite distinctly. Put out the fire—put it out, or they will be upon us at once!"

Claude and Sixteen-String Jack started when they first heard his words.

Then instantly assumed listening attitudes.

But their well-practised ears failed to catch any sound at all resembling that which would be made by the approach of horsemen.

"You have been dreaming," they said, at last. "It is your fancy."

"No," said Tom, in greater excitement than before. "I tell you that I can hear them now plainer than ever. Listen—listen, and you will hear them too!"

CHAPTER CMLXXI.

SOME SINGULAR EVENTS TAKE PLACE BY NIGHT IN THE LITTLE RURAL CHURCH.

"Hush, Maud—hush!" said Dick Turpin, in a suppressed voice. "Keep your calmness, and I will answer for the rest."

"But where shall you go?" she asked, in a trembling voice—"where can you seek shelter now?"

"I shall not move," replied Dick, "until I learn that the officers—if such they are—really intend to enter this churchyard. It may be that they have only just halted there by accident, and that they intend to go riding on."

"Now, Dick," was the answer, "you must not cheat yourself into that belief. They are opening the gate now."

Maud was perfectly correct.

The rattling sound made by the hasty introduction of a key into the lock of the churchyard gate was distinctly heard in the silence that prevailed around, and then afterwards there was a grating, creaking noise as the gate was slowly pushed open.

Dick took Black Bess by the bridle with one hand, while he passed his other arm round Maud's waist.

"We will quit the porch," he said, "and yet not go far away—at all events, until we know something more than we know now."

Maud made not the slightest hesitation or demur.

In less than a moment the church porch was vacated.

Dick took up his position close to the side of it, standing in the angle formed by it and the church wall—a spot where the darkness was much greater than anywhere else.

Rapid as his movements had been, however, scarcely had he taken up this position than footsteps could be distinctly heard upon the hard gravel-path.

Dick leaned forward and strained his eyes anxiously, in order to make out the nature of these new-comers.

At first he saw nothing save a black moving mass, which on a nearer approach resolved itself into a small throng of persons.

The obscurity was too great, nevertheless, for Dick to say positively that they were not police officers.

Evidently the porch was their destination, for they walked straight towards it, and just as they passed within it, Dick caught sight, as he believed, of a female, but she was so surrounded by men shrouded in long cloaks that he could not make sure.

"Open the door," said a deep voice, in commanding tones—"open the door, and be quick about it! We have no time to waste!"

"I am opening it, worshipful sir," was the answer. "One moment! The lock is rather stiff, and my strength begins to fail me."

The person who had first spoken uttered an impatient exclamation, but even as it passed his lips the door leading into the church was opened, and the whole throng hastily entered.

Dick gave a long sigh of relief.

"You see, Maud, I was quite right in my suspicions—these people have nothing at all to do with us."

"Yes, so I find," said Maud. "And now that they have all entered, let us make the best speed we can to Hampstead."

"With all my heart," returned Turpin. "And yet before we move I should like to take one peep at the interior of the church. I am strongly filled with curiosity at what I have seen. I long to see more."

"No, no—do not seek fresh danger, Dick—make your escape while you have the opportunity."

"Tush—tush! There is no danger—none at all. Keep still. I will just take a peep through yonder window—that will satisfy me abundantly."

He pointed to a small window close by—a window which they had not previously noticed, but now it could be distinctly seen, in consequence of the light that beamed from it.

The sill of this window was at a tolerable height from the ground, but Dick managed to peep through the latticed casement by standing on the broad flat stone of a tomb that adjoined the wall of the church.

A singular scene now presented itself to his gaze—a scene which he had not at all expected to behold.

He beckoned Maud to approach and take her place by his side.

She was not proof against the curiosity which would be felt by anyone in consequence of such a strange visit to a church at so late an hour, and therefore, despite the agitation and terror that she felt, Maud stood upon the tombstone, and peeped into the interior.

She saw that the church was tolerably well illuminated by a number of wax candles standing near the altar, and which, though only just lighted, gave forth considerable light.

Every moment this light increased.

Then it was seen that the party which had entered the church was composed of several persons, all dressed in so rich and elegant a manner as proved them to belong to the upper class of society.

They had cast aside the long cloaks in which they had been enveloped when walking up the gravel-path.

Among them, too, was a girl, fair, young, and beautiful.

Her dress was of white satin, and a white veil was thrown over her head, so that, in the semi-obscurity prevailing in the church, she formed quite a conspicuous object.

But her countenance, upon which the rays of the candles fell, was clearly seen by the two watchers, and it was with no slight amount of surprise that they noticed the fair features were convulsed with anguish, and that tears were rolling rapidly down her cheeks.

Her hands were clasped tightly together, and she was standing in an attitude of imploring entreaty before a man who, with folded arms, looked coldly on her, evidently disregarding her distress.

By the movement of this girl's lips, they could tell that she was speaking, though her voice was well-nigh choked with sobs.

A faint murmur alone came to the ears of Maud and Dick, who in vain tried to make out what was said.

The young girl placed her clasped hands upon this man's shoulder, but he instantly and roughly shook her off.

At the same time, he turned his face towards a distant corner of the church, while, in those deep, stern tones which they had before heard, he cried:

"Is there to be no end to this delay? Cannot the ceremony at once be proceeded with?'

A slight movement followed these words, and then from out of a corner emerged a white figure, which in a moment or so afterwards the two watchers had no difficulty in recognising as a clergyman.

With an aspect of humility in his gait and deportment, this clergyman walked up the silent aisle, and then, opening the little gate in the altar rails, walked up to the communion table, from which he picked up a book.

The grief of the young girl was now something terrible to witness—she at times shrieked aloud in the bitterness of her anguish.

Then the one with the stern voice—who, from his manner, as well as from a certain distant resemblance between them, Dick conjectured to be the girl's father—advanced, and, seizing her by the wrist, dragged her violently forward.

At the same time, he took hold of the hand of one of his companions—a tall, thin young man, with dark, heavy, overhanging brows, which gave a peculiar appearance to his countenance.

His brow was now contracted into a frown, and so low did his brows descend that they seemed to reach his cheeks, leaving his eyes invisible.

With unmistakable aversion, the young girl shuddered and attempted to draw back; but her strength, compared with her father's, was as nothing, and he compelled the couple to join hands.

Slowly and reluctantly, the young girl was then literally dragged up to the altar.

The clergyman, who should have interfered in such a case, and not have been a willing accomplice in such villany, appeared to be quite unconscious of what was taking place around him.

He held before his eyes a large book, from which he appeared to be reading devoutly.

On reaching the altar, the young girl fell suddenly upon her knees, and with a rapid movement disengaged her hand from that of the intended bridegroom.

Once more assuming her former imploring attitude, she again spoke as well as her emotion would allow her.

It was just when events had reached this point that Dick's attention was distracted by another sound, coming from an altogether different direction, and yet a sound which, despite the interest he felt in what was going on before him, he could not disregard.

This was the loud and rapid clatter of a horse's feet.

Some one intent upon making the utmost speed was galloping along the high-road.

Maud heard the sound, and instantly forgot all that she was witnessing.

"There is no need for alarm, Maud," said Dick, in a reassuring voice—"from a single horseman we have nothing to fear."

"Are you sure that only one is coming?"

"Quite sure, though the clatter is prodigious."

Just as he spoke, the sound of the horse's feet ceased suddenly.

"There's an accident," said Dick—"I feel sure of it!"

He was deliberating whether to quit the churchyard, in the hope of being able to render some assistance, when a hasty footstep became audible, and directly afterwards he saw a slight, slim figure running at full speed up the avenue.

This figure made its way to the church door, which gave way before the sudden impetus with which he rushed against it.

He burst into the sacred edifice with the rapidity of lightning.

At the same time, he drew his bright, polished sword from its sheath, and whirled it round him.

Maud and Dick were now once more gazing through the window

Loud exclamations of rage and hate followed the entrance of the stranger, who, by the light which now filled the church, was seen to be a young man of handsome and imposing presence.

Swords were drawn, but before one of them could make a movement, the intended bride, with a shrill scream that seemed to electrify all present, sprang from her kneeling posture, and, fleet as a fawn, hastened to place herself beside the new-comer.

It was wonderful to observe what an effect this action had upon him.

He seemed at once to receive a tremendous accession of courage.

"Down with him!" cried the father of the intended bride—"down with him! Let him not escape! I will hold you all harmless from the consequences of the deed!"

But these words did not cause the young stranger to lose his self-possession in the least.

He whispered a few words to the companion at his side, then, presenting the same bold front, slowly retreated, step by step, towards the church door.

Up to now Dick had remained a perfectly passive spectator of the whole scene.

He had not been able to find any opportunity for interfering.

Now, however, the opportunity presented itself.

His sympathies were fully enlisted on behalf of the young girl, and it was a kind of instinct that made him resolve to side with the young stranger against so many powerful enemies, and assist him to escape.

There was nothing that Dick admired more than courage and true bravery, qualities which it was evident this young stranger possessed in no common degree.

Accordingly, without saying a word to Maud, Dick hastily stepped down off the tomb, and made his way to the door of the church.

He entered quickly, and found that he had made his appearance not a moment too soon.

"Cowards!" he cried, in a loud, ringing voice—"cowards! Would so many of you attack a single man?"

His words and his unexpected appearance for a brief space of time seemed to paralyse the young stranger's assailants.

The girl's father, however, was the first to recover himself.

"This is only one of his vile associates!" he said. "Down with them both! Surely you can be a match for two! Drag Silvia from him!"

"Back—back!" cried Dick, addressing the young man, who gazed in wonder at this new and unlooked-for ally. "Get to the door as quickly as you can! It is madness to contend against so many!"

The whole marriage party—if so it may be termed—now attacked Dick and the young stranger.

Had any of them been provided with firearms, then, beyond a doubt, the highwayman's life would have been in great danger.

The only weapons they carried, however, were swords, and under these circumstances there was just the chance that a skilful swordsman would be able for a second or so to keep them at bay.

Few knew better how to handle this weapon than Dick Turpin, and on the present occasion he made a good probation of his skill.

The bright steel weapons clashed together with a sound that brought out many a strange echo from odd nooks in the old church.

Upon seeing the combatants engaged, Maud uttered a piercing shriek, and this sound added not a little to the confusion of all present.

Silvia, for so she had been named, was unable to bear any longer the horrors of the scene, and sank off into a state of utter insensibility.

The young man to whom she had flown so quickly for protection evidently thought Dick's advice was good, for, picking up his inanimate burden in his arms, he ran hastily with her to the door of the church.

Dick followed him closely, covering his retreat by continually dealing circular sweeps with his heavy sword, which nothing could withstand.

All this, that has of necessity taken us some time to describe, actually took no more than a few seconds in occurring, so that when Maud entered the church porch the young man was in the act of leaving it with his senseless burden.

Directly afterwards Dick followed.

With the quickness of lightning, he flung his sword to the ground.

Then, seizing the massive oaken door, he pulled it shut after him.

His hands were already upon the key, which was still sticking in the lock, as Silvia's father was too impatient to allow it to be removed.

As quick, then, as the eye could wink, the door closed with a bang, and the key turned in the lock.

CHAPTER CMLXXII.

CLAUDE DUVAL MAKES A PROPOSITION TO HIS COMPANIONS.

"CAGED!" shouted Dick Turpin, in a voice of exultation—"caged! That was neatly done, I rather think!"

He stopped abruptly, for just then Maud flung her arms around him.

"You are hurt," she cried—"you are wounded!"

"No, no—not scratched."

"But I say you are—here in the arm!"

Dick carried his hand towards the place, and then, to his surprise, felt that his coat sleeve was wet with blood.

"It is nothing," he replied—"a touch that in the heat of my blood I had not felt. Hark!"

A furious hammering sound came from the other side of the church door.

"Knock away," Dick cried, derisively—"the door is strong enough to laugh at all your efforts. Come, Maud, we will leave this place."

Gladly Maud obeyed; but as soon as they emerged from the porch, Dick again paused.

The young man had placed Silvia on the ground in the churchyard.

Her head was resting on his knee, and he was endeavouring to restore her to consciousness.

"Fly!" cried Dick, addressing him—"Fly while you have time! Your only hope of safety lies in instant flight! They are all within the church now, but they will soon find a means of leaving it!"

"Then I can die in her defence!"

"There is no need for that. Fly, I say, and take your companion with you!"

"If I dared."

"Dared?" repeated Dick, in astonishment. "She loves you, and you would save her from a fate worse than death!"

"I—I trust she loves me."

"Believe it. Her actions prove it. Do not waste another moment, as you value your own life and her happiness!"

"But you, sir?" cried the young man, rising to his feet, and looking inquiringly at the highwayman. "May I ask in whom I have so strangely found a friend?"

"No matter. I tell you there is no time for talk! Raise her up in your arms, and follow me! Hark! I told you they would find a way out!"

A terrific crash of glass accompanied Dick's words

It seemed as though one of the large windows in the sacred edifice had been dashed completely from its setting.

The sound served to arouse the young man and quicken his exertions, though, to tell the truth, his brain was in a whirl, for events had taken so sudden and strange a turn that he is to be excused for feeling a little bewildered.

Following Dick's directions, he picked Silvia up in his arms, and strode with her rapidly along the gravel-path.

Dick and Maud hurried after them, and Black Bess, who had watched attentively every one of her master's movements, brought up the rear.

At the gate the stranger paused.

"My horse is utterly exhausted," he said; "besides, he fell heavily with me the moment I reached the gate."

"So much the better!" cried Dick. "Mount one of these. I will help this lady to seat herself before you, and I will start the other horses to keep you company."

"Why do that?"

"Why, to prevent all chance of pursuit, to be sure!"

"Yes, yes—of course! But pardon me—I am so confused that I am altogether incapable of anything resembling calm thought."

He mounted while he spoke.

Silvia had by this time partially recovered possession of her senses.

Dick lifted her easily to the saddle.

"Now," he cried, "off and away, and my best wishes go with you! Not another moment! See, they are rushing down the path!"

The young man did not stay to turn his head to obtain confirmation of Dick's words, but struck spurs to his horse's flanks instead.

It should be stated that all the horses had been secured to the gate leading into the churchyard, and left there. Dick released them quickly, giving each a sharp cut with a stick as he did so.

Away they flew along the high-road after the two lovers, and ere the discomfited bridal party could emerge from the gate they had all disappeared round the curve a few yards ahead.

Dick Turpin's course was now clear and easy enough.

He placed Maud upon the back of Black Bess, then mounted himself.

He took off his hat and made an ironical bow to the excited throng, who were in various ways giving expression to the mortification and anger they experienced.

"Good evening, gentlemen," he said—"a pleasant walk to you! The young couple are quite safe from your pursuit. Shame upon you all to contemplate such a deed!"

With these words, Dick Turpin allowed the reins to fall upon the back of Black Bess.

That was all the noble creature wanted to urge her forward.

Away she flew, and when Dick next turned his head to look behind him the church was completely out of sight.

"An odd adventure, Maud, was it not?" he exclaimed, as he slackened his mare's speed slightly. "Still, I feel that I acted rightly. Without my interference I believe two young hearts would have been made wretched for ever!"

"But your arm?" said Maud, apprehensively. "Are you sure it is no more than a trifling hurt?"

"Quite sure; but, for all that, it is bleeding yet, so we will try a bandage."

Dick's broad neckcloth served well enough for this purpose, and after this slight interruption the journey to Hampstead was continued.

But more time had been, from first to last, consumed by this little incident than Dick believed, and he was quite surprised to find the hour was midnight while he was yet some distance from his destination.

On making this discovery he pressed onward more rapidly, for he knew well that his companions would be suffering great anxiety on his account.

The journey was one that alarmed Maud considerably; but when she found herself in the vicinity of Hampstead Heath, without the occurrence of a single incident, she began to recover her ordinary composure.

The heath was covered with a darkness so intense that Dick found it necessary to reduce his mare's speed to a walking pace.

Fortunately he was thoroughly acquainted with the nature of the ground, otherwise he could not have made his way to that one particular spot where they had agreed to meet.

It was not long, therefore, before Dick caught sight of the red gleam of light proceeding from the fire.

At first this baffled him considerably, and made him doubt whether he had really made his way in the right direction.

Upon coming nearer, and finding that a fire was actually burning on the heath, he paused irresolutely.

"What is it?" Maud asked, with anxiety. "Why do you pause?"

"Do you see that light yonder?"

"Yes. What is it? What does it portend?"

"That is just what I am trying to find out," replied Dick. "That ought to be the place where we agreed to meet; but how comes it there is a light visible? Surely, if the others have arrived first, they have not been so foolhardy as to make a fire?"

This was a matter upon which Maud could give no opinion, and therefore she remained silent.

After a few moments more deliberation, however, Dick again slowly advanced.

From this it will be guessed that Tom King was not laboring under any mistake when he cried out that he could hear some one approaching; but his fancy misled him to a certain extent, inasmuch as he believed that police officers and not Dick Turpin, were approaching.

"Who is there?" cried Claude, raising his voice upon finding that only one horse was approaching. "Is that you, captain?"

"It is," was the reply, and the next moment Dick Turpin joined his comrades.

They were rejoiced indeed to find that he had escaped comparatively unharmed all the many perils which had beset him since they parted, and he experienced an equal amount of satisfaction.

The arrival of Dick had an inspiriting effect upon Tom King, who, by a great effort, shook off much of the languor with which he had been overcome.

"I am hurt, captain," he said, "but not badly. The wound is a trifling one; but I have neglected it, and I have been much harassed. A little rest will quickly put me right."

"I hope so," said Dick; "but now that we are all here, let us, in the first place, consider our future movements. Shall we separate again or not; and if not, where shall we go?"

"I anticipated that question, captain," answered Claude, quickly, "and I am glad to say that the point will require very little discussion."

"How so?"

"Why, Jack and myself have been fortunate enough to discover a retreat that will answer most admirably for the purpose of concealing us. We have thoroughly examined it, and are both fully impressed with its advantages."

"That, then, is good news," said Dick. "I, too, had found a place of refuge, and one which even yet may some day stand us in good stead; but there are many disagreeables and discomforts in connection with it—discomforts which your shelter may not possess."

"Silence!" cried Maud, at this moment—"silence, all of you! I am certain I heard a voice."

"A voice?" echoed the highwaymen, in slight alarm.

"Yes; it is, indeed, faint and far off, but I do believe it was a voice."

"We will listen," said Dick. "I know, Maud, that your ears are keen."

They listened accordingly, and then they heard first what was unmistakably a rapid footstep.

Some one was running across the heath towards the light at full speed.

Hearing this, the highwaymen all produced their arms.

They felt certain it could be no friend that was nearing them.

Suddenly, however, a voice that was almost inarticulate from breathlessness said:

"Captain—captain, are you there? If so, speak at once! Captain—captain!"

Upon hearing these words, the highwaymen all looked at one another in great surprise.

But Tom King quickly exclaimed:

"I know that voice—it belongs to one who has befriended me—one without whose aid I verily believe I should never have escaped from the police officers; but I will tell you all by-and-by. Take my word for it now—he is to be trusted."

"Then answer him."

"Jack," said Tom, "I am here."

The next moment, the ostler from the lonely inn made his appearance.

He was panting and breathless, so much so that he could not, for the life of him, speak a word, although he made violent efforts to do so.

Looking at him, the highwaymen perceived that his apparel was torn and disordered, as though he had recently been engaged in a severe struggle, while one side of his face and head was smeared and matted with blood.

"Take your time," said Dick—"take your time; then tell us what you have to say."

"Officers!" the ostler gasped out—"the officers are close at hand!"

"But not coming here, surely?"

"Yes, yes—in pursuit of me! They have done nothing but hunt me for days past. I knew that I was near the captain here, and was certain that he was coming to this place—not that I should have troubled him, only my horse was shot down under me; another bullet has ploughed up my cheek, and, as I fell bleeding to the ground, the officers pounced upon me and made me prisoner!"

"But you have escaped."

"Yes, I have escaped, and only a few minutes since, and that by the greatest miracle in the world. But the officers are after me; in a few moments at the most you will hear them."

"I can hear them now," was the response, and as the words were spoken, loud voices could be heard shouting in the distance, mingled with which came the dull, heavy beat of horses' hoofs upon the turf.

"We must be off," said Dick. "Are your horses all fresh?"

"Tolerably so, captain," was the reply.

"Then, Claude and Jack, you shall lead the way to this place of shelter you have spoken of—at any rate, we will pay it a visit now, and judge of its merits."

"Good!" was the reply. "Hallo, there, look at Tom!"

These last words were uttered in a very different tone to the preceding ones.

They were called forth by the fact that Tom King had made a hasty effort to mount his horse, but had failed, and after staggering a moment, fell to the ground.

"The captain is weak," said the ostler, "and I don't wonder at it—he is badly in want of rest."

"What is to be done?" said Dick. "It is certain he is incapable of retaining his seat in the saddle."

"If you don't mind me speaking——" said the ostler, hesitatingly.

"No, no. Say on—speak freely!"

"Well, then, I was going to propose that you allowed me to sit on the captain's horse, then you could place him on the saddle in front of me; I would clasp him round the waist, and by that means he will be able to ride well enough."

"Yes, yes," said Tom King, faintly, before any of the others could reply—"that's what I wish to be done."

This settled the matter.

Jack, the ostler, was mounted and seated in the twinkling of an eye.

By the joint exertions of Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack, Tom King was raised and placed in front of him.

"I can hold the reins," he exclaimed, "if you will clasp me tightly and prevent me from falling off."

"Right, captain—right!"

"This is one more obligation I shall owe you," said Tom King, "for without your aid, it is certain I should never have escaped the officers."

"We have not escaped them yet."

"No," said Dick Turpin, "but we are in a fair way of doing so. Quick, Claude, and you, Jack—make haste and lead the way; depend upon it, we shall not lag many paces in the rear!"

CHAPTER CMLXXIII.

IN WHICH THE HIGHWAYMEN DECIDE UPON THE NATURE OF THEIR FUTURE PROCEEDINGS.

THE next moment the highwaymen moved off, Dick Turpin insisting upon bringing up the rear.

By this time they had all become tolerably well accustomed to the darkness that prevailed, so that they were able to distinguish the ground just in front of their horses' heads.

But, very wisely under such circumstances, they trusted far more to the sagacity of the animals themselves than to their own ability to steer them clear of obstacles.

Claude Duval led the way with much confidence.

The speed at which they went was, comparatively speaking, slow, and yet rather faster than most persons would have considered consistent with safety.

"We shall baffle them before we quit the heath, or it's odd to me," he said, to Sixteen-String Jack. "The darkness is terrific—I will defy them to see us; and the ground is so soft and turfy that the horses' feet scarcely make a sound, going at this gentle pace."

This was true enough; but, nevertheless, they could hear behind them, more distinctly than was at all pleasant, the continuous shouting of the officers as they bawled out to one another, and occasionally the rattling of the cutlasses which they carried.

When once the highwaymen gained the border of the heath, and their horses' feet felt the firm roadway beneath them, they set off at full gallop.

By this means they obtained a very considerable start of their pursuers, who were still winding their way over the broken ground, unable to push on at any faster speed than a trot.

Most fortunate indeed was it that the friendly ostler had appeared at so opportune a moment.

But for him it would have been hard to say how Tom King could have contrived to join in the flight at all.

But this ostler, like most of his class, was an excellent horseman, and was as secure and at home when seated in the saddle as he possibly could be anywhere.

Therefore to him the feat of holding Tom King on was easy enough, though to an unpractised horseman it would have been beset with difficulties, for every now and then, in spite of the command which he strove to keep over himself, Tom King would lean suddenly to one side, to such an extent on many occasions that it required the whole of the ostler's strength to bring him back to his former position.

And now, with great suddenness, the wind, which had so long been moaning and sighing, dropped altogether.

There was an unnatural calm in the atmosphere, which endured only for a few seconds.

Then a tremendous downpour of rain was discharged from the clouds.

So thickly and so heavily did the rain-drops fall that in the space of a few moments the whole of the fugitives were soaked with wet.

Still, although the rain beat with painful force into their faces, depriving them almost of breath and of the power to see, they pushed on, knowing full well that, disagreeable as this event was, they would nevertheless be able to turn it to good account.

Certainly, if anything was calculated to clear all the roads in the shortest space of time, that shower was, for no one would willingly endure it any longer than was required for them to gain the nearest place of shelter.

For some time the rain continued to fall at this violent rate; but by degrees it subsided, and when something like tolerable calmness prevailed, the highwaymen all listened intently.

As they fully expected, not a single sound could be heard in the rear.

Evidently the police officers, baffled by the rain, had given up the chase in despair.

"On—on!" cried Dick. "It is not worth while to linger now; the sooner we reach this place of shelter you speak of the better."

These words were addressed to Claude, who made no other reply than setting his horse in motion.

For the rest of the journey scarcely a word was exchanged.

Certainly, nothing was said of sufficient importance to merit being set down.

Nor did they see or hear anything of the police officers, or even of a human being.

When at some distance from the ruined castle, Claude Duval pulled up, and pointed towards it.

The lofty, ruined keep could just be dimly distinguished when pointed out as a mass of something blacker than the clouds, which formed a background to it.

"Let us approach with caution," said Claude Duval. "If we are too careful we only make a mistake on the right side, that's all."

This was at once assented to.

But although they took every precaution they could think of, they failed to see or hear anything of an alarming nature.

When the courtyard was at length safely gained, the horses were left in charge of the ostler.

In good truth, the highwaymen were by no means sorry to have met with such an ally.

Beyond a doubt, his fidelity might be depended upon, and in more ways than one he would prove useful, should he feel inclined to share their fortunes.

Even Dick did not hesitate to surrender Black Bess to his charge: after which, drawing Maud's shivering form closer to him, he followed Claude and Sixteen-String Jack to the entrance of the secret passage.

It was easily found; then a light was produced, which enabled them to make the descent rapidly and easily.

Many were the ejaculations of surprise that were given when they fully comprehended the nature of this strange place.

They questioned Claude eagerly as to how he had discovered it.

But he said.

"We have many mutual explanations to give; let this stand over till to-morrow. In the meanwhile, we will make a roaring fire in the alchemist's furnace, and dry our clothes; after that, a hasty meal and a good long sleep will be the best things we can have."

This proposal was universally assented to.

The fire was duly made, and the remains of the provisions which Claude and Jack had brought from the village inn were produced, and equally divided.

There was not one among them that was not thoroughly wearied out, yet it was necessary that some one should watch while the others slept.

Tom King, now that the ride was over, seemed much better; but his wound was re-dressed, and carefully bandaged up, after which he seemed to sink off into a slumber, so profound that it was hard to distinguish it from total insensibility.

Claude and Jack went above to watch, and until daylight the duty was shared between them and the ostler, who would have watched during the whole of the time if they had permitted him, he was so anxious, he said, to do something to recompense them for having saved him from a capture.

Not the least alarm was given, and when the highwaymen met in the morning they were able to congratulate themselves upon the fact that they had managed to reach their present place of security without their presence in that part of the country being at all suspected.

Under these circumstances, all they had to do was to keep perfectly quiet.

The greatest impatience was manifested on all sides for an account of all that had happened since the separation in the plantation.

To narrate all this, as the reader must be aware, occupied a long time indeed—the greater part of the day was spent in this manner.

But, unquestionably, the strangest circumstance and the one that produced the greatest amount of discussion was the account which Dick Turpin gave of having seen his two comrades, Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack, meet and accost each other on the summit of the hill.

With tolerable accuracy, Dick Turpin described the exact spot where this strange event occurred, and, after the most careful consideration, Claude Duval and Jack came to the conclusion that they must have been on that particular morning very many miles from the hill Dick mentioned.

But what was strangest of all was, that on that very morning they had met in the manner Dick described, which, as will be recollected, was after their brief separation, and just before Claude and Jack made their way to the inn from which they departed so opportunely.

Tom King was the only one of the party who had listened to the whole of this adventure without making a remark.

But now, when all was fully described, he said:

"There is one way, and only one way, in which what Dick has seen can be accounted for, and that, I imagine, is the true key to the mystery."

"What is it, Tom?" they asked, eagerly—"what is it?"

"Well, then," he said, with a melancholy smile, for his spirit was always saddened when he had occasion to refer to the past, "many years ago, in my youth—I mean, I remember reading—how such an occurrence is far from uncommon. It depends upon some strange state of the atmosphere, which I cannot explain to you, but which brings suddenly distant objects close to hand, so that sometimes, in the midst of a vast plain, trees and houses have been seen, which, upon a closer approach, have seemed to melt into the air."

"Let us ascribe it, then, to that," said Dick, "and so dispose of the subject, for we have far more pressing subjects that require our attention. None of you have mentioned Tom Davis yet; I trust he is not forgotten."

"Certainly not, captain—certainly not! We were waiting for you to speak."

"Well, then, the question is, what shall be done? I confess I have already made up my mind, and that is, at every risk, to set him at liberty; he deserves as much at our hands."

"He does—he does!" was the unanimous reply.

"Such being the case, then," continued Dick, "we can easily arrange the rest. When he is set at liberty we will furnish him with what money we are able to obtain, and put him in the way of leaving England. If we can see him safely aboard some vessel, then I shall feel that we have done our duty to him."

"But," said Claude Duval, "before we go any further, it is necessary that we should learn something more as to his position at the present moment."

"Precisely so," said Dick; "and a knowledge can only be obtained by a journey to London."

"But who is to take it?"

"That remains to be seen."

"Not you, Dick—not you!" cried Maud, for the first time joining in the conversation. "Surely you will not run the risk of paying another visit?"

"Why not?"

"It is tempting your fate too much. Let me go," she added. "I shall be less likely to be suspected than you, and I can bring you back all the information you require."

Dick shook his head.

"I am sorry to deny you, Maud; but, in good truth, it cannot be. I should suffer more on your account than you could possibly suffer on mine, for you would know that I was able to extricate myself from any perilous situation, while you would be incapable of doing so."

"Then," said Claude, "suppose I go."

"I am willing, too," said Jack.

"And I as well," said Tom King, faintly, "if I only felt a little stronger and better."

"You are out of the question, Tom," said Dick; "but what I propose is, that Claude, Jack, and myself shall draw lots. It can easily be managed by a few splinters of wood—one longer than the rest. Whoever draws that, goes to London, and the other two will, in the meanwhile, set out upon an excursion to obtain such a sum of money as would be useful to Tom Davis after we have rescued him."

This was assented to without the least demur, for whatever Maud may have felt upon the subject she kept to herself, knowing from experience that it was useless for her to raise her voice in such an affair.

The small pieces of wood were rapidly prepared, and held by Tom King.

Three were drawn, and Dick Turpin was found to hold the longest.

"That is as I wished," he exclaimed, with sparkling eyes. "I have longed for the opportunity to go, for I feel that it is something which particularly concerns myself."

"But when shall you start?" asked Maud, timidly.

"To-night, as soon as it is dark enough to leave here safely."

"But you will need a disguise," said Claude Duval. "Where shall you obtain that?"

Dick shrugged his shoulders.

"It strikes me I shall take very few precautions in that way," he replied. "If I wait here until I find a disguise I shall never go at all. I will ride off, and trust entirely to good luck to befriend me."

"We have an hour or two to spare yet," said Sixteen-String Jack, "and there would be no harm if we were to spend that time in making our arrangements a little more fully."

"None whatever. But first of all, I will go and see that Black Bess is in readiness."

"Why not take one of the other horses?" said Tom King. "Black Bess must be as well known as yourself."

"That may be," said Dick, "and no doubt is the case; but if I went without her that would be no safeguard to me, but the reverse. When I am seated on her back, I feel an amount of confidence and security which I cannot feel elsewhere. No, no—Black Bess must accompany me on my mission, or I must give it up altogether."

With these words, Dick hastened to one portion of the ruins which the ostler had already extemporised into a kind of stable.

He was rejoiced to find his gallant mare looking fresh and ready for any amount of exertion.

The time between then and nightfall passed quickly, for there was much to talk about and decide upon.

It was agreed that Tom King, Maud, and the ostler should remain at the ruins—that Sixteen-String Jack and Claude Duval should seek a night of adventures, while Dick made his way to London.

Oddly enough, not a word was said about his return, and probably this would have been left altogether unmentioned had not Maud put the question just as Dick seated himself in the saddle.

"There are many hours between now and daybreak," he replied, "and I have them all before me. I shall try my best to get back here before day dawns. All will, however, depend upon circumstances. If I can see good reason for remaining away—if I feel that I should be safer elsewhere—I shall not come here; so do not expect me. Rest assured that, for my own sake alone, I will take the best care of myself."

But Maud could tell, by the manner in which he pronounced these words, that he was just then in the humor for any adventure, no matter of how dangerous a character; and with a burst of grief which she could not control, for her heart foreboded much coming evil, Maud covered her face and turned away.

"Farewell!" said Dick, in cheerful tones—"farewell, yet not for long! I shall soon return, bringing the needful intelligence with me."

CHAPTER CMLXXIV.

GOOD FORTUNE APPEARS TO INAUGURATE DICK TURPIN'S EXPEDITION.

As he gave utterance to these words, Dick Turpin set Black Bess in motion, and took his way slowly from the castle ruins.

Jack the ostler had been sent out as a kind of scout to ascertain that there was no one loitering near, and at this moment he appeared, saying:

"All right, captain—there's not a soul about. You may venture to ride off boldly."

Nevertheless, Dick Turpin did not altogether relax his caution, but continued to keep a sharp look-out on all sides.

But as soon as the ruins were fairly behind him, he allowed Black Bess to put forth her powers of speed.

There was on this occasion a feeling of freedom and ease, as well as energy and determination, about Dick's heart to which he had been for a long time a perfect stranger.

Maud had rightly defined his frame of mind.

But for all his light-heartedness, Dick, as he rode along, wondered by what means he should obtain a disguise.

To ride to London in his own proper character was a feat of daring from which even he recoiled.

Such a proceeding would have been nothing short of actual insanity.

But when and how was he to find the means of so well disguising himself that, should he by chance encounter any of his foes, they would fail to recognise him.

This was a question he asked himself over and over again without, however, being able to frame anything like a satisfactory reply to it.

[DICK TURPIN ASTONISHES OLD MATTHEW.]

Despairing at last of coming to a conclusion just at present, he exclaimed:

"On, Bess, old lass—forward! Now there's plenty of time before us, and I must trust to chance to put something in my way."

Just then Black Bess was crossing a smooth, well-kept meadow of vast extent.

Coming to a low hedge, which divided it from another field, she rose freely in the air, and alighted in safety on the other side.

But the manner in which she came down made Dick aware of something which he might have ascertained before, had not his thoughts been so preoccupied.

This was that the second field had been ploughed up, and, owing to the rain which had lately fallen, was now in a very heavy condition indeed.

This discovery, however, was not made until too late, for such was the impulse Black Bess had gained, that it was impossible to rein her up all at once.

Dick could see the opposite side of the field, and finding there really was not far to go, he resolved to push on rather than turn back.

All at once, however, a loud voice struck upon his ears.

"Hoi—hoi!" cried some one—"hullo, there! What are you doing? Turn back—turn back, I say, or I will take you up!"

Dick looked in the direction from which these sounds appeared to come, and then he caught sight of a stout man, attired in the dress of a parish constable, running hastily towards him.

Although the moon was not shining, yet a certain portion of her light found its way from the clouds, and so diffused a kind of dim radiance over the earth, so that

No. 203 will be Published next Monday.

Dick was able to see this man with tolerable plainness.

As may be suspected, however, the highwayman paid not the slightest attention to this demand to turn back.

So far from doing so, he continued to advance at the same easy pace as before.

This evidently infuriated the constable to no ordinary extent.

He shouted, and bawled, and ran until he was out of breath, for it was no trifling achievement to run across a ploughed field in such a condition as that was.

The constable, indeed, looked as ludicrous as any such dignified personage possibly could do under any circumstances.

Every time he lifted his feet from the ground he brought with him a huge mass of soil, which was so heavy and clung so pertinaciously to him that it threatened to pull his boots off at every stride.

Nevertheless, as he was making his way directly towards the highwayman, his slow rate of progression was not of much consequence.

A meeting quickly took place.

"Stop, you villain!" he roared, at length, when he found himself close to Black Bess—"stop, I say! Are you deaf? Can't you hear what I say?"

While he spoke, he seized Black Bess by the bridle.

"What's the matter?" asked Dick, calmly, yet he spoke the words in an absent manner, which may be accounted for by the fact that just then his mind was very busily occupied with a fresh idea that had just entered it.

"Matter?" said the constable, endeavoring to speak calmly as well, but failing lamentably. "Don't you know that you are trespassing, sir? No one is allowed to cross these fields, and so I must insist upon making you turn back! Turn at once, and be thankful that you are let off so easily!"

Dick took a glance around him, as the constable thought to ascertain his position in the field, for the next words he said were:

"But look here, my good friend, don't you see that I'm already half-way across this field, and, so far as any damage I may do is concerned, it will be just the same thing whether you allow me to keep straight on, or whether you compel me to turn back."

"Do you presume to dictate to me, sir?" said the constable. "Is that the return that you make for my leniency? Consider yourself my prisoner!"

"Your what?"

"Prisoner. I spoke plain enough, didn't I, stupid?"

"But do you know who I am?"

"No, nor care either."

"So it seems," added Dick, who had already, while this brief conversation was going on, matured his plan of operations. "Still, I think it rather strange that you should presume to speak to me like this on my own land."

"Your what?"

"Land," said Dick, quickly. "I spoke plain enough, didn't I, stupid?"

"Come—come," said the constable, "none of your nonsense! I daresay you think yourself a mighty clever fellow, but there are others as clever as yourself. Come this way. I won't say another word to you."

"But I shall to you," said Dick. "I ask you again, do you know who I am? Of course you do not, or else you would not presume to talk to me about trespassing on my own land."

"How can it be your land," said the constable, "when everyone knows that it belongs to Squire Verrals? And he won't allow trespassers on his estate."

"Well, it will be mine some day," said Dick—"at least, in a manner of speaking. Come a little closer, and I will tell you who I am."

"Sha'n't!" was the answer. "You can tell me from where you are, if you like."

"You will regret your behaviour," said Dick. "Let me tell you that you have been addressing yourself to one who will one day be your Sovereign. I am George Frederick, Prince of Wales."

The constable was greatly taken aback by this audacious statement.

He relaxed his hold upon the bridle of Black Bess at once.

"Nonsense—nonsense," he cried, recovering himself—"nothing of the sort! Fudge! I don't believe a word of it."

"Very well, then, in that case I shall have to treat you as I do everyone that I encounter who denies me as you have."

With these words, and before the constable could have the least idea of what Dick's intentions were, our friend slipped from his horse and caught the constable by the throat.

"Hands off," cried the constable—"hands off, I say!"

"No, no," said Dick—"you shall be punished. I will make a bird of you!"

The constable glared in surprise.

Dick had been careful to assume in his tone and manner a certain amount of wildness, which began to impress the constable in a manner that he intended it should—namely, that the constable had a madman to deal with.

"I will degrade you from your office!" said Dick, with increasing wildness. "You shall be a constable no longer. I will strip off your uniform! Hark! Did you hear that?"

"W-hat?" stammered the constable, in genuine alarm for, like most people, he had a great horror of lunatics, and by no means relished the prospect of an adventure with one in that lonely field.

"Hark!" repeated Dick. "I ask you again, can you hear it?"

"Hear what?"

"The moon," said Dick, with deep solemnity. "It tells me that I am right. It tells me to go on and punish you as you deserve."

As quick as thought, Dick produced a pistol—so quickly that the constable could not, for the life of him, make out where it had come from.

No sooner, however, did Dick present it at him than he dropped down suddenly upon his knees in the clayey mud, and roared lustily:

"Oh, murder—murder! Help—help! Here—murder!"

"If you raise your voice again," said Dick, in determined accents, "you are a dead man, so mind that! I tell you you shall suffer for your offence. Obey me—refuse me if you dare! Off with your hat—pull it off at once!"

The constable complied with a quickness quite astonishing.

But the fact was he, fully believing Dick to be mad, had made up his mind to comply with every demand that he could, in the hope that by this means he should be able to get away.

"Your wig as well," said Dick, who noticed that the constable endeavored to fix this article properly in its place.

It was given up without a murmur.

"Quick!" he continued. "Your cloak, coat, and waistcoat! Do you dare to hesitate and falter, villain? In another moment——"

Dick did not finish his sentence by words, but very suggestively brought his pistol to full cock.

The clicking sound thus made immediately increased the terror under which the constable labored.

Never before had he divested himself of his apparel with so much dexterity and speed.

Dick took the articles one by one, placing them carefully across his arm.

The reader no doubt guesses what was his intention.

It was to obtain from this man these upper outer articles of clothing in order to disguise himself, and yet to obtain them in a manner that would not lead anyone to suspect the purpose for which he required them.

He had now got all he wanted, and nothing remained but to frighten the constable away.

The poor wretch was now shivering, and his teeth were chattering, half with cold and half with fright.

"Quick!" Dick continued—"off with the rest of your things, then you shall roll yourself over and over in the mud until I tell you to stop. Hark again! Don't you hear the moon that commands me to make a bird of you?"

If the constable had had doubts lingering in his mind as to Dick's sanity they no longer existed.

Now he was impressed also with the belief that he was in imminent danger of his life, and therefore resolved to pluck up his courage, and make a bold rush and endeavor to escape.

This was just what Dick had calculated upon.

With a loud shout, then, the constable turned round, and once more set to work to run across the ploughed field.

Dick called after him to stop, and made a feint of pursuing him.

But the constable ran on all the more swiftly.

Deeper and deeper sank his boots in the soft, miry ground, until at last his feet came out of them entirely.

But, heedless of this, he continued his headlong course, leaving them sticking up behind him.

He staggered, stumbled, and fell; he rolled over more than once, and when, after many efforts, he succeeded in gaining his feet, he did indeed present a most pitiable aspect.

Dick watched him for some time, then perceiving in the distance that lights were moving about hither and thither, he guessed the alarm had been given, and resolved to lose no more time in taking his departure.

Nevertheless, he laughed so heartily at the constable's condition, that he could scarcely scramble into the saddle.

He tied all the articles of clothing up into the cloak, with the resolve to attire himself in them as soon as he had a good opportunity.

The constable, floundering on, and, in his excitement, quite blind to all objects in his path, ran headlong into a ditch, and long before those who had been aroused by his cries came and helped him out of it, Dick had left the ploughed field a long way behind him.

"Fortune favors me," he cried, in an exultant tone, as Black Bess leaped over a low hedge into the high-road. "Aha! it has been a good joke! I felt in need of a good laugh about something; but I shall take my success in this matter as an omen of what is to follow. Dressed in these things, I believe I shall be able to disguise myself effectually."

This little adventure had, however, run away with a good deal of time, and so, as the firm, hard road was lying beneath Black Bess's feet, Dick urged his mare to a little better speed.

While journeying on, however, he looked keenly about him in search of some place to which he could retire and make the requisite change in his apparel.

In this matter luck again appeared to befriend him, for before he had gone far he perceived a small, broken-down, ruined shed.

So far as he could tell, it was empty and deserted, and here he determined to remain for a few moments, and don the constable's apparel.

He listened, but all was still, and without further hesitation he entered the shed.

He fancied he heard a slight movement, but was not certain.

Evidently, however, he did not consider it worth taking any notice of, for, untying his bundle, he put on first of all the huge waistcoat with its large flap pockets, and after that the coat.

The constable was so much stouter than Dick, that these articles went on easily over the highwayman's ordinary apparel, and when the cloak, wig, and gold-laced hat were added, the metamorphosis was complete.

In such an eminently parochial-looking individual as he now appeared, no one would think of looking for the daring highwayman, Dick Turpin.

CHAPTER CMLXXV.

IN WHICH DICK TURPIN PAYS WITH BLACK BESS, AND FINDS THAT HIS DISGUISE IS BY NO MEANS PERFECT.

Just as Dick had finished making these changes in his appearance, the slight noise was again heard, only this time it was more unmistakable.

"Who's there?" Turpin cried, turning round quickly. "Speak—who are you?"

"What's that to you?" said a growling voice.

"Who are you?" said Dick, again. "And beware how you trifle with me!"

"You be blowed!" said the voice, again. "I should just like to know what you have been togging yourself up in those things for? Dark as it is, I seed you."

"Did you indeed?" said Dick. "Then I'll see you in return, though, if you have no objection, we will have a little light on the subject."

A hasty movement followed these words.

As we have often stated, Dick took good care never to be without the means of procuring a light.

He had not been long in learning the absolute necessity there was for this.

On the present occasion he quickly ignited one of the small pieces of wax taper that he always carried about him, and as he held it above his head it diffused quite light enough to illuminate the interior of that ruined shed.

Lying in one corner, covered over by a heap of rags and straw, was what beyond all doubt was a human being, though of what sex it was impossible to discover, though the voice had decidedly a masculine tone.

"I don't know you," said Dick, "and you need not know me. I thought I had the place all to myself. However, if you like to hold your tongue about what you have seen, and say nothing about it, you can have this for a reward."

As he spoke, he tossed a guinea in the direction of the miserable object in the straw, and no sooner had he done so than he turned abruptly on his heel, and mounted Black Bess as quickly as he was able.

"Confound it!" he muttered. "I am vexed that, after all the precautions I have taken, some one should actually see me assume this disguise; and yet what have I to fear from such a miserable object as that was? Bah! the matter is not worth another second's thought!"

But although he said this, he could not banish the remembrance from his mind, nor could he help it making him feel decidedly uncomfortable.

But soon afterwards his attention was diverted, for, happening to look along the road before him, he perceived the figure of some person on horseback.

The animal appeared to be a very spirited one, for it was prancing, and curvetting, and rearing in a manner dangerous to any inexperienced rider, as the person on his back clearly seemed to be.

"He'll be off," ejaculated Dick, after watching the movements of the horse and rider for a few seconds—"he'll be off—I know he will! By Jove, there he is!"

Just while he spoke, the horse, by a sudden movement, succeeded in unseating its rider, who fell with a heavy, disagreeable crash to the earth.

Luckily, the rider's feet were not entangled in the stirrups, and, what was oddest of all, the horse, having, as one might say, accomplished his purpose, stood perfectly still.

All this appeared very odd to Dick, who, however, accelerated Black Bess's speed in order to reach the scene of accident, and ascertain whether the stranger was seriously hurt or not, and in any case to proffer assistance.

The horse appeared to view Dick's approach with considerable distrust, and once seemed ready to start off at full speed.

Dick noticed it, and resolved not to allow the animal the chance of doing so if he could help it, so, with considerable adroitness, he seized hold of the rein, and secured it to the branch of a tree.

This done, he turned his attention to the stranger, who still lay immovable upon the ground, just in the same position as he had fallen.

Dick stooped down over him, and then saw that the figure was slim, and the face young and almost too delicate-looking for a man's.

The costume of this young man was, however, very rich indeed, and Dick concluded at once that he belonged to some high family, for among the upper ranks of society such an effeminacy of appearance was by no means uncommon.

"Are you much hurt, young sir?" said Dick, bending down over him. "Do you think you will be able to rise with my assistance?"

Not a word was given in reply to this speech, and Dick began to fear that this young horseman had met with his death.

Placing his hand at the back of his neck, however, Dick, by an effort of strength, raised him to a sitting posture.

As he did so, the cap worn by the young stranger was removed, and then immediately a quantity of hair showered down, covering at once his head and neck, and falling far on to the shoulders.

This surprised Dick not a little, and the ejaculation that he gave utterance to upon making the discovery seemed to have the effect of arousing the stranger, who, in a low, faint voice, said:

"Help—help—oh, help me and save me!"

The tones of this voice were inexpressibly sweet and touching; and if Dick had required any further proof than the abundance of hair as to the sex of this stranger, the voice would have been sufficient.

"I will help you," said Dick, in a reassuring voice, "and save you if I can Do you remember your horse threw you?"

"Yes—yes," said the young girl, for such, in truth, she was; "I remember all now, and——"

She started, and even in the semi-darkness Dick could tell that her fair, pale countenance was suffused by a deep blush.

Dick affected to take no notice of it, and he spoke as though he had not guessed the stranger's secret.

"I trust, young sir," he said, "that you are not very dangerously hurt. Do you think, with a little aid from me, you would be able to remount your horse?"

The young girl exhibited many traces of agitation, and endeavored to rise to her feet.

By Dick's assistance she was enabled to do so, and then she limped slowly and painfully towards the spot where he had fastened up her steed.

"I am a little hurt," she said. "I feel bruised and shaken, and my ankle is sprained, I think, but nothing more than that. Many thanks, sir, for the services you have rendered."

"It is not worthy of a thought," said Dick. "But do you not think you are running considerable risk by remounting that spirited creature? He seems to me far beyond your strength."

"Perhaps he may be," was the answer; "but he will probably be calmer now—at any rate, I have no other resource: I dare not linger here."

The young girl tried to mount while she spoke those words, but it is questionable whether she would have succeeded but for the aid Dick afforded her.

"Many thanks, sir," she said again—"many thanks!"

"Here is your hat," said Dick, picking it from the ground; "you had better put it on."

She took it from him, and was about to place it on her head, when she stopped suddenly, for she had discovered that her hair, which she had so carefully concealed beneath it, was flowing over her shoulders.

In the excitement under which she labored she had not noticed this before, but upon making the discovery she believed that Dick must have penetrated her secret.

She was overcome with confusion, but with a great effort she spoke:

"You have behaved so kindly to me, sir," she said, "that I am anxious to stand well in your opinion. How strangely you must think of me to see me in this garb; but, believe me, nothing but the most urgent motives would have induced mo to set out thus attired, and even now I almost shrink from what I have to do."

There was a tone of deep sadness in her voice, which she endeavored to control.

Dick simply bowed, and with increasing hesitation the young girl continued:

"I have known much sorrow and much suffering It has all been caused by one who—who I have come forth to seek to-night. I shall find him," she added, with a deep, long-drawn sigh—"I know I shall find him; but, alas! for me, I——"

Unable to continue any longer in her broken communication, she stopped with more suddenness than Dick had anticipated.

However, she recovered, and looking up to him, she said:

"Farewell, sir—good-night; we shall never meet again; but still, I shall always remember the kind way in which you have treated and spoken to me."

Scarcely had she finished speaking these words than she touched her horse lightly with the spur.

The animal gave a sudden bound, then darted off at full gallop down the road.

Dick stood for a moment perfectly still, gazing after the flying form.

"This is odd enough," he murmured, at length. "There's a mystery there—a strange one too: I would give much to unravel it. I will follow her. Yes—yes, I will follow her; I may be able to render her some assistance."

Dick went a few paces in this direction, which was opposite to the one he ought to take.

But he stopped and muttered:

"No—no, hard as it is to restrain myself, I feel that this is not the time to look after an adventure; I have enough to do before me; besides, she has gone; I may not be able to overtake her—at any rate, for the sake of poor Tom Davis I will not make the trial."

Having thus come to a determination, Dick turned Black Bess's head round, and, dropping the reins upon her neck, urged her forward with his voice.

A few minutes soon took him a considerable distance from the spot where he had met with this strange adventure.

He was now drawing near to London, and, finding such was the case, he relaxed his speed, for he was reminded that as yet he had not come to any definite arrangement as to his proceedings.

"It will never do," he muttered, "to ride through London attired like this, and with Black Bess beneath me. No, no—that will never do! Black Bess would be recognised beyond all doubt. Yet dare I part with her? and, if so, where could she remain?"

These were harassing and perplexing questions, and they cost Dick much thought and consideration before he could come to a conclusion with respect to them.

But while cogitating, he happened to remember that near the entrance to Piccadilly was a small public-house, situate in a narrow street turning out of the thoroughfare just named.

The place was one of a retired description, and he questioned very much whether the people there in whose charge he would leave his mare would recognise her.

At any rate, Dick could think of no better mode of disposing of Black Bess, and so he resolved, without any more hesitation, to adopt it.

When he rode up to the inn, he found that the front of it was in darkness.

Over the gate leading to the stable-yard, however, a dim light was burning.

He pulled away at the handle of the bell, and, after some little delay, a man appeared, who was so busy rubbing the sleep out of his eyes that he could scarcely see anything.

He winked and blinked like an owl.

"Here's this horse," said Dick. "I want you just to pay a little attention to it for a short time, and have it ready when I call. I am not going far, and if you serve me faithfully you will be well rewarded."

"All right, sir!" said the man, who was too sleepy to trouble himself even to take a second glance at the highwayman.

In quite a mechanical way he took hold of Black Bess by the bridle, and led her through the gateway.

The door closed heavily,—and no sooner was it shut than Dick wished he had passed through along with his mare, and ascertained the spot where she had been bestowed.

This was now too late, and, moreover, he thought perhaps it was quite as well that he had remained outside, for if he entered he might confront some one else, and then there would be the danger of recognition.

He felt if he remained lingering near the inn he should regret what he had done, and therefore, with a hurried step, he turned away.

"I will soon be back," he muttered, "or I will send some one for Black Bess, if I fancy there is any danger in going myself. There's plenty of time to think about that, though. I wonder how I look in my disguise? Do I resemble a parish constable, I wonder? I think so. Ah, that will not do—no, certainly not!"

While he had been speaking, Dick, in accordance with a habit of his, had stroked the lower part of his face, and in doing so his hand had passed over his moustache, which caused him to give utterance to the last words.

"Confound it!" he said. "I forgot that my moustache will spoil it all! Who ever saw a constable with such an appendage? No, no—it will never do to remain so! I must find some means or other of getting it removed."

This was likely to be a matter of no ordinary difficulty.

It was necessary that it should be removed at once, for he could not tell how soon he should be met by some one or other.

He could not remove it himself, and the hour was so late a one that there was a very slight probability indeed that he would be able to find any barber's shop open, even if he had felt inclined to run the risk of entering one.

CHAPTER CMLXXVI.

IN WHICH DICK TURPIN MANAGES TO GET RID OF HIS MOUSTACHE IN A VERY CLEVER MANNER.

But the more Dick Turpin pondered over this matter, the more he felt the necessity of having his moustache removed.

It was altogether incongruous with his disguise.

He had just reached this point in his reflections, when he caught sight, at some little distance off up the street along which he was hastening, a feeble gleam of light.

On coming nearer, what was his surprise to perceive that the light actually came from a barber's shop.

He paused outside irresolutely.

Really it seemed as though chance had directed his footsteps to that very spot, and he was conscious that if he allowed this opportunity to slip by him he would not have another presented to him.

Nevertheless, he could not make up his mind to walk boldly into the shop; but he stopped outside the window, and by peeping in between the various objects it contained, endeavored to get a view of the interior of the shop.

While he was so engaged, he heard a footstep near at hand.

He looked up and caught sight of a thin, little-sized man, with a remarkable-looking, pointed chin, approaching.

He ran into the shop in what was certainly a most furious manner, and no sooner had he entered it and glanced all around than he uttered several strange cries, all of which were in the strongest degree indicative of violent rage.

Dick was amused at his proceedings, and continued to watch him with great anxiety.

"I'll be the death of him!" said this man, as he pulled off his coat, and flung it down in a passion—"I'll be the death of him! I'll—I'll——"

He stopped, and made a frantic rush to a drawer, from which, in the twinkling of an eye, he produced a razor, which he began to strap rapidly on the palm of his hand.

The noise he had made evidently attracted the attention of some other persons in the house, for just then an inner door was timidly opened to the extent of about a couple of inches, and a woman's face appeared.

The barber—for such no doubt he was—uttered a howl.

"Where's that villain Sam?" he roared—"where is he?—where's he gone?"

"Lor, Mr. Goodge, how in the world should I know? He's such an awful boy that is!" replied the woman, in a remarkably mild tone of voice, which contrasted strongly with the barber's infuriated accents.

"I'll be the death of him!" he repeated. "Let me ask you, ma'am, whether I did not leave him in my shop with particular directions as to what he was to do? Didn't I say that as soon as nine o'clock came he was to shut up the shop and go home—didn't I tell him all that?"

"I believe you did, sir?"

"Of course I did! And how dare I come home at this unearthly hour and find the shop staring wide open, and that villain nowhere to be found. But let me get hold of him—only let me get hold of him, and I'll finish him!"

The barber accompanied these words with such a fiendish look, that the woman, thoroughly alarmed, vanished immediately from the door.

"Then the cause of the shop being opened is explained," thought Dick, who had heard every word of this conversation. "What an odd chance! I'll warrant there's not another barber's shop open in London. I'll enter here at all risks; perhaps in his excited state I can work upon him a little."

With these words, Dick approached the door, and only just in time, for the barber was beginning to think about closing his shop.

Dick stood just on the threshold and projected only his head and the upper part of his body into the shop.

"Good morning—good morning!" he said, assuming a peculiarly vacant smile, and making an odd grimace—"good morning, Mr. Goodge! I am the Prince of Wales. How do you do, eh? Seen the moon lately?"

To say that the barber was astonished by Dick's sudden appearance and his extraordinary words would not be to say much.

So overcome was he that he could do nothing but stagger back a few paces, and goggle his eyes frightfully.

Dick availed himself of the opportunity to slip inside the shop.

He closed the door behind him, and as he did so he noticed that the key was sticking in the lock.

He turned it round, and removed it at once, then coolly consigned it to his pocket.

"Murder!" said the barber, in a faint, exhausted voice—"oh, murder! This is a madman escaped from some asylum! What shall I do?"

Dick certainly simulated the manner of an insane person to great perfection.

The barber was completely deceived by it.

Putting on a most mysterious aspect, and extending one hand before him, Dick approached the barber, who gradually retreated until he was brought up by the wall, and found himself unable to go any further.

Then Dick took hold of him by the collar of his coat, and placed his lips close to his ear.

"Hush!" he said "Do you wish to know what must be done?"

"No—no!"

"I have made a vow—yes, I repeat it—a vow. It was that the first man I met should either shave me or let me shave him."

With these words, Dick pounced suddenly upon a razor which his keen eyes had detected lying close at hand.

He flourished it in the air in a most alarming manner, as he continued, with additional excitement:

"Come on, I am ready—I am armed! Sit down, and I will shave you as you were never shaved before!"

The prospect of this operation horrified the barber beyond all measure.

The bare thought of sitting down in a chair at the mercy of a lunatic who held a razor was too horrible to bear reflection.

"No, no, my good sir," he said, with chattering teeth and trembling knees—"my very good sir——"

"Wretch!—dastard! do you know what you are saying?" cried Dick, pretending all at once to fall into an ungovernable rage. "Is that the way you address me, you miserable, chin-scraping wretch?"

"I beg your pardon," said the barber, who, having heard that the best way of treating lunatics was to comply as far as possible with all their wishes—"I humbly beg your pardon, your Royal Highness! I hope you will forgive me!"

"Ah, good!" said Dick. "Now, then, down in the chair with you at once!"

"But, your Royal Highness," said the barber, bowing and scraping at every word, though he was so horribly afraid that he scarcely knew what he said, "may I call your Royal Highness's attention to the fact that I am already clean shaved—that there is not so much as the ghost of a bristle anywhere on my face?"

"No matter," said Dick—"the razor will go all the more easily"

"But did not your Royal Highness say something about being shaved yourself? Suppose, now, you allowed me to remove that untidy moustache on your lip?"

"Yes, yes—of course!" said Dick. "That's what I meant! How dare you dispute my commands? Quick—come here at once! I have no time to lose!"

These were welcome words indeed for the barber, and he made up his mind to shave his disagreeable customer as quickly as he could, and then trust to his ingenuity to get him out of the shop.

He was not without a hope that he would depart quietly.

This was just the frame of mind that Dick Turpin wished to bring him into, so he put down the razor, and calmly seated himself in the chair.

But while doing this, as the reader may easily believe, he kept the keenest possible eye that he could upon the movements of the barber, for it was quite likely that individual would summon the assistance of his neighbors, and endeavor to capture the supposed lunatic.

"Come on!" he cried, furiously—"come on. How long do you intend to keep me waiting?"

Fearing some act of violence, the barber replied, most civilly:

"Now, your Royal Highness—I am coming now—I shall not be another second."

He bustled about, and made his preparations.

As soon as the barber approached the chair, Dick cried:

"Ah, villain! I read your purpose in your eyes—I know the intention in your mind! You mean to shave off my eyebrows!"

"Nothing of the kind, your Royal Highness—nothing of the kind," said the barber. "If you would allow me to say so, that is entirely a mistake on your Royal Highness's part, as I will soon convince you."

Dick leaned back, pretending to take upon himself a quiet mood, as mad people sometimes do.

The barber, trembling all over, inwardly cursing his apprentice, to whose door he laid this disagreeable adventure, bent himself to the task of shaving his customer with all possible dexterity—in fact, in less than a minute Dick found himself entirely divested of his moustache.

He happened to catch sight of himself in a glass that was opposite, and was struck immediately by the great difference it made to his appearance.

"Performed!" said Dick, with a wild shout, as he sprang to his feet—"performed—the deed is performed! Come, rascal—a towel!"

This article was handed to him, on which he wiped his face carefully.

"Dear me," Dick said, by way of giving the barber a parting fright, "I feel dreadfully hungry! I must have something to eat. Have you such a thing as a baby in the house?"

The barber turned pale with fear.

"I must have a baby!" continued Dick, making a horrible sound with his mouth. "Is there one in the house, eh?"

"No—no," stammered the barber, desperately, "I think if your Royal Highness would only try next door you will find that they have one that will exactly suit you."

"Ah!" said Dick, suddenly, "next door, of course! I will go there."

The barber gave a long-drawn sigh of relief.

Dick produced the key from his pocket, opened the door quickly, and passed out.

No sooner, however, had he crossed the threshold than the barber turned the key in the lock once more, and then, not content with that amount of security, drew a couple of bolts, and put up a bar.

"Thank goodness," he ejaculated, as he sank, limp and half-fainting, into a chair—"thank goodness he is gone! Oh, the dreadful wretch!—the villain! I shall always be frightened to death to be in the shop of a night after this! But it's Sam's fault—I'll pay him out for it to-morrow!"

The change that came over Dick's appearance as soon as the barber's door was closed behind him was truly remarkable.

Stroking his face and adjusting his apparel, he murmured:

"I rather think I have managed that little affair with some cleverness. At any rate, I'll wager the barber will never suspect who he has done such a service for."

With these words, Dick strode hastily onward, for the hour was a late one, or rather an early one, and he was anxious to reach the White Horse without delay.

The streets were almost deserted; but the few people he met did not even trouble themselves to give a second glance at him, which was a source of considerable satisfaction to the highwayman, for it filled him with the hope that he should be able to carry out his mission successfully.

Soon after this he found himself near to Drury Lane, and then began to wonder what steps he should take in order to gain admission to Old Matthew's house.

Certainly there was the little secret door in White Horse Yard; but then that would doubtless be watched, and should he be seen entering by stealth, suspicion would at once be aroused.

This consideration made him determine to walk boldly up to the inn to push open the door, enter, and walk up to the bar without heeding who might be there.

This was certainly a very bold plan of operations; but then its very boldness was well calculated to carry success along with it.

Having come to this decision, Dick evinced no hesitation.

The oil lamp was burning outside the front door of the inn as usual, and through the swinging half-glass door placed a little way down the passage came another dim and feeble ray of light.

CHAPTER CMLXXVII.

OLD MATTHEW PENETRATES DICK TURPIN'S DISGUISE.

"THERE is certainly a slight surprise in store for Old Matthew," said Dick, as, after a hasty glance up and down the street, he crossed the threshold of the White Horse. "At any rate, I will test the efficiency of my disguise. If he fails to recognise me, I shall have the greatest amount of confidence in it."

These thoughts passed through Dick's mind as he pushed open the swinging door we have just mentioned, and which brought him at once into full view of the bar.

Here he was rejoiced to find Old Matthew standing alone, busily engaged in decanting some liquid from one bottle to another.

Dick marched up to the counter with a step very different to his usual one.

Then pausing, he said, in a sharp, cracked voice:

"Mr. Gale, consider yourself in custody!"

Old Matthew, hearing these words, naturally enough gave a great start, and turned round.

He looked Dick full in the face for some moments without saying a word, and while he did so his countenance wore a very puzzled look.

At length the expression of the features changed entirely, and winking his eye, and at the same time shaking his head, he exclaimed:

"No, no, Dick—it won't do, though I am willing to surrender to you whenever you wish it."

"You know me, then?" said Turpin, as he gave a hasty glance around, in order to ascertain that no listeners were near.

"Yes, I know you, of course," said Matthew, coming forward, and shaking him by the hand. "At first, I do confess, I was puzzled. The absence of your moustache makes a wonderful difference to your face. But where on earth did you get that strange costume?"

"I will tell you all about it, Matthew, and plenty more besides—that is if we can only have the opportunity of exchanging a few words with each other."

"Well, we'll try."

"Have you been much troubled by the officers lately?"

"No, not much—very little. After that last adventure of yours, I almost think that they have made up their minds that the wisest thing they can do is to let me alone."

"I hope they have," said Dick. "But where are you going to?"

"This way," said Matthew, who had quitted the bar. "I've got a comfortable room upstairs, and we can surely sit there and converse in private?"

"Will it be safe?"

"As safe as anywhere."

"Enough, Matthew. I have the greatest confidence in you, and place myself willingly in your hands. I know the great extent of your resources."

Old Matthew smiled, and it may be that the smile was one of satisfied vanity.

He preceded Dick up the old oaken staircase, and, pushing open a door at the top, he ushered his visitor into a small room plainly yet comfortably furnished.

Producing a light, Matthew ignited a lamp standing on the table.

Then he said, rapidly:

"Wait here a moment, Dick, while I run downstairs and leave the necessary instructions in case of an alarm. I will be back directly."

"And bring something with you," cried Dick.

"Yes, yes—never fear; but do not speak so loud."

With these words Matthew departed.

He was absent only a few minutes, yet to Dick it seemed a long time.

When he reappeared, he was carrying before him a huge tray, on which was set out a very tempting array of eatables and drinkables.

There, now," he cried, "what do you think of such a feast as that, and at a moment's notice, too? The fact is, I feel quite peckish myself, and shall have a good deal of pleasure in joining you."

Old Matthew was a very good hand with the knife and fork, and, no matter what time in the day or night it might be, he was generally ready to make a meal with anyone.

"I expected to astonish you much more by my arrival," said Dick, after a short pause, during which they had both been paying their respects to what they had before them.

"Very likely," answered Matthew; "but the truth is, I expected you."

"Expected me?"

"Yes—I have been looking for you for days and days past. I'll warrant I know your errand—it concerns Tom Davis. You are not the one to leave a friend in the lurch."

"Not by any means," said Dick. "You have guessed rightly—my intention is to get him out of his trouble, and I have come to you to ask you how to do it."

"Well, then," Matthew responded, "I can do that in a very few minutes; and before we proceed to that, I am determined to have from you an account of your late doings. You can be as brief as you like, but I must have it."

Dick knew that it would only be an utter waste of time to hesitate or to attempt to persuade old Matthew to postpone the account of his adventures.

Taking, therefore, what was the shortest way, Dick began abruptly, and, as briefly as ever he could, placed his old friend in possession of those facts with which the reader is already well acquainted.

By the time this was done the meal was over.

Drawing the chairs closer to the fire, they then set about the consideration of the business before them.

That the subject was an important one could be told by the very manner in which old Matthew filled and lighted his pipe and drew the first few whiffs.

"I've a good deal to tell you, Dick," he began, "and I may as well make a straightforward tale of it."

"By all means. Begin by telling me whether you communicated with him or not, according to our arrangement."

"If you will listen," said Matthew, "I will tell you all. And if you abstain from making interruptions, much time will be saved."

Dick simply nodded his head, and Matthew took this hint to proceed.

"When we parted on the last occasion," he said, "I just snatched a few hours' slumber, and the first thing the next morning went to a lawyer that I have had some dealings with, and who I knew to be a very clever fellow. I told him Tom Davis's exact position, said he was a friend of mine, and that I was anxious and willing to go to any expense in order to obtain the best talent on his behalf when his trial took place."

"Good!" said Dick. "It would be impossible to act better than that."

"So I thought," answered Matthew, complacently. "You see I have found that, in a general way, as regards the law, if you have only got the money to pay for it you can obtain what you require, and so I had the strongest hopes for Tom Davis's safety."

"Then the lawyer has undertaken the case?"

"He has, and has had frequent interviews with Tom. He has told him what we intend to do on his behalf, and if this, the first attempt, fails, another will be made."

"He would be glad to learn," said Dick, "that he was not forgotten by his friends."

"He knows you too well to fear being forgotten," said Matthew. "But, however, I have not seen him myself—indeed, I have not made the attempt, for I fancied anything of the kind would only be a means of exciting suspicion."

"And perhaps of getting yourself into trouble," interrupted Dick.

"Very likely; and the lawyer expressly cautioned me against it."

"And what steps has this lawyer taken up to the present time?"

"Nothing further than to engage a most eminent counsel, who will do his best to get the three prisoners off. The charge against Tom is a very grave and serious one, and if they succeed in obtaining his acquittal they will fairly be entitled to a good round sum."

"And they shall have it," said Dick—"they shall have it!"

Matthew smiled at the emphasis with which he spoke.

"Why, what a foolish thing it would be," he said, "for anyone in whom you place trust to betray you; at the most, only a share of the reward would be received as the fruits of what they had done, whereas, by befriending you, they can at any time make sure of double the whole amount."

"That's very true," said Dick, "and I believe we have all owed our safety in a very great measure to that very circumstance. But the trial—when does that take place?"

"The assizes begin to-day," answered Matthew, "and the case is liable to be called on at any moment; it may stand over to the end of the week, and it may be commenced to-morrow morning."

"Indeed!" said Dick—"so soon as that? If so, that leaves a very little time for preparations."

"You are right," said Matthew. "And yet, after all, I hope in all sincerity it will take place in the morning."

"Why so?"

"Because then the state of suspense we are now in will be put an end to—we shall know then precisely what to do. If the lawyers fail, and they are all three sentenced to transportation, we must make up our minds how to set them free."

"Exactly," said Dick.

At this moment there came a gentle rap at the door of the room.

Old Matthew gave such a nervous start that he dropped his pipe, which broke into fragments on the hearth.

"Don't be alarmed, Dick," he said, rising to his feet and going to the door. "I think I know now what I am wanted for."

He turned the key as he spoke, for he had taken the precaution to lock the door.

Throwing it open on its hinges, he perceived the girl who assisted him standing on the threshold.

"You are wanted," she said, "by a gentleman downstairs."

"I thought so" said Matthew; "but at the moment I forgot."

"Who is it?" asked Dick.

"No one but the lawyer. He promised to call here to-night and let me know in case anything unusual should have occurred. I will be back again immediately; but, for safety's sake, just lock the door behind me."

Dick was not slow to comply with this request.

He waited in the utmost suspense, however, until the landlord returned.

He came back at length, bearing on his countenance a very portentous look.

"The news?" said Dick, hastily. "Do not keep me any longer; my impatience while you were absent grew so great, that I was almost ready to come down and join you in the consultation."

"Then be glad that you had the prudence to restrain yourself."

"But the news, Matthew—what have you heard?"

"Why, simply that the lawyer has ascertained that Tom Davis's case is put down for the first in the morning, and in all probability it will be taken then."

"And what time does the court open?"

"At ten o'clock."

"We have not many hours to wait then," continued Dick, "for it is already past midnight."

"So much the better," answered Matthew; "I am anxious for it to be over."

"Did the lawyer express an opinion?"

"Well, scarcely; but yet he alluded to the difficulties he had to deal with. The evidence is so confoundedly straightforward and clear that it is scarcely possible for the cleverest man to bother or confuse the brains of the jury, easy as it often is to do so."

"Rather more than nine hours," said Dick, musingly. "A very short time—a very short time; not long enough to go and return."

"What are you muttering about?" asked the landlord.

"Why," said Dick, "as the trial is to take place so soon, I will make the attempt to stay in London until it is over; but my companions and Maud will all be full of anxiety on my account, and I was wondering whether I could ride over and tell them all was well, and be back in time."

"Don't think of any such foolish proceeding," said Matthew. "You will be able to return before midnight to-morrow night, and they must endure their suspense till then as best they may."

"I suppose so," said Dick, with a sigh; "yet I could have wished——"

"What?"

"That we had been able to communicate with them in some way."

"But how is it to be done?"

"Have you no one that you can trust to send upon such an expedition?"

"No one at all; and, believe me, Dick, I do not think the occasion sufficiently pressing to warrant you in letting anyone else into the secret of your present retreat."

"Perhaps not," answered Turpin. "At any rate, we will think no more about it."

"Wisely determined, I think. And now, Dick, as regards your staying here, I think, if you will only have the prudence to remain in this room, that all will be well. The attention of all the officers will be very much taken up by Tom Davis's trial—they will all want to know the result. For that reason, you can count upon the probability of being left here unmolested. Then, as soon as the verdict is pronounced, I will leave the court, and come here to you."

Dick was silent for a moment, and then he said:

"That's all very well, Matthew, but I have a word or two to say yet as regards the bargain. If I stay here, as I fully intend, I shall not be satisfied to keep close prisoner in this room; on the contrary, I have determined to go with you to the court, and be present at the trial myself."

Matthew started to his feet, and spoke angrily.

"You are mad, Dick—mad—quite mad! No one in his sober senses standing in your position would dream of such a proceeding!"

"I don't know that," said Dick. "I've done it before in safety; and I consider that I have rather a talent in disguises."

"But you surely do not think that mere change in your costume is sufficient?"

"No, I do not," was the reply; "but I have been thinking of that old friend of yours, who has been of assistance to me more than once before."

"You mean the old costumier in Bow Street?"

"I do. Believe me, Matthew, he will be able to disguise me so well that not even you could recognise me."

CHAPTER CMLXXVIII.

DICK TURPIN FINDS HIMSELF IN UNEXPECTED PERIL.

"Don't try it, Dick—don't try it! Take my advice, and abandon that at once."

But Turpin only shook his head resolutely.

"I am sorry to differ from you," he said, "and I like to follow your advice whenever I can, because I know it is good. On the present occasion I feel sure that if I underrate the danger, you overrate it, and therefore I believe it will be safe for me to go."

"Well, Dick, you know a wilful man will always have his own way. If you find yourself in the wrong box don't blame me."

"I won't, you may depend upon it. But in the event of such a thing, don't have any ill-feeling against me, but do your best once more to get me out of the scrape."

"Ah, Dick," said Matthew, more and more seriously, "I feel impressed with the idea that if you are once more made a prisoner and confined in a cell it will be for good—no human aid will ever release you."

It was more the manner in which old Matthew spoke than the words he uttered that impressed the highwayman; nevertheless, while he spoke, Dick shuddered, though he tried hard to feel at ease.

"Come, Matthew," he said, abruptly, "may we consider this matter settled? If so, I will set out for the costumier's at once, otherwise it will be too late."

"I can't alter my opinions," returned the landlord.

"And I cannot bear the prospect of remaining in this room all day," said Dick, rising to his feet, "and, therefore, if you will go downstairs and see that the coast is clear I will take my departure."

"Only think," said Matthew, "that you in your position should have the audacity of thinking about paying a visit to a house situated nearly opposite the police station in Bow Street—certainly within sight of it!"

"That's the reason why it's the safest place in the world," returned the highwayman; "they would never give me credit for such a daring act as that."

"I don't know; they are getting used to your audacious tricks now; I do not believe they would be surprised at anything you did."

"Well—well, we may stay here talking for hours to come without advancing any further. Go now and see whether it will be safe for me to depart."

Very reluctantly indeed did old Matthew obey this request.

He was not absent very long, and when he came back he felt compelled to tell Dick the truth, for he had never deceived him yet, and so he said:

"All's well, Dick; if you wished it you could not have the coast clearer than it is now."

"Then I'm off."

Matthew gave a half sigh, and almost regretted his own open-mindedness, for he was aware that in all probability if he had told Dick there was danger abroad he would have abandoned his perilous enterprise.

But Dick rapidly put on his hat and wrapped the constable's cloak around him.

"Now, Matthew," he said, "not another word of discussion. Lead the way. If we linger only five minutes we may miss this desirable opportunity."

Without a word, Matthew walked from the room, Dick following closely at his heels.

"Leave me here," said the highwayman, as soon as the foot of the staircase was gained; "don't attempt to accompany me to the threshold. When I come back I shall be in a widely-different dress to this, you may depend, and so well disguised that even you, although knowing my intention, will be baffled."

"Have you made up your mind what disguise to take?"

"I have not; I shall be guided by the costumier."

"You cannot do better; he is a perfect master of his art."

"Then, for the present, farewell!"

With these words, Dick walked hastily along the passage, pushed open the swinging glass door, and the next moment was walking rapidly up Drury Lane.

The nearest way to his destination lay directly past the station in Bow Street, but, with all his daring, Dick had the prudence to avoid this route.

He made, instead, a considerable detour.

Entering Bow Street from the upper end, he crossed at once to the side on which the costumier's house was built, and a few hasty steps brought him before the door.

He remembered that in the door-post there was a little bell handle so well concealed among the carving that it required a keen eye to detect it.

Dick placed his hand upon it at once, and as he pulled it, the faint tinkling of a little bell reached his ears.

He waited, then, with some impatience for the door to be opened, and while doing so, he cast several stealthy glances across the road.

[DICK TURPIN AND THE OLD COSTUMIER.]

A little lower down on his left hand he could see an oil lamp burning.

This lamp hung over the doorway of the police-station.

Straining his eyes, he fancied he could perceive several officers lounging near the doorway; but in this particular he might have been deceived by his imagination, for the night was dark.

No notice apparently being taken of his summons for admittance, he pulled the bell again; but this time, before the tinkling had time to die away, the door was opened, and the old costumier, only partially dressed, and carrying a lighted candle in his hand, appeared upon the threshold.

His eyes had a sleepy, vacant look, and he winked and blinked at the guttering candle in a manner ludicrous to behold, yet, for all that, he made out the form of his visitor.

Bowing low, according to his custom, he said:

"Munificent sir, you are welcome. Enter!"

Dick lost not a moment in obeying, and when the front door was closed behind him, and he stood in the dark passage of this house, he felt that he was comparatively safe.

"You wish to avail yourself of my services, I suppose?" said the costumier.

"I do, and I wish you to put forth your utmost skill."

"'I will do so willingly and gladly, for I do not forget the past. This way, sir—this way! Be good enough to follow me up the staircase."

Dick obeyed without the slightest hesitation, for he had the utmost trust in the old man's good faith.

Reaching the top of the first flight of stairs, the costumier led the way into a room which was in every part overstrewed with miscellaneous articles of all descriptions.

"The reward to be earned by this night's service is large," said Dick, as he seated himself upon a table, the only available seat he could find, "for I am about to set out upon an expedition of great danger, and my disguise must be complete."

The old man nodded.

"What would you choose?" he said.

"That I determine to leave to you. I consider that you would be best able to guide me."

The costumier appeared to fall into a fit of profound thought.

His eyes closed, and Dick looked with interest upon his strange, wrinkled physiognomy.

The muscles about the lower part of his face twitched strangely, and the highwayman wondered, yet little guessed, what was the nature of the old man's thoughts.

Opening his eyes at length, he said, as Dick fancied, with some confusion:

"What should you think of a sailor?—would the disguise suit you? Could you personate the character?"

Dick reflected a moment, and said:

"I believe I could—yes, I feel sure I could."

"Then," said the costumier, "I should think it would suit you admirably, for your foes would never think of looking for you in such a garb as that."

"True," said Dick—"quite true."

"Then you decide upon that?"

"I do."

"Well, then," said the old man, "if you will remain here for a few moments—perhaps, too, you won't mind being in the dark, for I have no other light—I will go down and fetch a few things that are requisite."

He said this hesitatingly and awkwardly, yet the cause of this might be that he was solicitous not to give offence to one who had proved himself to be so good a customer as Dick had.

"Very well," said Dick. "I don't mind the darkness in the least; but, above all things, make haste, for I can assure you I have no time to lose."

"I can fully understand that," was the reply, spoken hurriedly and hastily.

No sooner had the last words escaped his lips, than the old costumier picked up the candle and left the room.

He closed the door behind him.

Dick was then in utter darkness, save and except that underneath the door could be seen a bright line of light.

He remained perfectly still, listening to the creaking noise produced by the costumier descending the staircase.

Then, drawing a long breath, Dick said:

"I wonder what it is that ails me? What can there be in the atmosphere of this place that makes it so oppressive? All these old clothes, I suppose. Bah! it is enough to suffocate one! I'll open the door."

With these words, Dick slid off the table, and groped his way carefully to the doorway.

He had accurately noted its position, and so he gained it without coming into contact with any of the many objects with which the place was literally crammed.

The air upon the staircase seemed to his heated fancy to be in no degree purer than that in the room, and he seemed absolutely to be gasping for breath.

Then faintly, and coming from afar off, he could hear the murmur of a voice.

This was a circumstance that roused up all his energies at once.

He immediately became on the alert, and listened eagerly.

But although his sense of hearing was so acute, he was unable to distinguish anything besides a hollow, murmuring sound.

"Who can it be?" Dick thought. "I always fancied that the old costumier lived alone, and what should he have to say, I wonder? I'll find out."

It was purely upon the impulse of the moment that Dick acted. He did not wait to reflect upon his decision; but very slowly and stealthily began to descend the stairs, for he knew that at the lightest tread they creaked dismally.

There was a vague sensation of alarm in Turpin's breast—a sensation that increased every moment in intensity.

It may have been that his proximity to the station at Bow Street produced a certain amount of nervousness—a greater amount than he ordinarily felt.

Be the cause what it might, however, he was most certainly apprehensive of danger to himself, and so, step by step, he went down the old, worm-eaten staircase.

At length he paused.

The murmur of voices became more audible, and one word distinctly reached his ears.

Looking round the angle of the balusters, he perceived at some distance off the glimmer of a light.

From his position he fancied it came from the shop.

"Isaac—Isaac," said the voice, which Turpin had no difficulty in recognising as that of the old costumier—"Isaac—Isaac, get your sleepy eyes wider open. Are you sure you understand me?"

"Quite sure," said a growling voice, though the sound of it made Turpin aware that the speaker was a boy.

"Understand, Isaac," the old costumier added, in a lower key, "it's a fortune that you are going to make within the next half hour—a fortune—that is, enough for you to spend for the rest of your life."

"I quite understand," was the reply; "but what is it you want me to do?"

"Hush—hush—be quiet! There's some one above for whom a large reward is offered."

"You mean the chap that came here once before."

"I do, Isaac—your memory is good. His race must be nearly run now—he cannot last much longer. Such being the case, then, why may not I reap the benefit of his capture as well as anyone else?"

"Better—better!" said the growling voice. "You know that was what I said to you the time before."

"You did, and I have agreed to follow your advice; so now, as I have got all these things in readiness, slip out of the door across the road to the station. Just let the officers know that he is here, and that I am willing to give him up."

"All right," said the boy, and then there was a hasty movement.

"Stop—stop," cried the costumier—"not so much hurry! Wait and hear my full instructions, for the least indiscretion will ruin all."

"Then make haste," was the response. "If you stop down here much longer he will grow suspicious."

"Right, Isaac—that is very likely; but all I have to say is this: when you come back with the officers, enter as silently as you possibly can. Let them surround the house in case of accidents, and you come with the rest up the stairs, dash open the door suddenly, and you will, in all probability, find him seated in a chair, and me standing before him."

"All right," said the growling voice. "You do your part, and I'll do mine. I'm off!"

CHAPTER CMLXXIX.

DICK TURPIN TAKES A DESPERATE LEAP OVER THE HOUSE-TOPS.

DICK TURPIN was so unutterably astounded by this conversation that during its progress he had been unable to move a single limb.

The treachery of the old costumier was well calculated to have an overpowering effect upon him, for, to speak the truth, he had placed as much confidence in him almost as he had in old Matthew, and certainly after what had occurred Turpin would scarcely have been surprised should the latter prove treacherous too.

But he was warned by the increasing brilliancy of the light, and by the shuffling footsteps of the old man, that it would never do to remain any longer in his present position.

The question was, in what way should he act?—what would be the best step to take, and the one most calculated to insure his safety?

His first thought was to rush at full speed down the stairs, overturn the costumier, and immediately make his escape from the house; and perhaps this bold and violent course might have produced success; but Dick hesitated, and the chance was lost.

Not but what he had good cause for hesitation.

In thus precipitately leaving the house, some alarm would of necessity be created, and the police station was so near that the officers would be upon him, as one might say, immediately.

The old costumier began to ascend the staircase, and as he did so Dick went back step by step higher up, until he reached the doorway through which he had emerged.

Here he paused again in doubt, wondering whether he should wait there for the costumier, and then arise upon him and overpower him.

A second reflection told the highwayman that this course could produce no beneficial result, though it might enable him to wreak some punishment on the perfidious old man.

He felt, however, that to escape quickly was the chief thing, and a plan of operations suggesting itself to him just then, he turned round, and with rapid steps ascended the second flight of stairs.

He heard the old costumier enter the room, for so wrapped up was he in the consideration of the iniquity he was about to perpetrate, that he failed to hear the slight noise Dick made in ascending.

By whom the house was tenanted Dick had not the slightest idea.

A dim light coming from some unknown source enabled him to find his way tolerably well up the steep, old-fashioned staircase, until at length he reached the top.

While ascending the last flight, his hands had been busily groping in his pockets for the materials wherewith to produce a light; therefore, without any loss of time, he managed to ignite one of those small pieces of wax candle which once before that night had been of such service to him.

The dim light it afforded was, nevertheless, sufficient to light up the narrow, confined space in which he stood.

He found that, as he had fully expected, he had reached the top of the house, and was standing on a small square landing-place.

Looking up, he saw in the roof one of those small square openings covered with a trap door, with which almost every house in London is provided, to serve as a means of escape in case of fire.

A second glance showed him a short ladder lying close against the wall.

To seize it was the work of a moment, and while he was placing it in the necessary position, he heard that a great uproar was taking place in the lower part of the house.

"Never mind," he muttered, as he ascended the ladder rapidly, "I believe that I have yet got time."

He stopped at the top and drew back the bolts.

The trap-door was then quickly placed aside, and he found himself with the fresh air blowing down upon him.

The candle was at this moment extinguished.

This did not matter, for he had no longer any occasion for its use.

"I can't fasten the door," Dick muttered, "and so put a stop to their progress in that way, but I will draw up the ladder, and that will make it more difficult for them to reach me."

He suited the action to the word, and sent the ladder sliding down over the tiles until it stopped short in the gutter.

He then began to look carefully around him, so as to make sure of taking the best route across the housetops, for, of course, his safety depended upon the course he chose.

Descending at length, he crawled slowly upon the tiles until he reached the centre ridge.

As he was passing over this, a tile, upon which one foot rested, was dislodged from its position, and so suddenly and unexpectedly that before he could save himself or even make an effort to do so, he was slipping at a fearful rate down the sloping roof.

He struggled violently, and strove to arrest his descent by grasping at the edges of the tiles.

But these did not afford him sufficient hold to enable him to stay his speed in the least.

Down he went, and such a shuddering horror took possession of him that he was unable to turn his eyes and look in the direction in which he was falling.

His heart ceased to beat, and a mist seemed to spread itself before his eyes.

Yet vainly and spasmodically clutching, he rolled down until he was brought up with great force and suddenness by the stone parapet, which most unquestionably saved his life.

Luckily, he struck against it feet foremost, and beyond a sharp shock and a slight pain, he felt none the worse for the accident.

Yet a moment elapsed before he could fully persuade himself that he was really saved.

Attracted by the noise evidently coming from below in the street, he cautiously raised himself from the gutter.

Then, prompted by an irrepressible impulse, he bent his head forward so as to look over the edge of the parapet.

To his surprise, he found that quite a crowd of people had collected, surrounding the costumier's door.

By that mysterious means which puzzles everybody, all those persons present had got to learn what was the matter.

Dick was satisfied with one hasty glance; then he shrank back, for there was just the possibility that one of those below looking up might discern his head, in which case a fresh alarm would be raised.

When Dick began again to crawl along the roofs, he became sensible of the fact that he had bruised himself dreadfully in many places, and when he moved his limbs he suffered considerable pain, which kept increasing each moment.

But his progress was now attended with a much greater amount of caution than at first, so, after all, the slight accident he met with was a fortunate event, inasmuch as it taught him the absolute necessity for caution.

In thus scrambling over the roofs, Dick had no settled idea further than that he might perhaps be able to gain an entrance to some house or other at some distance, and so descend to the street unperceived.

A thousand difficulties were in the way of this course; yet he crept on and on, though his pace grew slower in consequence of the pain in all his joints.

At last, with a sigh of disappointment, he stopped and looked despairingly around.

Just in front of him was a division between the housetops, not very wide, but its great height made the abyss look perfectly alarming.

That he could easily leap such a distance, Dick knew very well; but then he was bruised and shaken, and he shrank back with that dread which everyone experiences upon suddenly finding themselves in such a situation.

He looked back as though with the intention of retreating, but just then he heard many voices talking loudly, and directly afterwards a man crawled out of the trap-door from which he had so lately emerged.

Clearly the officers had found some way of reaching the roof independently of the ladder which Dick had so carefully removed.

They had also provided themselves with torches, which cast a bright, ruddy glare around for a considerable distance.

"It must be," said Dick, as he gathered himself up slowly—"it is my only chance. If I make the effort all will be well; but I question whether any of the officers will be bold enough to follow me."

He stepped up as he spoke on to the edge of the stone parapet, which was not more than a foot wide.

In doing so, he could not avoid glancing down to the ground below, and as he did so such a sensation of dizziness came over him that he almost lost his balance.

Between four and five feet distant from him was another parapet, similar in every respect to the one upon which he stood.

This he would have to clear so as to drop upon the roof beyond.

To take such a leap was terrible indeed.

Truly was it a leap for life, and one only to be taken by a man whose only chance of safety lay in doing so.

Dick prepared himself for the effort as best he could.

He gave one spring into the air, striving to forget that he was standing on the top of a high house, endeavoring to cheat his fancy into the belief that he was only on the level ground.

He alighted on the stone coping opposite.

His footing was insecure; he tottered and struggled for a balance.

For a second it seemed as though he must inevitably fall backwards into the abyss and be dashed to pieces; but by a sudden movement of the upper part of his body, Dick threw himself forward, and fell with considerable force upon the rough red tiles.

But he was safe, and that in a measure compensated for all that he had gone through.

He so far lost his consciousness in his fall as to feel an inclination to lie just where he was without moving a single limb; but the recollection that the officers were near to him enabled him to shake off this sensation of languor and depression.

Rising stealthily, he looked behind him, and shuddered again when he beheld the dark black gulf he had overleaped.

The police officers had by this time all passed through the trap-door, and were making slow and careful progress across the housetops, for Dick had left no track behind him by which he could be followed, and he was now at so great a distance as to be out of the sphere of light afforded by their torches.

These indeed were more hindrance to the officers than good, for one hand was constantly kept occupied, leaving only the other to seize hold of the various projections in the roof.

But Dick, although in comparative safety, was anxious to crawl away to such a distance and in such a manner that the officers should lose all trace of him entirely, and with this view he crouched down again, so that his form was concealed by a parapet, and, almost on all-fours, crept along the narrow, slimy gutter.

Bending all his energies to the task he had set himself, Dick kept resolutely on his way; but at length, having gone, as he considered, a sufficient distance, he paused, and slowly rising to an upright posture, took a survey around him.

Although he was invisible to the officers, yet they were plainly to be seen by him, owing to the ruddy halo of light their torches cast around them.

By their manner, Dick could tell they paused at the edge of the abyss over which he had leaped, and he fancied by their gestures that an animated discussion was going on among them as to whether he had really passed that way or not.

Turning his eyes in the opposite direction, Dick perceived, several yards off, a dim, glimmering light.

At one moment it would be tolerably bright, and then it would fade away so as scarcely to be seen.

"That's from an attic window," he muttered, after a more attentive examination of it, "and I should imagine the light proceeds from a fire. I will creep towards it. Perhaps that will present me with an avenue of escape."

While these thoughts were passing through his mind, Dick set himself in motion.

It took but a short time to gain this attic window, but he approached with the utmost caution, for of course he could not tell whether the chamber was inhabited by anyone or not.

Reaching it at last, he paused and listened.

A tattered curtain was drawn partially across the window, but not so closely as to prevent him from taking a peep at the interior if he had chosen to do so.

But Dick did not attempt, for the very instant that he paused the sound of voices came upon his ears.

CHAPTER CMLXXX.

DICK ONCE MORE FINDS THAT AUDACITY COMMANDS SUCCESS.

Upon making this discovery, Dick's first impulse was to crawl away as silently and cautiously as he had arrived, but the words that first fell upon his ears so interested him that, despite the danger of his situation and the urgency there was of immediately moving, he involuntarily waited to hear more.

The voice that Dick heard speaking was evidently that of a young girl, for the tones were sweet and low, although her words were interrupted by frequent choking sobs, and although there was such a tone of anguish in it.

"Do not grieve so—do not weep so bitterly," she said. "Innocent though he was, yet you must have known what would have been the result; he was so entangled that he could not escape. Do not weep, I say again, but be of better heart, and find consolation in the thought that though he has been pronounced guilty by his fellow-creatures, yet there is One who, knowing all, will acquit him of this fearful charge."

The girl was silent, and in the short pause that followed nothing could be heard but sobs and cries of lamentation.

"Girl," said another voice, and this one was of a character altogether different to the first, for it was shrill and piercing, and was indicative of the utmost mental agony and suffering—"girl, it is well and no doubt easy for you to preach, but such words as you utter bring no consolation to my breast; they may console you, for you cannot feel for him as I do, for I am his mother and he is my only one."

"That reproach is unjust—most unjust," was the quick reply; "but you can render him no aid by thus abandoning yourself to sorrow. You know that now the trial is over there is not the shadow of a hope—he will be sent away, and we shall never live to see him more."

While listening to this conversation, Dick had managed to raise himself a little, so as to be able to peep over the top of the tattered curtain we have mentioned, and as he did so a sad spectacle greeted his eyes.

The attic was small and destitute of nearly every article of furniture.

In the small rusty grate a few sticks were burning, which gave out by far more light than heat.

Crouching down on the floor near the hearthstone was the figure of an aged woman.

She was much emaciated, although Dick could see scarcely anything beside her long, bony arm and almost fleshless fingers.

Her gray hair was streaming in disorder upon her neck and shoulders; her face was completely concealed from view.

The young girl was standing in an attitude of easy, natural grace against the chimneypiece; her elbow was resting upon it, and her head supported by her hand.

Her cheeks were wet with tears, which continually flowed over them.

While gazing upon this scene and listening to what was said, Dick had thought of something which he considered might aid him to escape.

Before beginning to put his project into execution, he looked behind him once more, in order to observe the movements of the police officers.

They had left the parapet where they had been standing, and were busily engaged in dragging some apparently heavy object, but what it was Dick could not make out, nor did he particularly trouble himself to do so, for he had seen sufficient to make him aware that he might safely do what he intended.

Raising his hand, he tapped lightly against the window, and at the same time he placed his mouth close to a pane of glass which had been broken, and through which the sounds of voices had passed, otherwise he could not have heard so distinctly all that had been said.

"I am a friend," he cried, in a low voice. "Do not be alarmed—I have come to aid you."

Notwithstanding the assuring nature of these words, the two occupants of the garret both screamed, though, it must be said, only slightly.

The young girl was the first to recover herself from her astonishment.

With a quick step, she crossed the room and dashed the curtain on one side.

"Open the window," said Dick, "and let me enter. Believe me when I tell you I am a friend, and will do you a good service in return for one that you can render me."

"Alas, sir!" said the young girl, in sorrowful accents, as she unfastened the window, "if you look to obtain any service at our hands you will look in vain, for we are quite helpless."

"Not so," said Dick, as he stepped lightly into the room—"not so, and I will quickly prove it to you."

The old woman half rose up, and pushing the masses of hair off her face, looked scrutinisingly into the countenance of their mysterious visitant.

"I know the cause of your trouble," Dick said—"it is because one near and dear to both of you has been found guilty of a crime."

"It is, sir," said the young girl, quickly; "but, as we well know—though, alas! we could not prove it—he is quite innocent. The judge and the jury thought differently, however, and he is sentenced to twenty-one years' transportation."

"I will take your word for his innocence," said Dick. "I may as well confess to you that I have broken the laws—that the police officers are even now on my track. I look to you to assist me to escape."

"How can we, sir?" said the young girl, shrinking back—"how can we?"

"Easily," said Dick. "I only want you to conduct me noiselessly down the staircase, and let me out of the front door of the house; and, in return, I will pledge my word to use my best efforts to release the young man you speak of. There are those belonging to me who probably will be in the same condition as he is now, and I am determined that, in defiance of the laws, they shall be liberated. The same with this young man; and, in addition, I will put him in the way of leaving England secretly, and supply him with sufficient money to do so."

"It is a dream," said the old woman, speaking for the first time, and uttering her words in a shrieking, hysterical voice—"it is a dream—all a dream! You are not in earnest in what you say."

"But if I prove it," said Dick, quietly, "will you believe me, and will you do what I require?"

"I will."

Dick beckoned her to approach him, and then pointed out of the attic window.

What he saw filled Dick with some little surprise, and caused him to quicken his movements.

The bulky object which the police officers were dragging was evidently a broad plank, or something of that kind, which they could put across from one parapet to the other, and so continue their search over the housetops without hazarding that tremendous jump.

They had now effected the passage, and were fearfully close at hand.

"You see," said Dick, "they are police officers and searching closely for me; you see no time is to be lost. I tell you again I will set the young man free, and those who know Dick Turpin always say he keeps his word."

"Is that your name?" said the old woman, earnestly

"It is."

"Then I believe you," she answered. "Come with me—I have no fear that you will deceive me."

"I shall not. Let me fasten the window on the inner side. There, that will do. Now take me unperceived to the front door, and make all speed back to this room. If the officers speak to you or enter, make a great show of unfastening the window, and then tell them that you have not been disturbed."

The old woman nodded, and seemed so alarmed at the proximity of the officers, that she almost dragged the highwayman from the room.

The stairs were descended rapidly and noiselessly.

Many other persons were doubtless in the house; but, if so, Dick neither saw nor heard anything of them, while the passing of anyone up and down the stairs being heard would not be paid the least attention to.

In a very brief space of time the street-door was reached.

The old woman opened it, and looked forth before she allowed Dick to issue himself.

"The street is clear," she said. "You will escape unseen. Quick—quick, that I may return to the attic!"

"But the young man's name?" said Dick—"what is it? Tell me, and do not be afraid I shall forget."

"Philip Greythorpe."

Dick repeated it, and then said:

"Farewell, and many thanks for this service! If it lies in the power of mortal man to do what I have promised it shall be done!"

With these words he stepped quietly into the street, being careful to avoid all appearance of hurry or alarm.

The door was closed immediately behind him, and the old woman ascended to the attic.

Dick drew a long breath, and gave himself a hearty shake.

"That is what I call an excellent escape," he muttered, "and I fancy the officers will be puzzled not a little at my extraordinary disappearance. Ah, by Jove, they are looking over the parapet!"

Dick could tell this by the broad glare of light that suddenly illuminated the dark thoroughfare in which he stood.

He walked on, however, with as much composure as before, though when he turned round the first corner he came to he felt a sensation of great relief.

He knew, then, that he was out of danger.

But the consideration presented itself to him of where he was to look for further shelter.

It is questionable whether anyone under such circumstances would have come so readily to a conclusion as Dick did, and still more questionable whether they would have adopted his course of action.

This was, in the coolest and most matter-of-fact manner possible to walk back again to the White Horse in Drury Lane.

It was a path beset with dangers, for the officers would all be on the alert, and probably might jump to the conclusion that as Dick had escaped he had sought a refuge there at his old quarters.

But Dick did not allow this consideration to influence him in the least degree.

In the most unconcerned manner possible to conceive he walked at a steady rate along the almost deserted streets, taking care, however, to proceed to old Matthew's by the most roundabout way he could think of.

It was when he really entered Drury Lane that he began to glance somewhat apprehensively around him.

To his vexation, he perceived a police officer standing at no great distance, who, he fancied, eyed him suspiciously.

But Dick walked on as though he did not observe it—in fact, as though he was not troubling himself about anything going on around him.

Upon reaching the White Horse, he glanced up at the lamp over the doorway, and appeared to hesitate.

Then, just as though he was a chance passenger, and had made up his mind to call in for refreshment, he ascended the steps, and walked down the passage.

He was greeted with an exclamation which came from old Matthew, who was standing at the bar, and who, by his manner, was evidently on the look-out for him.

"Good gracious!" he ejaculated. "What on earth can bring you back like that? But don't stop to answer me! Upstairs with you—upstairs! I can wait till then to hear your news."

Dick did not wait to be told twice, but ran up the staircase two or three steps at a time.

Old Matthew was not long behind him, though he entered the room rather out of breath.

"What has happened?" he cried, in genuine alarm "I heard a rumor that you had been captured in Bow Street."

Dick smiled.

"Then I am afraid," he said, "the person who told you did not speak the truth. In sober earnest I was very near it, I assure you."

"And have you been seen to enter here?" asked Matthew. "That's the question."

"I am afraid I have," was the reply, "and, if so, I shall look to you for safety."

Matthew gave a peculiar and reassuring smile as he said:

"Well, if there's any danger approaching, we shall have timely notice of it. Just oblige me by relating your adventures."

Dick complied readily enough.

But no words could convey any idea of the amount of amazement Matthew displayed upon learning the perfidy of the old costumier.

He was, in fact, at first incredulous, only Dick's narrative was of such a character as to leave no room for doubt.

"It was my narrowest escape," said Dick, "and more than once since then I have felt that if ever I get into serious trouble it will be by the perfidiousness of some one in whom I placed the utmost trust."

CHAPTER CMLXXXI.

DICK TURPIN IS MADE ACQUAINTED WITH THE RESULTS OF TOM DAVIS'S TRIAL.

"THEN," replied old Matthew, very gravely, "you may make yourself quite sure, Dick, that I shall not be the one ever to betray you."

"I believe that," answered the highwayman, grasping him by the hand—"I fully believe it; indeed, should you prove false I should lose all faith in human nature."

"But this is profitless talk," said Matthew. "Supposing, now, that I go downstairs for a minute and look round?—there can be no harm in that."

"But will it look suspicious?"

"I think not, and if there is any danger at hand I shall let you know it in good time."

Dick made no further opposition to this course.

Old Matthew was not absent long, but when he came back his face had rather a grave aspect.

"Is there danger?" asked Turpin.

"Not immediate," he replied, "but I hear there is a tremendous commotion going on in and about Bow Street."

"Are the officers still searching for me?"

"I believe they are—at any rate, they were a short time ago. Your mysterious disappearance puzzles them exceedingly, and they seem to be impressed with the idea that you are concealed in one of the houses there."

Dick gave a contented, satisfied smile.

"Now," said Matthew, "I will do my best to keep you in safety while you are beneath my roof. Look here."

Old Matthew went, as he spoke, to a large oaken cupboard which completely filled up a recess on one side of the fireplace.

He threw open the large double doors with which it was provided, and then it turned out that it was not really a cupboard but a closet.

Various articles of apparel were hanging around it on different nails and hooks fixed in the walls.

Apparently this closet was formed entirely of wood.

Matthew, first bespeaking Dick's attention, stepped into it.

"Now, Dick," he said, "there's a hiding-place here which I don't think even you could discover, even if you knew it to exist."

"Indeed," said Dick, "then that is saying a great deal in its favor."

"It is, and yet not more than it deserves. Look here."

As he spoke, old Matthew stooped down and inserted his fingers in between the floor and the bottom of the back of the cupboard, which did not fit so closely as to prevent him from introducing the tips of his fingers.

Putting out his utmost strength, Matthew then raised this back, just in the manner that one might raise the sash of a large window.

When this was done, a small chamber in the wall was discovered, and in it was a chair.

But the place looked as though it had never been pried into or entered for many years, for it was thickly loaded with dust, and everywhere huge cobwebs were suspended.

"What do you think of that?" said Matthew, as he stepped back to look at it with admiration.

"It is very good so far as security is concerned," said Dick, "but yet by no means a comfortable place to think of taking up one's quarters in."

"You are right enough there; but then, safety is the thing you have to consider."

"Just so. But how in the world, Matthew, came you to make this discovery?"

"Oh, I have known of it for a long time," was the reply. "The hiding-place has been made many, many years, and I firmly believe that it is now forgotten or unknown—at any rate, there is no other place in the whole house which holds forth so good a prospect of affording safe shelter."

"I shall take your word, Matthew," replied Dick, "and be guided by you entirely."

"You cannot do better, though I say it. Now, what I have to tell you is this: Whenever you receive any intimation of coming danger, quit this room; see be careful to leave no token of your presence behind you, and enter this chamber—then I firmly believe that the officers will depart without finding you."

"So do I."

"Then, the next thing I have to say," resumed Matthew, "is, that I am going to shut up the house for the night. I feel the want of sleep, and I shall be able to snatch a few hours before morning; so will you, for when I fasten up the house at night I do it in so secure a manner that no one could enter it unawares."

"That is enough," said Dick—"indeed, to tell you the truth, whenever I am here I feel as though I am within a strongly-fortified castle."

Matthew laughed at this idea and left the room, leaving Dick to compose himself as well as he could upon the couple of chairs which the apartment contained.

Dick drew them near the fire, and having got into as comfortable an attitude as circumstances would allow, he dropped off into a deep slumber.

He was aroused from it by a sudden disturbance of some kind in the street, and having ascertained what was the matter, he advanced cautiously to the window.

Looking down, he then saw a large crowd of people assembled, and among them a body of police officers.

They were all looking up at the front of the White Horse, and Dick began to feel that he should soon have to take up his quarters in the secret chamber.

To his surprise, however, the officers, after conferring with each other, departed.

Then, by degrees, the crowd dispersed as well, until the street was left in tolerable quiet.

As soon as this was the case, Dick heard a faint tap at the door, and directly afterwards old Matthew entered.

"Have you looked out, Dick?" he asked.

"Yes," was the reply, "and I am puzzled at what I saw. What did you make of it?"

"Well, I may be wrong, but my idea is that the officers having failed to find you anywhere in the vicinity of Bow Street, have imagined that you have sought shelter here, but the quiet aspect of the place, now that it is shut up and in darkness, seems to have laid their suspicions."

"No doubt that is it," said Dick; "but, however, as morning cannot be far distant, I shall not attempt to sleep again."

"Nor shall I."

The remainder of the time was then spent by Matthew and Dick in discussion.

In the end, old Matthew, after a great deal of trouble, succeeded in persuading Dick Turpin that it would be best for him not to venture to Newgate—that, in fact, he was running a needless risk by doing so, and not doing the least good to anyone.

Secretly, Dick felt the full force of this, though he would not allow it.

He did not like on any occasion to change an opinion or a determination that he had formed.

Old Matthew carried the point, however, and having partaken of a good, substantial breakfast, he set out for the Old Bailey, leaving Dick to pass the time as best he might in the room alone.

Before the landlord departed, he again impressed upon the highwayman the necessity of seeking shelter in the secret room the moment the girl told him there was any occasion to do so.

"In fact," he said, "upon the approach of danger you will hear a bell ring violently; when you do, then, lose no time in concealing yourself."

Dick promised obedience, and his last words to old Matthew consisted of an earnest entreaty that he would return and let him know the result the moment the trial was concluded.

It was at quite an early hour when Matthew set out from his house; but then, he knew very well how much difficulty there was in forcing a way into the narrow, confined court at the Old Bailey, where the trials were held.

The first half-hour or so after his departure passed tolerably well to Dick, but after that time he began to grow impatient and restless, and continued to get more and more so as the day advanced.

He was yet, however, quite unmolested.

Beyond a doubt, the greater part of the police officers who had interested themselves in the capture of the highwayman were just then present at the Old Bailey, waiting the result of the trial with as much anxiety as anyone.

Never, under any circumstances, had a day appeared to lag so fearfully as that.

Dick thought the hours would never slip away.

But, for all his impatience and restlessness, old Time pursued his march without the least wavering or alteration.

Noon came and passed; then, after a short period of daylight, night began to close in.

To such a degree had Dick worked himself, that more than once or twice he was on the verge of issuing forth, in order to come to a conclusion earlier.

It was, however, as nearly six o'clock as possible when old Matthew returned.

By the look of his face, Dick knew that he was not the bringer of good tidings.

"Well," he said, briskly, "I will not question you. Speak, Matthew, and put an end to this horrible suspense as soon as you can!"

"Well, Dick, the case came on the very first thing this morning, and occupied the court up to within a short time of my leaving."

"And the result?"

"Is just what I expected—or, indeed, not quite so bad."

"What is it, then?"

"Why, I must tell you that a dead set was made against Tom Davis, and the attempt made to render what he had done a capital offence, so as to be punished with death. Luckily, by the efforts of the counsel I engaged, this was not successful."

"But why not come to the point at once?" said Dick. "What is his fate?"

"Twenty-one years' transportation."

"Twenty-one years?" repeated Dick. "Why, that's equivalent to transportation for life!"

"It is indeed. But don't chafe and fret so; wait until you have heard all, then we can talk over the matter, and if possible come to a decision."

"With all my heart."

"I shall never regret having taken the course I have," resumed old Matthew, "for by the efforts of the counsel Mrs. Davis and Ellen have escaped—when I say escaped, that is scarcely what I meant."

"They have been acquitted?"

"No, not that either, but sentenced to one month's imprisonment. For them you need not trouble; a month will quickly pass away—then they will receive their liberty in a legitimate manner."

"I am glad it is no worse for them," said Dick; "and yet you have no idea how much I regret even that. Still, as you say, they may be left; it is Tom Davis's case which demands our whole attention."

"You are quite right—it is," said Matthew. "And the question comes, in what possible way can we contrive to replace him in possession of his liberty?"

"I know not—I am too confused to think," said Dick; "I must leave all reflection to you."

"Well, it is certain," said old Matthew, "that if he is liberated by our aid he will have to leave England at once—that's the only course of safety open to him."

"And he will gladly enough embrace it," said Dick—"I feel sure of that. Once let him be free, and I will take care that all three of them have the means of quitting this country."

"Well," said Matthew, "and if I may add a few words of my own, I think while you are about it, the best thing you can do is to leave England too; you have run your career quite long enough. Take my advice—be satisfied with what you have done, and quit this land for ever."

Dick received this counsel with a smile.

"We'll talk about that another day," he said; "I have no humor to enter that discussion now."

"Well, be it so," said Matthew, somewhat sadly; "though, mark me, I should prefer that to be the end of your career."

Dick drummed upon the table impatiently with his hand.

"Well, then," said Matthew, "let us consider the ways and means of setting Tom Davis at liberty. He is now in Newgate, where he will remain for some short period."

"And after that?" asked Dick.

"Why, in the usual course of things, he will be put into a van or waggon along with the rest of the prisoners doomed with him, and taken, most probably, to Greenwich, where he will be put on board the convict ship."

"Well, Matthew, what is to be done, and when?"

"Ah, Dick! I cannot answer you that question; but I can very easily tell you what can not be done."

"And what may that be?"

"Why, liberate him from Newgate. From what was said at the court to-day, I feel sure that it is suspected that you and your comrades will make some attempt to set him free, and most certainly if you approach anywhere near the Old Bailey you will doom yourself to your own destruction."

"So we may," said Dick; "but for all that, Tom Davis must be set free."

"He must," said Matthew, rubbing his hands together, while a pleased expression gradually stole over his face—"he must. I quite agree with you. Just at this moment I thought of the means by which, in all probability, it can be done."

CHAPTER CMLXXXII.

THE RECESS BEHIND THE CUPBOARD, IN WHICH DICK TURPIN IS HIDDEN, IS DISCOVERED BY THE OFFICERS.

"Do you mean it?" said Dick Turpin, with eager earnestness—"do you really mean it? Come—quick! Speak out—let me know your plan."

"Well," said Matthew, with much complacency, "it is only a rude idea at present, but yet it may be elaborated into something very good indeed."

"Well, well, pass over all that."

But old Matthew seemed rather to enjoy his anxiety, for instead of speaking directly to the point he went on:

"And, by-the-way, there is that young man."

"Confound the young man!"

"Well, it isn't very grateful to say so. I mean that young man that you promised to rescue."

"Well, well, what of him?"

"Why, I think my plan will enable you to set him at liberty at the same time as Tom Davis."

"Indeed!" said Dick. "How so?"

"Can you not guess?"

"I cannot, nor do I intend to try; I am waiting for you to tell me."

"Then I will dally with you no longer. The fact is, Dick, it occurs to me that it will be perfectly possible for you and your three comrades to stop the prisoners' van while on its way to Greenwich, or wherever the place may be, which I can easily find out and let you know."

"Good, Matthew," cried Dick—"very good! Of course we can. I might have thought of it, it is so simple, and I think so very likely to succeed."

"Very likely," said old Matthew—"in fact, I am certain, for if you only partially succeed, the prisoners will aid you to the very best of their power."

"It is a glorious plan, Matthew," cried Dick, enthusiastically and excitedly—"a glorious plan, and one that cannot fail of success—I feel sure of it, and a heavy load is taken off my mind. I can see the means by which Tom Davis can recover his liberty."

"I am glad you approve of it so well. But now while we are on the subject, let us come to this arrangement."

"Well, go on. Why did you pause?"

"Simply because I was considering. However, this cannot be done at present; but leave to me the task of finding out when the prisoners will be removed from Newgate, and to what place they are going to be taken."

"You can easily learn that, I should think, Matthew."

"Yes—very likely I can; but then, having done so, the question is, how shall I make you acquainted with the intelligence?"

"That's a point we must settle, said Dick. "Suppose I should come here again at the end of a certain time?"

"No—no," said Matthew, very slowly. "I am glad enough to see you, Dick—it delights me when I can catch sight of your face; but the less you show yourself here I am sure will be the better. Don't think of it."

"Well, then" Dick cried, "how do you propose to manage?"

"Why, by a very simple means. It will not do for me to arrange to meet you anywhere, because I feel sure that I never leave home on any occasion without being followed by the officers. I'll tell you what I can do. I will write a letter, and find a trusty messenger who will take it to some place that we agree upon between us, and leave it there for you to come and fetch it afterwards."

"That's a good plan, Matthew. We may as well agree to it at once. But where shall the place be?"

"I leave that to you."

Dick remained for several moments plunged in deep thought.

At length he exclaimed:

"Do you know the spot where the river Brent flows under the Edgware Road?"

"Yes—perfectly well."

"Then you may be aware, perhaps, that the old bridge is very much out of repair—most of the stones at the top are loose."

"I see."

"Well, then, let your messenger move the first stone he comes to that is loose as he walks on to the bridge, taking the left-hand side. He will then be able to put the letter, if folded small, either between that stone and the next, or else completely under it."

"Very good," said Matthew. "I quite understand. And now, as there is just the possibility that the letter will fall into some one else's hands, we will agree upon what is to be placed in it. If, as I quite expect, the prisoners are to be removed to Greenwich, I shall not name any place on the letter at all, but will simply write a figure, which will represent the hour when the van will start from Newgate, and immediately after that will be another figure, which will represent the day of the month on which they will set forth."

"That is quite enough," said Dick, "so that these figures are all the paper need contain."

"Yes, all, and then if anyone else finds it, why, it will not matter."

"It is a wise precaution," said Dick; "but I don't feel the least afraid, for I will have the bridge well watched before your messenger arrives."

"You may expect him, then," said Matthew, "by the second night from this. I shall be sure to know before that time."

"And," said Dick, "we must arrange another meeting after that, for I feel myself much indebted to you, and whatever obligation I am under I shall not rest until I have discharged."

"Pooh—pooh!" said Matthew—"never mind such nonsense as that. I do not render you all these services simply for the money I can make out of you, but merely because I like you, so let us hear no more about obligations, I beg."

"It is all very fine, Matthew, for you to speak like that, but I shall not allow——"

Dick paused, for just then he was startled by the ringing of a bell, which caused old Matthew to spring to his feet.

"Quick," he cried—"into the cupboard with you—make all speed! Perhaps it is only a false alarm; at any rate, you can shift for yourself. I will go downstairs. Take good care the officers do not enter this room until you have had plenty of time to conceal yourself."

He spoke these words very hurriedly, and as he pronounced the last, passed hurriedly out of the door, and closed it behind him.

Dick was very rapid in all his movements.

Not knowing how long he might have to remain in his uncomfortable place of concealment, he picked up the glass out of which he had been drinking, and carried it into the recess along with him.

To shut the cupboard doors, and afterwards to pull down the back part of the cupboard, occupied but a very few moments indeed.

Yet he was only just in time.

Immediately afterwards he heard, though indistinctly, the sound of footsteps and the loud murmur of voices.

Of what was said he could not form any idea; but, from the tone used, he guessed something like an altercation was going on.

Then the door leading into the room he had so recently quitted was dashed open, after which came a brief pause.

"I tell you you are playing falsely!" Dick heard a voice cry, in high, exasperated tones. "Do you mean to assure me positively that a few moments ago you were not seated in this room along with another person?"

Dick did not catch old Matthew's reply, for he spoke in a more subdued voice.

"Then I say you do not speak the truth," was the rejoinder. "I have just come from across the way, and as I stood at the barber's bed-room window I could see into this, and made out distinctly you and another person sitting at this table."

Neither knew it, but just as the officer spoke, both old Matthew and Dick were engaged on the very same operation, and that was in inwardly, but none the less bitterly, cursing the barber for his interference.

As before, Dick could not make out what old Matthew said in reply, but the officer—for such beyond a doubt he was—exclaimed:

"Now, my men, is the time to show your sharpness. Never mind a word of what he says—I know him for an inveterate liar. I saw two men sitting here not five minutes ago. There's no one to be found, so it's clear there's a hiding-place somewhere, and you've got to find it."

After those words were spoken, there was a vast amount of clattering caused by the hasty removal of the various articles of furniture contained in the room.

Dick, having heard so much, not unnaturally began to feel very uneasy for his own safety.

After what Matthew had said, he fully believed the officers would, with care and time, discover the recess at the back of the closet.

A cold perspiration broke out all over him, and as minute after minute elapsed, his uneasiness increased.

Most bitterly indeed did he regret having been persuaded to take up his quarters in such a place, for how inglorious it would appear for the officers to break down the panelling and seize him hiding in such a place!

These thoughts made Dick almost desperate.

For the first time, he began to wonder whether there was any outlet from this secret recess.

He had forgotten to ask Matthew anything on the subject.

But the more Dick thought, the more assured he felt that such a place as this would not be constructed without some means being contrived of emerging from it.

Just then the closet door opened, and one of the officers entered, and poked about very vigorously among the clothing with his sword.

Dick held his breath, for there was nothing to divide him from his foe but a thin partition of woodwork.

"Nobody here," was the reply, and then this man, who never for a moment thought of trying whether the back of the cupboard had a hollow sound or not, stepped out, and closed the door behind him.

"Escape number one," said Dick. "But that little incident only makes me feel the more that I shall not be so fortunate a second time."

While these thoughts passed through his mind, he rapidly produced from his pocket a phosphorous match, which he ignited silently.

The light lasted only for an instant, yet it enabled him to glance at the walls around him.

He saw no means by which the recess could be left, but, believing that the means of leaving it would be similar to those by which he had entered, he stooped down, and endeavored to insert his fingers in between the floor and the walls.

At his first attempt he succeeded, and raised the piece of woodwork to the extent of about an inch.

Then he paused.

"I am all right now," he thought, though he had not the remotest idea of where he would find himself after passing through this partition.

[DICK TURPIN ENDEAVOURS TO ELUDE HIS FOES.]

It was at this moment that the closet doors were again thrown open, and Dick heard the man with the exasperated voice cry:

"Don't you think I can believe my own eyesight? I tell you I saw somebody here; and where's he gone? I'm sure there is a secret hiding-place somewhere! I have been told that this old inn is full of them, and I'll do my best to find out to-night!"

While he spoke, the officer began with the butt-end of his pistol to rap against the walls of the closet.

As he began at the side, close to the hinges of the door, where the wall was perfectly solid, the sound returned was of such a character as to make him certain there was no hiding-place there.

On reaching the back, however, the first blow produced a hollow, reverberating sound.

The officer uttered a shriek.

"I have it," he cried—"I have it—this is the place! Never mind finding out the secret! Break down the woodwork—it will be done in a moment!"

With these words, he raised his pistol in the air and brought down the butt-end of it with full force upon the panelling.

A large crack was the result.

The next blow produced another.

The officers came crowding round him, and a few more heavy strokes demolished the woodwork to such an extent that the officers were able to seize hold of it, and by main force pull out a large piece.

The officers sprang forward with a cry of exultation, which quickly changed its tone to one of disappointment.

There was the recess, it is true, but it was perfectly empty, save and except the chair on which Dick had placed the glass out of which he had been so lately drinking.

Old Matthew had during these occurrences suffered such an amount of mental agitation as few could have any conception of, and he looked upon Dick's disappearance as something miraculous, for he was not aware himself that there was any means of leaving the recess.

He could scarcely believe his eyes, indeed; but his satisfaction was, nevertheless, most intense.

"There's nobody there," cried the officer, in dee disappointment—"nobody at all!"

"But there's this glass, sir," said one of the men.

"Oh, d—n the glass! Don't bother me with that!"

"But there's ale in it," continued the officer, speaking cautiously—"there's ale in it; and, look, why, there's froth on it, and it looks as fresh as though it had only been just drawn."

This occurrence arrested the officer's attention, and at the same moment filled old Matthew with despair.

"So it has," cried the one with the angry voice—"so it has! Aha! I knew I was right. He is close at hand, my lads, depend upon it! Look around, and you will see the means of leaving this recess."

Just as he spoke, there came a loud and thrilling shriek, evidently issuing from female lips.

At the sound the officers all stood aghast.

"Help—help!" they heard a voice cry, very distinctly. "Help—help! Murder—thieves!"

"He's caught!" cried the chief officer—"as I'm a living man, he's caught! Down with that bit of woodwork! Dash against it! The sooner you break it down the better!"

The officers obeyed, but it took them rather longer to pull down the panelling than they had anticipated.

CHAPTER CMLXXXIII.

DICK TURPIN PUTS IN EXECUTION A BOLD AND NOVEL EXPEDIENT.

In order to explain the meaning of this strange occurrence, we must go back to the proceedings of Dick Turpin.

He waited until the officer struck against the woodwork with his pistol, then he knew discovery was certain.

Without another second's pause or hesitation, he stooped down, and slowly and noiselessly raised the large piece of wood forming the back of the recess.

He only did so to a sufficient distance to allow him to creep beneath it.

This he did with all secrecy imaginable.

Then he drew it down again.

He was only just in time—indeed, he had scarcely composed himself before the panelling was torn down, and the recess discovered.

He remained perfectly still after this, listening to what took place next.

Where he was he had not the remotest idea, except that it was possible he was in another closet similar to the one he had recently left.

How much he regretted having left the glass behind him, as that unquestionably helped the officers to get on the right track.

When he heard the remarks passed upon it, he was sure that his present place was no abiding spot, and he began to seek some means of quitting it.

Feeling cautiously with his hands, his fingers encountered two doors similar to those opening into old Matthew's room.

They yielded to his touch, and he pushed them open slowly and gently.

Then, creeping out with a stealthiness that would have delighted an Indian, he raised himself to his feet, and endeavored to take a peep at his surroundings.

He was in a room evidently, for he could see the window, through which there came a very dim amount of twilight.

He moved forward, as he believed, in the direction of the door, but he was not looking sufficiently close to his feet, for, with great suddenness, he struck against the post of a bedstead.

It was then that the shrill scream that had so startled the officers broke forth, and it must be confessed that it startled Dick quite as much.

Recovering his presence of mind, however, he exclaimed:

"Do not be alarmed—all is well!"

But his words were perfectly unheeded.

The female by whom the room was tenanted had evidently got hold of the idea that a man was in the room, whose intention was to rob and murder her, and so she kept up the prodigious clamor.

Finding all efforts to silence her vain, Dick, who by this time had discovered the doorway, lost no time in passing through it.

As his hand passed over the lock he felt a key.

He took it out instantly, thrust it in on the other side, and locked the chamber door.

This he knew would cause delay, and, in the meantime, what he had to do was to seek the street.

Accordingly, he descended the stairs at full speed, but, ere he had gone far, some one, alarmed no doubt by the fearful shriek, cried out:

"In Heaven's name, what's the matter? Oh, lawks! who are you?"

"The devil!" said Dick, in a sepulchral voice.

There was a smothered kind of cry, and then the door was hastily shut.

But Dick was very far from being anything like safe.

The house would be so thoroughly alarmed before he could get to the bottom of it, that on attempting to leave it he would most likely run into the arms of the officers.

The first-floor landing was now, however, reached, but just as his foot touched it, a door was opened, and a man with an extraordinary worsted night-cap on his head, a candle in his left hand, and a dark object in his right, appeared.

He seemed to catch sight of Dick, for he cried:

"Take that, you wretch, and don't you disturb me any more! I tell you I won't be bothered with you!"

These words plainly showed that he mistook Dick for somebody else.

When he said "Take that!" he lifted up his right hand in which he held the dark object, which proved to be a missile of some kind, for it flew past Dick's head with unpleasant swiftness.

Its course was stopped by the face of a large clock which stood upon the landing.

There was a crash, and then the mechanism became so deranged that the clock began to strike at a furious rate.

So alarmed was the night-capped gentleman by the effects of his violence that he dropped his candle and precipitately retreated into his room.

Dick made a plunge down the staircase, inwardly cursing his ill-luck.

When about half-way to the ground floor, however, he perceived a small window, which had been contrived for the purpose of lighting the staircase.

Happening to glance through it, he saw that it opened upon some leads, and this caused him to pause.

The way of escape he now believed lay clear enough before him.

To open the window took him scarcely more than a second.

He passed through it, closed it after him, and then found himself standing on what was to all appearances the top of a cistern.

On one side of him was a rather narrow wall, which extended for a considerable distance.

Without hesitation, he stepped upon it, and, without giving a thought to the narrow space on which he stood, ran rapidly along.

Reaching the extremity, he saw, only a few feet below him, the pavement of a narrow court.

He dropped without hesitation, and running forward, quickly found himself in one of the streets lying between Clare Market and Lincoln's Inn.

He set forward to run immediately, though he instantly became conscious of the impolicy of this course, and certainly had he not been so greatly excited he would never have dreamed of adopting it.

His flying form arrested the attention of a man, who set up a tremendous shout.

"Stop him!" he cried—"stop him! A highwayman—a highwayman! There he goes! Stop him—stop him!"

These cries were instantaneously followed by loud shouts and a trampling of footsteps, so that in what seemed a magical short space of time Dick found himself followed by a crowd of persons of all ages and both sexes.

His hopes of escape now sank down to zero, yet he did not on that account in the least degree abate his speed, if anything, he increased it.

Panting and breathless, with the perspiration running down his face in streams, and with a kind of mist before his eyes that half blinded him, he strove to think what would be the best thing he could do in order to baffle his pursuers.

He turned a corner rapidly, and then another; but they were so close upon his track that before he was able to turn again they had him once more in sight.

At every step did the numbers of those who were pursuing him increase; and there was this disadvantage, so far as Dick was concerned, that whereas he was almost spent with running, those who were foremost in the chase had only just begun their task.

All at once, a man started out into the centre of the road and extended both his arms.

To attempt to dodge past him Dick knew would be absurd, and so kept on his course, determined to run the man down, though he feared that in the scuffle he might be delayed sufficiently to enable his foes to pounce upon him.

This, no doubt, was what the man calculated upon, but he forgot to take into consideration his own personal condition.

Clenching his right hand, Dick ran on straight as an arrow.

The man stood resolutely up, but the tremendous blow from Dick's fist felled him like an ox.

The highwayman staggered for an instant, then bounded on.

Actually he had gained a little on his foes, and, perceiving another turning which led towards Lincoln's Inn, he did not hesitate to take it.

But no sooner had he turned the corner than he was struck with a sudden thought.

He was then out of sight of all his foes, and could count upon being for the space of a few seconds, yet not long enough to enable him to reach the top of the street.

But he paused close to a doorway of rather pretentious character, on which was a brass plate.

He perceived this, as well as the name upon it, by means of a lamp that was burning above, and that was placed purposely so as to render the words on the door-plate legible.

With a boldness that was astounding, Dick stepped up to this door, and knocked at it, while at the same time he pulled the bell.

During the brief space that he had to wait for a reply, he read upon the plate the words:—

"Mr. Solomon Cartwright, solicitor."

Just as the door was opened, the crowd of persons turned the corner.

Dick was hidden by the projecting portico, and no sooner was the door opened than, without waiting to be invited to enter, he stepped in and closed it after him.

Then he had the satisfaction of hearing his pursuers rush by.

"What is it, please?" said a female voice with tolerable clearness.

"Is Mr. Cartwright within?"

"Yes, sir, he is; but this is past business hours, and he cannot be disturbed."

"I am sorry for that," said Dick, who scarcely knew what to say.

But his active brain quickly suggested something, and he added:

"Be good enough to tell him that a gentleman wishes to see him on some matters connected with the sale of some property."

Now Dick hoped that the girl would leave him and go to deliver this message, in which case he would have slipped out of the door, and trusted to his good luck to make an escape.

To his deep annoyance, however, he was frustrated in this intention, for a door close at hand was opened, and a gentleman stepped out into the passage.

"What is it, Mary?" he asked—"who is it?"

"A gentleman wants particularly to see you about some property," was the reply.

"Oh, certainly!" said the lawyer, who was never one to allow the chance of obtaining a fresh client to pass by. "Ask the gentleman to walk this way."

Dick had no resource but to comply.

"I'm doomed to nothing but misfortune to-night," he thought. "What on earth can I do? How can I manage to deceive this man?—what shall I tell him?"

Really he had no time for thought.

The door was close at hand.

Without the lapse of a moment, he was shown into a room.

There was a fire burning in it, and a lighted lamp was standing on the table, and surrounded by a great quantity of papers.

"Take a seat, sir—pray take a seat!" said the lawyer as he turned up the lamp, so as to cause it to give a brighter light, and to enable him to see his visitor better. "I happen at the present moment to be quite disengaged."

Dick wished from the bottom of his heart that the solicitor was overwhelmed with business.

Nevertheless, he took a seat, and, with as much calmness as he could command, drew his handkerchief from his pocket, and wiped the perspiration from his face.

"Dear me," ejaculated the lawyer, "how warm you look!"

"Yes," said Dick, concealing his breathlessness with much difficulty, "it is quite sultry."

"How odd!" said the lawyer, with a shiver. "Here have I been crouching over the fire all night."

"I am excited," said Dick—"very much excited, and I have come here at a very rapid rate to see you, as I was fearful I should be too late."

"I am perfectly ready to listen to you," was the lawyer's reply. "Be good enough to let me know the nature of your business."

This was a poser, for what to say next Dick had not the remotest idea, so, merely with the view of gaining time, he once more took out his pocket-handkerchief and wiped his face with it.

While he did so, he could not help noticing that the lawyer was looking at him with an expression of suspicion and distrust.

CHAPTER CMLXXXIV.

DICK TURPIN VERY CLEVERLY MAKES A TOOL OF THE LAWYER.

But Dick Turpin was fast becoming himself again—cool, calm and determined.

The silence that prevailed in the street justified him in indulging in the belief that his pursuers had lost the scent altogether, and that he would have nothing more to do than to speak for a short time to the solicitor and then quietly take his departure.

But even at this moment he heard a loud hubbub, which gradually yet rapidly increased in loudness.

"Dear me," said the lawyer, with an air of vexation, "what in the world can be the matter with the people to-night?"

"I'm sure I don't know," said Dick. "There's something the matter; but I don't know that it need concern us."

"No, certainly not. Pray proceed to the business you were about to place before me."

The lawyer made a feint of consulting his watch, as if to show that his time was precious.

"Well," said Dick, "to be brief with you, Mr. Cartwright, the fact is that a dear and much-loved friend of mine is at the present moment in very deep distress."

"Pecuniary distress?" asked the lawyer.

"Yes—in fact, he is in debt, and has been thrust into prison. It is a shocking thing, for I know very well that with anything like reasonable time he could pay off the whole of his debts."

"Then may I ask your object in consulting me?"

"I will tell you in a moment," said Dick, who by this time had arranged his whole plan of future operations, and which promised to be so satisfactory that he threw off at once all the fears and apprehensions under which he had been laboring.

"I am staying at the Regent's Hotel in Piccadilly, and the head waiter there was kind enough to mention your name to me as being a gentleman likely to do what I required."

"Indeed!" said the lawyer. "I am rather surprised at that, for at the moment I cannot recollect such an hotel as that in Piccadilly, nor can I say that I am acquainted with any head waiter either."

"Well, sir, such is the fact," said Dick, with unblushing effrontery. "I am quite a stranger in London, and when this dreadful affair happened to my friend I posted up to town at once. I always stop at the Regent's Hotel, and as the head waiter was the first person I saw I asked him what I had better do."

"But what do you want me to do?" said the lawyer, with a bland smile, for he began to think that so excitable a personage as Dick seemed to be would prove a very good client.

"I have some property in Berkshire," said Dick—"freehold, and of considerable value. I have brought the title deeds with me, and I want to know whether a mortgage can be executed upon it for about one half of its value, which will enable me to set my friend at liberty."

"Yes, certainly," said the lawyer. "I often manage matters of that kind—not that I have money myself, but many of my clients have, who are anxious to lend it out for mortgage."

"That is just what the head waiter told me," said Dick, with great assurance.

"Would you be good enough," said the lawyer, "to let me look at the title deeds you spoke of?"

Dick placed his hand in the breast pocket of his coat, then exclaimed:

"Dear me, sir, would you believe it? In my great state of excitement I have left the papers in my portmanteau at the hotel? What is to be done?"

"Just what you please," said the lawyer, in an altered tone.

"Well, then," said Dick, "suppose you call a hackney-coach: we can then both go to the hotel together, and drink a glass of wine: you can look over the title deeds, and the matter put in a fair way for settlement."

"Oh, certainly," said the lawyer; "I have no objection to that at all; we will go at once, if you are willing."

"Yes, I am quite willing," said Dick—how willing, the lawyer little thought.

They stepped out into the passage, on a peg against the wall of which some cloaks and hats were hanging.

The lawyer selected one of each of these articles.

"My dear sir," said Dick, "would you mind doing me the favor of lending me one of your cloaks? Now that I have got over my excitement I feel the cold strike with quite a chill."

"Oh, certainly," said the lawyer, "with very great pleasure! Take this one. In your present condition you are likely enough to take a cold that will result in your death."

Dick took the proffered cloak gladly, not that he cared about his heated condition, but he knew very well that wrapping this garment around him would greatly change his outward appearance.

"Mary," said the gentleman, "just call a hackney-coach."

The girl opened the door and stood outside, and just as she did so, the very vehicle they wanted came rolling by.

It was stopped at once, and then, with a heart which it must be confessed beat faster than usual, Dick followed the lawyer across the threshold into the street.

Here many people were assembled searching in all directions.

It was pretty clear that they had formed a tolerably good guess as to the exact spot where the highwayman had disappeared.

"What's the matter?" asked the lawyer of some one standing near.

"They're after Dick Turpin, the highwayman, sir," was the answer. "He was chased to somewhere hereabout and disappeared."

"Oh, indeed," said the lawyer, "then I hope he will be caught, for nothing would please me better than to hear the last of him. I have been twice robbed by his rascally associates."

While these few words were passing, Dick had entered the hackney-coach, the door of which was held open by the driver.

Mr. Cartwright followed, and as the door was closed Dick said:

"Drive to the bottom of Piccadilly; I will call to you when to pull up."

Mr. Cartwright was about to make a remark, but just then the coach was set in motion, and such a jolting and such a horrible rattling noise ensued that he gave up in despair the attempt to make himself heard.

At last Dick felt that he had reached the end of his troubles, and therefore he leaned back in the coach with a contented air.

To be sure there was the little difficulty to be got over, that it was necessary to dispose of the lawyer somehow.

But Turpin considered this such a trifle that he hardly bestowed a thought upon it.

Over and over again he congratulated himself upon his good fortune in having so availed himself of the strange turn that events took.

His object in deluding the lawyer with the story about the mortgage of the estate was simply to find a means of reaching the bottom of Piccadilly, which it will be remembered was the place where he had left his mare Black Bess.

Certainly the ingenuity of the plan deserves commendation as well as the successful manner in which it was carried out.

The distance to Piccadilly was not very great, and the two horses which were harnessed to the hackney-coach quickly brought them there.

"Now, my dear sir," said the lawyer, confidentially, "here we are in Piccadilly. Be good enough to point out the hotel."

"It is a little lower down," said Dick, looking carefully through the windows, for he was in search of the narrow turning in which stood the stable where he had left his mare.

But while doing so, he became conscious of the fact that it would be impolitic in the extreme to quit this lawyer hastily, or in such a manner as to give an immediate alarm.

To spoil so good a piece of work by a little bungling at the end was what Dick was very disinclined to do.

Therefore, he again set his brain to work, and this time with as much success as before.

"There it is," he exclaimed, pointing to a well-lighted building which actually stood at the very corner of the thoroughfare he so much wished to reach—"there it is."

"Why, that's not the Regent's Hotel!" ejaculated the lawyer. "That's the Royal."

"Of course it is!" said Dick. "What an absurd mistake for me to make! Did I really say Regent's?"

"You did indeed, and repeated it many times."

"Then you must attribute that mistake to my state of excitement. However, I am calmer now—much calmer."

The lawyer smiled, and then said:

"Still I am puzzled about this head waiter. I most certainly don't know him, for I never was across the threshold of this building in my life."

"You will see directly," said Dick, "for here we are."

He called out to the driver, who at once stopped opposite to the entrance of the hotel.

Dick alighted and gave him so liberal a fare that the coachman actually said: "Thank you, sir!" a piece of civility he had never been known to vouchsafe to anybody before.

The lawyer knew that he had given this man about six times his proper fare, and smiled again, for he thought a man who was so liberal to a hackney-coach driver would be equally so with himself, and so on this very ground was not disposed to say a word about his extravagance.

Scarcely anyone would have had the audacity to walk up the spacious stone steps leading to the fashionable hotel as Turpin did, but he had already found that wherever he had dared the most there he had succeeded the best.

On reaching the top of the steps, the massive plate glass door was opened by an obsequious attendant.

"Coffee-room," said Dick, laconically.

The man bowed and pointed to a door a little way off on which the words were written.

Dick nodded his head in return, and stepped briskly forward.

Reaching the coffee-room door, Turpin pushed it open and stood aside to allow the lawyer to follow him.

It was rather an odd thing, but just at that time the coffee-room happened to be empty.

"I have only a bed-room here," said Dick to Mr. Cartwright, as that gentleman took a seat near the fire, "and of course my portmanteau is there. It will not take me a moment to run upstairs and fetch you the title deeds, so you will excuse me for leaving you here a moment while I do so."

This was said with so offhand an air, and sounded so plausible and reasonable that the lawyer immediately gave his consent.

This was all Dick needed, and his exultation at having managed so well could scarcely be restrained within bounds.

Leaving the coffee-room again, he stepped swiftly along the hall to the door.

Dick hesitated for half a second, then put his hand in his pocket and drew forth a guinea.

He slipped the coin into the hand of the attendant, and as he did so he said, with a wink:

"If that gentleman who came in with me a moment ago should ask you where I have gone, just be good enough to say that you have not seen me."

Whether the man would comply with this demand Dick did not wait to know; but the way in which he slipped the guinea into his pocket was very suggestive.

"Free!" said Dick, after he had descended the steps of the hotel—"once more free, after running the gauntlet of so many dangers—free, too, by my own unaided exertions! Truly has my brain been busy to-night, yet all is well; a few minutes more and I shall be in possession of Black Bess; and when I feel that gallant mare beneath me I shall bid defiance to all that my enemies can accomplish!"

Just as he spoke these words, Dick reached the doorway leading to the stables.

He glanced up and down the street, but all was perfectly silent.

Seizing the bell-handle, he pulled it somewhat vigorously, then waited with a singular mixture of calmness and anxiety for the ostler to make his appearance.

CHAPTER CMLXXXV.

DICK TURPIN IS REMINDED THAT HE IS AS YET BY NO MEANS OUT OF DANGER.

THIS feeling rapidly intensified, and as it did so his anxiety increased.

It reached its culminating point at the moment when he heard a shuffling footstep in the inn yard, and caught sight of a dim gleam of light.

"I have been too precipitate," he muttered—"by far too precipitate! My late successes have blinded me to caution. I should have sent some one here in case of danger, or, at any rate, I ought to have reconnoitred first."

Having come to this conclusion, Dick glanced around him as well as the obscurity that filled the narrow turning would permit.

On the opposite side of the way, and nearly opposite to the stable gates, was a small doorway, that apparently formed a kind of private means of communication with the back part of the hotel.

Dick had resolved to secrete himself in a place where he could watch the course of events, and, as no better one than this presented itself, he darted across the roadway in a moment.

He had scarcely passed into the dark shadow caused by the depression in the wall, when he heard the fastenings of the stable gates noisily undone.

"I'm coming, sir," said a voice—"I'm coming, sir; Just have patience for half a moment."

"What the deuce does he mean by talking like that?" thought Dick. "And how does he know who is outside, I wonder?"

Just then one half of the gates was thrown open, and at precisely the same instant Dick discovered that the door close to which he was pressing in order to get more out of sight was unfastened.

No sooner did he make this discovery than he instantly availed himself of the opportunity which this afforded for a better concealment.

His movements were so rapid, and yet so silent, that by the time he had placed himself on the opposite side of the door—which he held a little ajar in order that he might observe all that took place—the ostler had only managed to get the gate fairly open.

He raised in the air the lantern he carried, and glanced around him in great surprise.

"The devil!" he ejaculated, when he found that beyond all doubt no one was outside. "Why, it's a mistake. Some one rang the bell, and ran off, drat 'em!"

"What's that you say?" growled another voice. "Isn't he there?"

"No, that he isn't."

The second speaker came forward—sufficiently so for the rays of the lantern to fall upon him and reveal his exterior appearance.

Dick, on seeing him, drew back slightly, and pushed the door a little closer.

It was a police officer—a runner from Bow Street.

"Back, Mr. Bishop," said the ostler—"back, sir, if you please. Pray keep out of sight! He may be on the watch for aught I know."

Thus admonished, the officer retreated, and the ostler, after taking another survey around him, retreated also, and closed the gates, saying something in a growling tone all the while.

In less than a moment afterwards all was as silent as before.

"Another narrow escape," thought Dick—"by far too narrow to be at all agreeable. But certainly I must be in luck's way to-night."

Dick might well think this, for, since his departure from the old castle, Fortune had constantly favored him.

But the highwayman, just at that moment, had more to think about in the present than the past.

A rapid glance at his position made him conscious that, to say the least of it, it was a very unpleasant one.

What he had witnessed convinced him beyond all doubt that by some one or other his mare had been recognised, and, in consequence, a watch set in the hope of securing him on his return.

How nearly they had succeeded the reader knows already—but for his lucky second thought, the highwayman could scarcely have got free.

A slight noise behind him caused by the opening and shutting of the door disturbed the highwayman in his thoughts, and reminded him that the place he was in was not at all adapted for an abiding spot.

He had no other resource than to enter the street again.

He did this most reluctantly.

But the narrow thoroughfare still wore its deserted appearance.

Dick glanced up at the high brick walls which defended the stable-yard.

"Black Bess is there," he said to himself—"there, and surrounded by my foes and hers. She cannot help herself. I would as soon part with my life as lose her, and so I shall have to depend upon my own exertions to set her free. It must be done somehow, and that without delay."

Dick Turpin paced slowly down the street in deep thought.

Certainly the task which he had set himself was one which any other man would have given up in despair as being totally impossible; but its very difficulty only served as a stimulus to Dick.

He was not long before he arranged his plan of action up to a certain point.

"Before I can go any further," he murmured, as he turned round and retraced his steps, "I must ascertain the exact force which my enemies muster. I must also find out how they are disposed, and just where about Black Bess is situated. Yes, certainly, that will be the preliminary step to take."

Glancing up to the walls, Dick fancied that he should be able, by giving a good spring, to get the ends of his fingers over the edge.

He tried, and at the first trial succeeded.

His next act was to draw himself up by his arms to such an extent as enabled him to take a peep at the other side.

Owing to the darkness, however, he was not able to make out anything with much distinctness, though he perceived rather a long range of low buildings, from a window in one part of which a light was shining.

Here, he conjectured, he should find Black Bess; but it was a conjecture merely, for, as the reader will recollect, he was quite ignorant of the nature of the premises. It was, perhaps, about the only occasion on which he had omitted to follow Black Bess to her stable in order to be familiar with its whereabouts, and now he bitterly regretted his indiscretion.

But regrets were useless, and dismissing them from his mind, he began to draw himself up higher and higher still above the wall, being emboldened to do so by the perfect quiet which prevailed.

At length, by dint of a little scrambling, Dick managed to get fairly astride the wall; then, crouching down as closely as he could, he crawled in the direction of the light.

Evidently there was no one outside on the watch; but this was not surprising, for the night air was too cold to make anyone wish for the job, and, moreover, they doubtless considered that they should receive timely intimation of the highwayman's approach.

Dick found that he was on the wrong part of the wall to get anywhere near the lighted window; but he crept as close as he could, and then waited.

It would almost seem as though the slight noise he had made in his progress had been heard, for a door was opened, and the ostler appeared.

Dick sank down from observation.

"It is nothing," said the ostler, evidently addressing some one within—"nothing at all. Everything is quite quiet."

"Then come in, will you, and shut the door, for it is confoundedly cold."

The ostler obeyed with alacrity.

Owing to his elevated and awkward position, Dick was not able to do more than just get a glimpse through the doorway, yet that was sufficient to show him that the interior was fitted up as a stable.

Most probably Black Bess was there, and the officers were watching near her.

What else to do, Dick at the moment knew not.

How to regain possession of Black Bess certainly seemed a greater mystery than ever.

Dick felt it so, and chafed impatiently.

"It would be something," he thought, at last, "if I could only find out how many I have to grapple with. If no more than the ostler and the officer I saw, I will risk an encounter with them."

Dick felt much relieved at having thus arrived at a decision, and he was not long before he devised the means by which he could make this important discovery without running any great risk himself.

Looking back a little way, he saw that the large bell he had rung was fixed to the wall just inside the gate, and was, he believed, in such a position that he could reach it without much trouble.

A peal upon it, he thought, would not fail to draw them forth again.

At any rate, there could be no harm in putting such a stratagem into execution.

Dick seized hold of a piece of the wire and pulled it with all his might.

The clanging was truly terrific, and he kept it up for some time, so as to induce a belief that whoever was outside was anxious and impatient to get in.

"That's him!" cried a voice, as the stable door was flung open—"that's him for certain! Come on! Get all ready; but don't show yourselves till I give you the word!"

"Hush—hush!"

The ostler hurried to the gate, and as he had not replaced all the fastenings, he flung it open in much less time than he had taken before.

And now most decidedly did the fickle goddess Fortune favor the perplexed highwayman.

It so happened that just as the ostler flung open the gate a chance pedestrian wrapped in a cloak was passing by.

The ostler no sooner caught sight of him than he uttered a cry.

At the same time he sprang forward, seizing the stranger by the throat.

The cry was followed by the rush of footsteps, and then, from out of the stable there issued no less than seven police officers.

Had any one of them chanced to cast his eyes up to the top of the wall, it is quite possible that Dick would have been detected there.

But of this there was no fear.

All their faculties were engrossed by the struggle which was taking place in the street, for the stranger, believing himself attacked by robbers, resented with right good will the attack which the ostler made upon him.

The officers hastened to his assistance, and so convinced were they that the right man had been seized that they never troubled themselves to take a second glance, but with the greatest impetuosity joined in the fray.

It was almost a moment before Dick could properly comprehend what had occurred; but as soon as ever the actual truth flashed upon his mind, he said to himself, with great determination:

"Now or never is the time! Such a chance as this is more than I could possibly have expected, and certainly such a one as will not occur again!"

With these words in his mind, if not on his lips, Dick turned, lowered himself rapidly from the top of the wall, and dropped into the stable-yard.

He happened to alight upon some littered straw, so that no alarm was given.

The conflict was going on outside, if possible, with redoubled violence.

Like a shadow, Dick flitted rapidly across the yard and darted into the stable.

Here a light was burning.

A cry of exultation escaped his lips.

There, safe, and to all appearances unhurt, was his bonny mare, Black Bess.

In an instant she recognised her master, and gave utterance to a sharp neigh.

Dick caressed her while he untied her from the manger.

Her trappings had all been removed, and, though he made a rapid search, he failed to find them.

He uttered an impatient ejaculation; but to linger would spoil all—probably bring on his own death or capture.

"It must be thus," he said, addressing Black Bess. "I have ridden you bare-backed before, and can do so again. The halter shall serve me for a bridle."

So saying, Dick led Black Bess to the stable door.

He sprang then into the saddle, for a kind of lull had taken place outside.

The officers had just discovered that they had made a most ridiculous mistake.

The man they had seized, and whom they had at last succeeded in overpowering, they found, upon examination, to bear no resemblance to Dick Turpin whatever.

The clatter of hoofs upon the stones in the yard caused them to turn round.

What words can express their astonishment, rage, and fury, when they saw before them Dick Turpin sitting composedly on the back of bonny Black Bess!

CHAPTER CMLXXXVI.

DICK TURPIN ESCAPES, AND PROVIDES HIMSELF WITH A FRESH SADDLE AND BRIDLE.

"CLEAR the way, there!" cried Dick Turpin, in a loud, ringing voice, for the officers had all fallen into immovable attitudes indicative of their feelings—"clear the way there! Let me pass!"

This speech at once brought the officers to their senses.

Releasing their hold upon the bewildered stranger, they dashed headlong, pell-mell into the yard.

But Dick was prepared for them.

"On, Bess!" he cried, exultantly. "Forward, old lass! On—on! Down with them!"

Never before did Black Bess respond so gallantly or so promptly to her rider's commands.

She gave one tremendous bound forward—a bound which scarcely anything human could withstand.

The officers scattered before it like so much chaff, and, without experiencing a shock, Dick Turpin found himself on the other side of the stable gates.

The ostler was furious at this utter failure of his deep-laid plan.

"Down with him!" he yelled. "Shoot him—shoot him! Where are your pistols? Shoot him, I say! Shoot his mare—that will be better! Curse the brute! I can feel her teeth now! Lend me a pistol, somebody, and I'll shoot her!"

These vindictive words produced a total change in Dick's feelings, for they aroused all his strongest passions.

Any injury meditated towards himself he thought nothing of—he considered that the officers had a fair right to shoot at him if they wished.

But with Black Bess it was another thing altogether.

Things which, had they regarded himself alone, he would have taken no notice of whatever, assumed quite a different aspect when Black Bess was concerned.

Therefore, when these words were uttered, he turned round with flashing eyes.

In his hasty rage, he drew a pistol from his belt.

Without reflection, and acting only upon the impulse of resentment, he levelled it at the cowardly ostler, and fired.

In the confined space in which he stood, the report seemed tremendous.

The ostler uttered a shriek, and, throwing his arms up above his head, fell back.

Turning round again with equal suddenness, Dick hurled his pistol at his foes, and set Black Bess in motion.

His breast was still filled with angry feelings as he dashed down Piccadilly in the direction of the open country, though he experienced a savage satisfaction in the thought that the ostler had not escaped without receiving some punishment for his meditated atrocity.

"So he felt your teeth, did he, Bess?" he muttered. "I am glad of it, and I hope he will feel the pain till his last day! What was it, lass, that made you turn round upon him like that?" he added, aloud.

By the way he spoke, one would have thought that he really expected to receive some comprehensible reply from his mare, and certainly the odd, neighing noise which she made immediately afterwards seemed like an effort at articulation.

Dick's thoughts were now distracted by hearing unmistakable sounds of pursuit coming from the rear.

"No matter!" he said, as he turned round, and looked behind him with a disdainful smile. "Let them come on—I can outrun them easily!"

About this there could be little doubt, provided he had a clear course before him, for never had Black Bess appeared to be in better condition for the road.

Certainly, while Dick had gone through so many hair-breadth escapes she had been resting quietly in the stable.

The night was dark and inclined to be stormy, and, as far as Dick was able to see, there was no one on the road before them.

Accordingly, he allowed the rope attached to the halter to fall loosely upon the neck of his steed.

A gallop of a few miles placed him beyond all fear or danger of pursuit, and, such being the case, he gradually reduced his mare's pace, as he never unnecessarily distressed her by a hard gallop.

He also found that it was far from comfortable to ride so far without those useful appendages, a saddle and a bridle.

"I must make good this loss," he cried, half aloud. "But that can be done easily. I make no doubt—but the sooner the better, for all that."

Dick had not even now recovered his usual equanimity, and there was something angry and altogether unlike his usual manner in the way in which he looked before him in the hope of catching sight of some solitary traveller.

But no one appeared in sight.

A long stretch of rising ground was before him, and up this he allowed Black Bess to proceed at a walking pace.

When the ascent was almost accomplished, a horseman suddenly came into view on the brow of the hill.

"There is the man," was Dick's remark. "He has got what I want, and he had better surrender it to me quietly, for I am in no humor to be crossed."

The new-comer's horse seemed somewhat exhausted after making the ascent on the opposite side, and so it was allowed to pause a little while to recover its wind.

Dick rode forward at the same steady rate.

The sharp ring of a horse's footsteps caused the horseman to look before him and endeavor to pierce the darkness.

He was not long in making out the forms of the highwayman and his steed.

Dick kept unwaveringly on his way until breast to breast with the stranger.

Then he stopped with great abruptness.

"Good evening, sir!" he said.

The salutation was so courteous a one that the stranger could not refrain from returning it.

But evidently he either had his suspicions of Dick, or else he avoided making acquaintances on the high-road at night on principle, for he gave his horse a sharp slash with the whip, intending to set it in rapid motion.

But this intention was prevented from being carried out by Dick, who, with much promptitude, stretched out his hand and grasped the rein.

The horse swerved and pranced, almost unseating his rider, but Dick maintained his hold.

"Not so fast, sir," he cried—"not so fast! We have a little business to settle together before we part."

"You mistake! I have no business with you. Let me pass! I will not suffer to be molested thus!"

"You cannot help yourself," said Dick, gently but firmly, "and if you possess half the amount of good sense I give you credit for having, you will listen in patience."

"Well, sir?"

"It is not very well—in fact, very ill! I am in a little difficulty, and you must help me out of it!"

"That's cool, I must say!"

"Very!" responded Dick, imperturbably.

"Come, sir," said the stranger, impatiently, "I don't feel inclined to be trifled with——"

"Nor I either, sir!"

"What do you want?"

"That is a sensible question, and I will answer it without delay. Doubtless you perceive, sir, that I am unprovided with a saddle and a bridle."

"I do perceive it. But what has that to do with me?"

"Much, or else I am greatly mistaken."

"How so?"

"Why, sir, I must trouble you to favor me with yours, they will just suit me."

"My saddle and bridle?"

"Exactly!"

"And you would have the unblushing impudence to sit there and ask me quietly to surrender my property in that fashion?"

"Exactly!"

"Then damme, sir!" cried the stranger, furious with rage, "let me tell you that you have got the wrong man to deal with! I won't stand anything of the kind! Keep off!"

"My dear sir——"

"Oh, d—n——"

"Do you see this? It is a pistol. One of excellent make, I assure you! Hark! Did you hear that click? It is now on full cock! The muzzle is within eighteen inches of your breast. Now, be good enough to tell me whether you prefer to part with your saddle and bridle or your life, for I am determined to have one or the other, or both?"

There could be no possibility of mistaking Dick's words.

They were terribly in earnest.

They produced a palpable effect upon the stranger, for he shrunk back from before the muzzle of the pistol, and when he spoke again there was a marked difference in his tones.

"Put that pistol up, I beg! It might go off at any moment—accidentally, you know. Put it up!"

"Anything to oblige," said Dick, quietly. "And now, sir, since I have granted your request, grant mine."

"What is it?"

"Let me recommend you to dismount without making any more fuss, and, with what speed you are capable of making, divest your horse of his trappings."

"But if I give you my saddle and bridle, what the devil am I to do?"

"Get another."

"Why don't you?"

"I am about to."

"Curse it, but you know what I mean. My horse has got a backbone that sticks up, and it's as sharp as a nail to sit on, I assure you."

Dick could not forbear a smile.

"All that produces no effect upon me whatever, sir. But come; words enough and to spare have been wasted already. Dismount and off with the saddle at once!"

The stranger appeared to hesitate.

Dick carried his hand to his pocket in which he had carelessly deposited the pistol.

The gesture was sufficient.

With an execration which, if not loud, was deep, the stranger slid off his horse.

"I don't mind confessing to you," said Dick, "because I suppose you suspect it, but I am a highwayman. I have had a close brush with the officers, and you can supply the loss of a saddle and bridle with infinitely less trouble and risk than I can. So make no demur—I cannot tell how soon my enemies may make their appearance. Be quick!"

Upon hearing this, the traveller looked anxiously down the hill.

While he did so he fervently wished that he might be so fortunate as to catch sight of a troop of police officers approaching.

CHAPTER CMLXXXVII.

IN WHICH DICK TURPIN HAS A VERY ODD ADVENTURE WITH A VERY ECCENTRIC PERSONAGE.

"Curse it!" said the traveller, under his voice. "Whoever knew of officers to be at hand when they were particularly wanted?"

"What are you muttering about?" asked Dick, who had noticed the rapid glance, and partly caught the half-uttered words.

"Nothing, sir—nothing! Here, take the saddle, and be content. Surely you would not deprive me of the bridle?"

"I must—I cannot do without it. But you shall have this halter in exchange."

The stranger ground his teeth, but another glance assured him that no help was near, and so he surrendered the bridle.

Dick had Black Bess caparisoned with these fresh trappings in a moment, then lost no time in vaulting into the saddle.

"Now, look you, sir," he said, "there is little occasion to make so much fuss. The loss you have sustained is such a one that you can easily repair. You ought, indeed, to think yourself most lucky."

"Lucky?" repeated the traveller, sardonically.

"Yes, lucky in getting off so easily; and I should advise you to part company with me now, or I may take a fancy to whatever money or valuables you may be carrying about with you."

Hearing this, the traveller gave a great start, and hastily mounted his horse.

Either this idea had not occurred to him before, or else he carried about his person some objects he was by no means willing to part with.

"Good night, sir!" said Dick, with a politeness that made the other furious. "A pleasant journey to you!"

What the traveller said in reply was inarticulate, but he struck his spurs sharply into his horse's flanks, and set off down the hill at a pace that must have caused him great inconvenience if his horse's backbone was anything like so sharp as he had declared it to be.

Dick Turpin laughed heartily at the adventure, indeed, he was so amused by it that those angry feelings which had heretofore filled his breast were vanished.

"Now, Bess," he exclaimed, "let us have another gallop, and that will go far towards taking us to our journey's end, when, I doubt not, we shall find many anxiously looking for our arrival. Forward—forward, old girl! It seems to me that we have the road all to ourselves to-night!"

Slackening the reins while he spoke, Black Bess broke out into one of those long, stretching gallops which get over the ground with so much rapidity, and which she seemed to perform with so little fatigue to herself.

Ere he had gone far, however, Dick began gradually to draw her in again, for his quick ears had detected the approach of another horseman on the road.

It was more upon impulse than reflection that he reduced his mare's rate of speed, but having done so, he paused and began to think.

The sound made by the new-comer's horse's hoofs became now much more audible.

"What shall I do?" Dick asked himself. "This little adventure seems purposely thrown in my way. Shall I neglect it? It goes against the grain to do so; and besides, in the carrying out of the little enterprise I have on hand a good supply of money will be absolutely necessary."

He had no further space for deliberation, for just then the traveller's horse came into sight round the bend in the road.

An ejaculation escaped Dick's lips.

He reined Black Bess in with great suddenness.

Then he flung himself from the saddle with an amount of precipitancy that looked dangerous in the extreme.

The cause of these actions is easily described.

The horse which came round the bend of the road at so violent a pace was riderless.

Or rather, at a first glance he appeared to be so.

The highwayman's keen eyes, however, discerned that this horse was dragging at his heels some large, dark object.

What was it?

Dick recognised it with a shudder, and that was why he dismounted so precipitately.

It was the body of a man—

Evidently that of its rider, who by some means or other had fallen to the ground, and in doing so one foot had remained entangled in the stirrup.

The manner in which he was dragged over the rough, hard road was truly terrible to behold.

There was a groan and a faint cry for help.

But Dick was ready.

He was standing cool, calm, and determined in the middle of the road, and when the horse came thundering up he sprang forward and seized it by the reins.

But he almost lost his footing in his attempt to curb the speed of the terrified animal.

Clinging tightly, however, he ran forward a few yards, and then brought it quietly and gradually to a standstill.

The animal exhibited every sign of intense fear.

Its mane seemed standing half erect, its eyeballs were expanded and glaring wildly, while its flanks were covered over with white foam.

Few understood better how to treat a horse than Dick Turpin, and it looked magical to see how quickly he succeeded in taming and calming this frightened creature.

This much being done, and keeping tight hold of the rein in order to be guarded from any other accident, Dick turned his attention to the stranger, whose condition seemed to be desperate indeed.

He lay now without exhibiting the least sign of animation.

Not without some trouble, Dick succeeded in releasing his foot from the stirrup-iron; but having done so, he led the horse to the side of the road, and well secured it to the low-lying branch of a tree.

Here he knew it would be safe, and require no further attention, thus leaving him free to devote all his time to the injured stranger.

"Can you speak, sir?" asked Dick, as he bent over him. "If you can, tell me what I can do in order to assist you?"

A very faint groan was the only reply Dick got to this speech; but yet it contented him, for his object in inquiring was merely to ascertain whether the traveller was alive or not.

Finding that his injuries had not yet caused death, Dick hastened to the side of the road where he had noticed a little brook was flowing.

CLAUDE DUVAL AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK COMPEL THE BALIFFS TO DISGORGE THEIR GOLD.

He had nothing else to carry water in save his hat; but he did not hesitate to put it to this use.

Returning quickly, he sprinkled some of it upon the stranger's face, who groaned again, and this time more audibly than before.

"Help—help," he gasped—"help! Save me, and what reward you ask for shall be yours! Help—oh, help!"

"I will help you gladly," said Dick. "Do you not already feel much better?"

"Thanks to you, I do. I feel that I am coming back to life! Oh, my bitterest curses be upon them; but they shall rue this deed—ay, they shall rue it!"

While speaking, the stranger evidently in no ordinary degree recovered possession of his senses, for he raised himself partially upon one arm, though the effort seemed to cause him infinite pain,

Dick now, for the first time, had an opportunity of noting his personal appearance.

As to his apparel, it was not easy to form any clear idea of its quality, for it was thickly besmeared with mud, though by its make Dick could tell that he belonged to the higher ranks of society.

"Water," he said, faintly—"give me water!"

Dick obeyed, and the stranger, as well as he was able, removed from his face the blood and dirt with which it was thickly covered, wiping himself upon a handkerchief which he took from an inner pocket.

When this operation was completed, Dick caught sight of a young, round, but very florid face, in which a pair of small eyes were set, giving him a sleepy appearance.

"You have had a narrow escape of your life, sir," said Dick. "I am glad to find your injuries are no worse than they are."

"Curse it, I'm bad enough! But come, help me on my horse—I can't stop here; and just name your reward, and you shall have it."

Dick, as may be supposed, did not relish being spoken to in this fashion.

"I want no reward," he answered. "Money would not purchase my services in such a case. I would have done as much for anyone."

"Is it possible," asked the stranger, "that you do not recognise me

Dick looked at him closely.

Then shook his head

"I have no recollection of ever having seen you," he said, after a brief pause.

The stranger gave a peculiar smile.

"And you refuse payment?"

"I do."

"Then you are an extraordinary person, that is all I can say, and I wish I could have a few about my person like you. However, I am determined to reward you in some way!"

"I want nothing, will receive nothing. Good-night! You are welcome!"

Dick, as he spoke moved to the side of Black Bess, and with his usual quick bound seated himself in the saddle.

"Stay," said the stranger, with greater imperiousness than had as yet been perceptible in his tones—"stay, I command you!"

"I obey nothing but my own inclinations. Once more, good-night!"

"But stay," cried the stranger, again, who seemed to be much interested and surprised by Dick's manner—"stay! At least you will let me know to whom I am indebted for this great service. What is your name?"

"It shall never be said that I refused to own it!"

"Well?"

"Dick Turpin."

"The highwayman?"

"At your service."

"But you stand in peril of your life."

"I am aware of it," was the smiling reply.

"A large reward is offered for your apprehension."

"True again."

"Then how is it that you are not captured?"

"Because a better man than myself has never opposed himself to me. And now, having answered all your questions, perhaps you will not object to reply to mine?"

"Sir," said the stranger, "you forget to whom you are speaking!"

"I do not, for I have not the pleasure of knowing."

"Look you, then," said the stranger. "I cannot bring myself to part with you thus—I will not show myself ungrateful. Take this ring, and if you will bring it some night to St. James's Palace you will hear of something that will turn out greatly to your advantage."

"St. James's Palace?" echoed Dick, for this mention of the abode of royalty not unreasonably filled him with surprise.

"Just so, and whether you like to take the ring or not I leave you to choose. If you don't care to pick it up, it can stay there for the benefit of the next person who passes this way."

With these words, the stranger urged his horse forward, and before the highwayman thoroughly recovered from the state of surprise into which these strange occurrences had thrown him, he was out of sight.

"Well," he ejaculated, at length, "this is an odd adventure, at any rate. What an eccentric person! Who on earth can he be? However, I will pick up the ring, and keep it as a memento of the affair. Some day or other I may feel disposed to find out what it all means, and learn what I am to hear to my advantage."

Having arrived at this determination, Dick once more dismounted and picked up the ring.

"A rare gem!" he exclaimed, as he held it up. "How it glitters and sparkles in this darkness! It must be of great value. Whoever can he be?"

It was in vain that Dick asked himself this question. He might give many guesses, all of which, possibly, might be far removed from the truth.

"I must take time to consider of it," he said, mentally. "Well, old lass," he added, aloud, addressing himself to his mare, "I think we have had enough of adventures for one night; besides, I ought to remember how much uneasiness my long absence will occasion. I will dally no longer. Forward, Bess! We will take the nearest road to our destination."

Black Bess really seemed to understand that she was about to return to comfortable quarters, for she set forward with great willingness.

The highwayman's thoughts were busy as he rode swiftly along through the darkness; but, true to his determination, he did not draw rein until he perceived before him the dark-looking mass of trees which formed a background to the ruins of the old castle.

Greater cautiousness was now required in his progress; but as he rode slowly towards the spot where he had last left his companions he little thought of the strange and startling events which had taken place since his departure.

But in order that the reader shall be no longer kept in the dark concerning them, we will revert to the proceedings of Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack, both of whom it will be remembered had resolved to set out upon a pecuniary expedition.

CHAPTER CMLXXXVIII.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK AND CLAUDE DUVAL DO A GOOD ACTION, AND RECEIVE A SUBSTANTIAL REWARD IN RETURN.

"It's a darkish night, Jack," said Claude Duval to his companion, as soon as they gained the first cross-road; "but it is all the better for us on that account, I fancy."

"Most decidedly," was the reply. "And, to tell the truth, I never felt in better tune for a rare adventure in my life!"

"Nor I, and it is very odd to me if we do not meet with what we want. But come—push forward; we are, as yet, much too near the castle to think of attacking anybody."

With these words, the highwaymen at once increased the pace at which their horses had lately been going, and for some time a perfect silence reigned between them.

It was not broken until both, as if animated by the same impulse, pulled up.

"There is some one on the road before us, Claude."

"Yes, I hear them."

"Your pistols are ready, of course?"

"Yes."

"So are mine."

"Then fall back. The new-comers are certainly approaching us, and we shall be able to make up our minds as to whether we shall attack them, or allow them to pass by scot free."

Without further consideration, the two friends backed their horses close to the side of the road, which happened to be thrown into deep shadow.

As soon as they had taken up their positions here the approach of horsemen was more unmistakable than before.

Claude was listening intently, and then he said, in a low voice:

"There are three travellers on the road."

"Yes, there can be no mistake about that."

"Can we manage so many?"

"I am willing to try; but we shall be able to form a better idea when they come up. Hark!"

The sound of voices could now be heard mingling with the trampling of the horses' hoofs, but what was said they could not as yet make out.

As the horsemen came closer, too, it became evident that they were slackening their speed, and when within about twenty yards of the spot where the highwaymen were lying in ambush they stopped altogether.

"Gentlemen," they heard a voice say, "pray listen to me! Surely you must have some degree of compassion?"

"Well, whether we have or not is nothing to do with the present business!" was the gruff reply. "Our orders are clear, and we intend to carry them out."

"Then I hope you will never have to plead as I plead now. Not that I care personally for myself in the slightest degree. It is my poor wife and children that I care about. They will be involved in utter ruin!"

"It's a bad job, that's certain," joined in the third

"but we cannot help it. You ought not to blame us for it."

"But I do blame you!" was the half-angry response. "Had you chosen to do as I asked, you would have found me on your return."

"Oh, very likely; but we have been played that game too often to think about granting such a request."

The first speaker gave a deep sigh.

"It is a hard case," he cried—"a very hard case, and I am sure the world will join with me in thinking so. But when I first got into Joshua's debt I might have guessed what would be the end."

"Then you ought to have known better, that's all I can say. But, come, we have reached the top of this hill, and our horses have winded themselves nicely, so forward once more, for we have many miles to journey yet."

There was a stir among the horsemen immediately.

Not a word of the preceding conversation had been lost by the two highwaymen, who at first were rather at a loss to comprehend the rights of the affair.

But just as the travellers set themselves in motion, Sixteen-String Jack bent sideways towards his comrade and whispered:

"Put up your pistols, Claude. I have an idea! I can't stay to explain it now; but take my opinion for it that it is good."

"I will do so readily; but what else am I to do?"

"I cannot stop to explain."

"Then I will just back you up in everything you say and do."

"In that case all will be well."

There was not time for another syllable to be exchanged.

But Claude Duval had the most implicit faith in his companion's strategic powers, and so was prepared to follow him blindly.

Nevertheless, Sixteen-String Jack's first movement filled him with surprise.

Riding slowly out from his place of concealment, he accosted the three travellers, who naturally enough shrunk back, half in distrust, half in alarm.

But the first words uttered by Jack served to dispel whatever alarm they might have felt.

"Gentlemen," he said, in an apologetic voice, "excuse us for troubling you, but we happen to be journeying your way, and we should be glad to travel with you for protection's sake, as we have a large amount of money about us."

"We purpose riding as far as Oxford," was the reply given by the man with the gruff voice. "But perhaps you are not going so far?"

"No—we have not much further to ride."

"Then you are welcome to join us."

Sixteen-String Jack then very suitably expressed his thanks, in which he was very well followed up by Claude, who wondered what on earth his comrade's designs were.

They rode on after that for some few moments without speaking.

Sixteen-String Jack broke the silence, as though it was irksome to him.

"I hope you will excuse me for mentioning such a thing," he said, deferentially, "but you must understand that when my friend and myself heard some one on the road before us, we thought the most prudent thing we could do would be to conceal ourselves, hoping by that means, if robbers were abroad seeking for prey, we should escape their notice."

"A very wise precaution," said the one who rode nearest to Claude.

"On the other hand," continued Jack, "we made up our minds that should we find respectable travellers were approaching we would ask them, as a favor, to allow us to ride along in company."

"Just so," said the gruff voice, possibly merely because Jack paused, and he therefore felt it incumbent upon him to say something.

"It was then," added Sixteen-String Jack, in a louder voice, "that I happened to hear a conversation between you—of a very private character I make no doubt—but still I heard it, and, I must confess, it not only interested me, but also stimulated my curiosity to such a degree that I am most anxious to hear more!"

"Then, if that is your desire, it shall be soon gratified," exclaimed the gentleman with the sad voice, joining in the conversation for the first time. "The tale is not a long one, and when you have heard it, it is very strange to me if you do not confess that a case of greater and more unmerited hardship was never laid before you."

"Pray proceed," answered Jack, coming a little closer "I am all attention."

"Then," was the reply, "I may just briefly say that I owed a certain person the sum of one hundred pounds. I speak in the past tense, and when you have heard a little more you will say that I do so advisedly."

"Perhaps," interposed the gruff voice. "But, anyhow, you shall have your say first, and then I will have mine afterwards."

"You are quite welcome; but I must first declare that which you cannot deny. When the time came round at which the hundred pounds was due, I was unable to find the money; but I said that if only a short extra time was allowed me it should be forthcoming.

"This was promised, and I set to work most diligently, being determined to make any sacrifice rather than suffer myself to be hauled off to the debtors' jail at Oxford, for this is the fate my stern creditors threatened me with. But I am going too much into detail. I will now lose no time in coming to the point.

"The allotted time expired, and this was at sunset this evening, and my mind was at ease and content, for, by dint of selling off a great deal of my stock at a much reduced price, I managed to collect together the sum of one hundred and two pounds; so, naturally, I felt myself secure. Judge of my surprise when, just about dusk, these two gentlemen—Heaven forgive me for calling them such!—entered my house, and declared they were bailiffs, and that if the money was not paid down to them at once they should remove me to the prison.

"I said at once that there was no need for such threats or boisterous behavior, adding that I had the money ready. While I spoke I took out my money bag and placed it on the table.

"'One hundred and twelve pounds we want!' said the gentleman on my right.

"'One hundred and twelve?' I repeated. 'That is some mistake. My debt is no more than one level hundred.'

"'I know that,' was the reply; 'but the twelve pounds is for expenses already incurred.'

"'Expenses? Good Heaven! there was no occasion for anything of the kind! I had been granted a certain prolongation of time, and at its expiry the money was ready. And then to think the expenses should swell up to something like one-eighth part of the whole debt!'

"As you may perhaps understand, sir, I succeeded in making no impression whatever upon these men. The expenses had been incurred, they said, and must be paid.

"Finding this to be the case, I said:

"'Well, gentlemen, it will be quite foolish on my part to disguise the truth, and so I confess that all the cash I have in this world is contained in this bag, and the amount is one hundred and two pounds, which I hand over to you.'

"'I receive that amount on account,' said the bailiff. 'As for the balance, you must go along with us until you are able to find it.'

"'What?' I ejaculated, almost bursting with indignation, for my passion had been gradually rising. 'Would you carry a man off to the county jail for such a paltry amount as ten pounds?'

"'That's our orders,' was the only reply I could get. 'Make your choice—pay the ten pounds, or come along with us.'

"To pay the ten pounds was utterly out of the question, and there was no one to whom I could apply for the loan of the amount.

"In a word, sir, to make a long story short, these men, having received from me the hundred and two pounds, are now dragging me off to jail for the remaining ten pounds. No words have the least effect upon them—they are deaf to every entreaty. I have no doubt but what they will carry out their cruel intention to the very letter, and if so I am a ruined man for ever—nothing but the workhouse stares my wife and children in the face."

The stranger's voice faltered while he spoke, and the last words were almost inarticulate.

"If this is all true," said Sixteen-String Jack, "I do indeed agree with you in saying that a worse case of oppression was never heard of."

"Well, that may be so," said the man with the gruff voice; "but, with all respect to you, sir, it seems to me that a man should never get into debt, but, if he does such a foolish thing, he must abide by the consequences."

"You are welcome to your opinion," replied Jack; "but, for my own part, I am determined that this poor gentleman shall not be carried off to jail."

"Perhaps," said the bailiff, sneeringly, "you would be good enough to let me know how you intend to prevent it?"

"I shall take a very easy means of doing so," replied Jack, "for, rather than allow such an act of oppression to be consummated, I will pay the ten pounds out of my own pocket."

"Then, of course, if you like to do that, there is an end of the matter."

The poor debtor, hearing these words, could scarcely believe the evidence of his own senses.

He was for a moment or so struck dumb with surprise.

At last, in a broken, hesitating voice, he did his best to thank Jack for his generosity.

"Now," continued the highwayman, "where can we settle this business? How far is it to the next inn?"

"Not far, if we turn back again," was the bailiff's sulky rejoinder.

"But I cannot consent to allow you to be taken so far out of your way," said the poor gentleman. "Let us journey on."

"Nay," said Jack, "I have set my mind upon freeing you from these men, and it shall be done at the earliest possible moment; so let us retrace our steps."

"It is most extraordinary," murmured the poor gentleman, "that you, a perfect and utter stranger, should be willing to do what not one of my best-known friends would!"

While these words were being spoken, the whole of the party turned their heads in the opposite direction.

Claude found an opportunity to whisper to his comrade.

"What on earth are you after, Jack?" he said.

"Wait a little while, and you will see. I am going to lay out a little money that will pay a very good rate of interest."

There was no chance of saying more, for there was the strong probability that every word that passed their lips would be overheard.

The bailiffs scarcely knew what to think of the affair, but, not seeing how to hint any objections or make any refusal, they pushed on to the inn.

It was situated just at the foot of the hill, and on their arrival Jack called out in a loud voice for a private room.

This was a request not often made in that out-of-the-way place, and it produced an immense effect upon the landlord accordingly.

They were ushered into a tolerably comfortable apartment, and by Jack's orders a plentiful supply of wine was brought in.

His next proceeding was to draw ten guineas from his pocket, which he flung down upon the table with a careless air.

"There," he said, addressing the two bailiffs, "make out your formal discharge, and release this gentleman from your custody."

This was accordingly done, but as soon as ever the matter was completed Jack said, in a stern voice:

"Now, gentlemen, if you will just drink up your cup of wine, we will part, for I don't hesitate to tell you plainly that I would be much rather without your company than with it. As soon as you are gone, this gentleman and myself will settle matters together."

Jack indicated the poor gentleman as he spoke.

The bailiffs were far from pleased with Jack's manner, but they swallowed their wine and their displeasure along with it.

Without any more delay, they then took their departure, looking very much chagrined, and no doubt feeling that they had been very badly done by.

As soon as ever they left the room, Jack sprang from his seat and ran to the window.

He was just in time to see the bailiffs in the act of mounting their horses.

Without appearing to be particularly interested in doing so, he watched carefully the direction they took when they rode off.

"I suppose," he said, returning to the table, that those gentlemen are off to Oxford?"

"Yes, such is no doubt their intention," replied the debtor. "And now, kind sirs," he added, "as I have somewhat recovered myself from my state of surprise, permit me to thank you for what you have done. I cannot express myself as I should, and as I wish; but come with me and see my wife and little ones—they will prove far more eloquent than myself."

"Enough," said Sixteen-String Jack, who several times during this speech endeavored to interrupt the speaker—"you have said already more than enough. What we have done has been done freely, so, if you wish to oblige us, you will say nothing more about it."

"Such is ever the way with true generosity. But now what bond or deed shall I draw up as some security to you for the loan of the money?"

"None at all. I will not permit anything of the sort. Wait till I am in want of the cash, then I will call upon you. And now good evening. You have not tasted your glass—doubtless you are impatient to get homewards. As for us, time presses, and so, if you will excuse us, farewell!"

The poor gentleman again, to the best of his ability, poured out his thanks, but Jack made a very rapid exit from the room.

He was closely followed by Claude, to whom he said, in a low voice:

"Follow me. The sooner we are in the saddle now the better."

He led the way while he spoke to the front part of the inn, where, in accordance with their instructions, the horses had been left in charge of the ostler.

Without any delay or hindrance whatever, the highwaymen mounted.

Jack turned his horse's head in the direction of Oxford, and set forward at a sharp trot.

Claude lost not a moment in placing himself by his side.

"What on earth does all this mean?" he inquired.

"Cannot you guess?"

"I think I could if I tried; but explain yourself—that will be much more satisfactory."

"I am going to do so. Listen!"

"Say on—I am paying the utmost attention."

"That gentleman at the inn must think us a couple of eccentric personages. Still, we have done him a very good service, and, as I believe, prevented the execution of a great piece of injustice. But the end I had in view was a profitable one."

"I thought so."

"We know now that these two men are on the road before us—we have also certain knowledge of the amount they carry about their persons, so denial will be about as foolish as it will be out of the question."

"Forward, then!" said Claude. "The sooner we overtake them the better!"

"Just so; and, if you are at all in the same mind as myself, it will afford you the keenest satisfaction to compel these rascally tipstaves to disgorge their money."

"But we shan't get the poor gentleman into trouble again, shall we?"

"Certainly not! If he has their receipt he can hold himself clear."

"Then that's all right. And now, Jack, for a gallop, for, if you will believe me, my fingers positively itch to have the handling of some of those fellows' gold!"

"The same here!" replied Jack, and as he spoke he touched his horse rather sharply with the spur.

Claude did the like, and in less than a second afterwards the highwaymen were tearing along the road at the utmost speed their horses were capable of making.

CHAPTER CMLXXXIX.

CLAUDE DUVAL AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK COMPEL THE TWO BAILIFFS TO DISGORGE THEIR GOLD

ERE long, our two friends were able to catch the sound of horses' hoofs on the roadway before them, and immediately upon making the discovery they gently reined-in their horses.

When their pace had subsided to a canter, Claude and Jack perceived the forms of the bailiffs before them.

By their manner, it would seem as though they had heard the highwaymen's furious approach, for they had drawn as close as they could get to one side of the road in order to leave a free passage.

Not for a moment, however, did they guess what Fate had in store for them.

It was, then, much to their astonishment and dismay that they found the two new-comers ride up to them, pistols in hand.

"Now, you rascals," cried Jack, in a somewhat excited voice, "we will come to a bit of a settlement!"

"Settlement?" ejaculated the one with the gruff voice. "What do you mean, sir? I thought all matters were perfectly settled between us?"

"Then all I can say is," returned Jack, "that you have made a very great mistake!"

"Yes," added Claude. "Hand over every farthing you have about you, or, as sure as you are rascally tipstaves, these pistols shall make an end of you!"

"But we have nothing—absolutely nothing, except the money we have just received, and surely you would not rob us of that? Why, it would be our ruin!"

"I can't help that!" said Jack. "It would have been ruin to that poor gentleman if you had dragged him off to prison. But that made no impression upon you, so you cannot expect any different conduct from us."

"Drop that!" cried Claude, with great suddenness, and at the same time that he pronounced the words he struck one of the bailiffs a heavy blow upon the knuckles with the butt-end of a pistol.

A roar of pain followed, and the man's grasp relaxing, allowed the pistol which he had drawn stealthily from his pocket to fall to the ground, where it immediately exploded.

Fortunately, no danger was done either to our friends or their horses.

"You thought my eyes were off you, did you?" exclaimed Claude. "Take my advice, instead of making any foolish resistance, hand over the cash!"

"But, gentlemen——" they began, expostulatingly.

"Silence!" roared Claude, at the top of his voice. "Hand over at once, or we will blow your brains out first and then empty your pockets afterwards, which will be quite as troublesome and disagreeable to you as to us, I can assure you!"

With a heavy sigh one took from his pocket a crown-piece and dropped it into Claude's hand, who asked immediately:

"What is that for?"

"I assure you, sir, it is all I have——"

"Bah!"

"All I have of my own."

"I see there is no help for it," said Jack, deliberately cocking his pistol while he spoke. "They won't listen to reason. Down with yours!"

"Jim—Jim!" yelled one, as soon as Jack levelled his pistol. "Give up the dubs! Don't be a fool! I won't sit here and be shot—no, not for ten times a hundred pound!"

Finding that the highwaymen were terribly in earnest, the other bailiff most reluctantly plunged his hand into an inner pocket, from which he drew forth a large and apparently very heavy bag.

Jack snatched it away from him in a moment.

"We're ruined," they both cried together—"ruined completely! What can be done?"

"Why, rejoice to think you have got off so lightly."

"Hurray!" cried the one with the gruff voice, and abruptly changing his manner. "Hurray! Help—help! Highwaymen and thieves! Help—help!"

This sudden outcry took the highwaymen slightly by surprise, but turning their heads in the direction the bailiff was looking they perceived a small troop of horsemen approaching who looked suspiciously like police officers.

"Off and away, Jack," cried Claude Duval. "Let us be satisfied with what we have. It would be worse than folly to remain any longer."

"Follow me then," was the reply. "I can hear some vehicle on the road before us."

So saying, Sixteen-String Jack made his horse face the low-growing hedge which divided one side of the roadway from a green, undulating meadow.

His horse leaped the obstruction easily, and so did Claude's.

Nothing but soft, springy turf being beneath them, they urged their horses onward at the utmost speed they were capable of.

The sharp report of a pistol and the sound of many voices made them aware that the officers had in good earnest begun the pursuit.

The discharge of the pistol was a foolish act, for though the highwaymen were not far off, yet they were out of range.

Nevertheless, it made the highwaymen turn their heads and look behind them.

To their unalloyed gratification, they then perceived that nearly half the officers had come to grief in attempting to overleap the hedgerow.

But those whose horses had succeeded in keeping their footing commenced the chase with a great show of animation and courage.

Well mounted as the highwaymen were, however, it quickly became apparent that the officers had not the ghost of a chance of overtaking them unless some unlooked-for accident should occur.

But yet it was also beyond doubt that they would be able to hang on in the rear of the two friends until they met with some additional assistance.

This Claude and Jack determined to prevent if possible, so they did not scruple to push their horses onwards to the utmost of their power.

In a short time, then, they had the satisfaction of finding that the distance between themselves and their foes had visibly increased, and after the lapse of another quarter of an hour they could not, when they looked back, detect any signs of them.

"All right!" cried Claude. "Pull in, Jack; don't you see there is a village or town before us? If we ride through it at full speed we shall cause such a prodigious clatter that all the inhabitants will be aroused."

The highwaymen had quitted the fields and entered upon what seemed to be the high-road.

Claude's advice was too good to be neglected, so Jack pulled up at once.

"We will go at a walk," he said, wiping the perspiration from his face. "It will enable our horses to recover themselves a little; we have pressed them hard."

This was a palpable fact, for both animals showed unmistakable signs of being greatly exhausted and distressed.

Quite at a gentle walk, then, the highwaymen approached the village.

A profound silence prevailed in the long, straggling street—not a light was anywhere to be seen. The inhabitants had been doubtless fast asleep for many hours.

They passed on without exciting the least observation, but just as they were about to pass out into the open country again, both heard distinctly a low cry of anguish or sorrow.

It was so dark around that for some moments they could not perceive from whom the cry proceeded, but a repetition of it enabled them to discern a dark figure that was crouching down near a doorway.

Whether male or female it was not possible for them at that distance to say, but as if actuated by the same impulse the highwaymen drew nearer.

Aroused probably by their approach, the figure quitted its crouching position and stood upright.

They then found it to be a female.

She was still entitled to be called young, but her face was hollow and pinched, and her scanty clothing disclosed how much her person was emaciated.

She held what seemed to be a bundle of rags in her arms, and but for a faint wailing cry which at this moment broke forth, the highwaymen would no doubt have considered it to be nothing else.

"My good woman," said Sixteen-String Jack, in a kindly voice, "what can you be doing here in the street at this lonely hour of the night?"

For a moment there was a silence.

Then, in a husky voice, the woman replied:

"Alas, sir, I am destitute—nothing to eat—nowhere to lay my head—nothing for this poor little one, who is half dead with cold and hunger. I have knocked and rung repeatedly at this door, and cannot gain admittance."

The two highwaymen looked up at these words, and then they noticed that they were standing in front of a large and gloomy-looking building.

"What place is it?"

"The workhouse, sir" was the answer given, reluctantly, as though from shame.

"And do you mean to tell me," cried Sixteen-String Jack, "that, at this place, erected purposely for the relief of the destitute, you cannot gain an entrance? Would they leave you here to perish on the very threshold?"

"I fear their hearts are hard enough, sir. The beadle, who seems in command, appears dead to pity. He cursed me for disturbing his night's rest, and finished by telling me to move off, as this was not my parish. Then he slammed the door, and I, faint, sick, and broken-hearted, sank down here, unable to proceed another step."

No words of ours could possibly express in any degree the amount of indignation which these words excited in the breasts of the two friends.

"It is monstrous—abominable!" Sixteen-String Jack managed to say at length. "But they shall repent this harshness! Where's the bell?"

He slipped from his horse while he spoke, leaving his companion to take care of it.

A very brief search indeed enabled him to find the bell-handle.

Seizing it tightly, he pulled it up and down with the full vigor of his arm. While doing so, it seemed to him as though his anger was finding an outlet.

Most assuredly never such a peal had been rung upon that bell since a clapper first hung within it.

The clangor was tremendous.

Then, becoming more accustomed to the darkness, he perceived a massive iron knocker.

This he grasped with his left hand, and pounded away with all his might, while the clanging of the bell seemed to grow louder and louder.

Very soon there were signs that the inmates of the workhouse were alarmed.

Then came the sound of the opening of a door, accompanied by a heavy footstep and a flash of light.

"Hullo, there!" said a thick, wheezy voice—"hullo! What the devil is the matter? Is the place afire? D—n it all, I say, what's the matter?"

Just as these words were pronounced a little wicket in the centre of the outer door was thrown back.

The aperture which it disclosed was strongly barred with iron.

On the other side of this grating appeared the florid countenance of a man, who rejoiced in a huge carbuncled nose and a dirty red woollen nightcap.

"D—n it all!" he said again, as he held up the light. "Did I speak, or did the wind blow, eh? What's the matter?"

The woman hearing this, to her, all-dreaded voice, shrank back in fear.

"Can you ask what is the matter," said Jack, sternly, "when you know so well? Why, a human being, a fellow-creature is dying at your gates of cold and starvation—that's what's the matter."

"Good 'Evvings!" ejaculated the beadle, drawing a long breath. "To think that I should live to hear such words! A pauper! Oh, am I alive? Well, curse your impudence! Stay there till you rot, and be d—d to you!"

With these words the parochial functionary shut the little wicket again, and stalked back with a heavy, and what he fully believed in his own self-conceit was a majestic step.

Sixteen-String Jack was so completely taken aback by this reception that he stood for a moment after the beadle had retired more like a man in a dream than awake and in full possession of his senses.

"Can this be possible?" he at last ejaculated. "Confound the rascal! I wish I had him on this side of the doorway. I would quickly make him alter his tone."

"Alas, sir," said the woman, "it is quite in vain for you to trouble yourself. He will not let me in."

"We will have another word or two to the bargain, then."

With these words, Jack once more seized upon the bell and knocker, and, if such a thing could be possible, plied them more vigorously than before.

"It is quite useless, Jack," said Claude, with difficulty making his voice heard. "He will not attend to you again, or if he comes, it will only be to repeat his former insolence."

Jack felt the truth of this, and knew, besides, that he was losing time—moreover, it was most impolitic on their parts to get up such a disturbance, and so bring people around them.

But, for all that, Jack said:

"I must get him to come out once more, and when he does, if I don't give him pepper, call me a fool."

"But what can you do while he is on one side of the gate, and you on the other?"

"You will soon see."

"Oh, gentlemen," cried the woman, much alarmed, "pray take my advice and go away! You cannot do me any good, and you will only get yourselves into trouble."

But Jack paid no attention whatever to her supplications.

Claude looked to see what he was about.

To his surprise, Jack had taken his powder-flask from his pocket, and was busily occupied in placing it upon the ledge of the wicket. He found there was just room for one measureful of powder in between each bar.

"There," he said, as, having finished, he restored the powder flask complacently to his pocket. "I only hope he will put his ugly old nose as close to the bars as he did the last time. If he does, I'll warm it for him!"

"What do you mean to do, Jack?"

"Can't you see?"

"You had better come away."

"Not just yet. Here goes again!"

Jack thereupon began tolling away at the bell at such a rate as would make it quite an impossibility for anyone to remain in the house and listen to it.

As he fully expected, before he had been going at it long the beadle again made his appearance.

His wrath now was something terrific.

He flung open the door of the little wicket, and peered through the grating.

"Well, d—n your impudence!" he exclaimed. "The end of the world has come now, sure enough! Be off, curse you—be off! I'll call the watch, and have you locked up! You're drunk—mad drunk, both of you! What do you mean by disturbing me at this time of night, eh?"

"Because," said Jack, "a woman happens to be dying at your gate for want of sustenance."

"Then let her die, and rot, and you and all! Ah! I can hear some one coming! Now we shall have an alteration, I'll warrant. Here, watch—watch, I say!"

There was certainly some one approaching from the village, the inhabitants of which had doubtless been aroused by the unusual clamor.

But the beadle, little thinking of the trifling retribution that was in store for him, pressed his face close to the bars of the wicket, and bawled with all his might.

This was the opportunity Jack was waiting for.

Already he held in his hand a lighted thieves' match, such as the highwaymen always carried, though, owing to the manner in which he held it, it was invisible to the beadle.

The latter, in shouting out, blew away some portion of the gunpowder, but not much.

Jack touched some of the black grains with the match.

There was a brilliant flash, a puff of white smoke, and afterwards what seemed to be a double darkness.

The beadle uttered one of the most awful yells that the imagination of man can possibly conceive.

At first he was deprived of sight.

"Fire—murder!" he screamed. "Oh, murder—fire! Help—help! Ten thousand curses! I'm blinded and scorched! Where am I?—where are you all? Where's the door? D—n it all, can't none of you speak?"

The agony and pain which the beadle endured was certainly terrible, yet no more than he deserved, for all his life he had ever been readiest in inflicting pain upon others.

"The village is up in arms!" said Claude Duval at this moment, in a low voice. "Come, Jack, we must be off."

"Right! I'll be with you in a moment. Here, my good woman," he added—"here is gold. Take care of it, and procure what you require. Farewell!"

Jack then sprang quickly on to his horse's back

After doing so he gave just one glance behind him.

Then he saw approaching a dense crowd of persons armed with weapons of every possible description.

Many carried lanterns.

"There will be a slight commotion in the village after this, depend upon it," Jack said, as he set his steed in motion. "On, Claude! We will leave the beadle to explain matters to the best of his ability."

Claude did not reply, but, spurring his horse, followed his friend.

When they drew rein again, it was at a considerable distance from the village.

"I think we have had enough for one night, Claude," exclaimed Sixteen-String Jack, as he looked around him. "What say you?"

"The same, for I can already see the coming of the dawn."

"Then we will make the best of our way to the old castle. At this hour, ten to one if we see anyone. Are you willing?"

"Quite. We ought never to venture to approach the place by daylight. If we are careful in this respect we may remain concealed there for a long, long time."

CHAPTER CMXC.

TOM KING AND MAUD HAVE AN EXTRAORDINARY ADVENTURE AT THE RUINS.

PRECEDING the two highwaymen in their return, we will narrate the events of that same night as witnessed by those who had been left behind at the ruined castle.

These, as the reader will scarcely need reminding, consisted of Maud, Tom King, and the new ally of our friends, Jack the ostler.

A more useful fellow than the latter the highwaymen could not possibly have met with; but what was most important was the fact that his fidelity had been well tried, and there was little fear that they would suffer betrayal at his hands.

After the three highwaymen had departed upon their excursions, he took up his station at a point which enabled him to command the most extensive view of the surrounding country, and there remained patiently on the watch waiting for their return.

As for Maud, it was with the greatest depression of spirits that she witnessed Dick Turpin take his departure.

A thousand fears thronged into her mind, and, strive as she would, she could not banish them.

She stood watching his retreating figure until the trees hid him from her sight; then, with a heavy sigh, she made her way to the underground chamber, there to count the moments until his return.

The presence of Tom King she was most thankful for. In her present state of mind she felt that solitude was a thing that she could least of all endure.

Tom's wound, though better, was still most troublesome.

The fact is, he stood in need of proper skilful treatment—just the very thing he could not possibly obtain.

Time might bring him round again; but on this particular night he felt extremely weak, and he was conscious that he was by no means out of danger.

The conversation with which Maud and himself whiled away the time until close upon the hour of midnight was not sufficiently important to be worthy of record; but at the time just mentioned they were both startled by the rather hurried entrance of the ostler.

They could tell by his manner and the expression of his face that something was amiss.

"What is it, Jack?" asked Tom King. "Speak quickly."

"There may be no cause for apprehension, but——"

"What have you seen?"

"Why, a few moments ago, as the air was so very still, I caught the sound of carriage wheels. I soon found the vehicle was approaching, and then it was stopped under the shadow of a clump of trees close to the castle boundary."

"A carriage?" echoed Maud, inquiringly, and in great amazement. "What kind of one?"

"A close, shut-up one—a regular gentleman's carriage."

"What next?" asked Tom.

"I crept closer, and saw descend from it a tall, powerful-looking man; but I could make out nothing else, owing to the darkness and the long cloak he is wrapped up in."

"Then," said Tom King, rather languidly, for the excitement which had lent him a temporary strength soon abated, "I do not see that it much concerns us."

"Well, captain, it may not, but I thought it my duty to let you know of it; besides, the gentleman came walking on as though he intended to pay us a visit."

"Then it is more serious than I thought," said Tom King, arousing himself. "We will watch his movements."

"I am sure it will be best to do so, captain."

"Go on, then. I will follow."

"And I as well," said Maud—"I as well. I could not bear to be left by myself in this dreary, underground place."

Tom King did not say a word by way of objection, so she followed him closely.

The open air was soon reached, and then, with much caution and stealthiness, Jack the ostler directed their footsteps towards a crumbling wall at some little distance.

This wall was pierced by a dismantled window, and it was from this point of espial the faithful fellow had observed the stranger's approach.

Certainly there was something strange and highly provocative of curiosity in the fact that anyone should be about to pay the ruins a visit at such an hour.

It was, then, with great eagerness that all peered through the dilapidated casements.

Their ears gave them the first intimation that some one was at hand, for they caught the sound of a voice, and immediately afterwards the unmistakable rustling sound that was produced when anyone walked through the rank, luxuriant grass with which the ground in and around the castle was covered.

"Hush!" said Tom King, in a faint whisper. "Do not speak or move, either of you, on any account. But listen to all with the utmost attention."

The fears of the three watchers suggested that those who were approaching were persons who, by some means or other, had scented out their place of retreat, and had now come to reconnoitre preparatory to an attack.

But this notion was at once dispelled when they saw come into view the stranger that the ostler had described.

He was still shrouded in his long roquelaure cloak; but what the ostler had not mentioned, and what at once raised their interest to the keenest point, was the fact that he led by one hand a little child, which proved to be a girl.

Her age could not have exceeded eight years, at the most—perhaps she was not so old, for she was tall and slender, though full of grace.

Above all, however, Tom noticed her fairy-like appearance, and the manner in which she grasped her companion's huge hand with both her own tiny ones was touching to see.

Tom thought what a loving little creature it was, and a strange longing sprang up in his breast to have such a little child to love, cherish, and protect.

After the pair came in sight there was a pause in the conversation; but the silence was broken by the little girl.

She looked up into her companion's face, and then, in inexpressibly sweet and silvery accents, she said:

"But what a strange, lonely place it is! And oh, I am so very, very cold!"

She shivered as she pronounced the words, for she was but thinly clad—her dress seeming rather suited for some fashionable assembly than for the open air. On her head, too, the watchers noticed she had nothing but a wreath of flowers and leaves.

"Are you going much further?" she asked; then, finding that her question met with no response, she went on: "Oh, do let us turn back! Don't go any further—please dont!"

"Don't be silly, Ruth! Come on!"

"How cross you speak, uncle. Oh, what a dreary place! Hold me tightly, I feel so afraid!"

"Afraid of what?" said the man, snappishly and angrily. "Don't let me have any more of your nonsense. Hold your tongue till I tell you to speak! Now come along!"

The tears rose quickly into the eyes of the little girl, and, with a sob that she could not repress, and which made Tom's heart feel as though it was breaking, the tears rolled down her cheeks.

"Don't cry," said her uncle. "Do you hear me? Don't cry!"

He shook her half savagely while he spoke.

This was a scene which neither Tom King nor Maud could look upon with anything like common patience.

It was only by exercising the strongest possible control over themselves that they resisted their inclination to interfere.

But they felt how important it was that their presence in that place should be not only unknown, but unsuspected.

Not only their own safety, but that of their absent companions depended upon it.

It was this powerful consideration that enabled Maud and Tom King to have the moral strength necessary to enable them to remain mere passive spectators of the scene.

In perfect silence the strange pair came walking on, and if there had been any doubt of their destination it could no longer have existence, for by this time they were fairly within what might be termed the outer portion of the ruins.

In vain our friends tried to come to some conclusion respecting the object of this midnight visit.

Only one idea presented itself to them, and that was of such a truly horrible and abhorrent nature that they strove to banish it from their minds.

But the whole of their attention was now attracted to the little girl's uncle, who began to speak.

"If you had not made me so cross and angry," he began, adopting a conciliatory tone, "I should have told you long ago what I am bringing you here to-night for. Will you be good if I tell you now?"

"Yes, uncle, I will—indeed I will!"

The stranger cleared his throat, as though he had some disagreeable communication to make, or as though his words, like Macbeth's amen, "stuck in his throat."

"Well, Ruth, when your father and mother were alive —— There now, you are crying again. Be good, or I will not tell you any more."

With much difficulty the little creature controlled her emotions.

"When they were alive—you were a little thing then—so little that you cannot recollect them——"

"Oh, but I can, uncle!"

He went on without heeding the interruption.

"They left you in my care to bring up for them. I have done so till now. You are just seven years old, are you not?"

"Yes, to-day, uncle."

"Exactly. Well, then, if you had died before reaching your seventh year, then all the money and property belonging to your parents would have—would have gone —gone to me!"

The last words were only brought out by a great effort.

"Yes, uncle."

"But you see, you are alive, and so, according to the wish of your poor father and mother, I have brought you here on this your seventh birthday."

"And did they really wish you to bring me here?" the young girl asked, looking all about her with a half shudder.

"Of course they did. Have I not said so?"

"And at this late hour of the night?"

"Yes."

"But what for, uncle?"

"Because—because there is in this place a large amount of money and jewels, all of which belong to you, and which, according to your parents' wish, were not to be touched by anyone but yourself."

"In the ruin?" said the girl, incredulously.

"Yes, in this ruin. And pray, may I ask, what right you have to call into account any of your parents' actions, who were so much older than you, and therefore so much the better able to judge what was best?"

This rebuke had the effect of causing the child to be silent.

Her uncle, however, quickly spoke again.

"Come on!" he cried. "We are close to the place now, and when we have once taken possession of the treasure we will make haste back to the carriage."

With a palpable amount of reluctance Ruth accompanied her guardian still further into the recesses of the ruins.

Young as the child was, she seemed to be conscious that there was something highly improbable and untruthlike in the communication her uncle had just made to her.

But, if such were her thoughts, she did not give them utterance, or it may be that it was only a vague, indefinable presentiment of coming evil that cast its influence over her spirit.

"Uncle," she said, after a short interval, during which she seemed to have been reflecting deeply, "and when we have got this money, what is to be done with it?"

"There is time enough to consider that point, my dear. But look! Here, I believe, is the entrance to the chamber that was described."

Now Tom King had come to the conclusion that all which this man had told the child was false; but this belief was shaken when he saw him take a large key from his pocket and insert it into the lock of a door which was half hidden in a thick wall.

With some difficulty the key was turned.

He pushed the door open a little way.

The child shrank back in natural terror when she saw the black-looking place in front of her.

"Now, Ruth," said her uncle, speaking in a high, cracked voice, as though he was laboring under a very unusual amount of excitement—"now, Ruth my dear, enter!"

"But it is dark—so very dark!"

"No matter for that. I will stand here, and you will be able to find the treasure easily."

"You come in as well, uncle," she exclaimed, shrinking back still more.

"No, no—remember what I told you. You, and you alone, must touch this treasure!"

"Then get a light that I may see."

"No—it is needless. Come, do not delay so much time! It is too cold to remain here unnecessarily. Go in! What do you fear?"

She did not reply; but she asked him a question:

"Uncle, do you say that this treasure is all mine?"

"It is all yours."

"Wholly?"

"Yes, wholly."

"And without any reserve?"

"Yes. But why all these questions?"

"And I can do with it just whatever I like?"

"Yes—yes," he answered, impatiently.

"Then, uncle, come away. Let it remain where it is. I do not want it. I would rather give it up a thousand times than enter that dark place to fetch it."

Her companion stamped his foot impatiently.

"Ungrateful, forward, perverse wretch!" he said. "How dare you thus set yourself up in defiance of everyone! Enter at once, I say—enter at once!"

"No—no, uncle!"

"But I say yes; and what is more, I am determined that you shall!"

[TOM KING WATCHES THE ARRIVAL OF MATTHEW'S LETTER.]

"Oh, why do you look at me so wildly? Why do you speak thus? What dreadful change has come over your face? Oh, help—help! Uncle, spare me—oh, spare me!"

Terrified beyond a doubt by the expression of her uncle's countenance—an expression which showed all too plainly what his diabolical intentions were—the young girl thus sent forth her appeal for aid.

He shook her violently, and in his strong hands she was little more than a feather.

"Silence," he said, in a suppressed voice, between his teeth—"Silence, you little wretch! How dare you make such an outcry? Silence, I say!"

"Oh, uncle, what would you do?"

"Compel you to be obedient! Do as I tell you, or I will use force! I am determined to be obeyed!"

But though his harsh, guttural voice betokened so much determination, the child held back, as though she knew that to obey would only seal her own destruction.

Finding this to be the case, the villain grasped her tightly, and dragged her towards the much-dreaded portal.

But no sooner did the child feel his hands thus harshly laid upon her, than she seemed to become all in a moment conscious of her frightful peril.

"Help—help!" she screamed. "Oh, uncle, would you murder me? Alas—alas, there is no need for any such harsh measures! I will give you freely all that you will gain by my death. I will pay you that much if you will only spare my life! Oh, uncle—have mercy—have mer——"

With an angry exclamation the monster dashed his hand violently before her mouth, thus in a moment stifling that voice which should always have sounded in his ears like the sweetest music.

The little thing struggled desperately again at her impending fate.

No. 207 will be Published next Monday.

The instinct of life was strong within her, and she made efforts of which, under any other circumstances, she would have been totally incapable.

But as well might a fly have endeavored to cope successfully with a giant.

Half dragging, half pushing her along the ground, he forced her to the dark, tomb-like doorway.

The nearer she came to it, the more fearful became her struggles.

"Now, wretch," he cried, in a voice which well displayed the malevolence that was pent up in his soul—"now, wretch, begone! You shall trouble and haunt me no more!"

As he pronounced these words, he suddenly released his grasp.

Then, without the delay of a single moment, he pushed her violently forward.

The child staggered—endeavored to stop herself—to gain a footing.

All in vain.

With a shrill, ringing shriek, that echoed and re-echoed through the ruins, she fell headforemost across the threshold.

But the shriek was abruptly cut short by the violent closing of the door.

The key was turned in the lock.

"It is done," said the stranger, in a loud, exultant voice—"it is done, and thus, by one bold stroke, I free myself from all those disagreeable complications in which I was involved. Free—free—I am now free! I am a new man! With this child's wealth I shall succeed in all my plans! I—I tremble now; but the time will shortly come when I shall look back upon this as being the best night's work that ever was performed!"

CHAPTER CMXCI.

TOM KING RESCUES THE LITTLE GIRL FROM HER LIVING TOMB.

It was perfectly certain that the stranger fully and entirely believed that he was all alone in the old ruins—that no human eyes had witnessed the awful crime which he had just perpetrated, for he had taken the greatest pains to make sure that no one had followed in his track.

That some one might have taken up a station in the ruins before his arrival was a thought that never entered his imagination.

Therefore it was that he ventured to give vent to his thoughts aloud.

At this moment there arose a faint, low cry, seeming to come from a long distance off.

"Uncle—uncle!"

"Yes, my dear!"

The reply had a refinement of cruelty in its tone.

"Uncle—uncle!"

"I hear you."

"Let me out—oh, do let me out of this dreadful place!"

"You must wait, my dear, and look about for the treasure, and by the time you have found it I shall be back to let you out."

With these words on his lips the stranger turned away.

He assumed for a moment a listening attitude, then, with a satisfied air, rapidly retraced his steps towards the spot where he had left the carriage.

Tom King touched the ostler on the shoulder.

In a suppressed voice, which told plainly enough how much he was agitated by what had just taken place, he said:

"Jack, follow that man! Watch closely where he goes, and do not return until you have housed him."

The ostler merely gave a nod to show he fully comprehended the nature of the service that was required of him, and at once glided off in the direction taken by the stranger.

We have not interrupted the narration of the course of events to show how and to what extent the spectators of this scene were influenced by it.

From what the reader already knows of the dispositions of Tom King and Maud it may be safely assumed that it was only by the exercise of the utmost self-control that they forebore from interruption.

Indeed, Tom King once did start forward, determined that the act of iniquity should not be perpetrated; but the ostler, divining his intention, touched him on the shoulder, and whispered:

"Keep still a moment, captain! For Heaven's sake do not let him know that we are here!"

This consideration came just in time, and Tom King paused.

But Maud once or twice felt as though she could not tamely remain there a passive looker-on, and several times a shriek rose to her lips; but on each occasion she stifled its utterance, being enabled to do so by recollecting that Dick's safety depended upon her discretion.

When, however, Tom was able to comprehend what kind of death the stranger intended to inflict upon the young girl, he grew more self-composed, though inwardly he execrated the refined barbarity of the man who could thus, without the least remorse, doom so fair and beautiful a creature to a lingering death by starvation, and longed to be able to mete out to him such a retribution as he fully deserved.

But, fortunately, even under these trying circumstances, Tom King retained sufficient presence of mind to remember and be aware that he should actually be of more real and permanent service to the little child by liberating her after her uncle's departure than he could by any sudden or violent interference.

No sooner, then, had the form of the ostler become lost to sight in the distance than he hurried towards the door of what the stranger had meant to be a living tomb.

Maud followed him with clasped hands, tearful eyes, and a wildly-beating heart.

All the womanly affection in Maud's nature was called forth on behalf of this young girl, for whom she already felt a most loving regard.

Both to her and to Tom King it was the greatest mystery how anyone could be of so barbarous and inhuman a nature to treat anything so loving and fairy-like with anything save tenderness and kindness.

"Oh, Tom," she said, "quick—quick! Do not lose a moment more than you can help! Haste—haste! Let the little darling free!"

"Can you hear her?"

Maud listened intently.

But all was still.

No faint cry came from the other side of the massive door.

"Oh, Heaven!" Maud shrieked, in alarm, "she is dead—alas, alas, she is dead!"

"No—no," cried Tom. "But hush! You cannot be too cautious, and I am by no means certain that we are yet out of all danger of being overheard."

"Yes, yes, I will be cautious. But speak to her—call her!"

Tom obeyed.

But the same silence continued.

"Oh, Tom," Maud moaned, "if she should prove to be dead I shall never forgive myself for not having interfered before. I shall always blame myself for being swayed by purely selfish considerations."

"You have no cause as yet to reproach yourself," said Tom King, who was busily at work upon the lock of the door. "She cannot as yet be dead, but her extreme terror may have caused her to fall into a swoon!"

This supposition was so reasonable a one that Maud immediately became calm again.

What was more likely to have happened?

"Should you mind leaving me a moment?" asked Tom.

"Why—what for?"

"To fetch a light. You will get one down below; and when provided with that I shall doubtless be able to open the door; but now, in the darkness, the lock baffles me!"

Maud did not wait to give any verbal answer to this request, but bounded off at once in the direction of the underground apartment, if we may venture to bestow upon it so ambitious a designation.

Indeed, she scarcely waited to hear the conclusion of Tom's speech. She was only too much delighted to find herself in the position to be able to render the little girl a better service than standing idly by and looking on.

But, rapid as she was in her movements, she found that by the time she returned Tom King had managed to open the door.

He took the light from her hand, however, and held it above his head, so as to light up as well as possible the place into which he was about to enter.

It was lucky that he took this precaution, for he stepped back with a cry of horror.

"What is it?" asked Maud—"oh, what is it?"

"Not so bad as I thought," answered Tom, who by this time had taken a second glance. "I thought the flooring of this place was many feet below the level of this ground, but I see now it is only a few inches."

Tom might well be excused for making this mistake.

The fact was, however, as he had stated.

There was one step down from the door sill into this chamber; but he found it rather a steep one.

He descended at once, however, and the first thing that met his gaze was the little girl lying at full length on the damp flooring, to all appearances utterly bereft of life.

Again surrendering the light to Maud, he stooped down and picked up the insensible burden in his arms.

So light and fairy-like was she, that he carried her almost without being sensible of her weight.

With a quick step Maud led the way, and in a few seconds the subterranean chamber was reached.

The girl was at once placed down before the brightly-burning fire.

"Does she live?" asked Maud, bending anxiously over her.

"She does—I believe she does. But look! The poor little thing has injured herself in her fall."

While Tom spoke, he pointed to a slight gash in the girl's forehead, from which the blood was slowly oozing.

Both now in good earnest set themselves to work to restore her to consciousness, and after a time their efforts were crowned with complete success.

The child opened her eyes and looked around her—at first with signs of fear, and afterwards of wonder.

When she saw the two anxious faces bending down over her with kindness visible in every lineament, her apprehension vanished.

"I am dreaming," she said, gently, as she closed her eyes again. "Yes, surely only dreaming. I might have known that nothing half so terrible could possibly be true."

Tom made a rapid sign for Maud not to speak. He was aware that before long the little girl would thoroughly recover possession of her senses, and that until then it would be by far the best to leave her to herself.

In a minute more, during which profound silence was preserved, the little girl opened her eyes again.

She glanced around, and the strange appearance of the place in which she thus suddenly and unexpectedly found herself affected her much.

Again a look of terror overspread her countenance, and she cried:

"Oh, what place is this? Where am I? Alas—alas, then it was no dream!"

"Compose yourself," said Maud, bending down nearer to her. "Do not be afraid—there is no occasion for fear. You are among friends—friends who will protect you and stand by you to the last!"

"Yes—yes," said Tom—"keep calm and still, and endeavor to compose your thoughts. I repeat that you have nothing to be afraid of now."

The assuring words, and the gentle tones in which they were spoken, produced a due effect, and it was truly touching to observe the great efforts the little child made to recover something like an ordinary amount of calmness.

She grew better rapidly, and even ventured to raise herself upon one arm and look around her.

As she did so, her eyes expanded in silent wonder.

It was evident that never before had she been the inmate of so strange a place.

"Tell me," she said, as, after looking well around, she sank back into her former position by the fire—"oh, tell me where I am and what has happened?"

Tom drew back in order that Maud might reply.

"I can only tell you that you are with those who will keep you in perfect safety."

"My uncle!"

The words were pronounced in evident fear, and accompanied by a fearful glance around the subterranean chamber.

"Even he cannot find you here, and harm you."

"Oh, it is terrible," the child said, with a shudder—"so terrible that I can scarcely think it anything but a dream!"

"It is no dream," said Maud; "but a sad reality. But tell me—your name is Ruth, is it not?"

"It is. But how could you know it?"

"I heard your uncle call you so."

"In the ruins?"

"Yes."

"But he told me we were quite alone."

"He thought so, but was mistaken. We were concealed, and witnessed all."

Ruth began to weep and sob bitterly.

She was, in fact, beginning to comprehend her true position.

"Oh, what shall I do?" she moaned. "Oh, what will become of me? Where shall I go?"

"Do not trouble yourself about that," answered Maud, quickly. "For the present you must remain here with us. When you feel better we will consider what is to be done in the future. If you could sleep now it would be so much better. Rely upon it we will guard you well, so do not be afraid to close your eyes in slumber."

Ruth listened dreamily.

She was greatly exhausted mentally and physically, and no wonder, after all she had gone through. Moreover, the warmth of the place was enough to draw her into a slumber.

It was not long, then, before her eyes closed and she became lost in the unconsciousness of sleep.

For some time Maud and Tom King remained silent, fearful if they spoke that the sound of their voices should disturb her.

"The night is going fast," said Tom King. "Surely before long we shall hear something of the absent ones."

Maud started, for she had become so deeply interested in the fate of the poor orphan that for a time the recollection of everything else was driven from her mind.

"Yes," she said, with an anxious sigh. "Let us hope they will return in safety."

"I have little fear of that."

"But how surprised they will all be when they see this little stranger among us."

"They will. But what I chiefly hope is that the ostler will be able to follow that carriage to its destination. If he does so—no matter at what personal risk to myself—I will take such steps as will unmask the uncle's villany! No doubt he now rejoices in the successful accomplishment of his heinous designs; but he shall be awakened from his state of false security!"

"He is a monster in human shape!" said Maud. "None other could perpetrate such a deed. Look at her now, and ask yourself what kind of a wretch must the man be who would harm her!"

"I feel with you, Maud."

"But think what a refinement of cruelty it was to work upon her feelings with such a specious tale as he did, and then doom her to a lingering death by starvation!"

"That is where he made his great mistake, and, surely, Maud, if this little heiress is restored to her rights by our instrumentality that will be a kind of set-off against our other deeds against society."

Maud, at these words, was about to speak—to give utterance to a thought that had long been topmost in her mind—but she hesitated, and when she made up her mind again the opportunity to speak was lost, for a faint tapping from without came upon their ears.

"That is some one returned," exclaimed Tom King, springing to his feet. "Remain here, Maud, and watch. I will soon bring you word who it is."

For greater safety, the entrance to the subterranean apartment was always secured on the inner side when occupied, so that no one could enter from without.

"Who is there?" asked Tom.

"Claude and myself," was the reply. "But where is the ostler? How is it there is no one on the watch?"

Tom opened the door, and then caught sight of the indistinct figures of his two comrades, Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack.

"Strange things have happened since you left," he said. "You must attend to your horses yourselves."

"We have done so; but what has happened?"

"Nothing alarming. Come down."

The highwaymen obeyed, and the entrance was again secured.

Maud was standing near the inner doorway.

She had learned already from the voices that Dick had not returned.

Listening attentively, she heard Claude Duval say:

"Has the captain come back?"

"Not yet."

"Have you seen anything of him?" asked Maud, unable to repress the question.

"Nothing whatever. We did not expect to do so, as we have been in quite a different direction."

"He will not be here before to-morrow night," said Sixteen-String Jack, "for in a very short time it will be broad daylight. But what is it that has happened while we have been away?"

He entered the alchemist's chamber while he spoke, and Maud replied to his question merely by raising her finger and pointing to the sleeping form of the little child.

"Good Heaven!" ejaculated Jack, "where has that little stranger come from?"

"Speak quietly," said Tom, "or you will wake her. If you will give me your attention for a little while I will tell you all."

It was easy to see how deeply interested Claude and Jack were, and when Tom had recited the brief events of the night they broke out into loud execrations upon the uncle's villany.

CHAPTER CMXCII.

DICK TURPIN TAKES LITTLE RUTH TO ST. JAMES'S PALACE, AND MAKES A STARTLING DISCOVERY.

THE event proved that Sixteen-String Jack had spoken rightly when he said that Dick Turpin would not return before the following night.

The day was passed wretchedly by Maud, for her mind was filled with tormenting doubts and fears; but the companionship of Ruth and her innocent prattle prevented her from giving way to them so completely as she otherwise would have done.

But her anxiety was fully shared in by all three of the highwaymen, for they well knew how unusually fraught with danger his enterprise was.

As night approached, their uneasiness grew more marked, though, for Maud's sake, they strove to conceal it as well as they were able.

The hour of twelve had pealed forth from the church in the adjacent village when the listeners were aroused by a summons at the secret entrance.

"It is the captain!" all cried, but they were doomed to disappointment.

It was Jack the ostler, whose countenance wore an expression of unusual importance.

"Well," said Tom King, quickly, "have you been successful?"

"Yes, captain."

"You tracked the carriage?"

"Yes."

"To what place?"

"St. James's Palace."

The last words were echoed by all in tones of amazement.

"And did he enter there?"

"He did."

"And what else did you learn?"

"Nothing. I came straight back, thinking it best not to show myself."

"You were right—quite right! St. James's Palace. Then this little girl must be of higher rank than I took her to be."

"Why not question her?" said Claude. "No doubt she could give much information."

"I scarcely like to trouble her at present. Let her be until the captain's return; then, when we feel no anxiety on his account, we can give all the more attention to what she has to say."

This was assented to, and by way of a change it was proposed that they should all make their way above ground, and keep a vigilant look-out.

But their patience was severely tested, for it was not until nearly dawn that they caught sight of the welcome form of their captain.

When they perceived him approaching—being to all appearances uninjured—they were inexpressibly relieved, for the long delay had filled them with a thousand apprehensions.

In the space of a few more moments he was surrounded with his faithful companions, and had Maud's head resting against his breast.

A dozen questions were asked him at once, but, holding up his hand, he said:

"Have patience for a little while, and I will tell you all."

Leaving the horses in charge of the ostler, and bidding him also to keep a sharp look-out, they made their way to the underground apartment.

The sight of the little girl was an intense surprise to Dick, which was just what his comrades intended it should be.

"Ah!" he ejaculated, "a stranger. Where on earth has she come from?"

Maud would have answered him at once and fully, for her heart was full of indignation at what had taken place; but Claude interrupted her.

"We will hear your adventures first, if you please, captain. After that we will gratify your curiosity."

On this ground Maud was deeply interested, and we are justified in saying that she felt more curiosity and anxiety to hear the recital of the captain's adventures than either of his three comrades.

"I will gratify you," said Dick, "for though I have been away from you so long, I can describe what has taken place in a very few words."

With this he commenced; but he soon found the narrative took much longer in delivering than he had anticipated.

When he described his singular adventure with the gentleman who had given him the ring and mentioned St. James's Palace, his hearers exchanged glances, and wondered whether there would prove to be any connection between the two.

"And now, my friends," Dick said, "that is all. I have no more to tell. But do not keep me any longer in suspense about that little girl. Where did you find her?"

"I will tell you," said Tom King, who thereupon gave a very full description of the occurrences in the ruins on the preceding night.

"Never," said Dick, interrupting him, and speaking in a voice which well showed the state of his feelings—"never have I heard of a case of more atrocity. But go on—go on."

Tom complied

While he was speaking, the young girl, who had awoke from her long sleep, stood beside Maud, listening with as much eagerness as anyone, though every now and then tears would spring into her eyes.

At last, when Tom concluded, Dick said:

"I cannot but commend you strongly for having preserved so much command over yourself. I question whether, under such circumstances, I should have been controlled by any considerations of safety."

"Perhaps I should not have been," answered Tom, "had I been in full possession of my health and vigor."

"At any rate, it is a most fortunate circumstance, for no one now knows anything about our being concealed here, and you have saved the child as well."

"Perhaps saved her more effectually than we could have done by an active interference."

"Very likely. But come here, little pet," said Dick, in a gentle voice, and drawing her towards him as he spoke. "Do not be afraid of me, but believe that I will be your friend, and never fear that any harm will come to you while I am by."

Ruth placed her hands in Dick Turpin's with the utmost confidingness.

"But what think you of her uncle's rank?" whispered

Tom. "The ostler tracked him to St. James's Palace. Who can he be?"

"I can give no guess," answered Dick, glancing at the ring; "but I believe there is one within those walls who feels himself indebted to me on the score of gratitude. I fancy, too, that he possesses power there. At any rate, I will go to-night, and ask him to interest himself and use his influence in this little thing's behalf."

"But I have set myself the task of seeing her righted," exclaimed Tom King, quickly.

"If you have, there are many reasons why you should pass the charge over to me. I have the means of gaining admittance to the palace, which you have not, and although you may feel better than you did, yet I think you are scarcely well and strong enough to undertake such an important matter."

Tom was silent, for he could not but admit the absolute truth and reason of these remarks.

"But," said Maud, timidly, "will it be safe to go? Will there not be a general look-out for you?"

"There may be, but I feel no apprehension as to the result. Besides, there is time for a good rest between now and nightfall, and it so happens that we have no business of any kind until to-morrow, when some one must go to receive old Matthew's letter on the bridge."

"Then I bespeak that duty!" cried Tom King. "I am tired to death of being imprisoned here. I can manage that easily."

"Agreed," said Dick—"that is, supposing that you find yourself sufficiently recovered of your wound."

"I shall be all right after a rest."

"I, too, feel much fatigued, yet, first of all, I should like to ask some questions of our little stranger here, if she would answer them."

Hearing this, Ruth looked up with wonder in her eyes.

"I want you to tell us," said Dick, "who you are, and who your uncle is. I shall then be better able to judge what to do."

"My name is Ruth—Lady Ruth sometimes they call me."

"Lady Ruth what?"

"Comynge."

"And was your father known by that title?"

"Yes."

"And your uncle?"

"He is Lord Comynge now."

"And does he live at St. James's Palace?"

"Yes—that is where he is in attendance upon the King, which is nearly always."

"But how was it he brought you here?"

"I was at a party—this is the dress I wore. I was in the garden, and happened to be alone. Suddenly my uncle appeared, and told me he wanted me to go with him a little way—that my parents wished me to do so when I attained my seventh year."

"And you complied?"

"Oh yes. I thought no harm, though I had always greatly feared my uncle. I wanted to re-enter the house to put on my things, and tell them of my departure; but he said there was no necessity, as his carriage was waiting close by, and that he had already announced his intention of taking me away for an hour or so."

"Poor thing," said Dick, stroking her glossy hair. "I can easily understand how you would fall into such a well-laid trap as that. And so he brought you here to murder you?"

The child was silent.

"The mention of the name," interrupted Claude Duval, "reminds me that this place is, or used to be, called Comynge-Castle."

Then if that is the case it will account for the villain bringing his niece here. I wonder, now, whether there is any truth in this tale about a secreted treasure?"

"I should think not, and yet there may be some foundation of truth in it. However, we can easily look in the morning and see."

"True; but at present I propose some rest, and, if I may judge by your looks, my proposal will be welcomely enough received."

He was right.

All were, without exception, thoroughly worn out

The care of the place was left entirely to Jack the ostler above, about whose fidelity not the shadow of a doubt was now entertained.

In a short time afterwards the profoundest stillness prevailed, and it was not until just as evening was approaching that the highwaymen reassembled.

Claude and Jack had made known the pecuniary result of their last expedition, and as the amount was not sufficient for their purpose it was agreed that they should take another turn upon the highway while Dick repaired to St James's Palace.

He had little doubt that if he merely declared his story, and left the little girl in charge of the stranger he had befriended, she would be well taken care of in the future, and her villanous uncle punished.

At any rate, this was what he hoped.

As the time drew near for the little girl to take her departure, Maud wept plenteously, for short as had been the time of their acquaintance, yet she had learned to love this little girl with no common affection.

As for little Lady Ruth herself, she fully reciprocated this feeling, and also wept at the prospect of separation. Not only was she extremely fond of Maud, but the novelty of her situation charmed and delighted her.

Dick only waited until it was perfectly dark.

In spite of her hard gallop on the previous night, he found Black Bess in capital condition for the road.

Tom King looked with an eye of envy upon the preparations for departure, and almost felt inclined to join them; but Maud's earnest entreaties for him to remain and bear her company, as well as sundry sharp twinges which his arm gave him now and then, induced him to overcome this inclination.

Dick took his departure first.

The ostler had given him the word that the coast was perfectly clear, so he sprang into the saddle and then had the little girl seated in front of him.

"Expect me before daybreak," he cried, as he allowed the reins to fall upon the back of Black Bess; "but if I do not return by then on no account set out to meet me."

The little girl was for some moments terrified at her situation, which appeared to her to be full of danger.

Perceiving this, Dick hastened to reassure her, and in a few moments succeeded in dispelling her fears.

On his way Dick glanced continually about him, for he fully expected to meet with the officers before going far. He was tolerably certain that such a commotion as he had raised on the two preceding nights would not die out very readily.

The little girl noticed his perpetual vigilance, but never once guessed the cause, for they had all been most cautious to keep their occupation a secret.

To Dick's agreeable surprise the journey to London was performed without any accident; but when he drew near to St. James's Palace he began to wonder in what manner he could dispose of his mare.

After the result of placing her in the stable in Piccadilly he was scarcely likely to attempt that mode of disposal again; but the question arose of what else he could do.

He came in sight of the dull, dingy-looking palace without having come to a decision.

"It will not do to hesitate or loiter," he muttered. "Such a course would inevitably give rise to suspicion. I have a good mind to ride boldly beneath the gateway, and give one of the palace lackeys the job of holding her."

This was an idea that probably would have occurred to no one else but Dick Turpin.

Yet the more he considered it, the more he liked it, and so he continued to ride on at his former easy pace.

As usual, a sentinel stood at the entrance of the court-yard.

Hearing the sound of an approaching horse's hoofs, he looked up.

By the aid of the dark, flickering oil lamp suspended above him, and which was the best exterior illumination the palace afforded, he made out the form of our hero.

Dick rode on without bestowing any notice upon him.

Finding himself treated in this unceremonious manner, the sentry allowed Dick to pass without questioning: but had Dick shown any hesitation, admittance would doubtless have been denied to him.

Ere going far, however, Turpin encountered another soldier on guard, and this one was more particular.

"Your business?" he said, briefly.

"Be good enough to look at this ring."

He extended his hand as he spoke.

The sentry made as good an examination as the darkness permitted: but it seemed a satisfactory one, for he said:

"All right—pass on! Knock at the fourth door you come to on your left hand."

"Does your beat extend so far?"

"Yes—just beyond, sir. Why?"

"Because, if you like, I will leave you in charge of my mare. She will be no trouble whatever, as she will stand quietly enough by the door if she is not interfered with; and as you go by, if you will just keep an eye upon her, that is as much as will be required."

"All right, sir."

Dick rode on till he reached the door mentioned by the guard.

Then dismounting, he assisted the little girl to her feet.

"Woa, Bess," he said, in a low voice—"steady, lass! Wait here till I come back."

Having thus spoken, he knocked loudly at the door, raising a thousand echoes in the silent courtyard.

His summons met with a speedy response.

Without waiting to say or hear a word, Dick coolly crossed the threshold.

"Who are you, sir?" said a man, clad in the costume of a yeoman of the guard. "What do you want?"

Dick held out his hand.

"Just look at that ring, will you?"

"All right, sir," said the man, respectfully, after a hasty glance—"pass on. Ascend the stairs. At the top you will be challenged again."

The little girl walked by Turpin's side with the air of one who had long been accustomed to tread beneath that royal roof. Indeed, if Dick had thought of applying to her, she would have made an excellent guard.

Sure enough at the top of the stairs they were stopped again—this time by a man who was not attired in any uniform whatever.

Having looked at the ring, he gazed upon Turpin with no little surprise and curiosity.

"You cannot see him to-night," said this plainly-attired individual.

Dick was strongly inclined to ask, "See who?" for he had not the least idea to whom the ring belonged. But the manifest impolicy of saying anything of the kind made him silent.

In a moment after he replied in a very different manner.

"I must!" he said, curtly.

"Impossible!"

"But I say I must; and if not now, I will wait till I can!"

"If your business is urgent you can confide it to me."

Dick shook his head resolutely.

"Then you can just go back the way that you came; and the next time, if you do not choose to tell me your business, you will have a great deal of difficulty in getting this far, let me tell you!"

"What's that, eh—eh—what's that?" said a voice.

A door was opened hastily, and some one stepped forward with a hurried, undignified, ungraceful step

The gentleman in the plain suit no sooner heard this voice than he uttered an ejaculation of dismay, and seemed ready to fall flat to the floor.

He faced round, however, and began to mutter some excuses.

Dick looked up, and at once recognised the stranger he had befriended.

His countenance showed the marks of the injuries he had received.

"Your Royal Highness——" gasped the gentleman in black.

The words filled Dick with amazement.

At the same time he felt the little girl tugging at his hand, and looked down to ascertain the cause of her doing so.

"It's the Prince of Wales," she said, in a whisper. "Be careful what you say and do, for he has got an awful temper."

CHAPTER CMXCIII.

FOLLOWS THE ADVENTURES OF DICK TURPIN AND BLACK BESS.

THE way in which little Ruth spoke would at any other time have brought a smile to Dick Turpin's lips.

But on the present occasion such an expression of feeling was altogether impolitic and not to be thought of.

It was not possible, however, for Dick all in a moment to overget the astonishment that was produced by the discovery that the person he had saved from such imminent danger, and whose behavior seemed so eccentric, was no less a personage than his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and grandson of the King.

But much of the eccentricity of his behavior was now accounted for.

He was not allowed any further time for thought, however, for the prince said:

"Cameron!"

"Ye—ye—yes, your Royal Highness!" stammered the man.

"Be off, and don't attempt to pry into my private affairs again."

"But, your Royal High——"

"Be off, I say!"

Warned probably by the tone of the prince's voice that it would be unwise to exasperate him any further, Cameron beat a retreat.

"And now, sir," said the prince, addressing himself to Dick, "may I ask your business with me?"

Once again by way of reply Dick simply held out his hand.

"What, is it you?" said the prince, in accents of surprise. "Well, well—never mind. But you must be something more than a man, that is all I can say."

"Nay, your Royal Highness, you requested me to call!"

"I did—I did; yet never thought that you would be foolhardy enough to do so."

"I am here."

"I see you are. Follow me into this room, where we can converse in private."

The prince led the way back into the room from which he had so unexpectedly emerged.

"Shut the door and sit down," said the prince, as he flung himself into a luxurious easy chair. "I don't want to play the prince just now—bah! I am sick of it."

Dick complied with the greatest readiness.

"I told you," began the prince, "that if you liked to call here some night you would hear something to your advantage."

"Your Royal Highness was good enough to say so, but believe me, I had not then the remotest idea of who you were."

"I believe not; but I expected you would come alone. What little girl is that you have with you?"

"Does not your Royal Highness recognise her?"

The prince stretched his little sleepy-looking eyes as wide open as his fat cheeks would let him, then said, slowly:

"I fancy I have seen her before."

"Your Royal Highness, this is the Lady Ruth Comynge."

"Comynge?" repeated the prince, while a black, portentous-looking frown almost hid his eyes altogether.

"Yes; and if your Royal Highness will only be kind enough to listen to what I have to relate you will at once take this poor child's part."

"I don't know that!" muttered the prince.

This was by no means encouraging—moreover, Dick was considerably puzzled.

Nevertheless, he steadily began his narrative, relating everything in connection with the little girl. He proceeded at some length, for the prince listened with avidity, but what was strangest of all, with evident gratification.

Dick trusted ere long to be able to solve all these mysteries.

When he had brought his narrative to a conclusion the prince said:

"This is the second service you have rendered me."

"Second service?" ejaculated Dick, amazed. "How so?"

"In this way: This girl's uncle, Comynge, is the King's confidant. He has his ear in everything, and, what is more, he is my bitter foe. Yes," said the prince, spitefully, "I hate him! He is ever prying into my private affairs, and poisoning the King's mind against me. I won't fall in with his views, and so, you see, he is determined that I shall be disgraced."

Dick nodded.

"But now," cried the prince, springing to his feet, and pacing the room in exultation, "I have him in my power—completely in my power! I will crush him!"

The prince clenched his hands tightly as he spoke, and the expression on his countenance was one of unmitigated hatred.

"Your Royal Highness," said Dick, also rising to his feet.

"Well?"

"Excuse me a moment."

So saying, Dick pointed to the door, towards which he strode rapidly.

The thick, soft carpet beneath his feet prevented the least noise.

By his movements, the prince comprehended that Dick suspected that some one was listening at the door, and so he looked on with great suspense and curiosity to see what the highwayman was about to do.

Dick carefully took hold of the knob.

Turning it quickly, he opened the door about a couple of feet.

Then, with equal quickness, closed it again.

But there was a sudden, sharp crack audible, so, in the most natural manner possible, Dick opened the door to see what was the matter.

On his knees on the mat, and rubbing his forehead with a very rueful air, was Cameron, the prince's valet.

"Dear me!" said Dick, pretending to be greatly concerned. "I had no idea you were there! I hope you are not hurt, sir?"

Cameron took no further notice of this speech than to mutter some curses under his voice.

Then he struggled to his feet, and retired, looking completely crestfallen.

"Serves him right!" said the prince, laughing heartily.

Dick closed the door again, and resumed his seat

"You understand now," said the prince, after a pause of a few minutes' duration—"you understand now in what manner you have contrived to render me this second service. My enemy will now be effectually removed. Leave Lady Ruth to me, and I will see not only that her unnatural kinsman is duly punished, but that she shall be fully restored to the rights he would have deprived her of."

"The word of your Royal Highness is quite sufficient," said Dick, with much deference, "and I trust you will accept my thanks, though I feel myself unable to express them."

"Enough!" said the prince. "I feel myself under a deep debt of obligation to you, and, in spite of what you are, I cannot forget—besides, I have a still further call to make upon your services."

"Your Highness, you will always find me ready and willing."

"I do not doubt it. I cannot unfold my plans to you to-night, however. Come to me again, and I will be prepared. I require a secret agent in an affair of much importance."

Dick bowed to intimate his perfect readiness.

"Come, Lady Ruth," said the prince, taking her by the hand, "I will be answerable for your safety."

"Your Royal Highness," said Dick, "I take my leave, but if——"

"If what? Say on!"

"If your Highness would reward me so far as to give me a safe conduct from the palace. I have only made my way here at a great risk, and I am fearful that on my return I may be intercepted by my enemies."

Dick, as he spoke, walked to one of the windows in the room, and drew aside the heavy curtain with which it was covered.

Placing his face close to the glass, he peeped out, and found that he commanded a view of the courtyard.

At some distance off he could perceive Black Bess standing as still as any statue.

"All seems well!" he exclaimed, turning back into the apartment. "I fancy there will be no need of your Royal Highness's interference."

"So much the better then, for I wish our dealings to be kept as secret as possible. Go, and have no fear; I will watch at this window until you take your departure."

Dick could not depart without saying farewell to little Lady Ruth.

The child wept, for, young as she was, yet she was conscious that she was parting with a well-tried friend.

"I shall never forget you—never!" she cried, through her tears, as Dick Turpin left the apartment.

The highwayman had taken particular notice of the different corridors he had passed through and the various staircases he had ascended, so he was able to find his way to the little door by which he had entered with as much precision as any inhabitant of the place.

The yeoman of the guard who had admitted him opened the door and allowed him to pass out.

The next moment he was standing beside Black Bess.

But just as he was about to place his foot in the stirrup, a man sprang out of the darkness and seized him by the throat.

"Dick Turpin," he said, "you are my prisoner. Surrender quietly, for you cannot escape! The courtyard is full of my men!"

Dick shook off his grasp, and spoke in indignant tones:

"I am not in the humor to be jested with! Stand aside! What do you mean?"

Dick's perfect coolness staggered the officer.

"Surely," he ejaculated—"surely you don't go for to deny your 'dentity?"

"You are drunk, I think."

"No; but you are Dick Turpin, and at all hazards I will make you my prisoner."

"Then you are a fool, and will suffer for your pains! Stand off, I say!"

"If you are not Dick Turpin, who are you then?"

"What business is that of yours?"

The officer placed a whistle to his lips, and blew it shrilly.

"You will get yourself into trouble, you wrong-headed fool!" said Dick. "I am a friend of the Prince of Wales's, and am even now about to set forth on his business."

"How jolly green you must think me! It won't do, Dick, for you won't impose upon me by such a tale."

Dick played his part very well, but to no effect, and he now looked up with some anxiety at the window at which the prince had promised to station himself.

He was wondering how far the prince would feel inclined to compromise himself on his behalf.

But surely if there was any such thing as gratitude existing, the Prince would interfere.

The officers now clustered around Dick in a dense throng.

He began to grow anxious.

His sole hope rested with the prince.

If he failed to keep his word he was lost indeed.

"Are you coming quietly, Dick?" said the officer. "If not, we can easily overpower you by force."

"Hark—behold!"

At this moment, with a clashing sound, one of the upper casements was thrown open.

"Below, there! Guard—guard!"

There was an immediate stir and bustle, and then from out of a low doorway there issued several soldiers.

"Halt!" said the officer.

The soldiers came to a standstill.

"Give that gentleman safe escort from the palace. He is engaged on my private business."

The voice of the prince was well known.

Indeed, there was something so peculiar in its tone that once heard it was never forgotten.

"Yes, your Royal Highness," replied the officer in command of the soldiers.

The casement was closed again.

The police officer who was so certain of capturing Dick Turpin knew the prince's voice full well, so he shrank back.

"Be careful how you interfere another time," said Dick, "or his Highness will have you removed from your post."

With these words the highwayman, escorted by the small troop of soldiers, quickly trotted out of the palace yard.

When once in the open street he felt that he was quite safe.

But he made up his mind to get out of the vicinity of the palace with all speed.

Accordingly he loosened the reins upon the back of Black Bess, and the next moment he was galloping up St. James's Street at a pace that raised a prodigious clatter

"Home now," Dick muttered, as, having reached Piccadilly, he turned his mare's head westward—"home now. I ought to be well satisfied with all that I have accomplished to-night."

This was certainly right; but before he had gone very far Dick found that he was troubled with a most tormenting thirst.

"I should not have raised an objection if the prince had offered me a glass of wine," he murmured, with a smile. "However, at the next inn I come to I will pull up for a moment and have a good draught of ale."

Being in England, Dick had not to travel far without finding what he sought.

In fact, in rather less than five minutes afterwards he caught sight of one of those pretty roadside inns which were more plentiful along the lines of the different highways then than they are now.

The place looked quiet enough in all conscience, and Dick at any rate ran whatever risk there was in stopping.

He pulled up in front of the long horse trough, from which he allowed Black Bess to drink, but only sparingly.

"Hilloa!" he shouted. "House—house! Landlord—ostler!"

These outcries brought to the front door of the inn a young and rather good-looking girl, and to the yard gate a thin, wiry little man, evidently the ostler.

"A tankard of your very best old October ale, my dear!" said Turpin, to the girl. "Make haste, for I am very thirsty, and if the ale is as good as you are beautiful, it will be very welcome, I assure you!"

The girl was by no means insensible to a compliment, so she smiled quite pleasantly upon the highwayman, and ran back into the house.

"A little hay," added Dick, to the ostler—"just a handful, that's all."

At this moment the blind hanging over one of the windows was drawn aside, and a man peered out.

One of the upper panes of this window was broken, and through this the sound of voices came with tolerable distinctness.

"All right," said some one—"I can see her. She is quiet enough; but I would not sell her for a thousand!"

Dick looked about him, wondering to what these words could apply.

His state of doubt did not continue long, for he caught sight of a very handsome bright bay horse, that was secured by the rein to a ring that was fixed in the wall near the window from which the man had looked out.

"It's a beauty," he muttered, admiringly—"a real beauty! She could almost rival my own bonny Black Bess."

The horse upon which Dick gazed was in good truth a splendid creature, and it is very probable his admiration would have gone still further, but just at this moment the young girl appeared, carrying the tankard.

Dick took it from her with a glance and manner that brought the color to her cheeks.

The ale was of good quality, and Dick was very thirsty, both of which occurrences combined caused the liquid to disappear with great rapidity.

When he paused to take breath, the ostler came with the hay.

A few unimportant words were exchanged, and then, when just about to ride off, Dick slipped a crown-piece into the palm of the ostler, and gave the girl another, bidding her get change and give it him the next time he called.

At a gentle trot, Dick now set forward, for he believed that he was at present quite out of danger, and as there was no occasion to hurry himself, he thought he might as well ride to the castle quietly as not.

But just at the moment when he took his departure from the inn, a gentleman came out of the front door.

"Now, ostler," he cried, "bring my nag this way!"

"Are you off now, sir?"

"Yes; be quick."

"All right, sir."

The gentleman glanced along the road, and caught sight of Dick mounted on Black Bess.

They had indeed only got a few yards away.

"By Jove!" he ejaculated, in a voice of enthusiasm, "what a splendid creature! What a magnificent trot, to be sure!"

As he pronounced the words several other persons sallied forth from the inn.

They were idlers, every one of them, and only came in order to witness the traveller ride off, for he had been vaporing for at least an hour about the qualities of his steed—so much so that the curiosity of all was strongly excited.

Upon hearing the remark made by the traveller, the ostler said:

"Mayhap, sir, you don't know who that is?"

"I certainly do not. Do you?"

"Yes, very well," returned the ostler, with a peculiar smile.

"Well, who is he? I should like to know him on account of his horse. I would ride any distance to see a bit of choice horseflesh."

The gentleman was evidently an enthusiast in the matter of horses.

"I'll tell you if you like," said the ostler.

"Well, who is he?"

"You have heard of Dick Turpin?"

"Of course I have."

"Well, that's him."

The ostler pointed down the road as he uttered these emphatic words.

"Impossible!"

"It is not impossible at all, sir! I know him!"

"Then, you rascal, why didn't you raise an immediate outcry, and try to capture him?"

"What for?"

"What for? Because he is a highwayman!"

"He never robbed me of nothin'."

"That may be."

"Nor I never saw him rob nobody else."

"That's not to the point. If you knew it was Dick Turpin, your duty was to raise the alarm immediately."

"Oh, was it? Very well, I shall know what to do when I see him again."

Evidently the ostler was not inclined to regard Dick in an unfriendly light.

The gentleman gazed after the retreating forms of the highwayman and his steed—both of them now nearly out of sight—with feelings very different to those he had lately looked at them with.

"Why not pursue him now?" said the gentleman, turning to the throng of idlers near the inn door. "We might keep on his track till we met with assistance."

The ostler laughed.

"What are you grinning at, you great idiot?" said the gentleman, angrily.

"Why, at you, for thinking of such a thing. Why, you might as well gallop over a marsh after a will-o'-the-wisp as after Black Bess when Dick Turpin was on her back—you would have about as good a chance of capturing one as the other."

"You are evidently in collusion with this robber," said the gentleman, hotly, "so I should advise you to be very careful what you say and do."

"Collusion?" repeated the ostler slowly, and scratching his head while he spoke. 'And what may that mean?"

"Oh, confound you, don't bother I'll ride off after this Dick Turpin myself."

"Then you're mad, sir," said the landlord, coming forward.

"Are you a confederate too?" asked the gentleman, with a sneer.

"No, I am not; but every man must be mad who would heedlessly ride to his death."

[SIXTEEN-STRING JACK AND CLAUDE DUVAL FOLLOW THE MYSTERIOUS LIGHT.]

"Bah! I have no patience with you at all! You seem to be frightened to death at the fellow's name! He is but a man, I tell you, and as such I will be a match for him, as my nag here will be for his mare!"

"Dick Turpin's match has not been found yet," muttered the ostler, "and that is why he remains at liberty. Plenty have pitted themselves against him, but they have always failed."

"No matter!" said the stranger, as he sprang into the saddle. "I know it would be worse than useless to ask any of you to accompany me, so I shall start alone. But don't be surprised to see me come back with my prisoner all safe!"

"I shall!" the ostler was heard to mutter, under his voice, as he turned aside; and he was further heard to say, more indistinctly, something about a wilful man having his own way.

The gentleman took not the slightest notice of him, however, but, giving a patronising nod by way of farewell to those who stood at the inn door, he rode away at a pace that was indeed wonderful.

The horse he bestrode was in good truth a wonderful creature, and justified him to a very great extent in boasting about it as he did.

"If he goes on long at that rate," said the landlord, "he will not be long in overtaking Dick Turpin, I'm thinking."

"That depends whether he lets Black Bess have her head or not," replied the ostler.

The gentleman evidently thought he should quickly overtake Dick, and therefore pushed his horse to the utmost of his capacity.

He was quite right in this, but the event was brought about in a manner he had not for a moment expected, and which, consequently, took him greatly by surprise.

Hearing some one coming along the road at such a fearful rate, Dick Turpin, so far from urging Bess onward, pulled her up altogether.

Then, turning her head in the opposite direction, he planted her in the middle of the road, and there waited quietly to see who was approaching.

CHAPTER CMXCIV.

DICK TURPIN MEETS UNEXPECTEDLY WITH A NOVEL AND PROFITABLE ADVENTURE.

THIS manœuvre on Dick's part quite disconcerted his pursuer, and by slow degrees he reined-in his steed, until its pace was reduced to a slow walk.

The gentleman really thought that Dick would be afraid of anyone who had courage enough to face him boldly; but the highwayman's behavior quickly dispelled this very erroneous idea.

Had there been any satisfactory way of doing so, the gentleman would unquestionably have turned back again; but he could not do so without passing the inn, and he was one who, above all things, hated to be laughed at, so he held on his way, filled with hesitation and wondering what he should do.

It was not, either, without a great deal of trepidation that he thus rode forward, for he had heard many strange stories of Dick Turpin and his doings, and consequently he was rather nervous as to what fate he might have in store for him.

His horse walked on until it reached the spot where Black Bess was standing.

Dick recognised the horse, and it may be he partially comprehended what was the gentleman's intention.

He took off his hat, and made a very elaborate bow.

"Good evening, sir!" he said, with the utmost politeness. "I feel much pleasure in meeting with you."

The gentleman had not yet recovered his self-possession, nor had he made up his mind as to just what he should do, so in his confusion he returned Dick's salutation with a great deal of ceremony.

"That is a splendid nag you have, sir," remarked Dick.

This seemed to put the gentleman more at his ease, for he replied:

"You say rightly, sir. His equal has yet to be found. I have never met him, and I don't believe I ever shall."

"Indeed! Then he must be of rare quality?"

"He is—he is. I have heard much about a mare called Black Bess, and have been told wonderful stories of her powers; but I should not be afraid to match mine against even her."

"Wouldn't you indeed?"

"I really should not."

"Now supposing, sir, you had the opportunity of taking a trial race with this Black Bess, what odds would you take?"

"Any."

In his excitement and enthusiasm about his horse, the gentleman was ready to forget anything.

But most especially did he congratulate himself upon the turn the conversation had taken, since it would enable him to escape an encounter with the redoubtable highwayman without any disagreeable imputations upon his own courage.

"You speak boldly," said Dick, after a brief pause.

"I mean what I say."

"That is, if you had the chance of trying the speed of your horse against Black Bess, you would be ready to bet any amount that your horse would win? Well, then, sir, you can have your inclination gratified, provided you don't change your mind."

"Indeed, sir?"

"Yes, in deed and in truth, too. For, hark ye, sir, a word in your ear——"

"Well—well?"

"I am Dick Turpin, at your service, and this is Black Bess, at your service too."

It was on the tip of the stranger's tongue to say:

"I know that very well!"

But he restrained himself, and merely repeated the word:

"Indeed!"

"Yes, sir," said Dick; "and if you don't mind making it worth my while, why, you shall have the trial race you so much wish for."

"Make it worth your while? How?"

"Why, as I am sure to win——"

The traveller interrupted him with a laugh.

Dick repeated his words.

"As I am sure to win, you must make something like a tolerable bet, otherwise I should not think of putting my mare and myself to so much trouble."

"Upon my word you take it coolly."

"Always did. But come, sir, time is passing. Is your inclination unaltered?"

"Quite."

"Then what is the figure? How much have you about you—I mean in the shape of ready money, rings, jewels, and other valuables?"

The traveller stared at this cool question, and asked:

"Do you think I shall tell you?"

"Yes—why not?"

"Why, I suppose that would only be preliminary to asking me to hand them over to you, and I have heard so much of your courage and prowess that I don't know whether I should feel inclined to run the risk of a personal conflict with you."

Dick bowed to this compliment.

"If you have heard much about me," he said, "you will unquestionably have been told that one of my characteristics is that whenever I pass my word I never go back from it."

'I have heard something of it."

'Then on the present occasion I give you my word that, if you will answer the question I asked you, I will not make the slightest attempt to take what you have from you."

"Then why do you want to know?"

"Answer my question first. Do not be afraid to do so."

"Well, then," said the gentleman, "I should think that, taking the ready money I have about me, and placing a fair value on my ornaments, there may be somewhere about six hundred pounds."

"Indeed, sir, I am glad to hear it."

"May I ask why?"

"Yes—because now there is a chance of our race to come off."

"Be good enough to explain yourself."

"Certainly—nothing is easier. As you may be aware, there is a reward of one thousand pounds to be gained by whoever captures me and takes me to Newgate.'

"I believe it is so."

"It is a fact, I can assure you, and that being understood, I will proceed to give you a form of the wager."

"I am all attention."

"Well, then, we are now on a capital bit of roadway—about the best in England, I should think, and we are by no means likely to meet with anyone at this late hour, so I propose that we adopt it for our race."

"Agreed!"

"Then as to the distance. Let me see, Ealing is the village next on before us. How far should you reckon it to be?"

"Rather better than seven miles, I should think."

"You are about right. We will call it seven miles, and we will let the Horns at Ealing be our goal."

"You mean the little inn on the left-hand side of the road?"

"Yes; and whoever reaches there first shall be the winner of the race."

"Agreed—that is fair enough."

"And now, sir, for the wager itself. If I get to the inn first you will, without any demur or resistance whatever, hand over everything in the shape of valuables you possess—on the other hand, should you get there first, I will, when I arrive, surrender myself to you in an instant, and you can then gain the thousand pounds reward offered for my apprehension."

The gentleman had the utmost faith in the capacity of his steed, and upon hearing the highwayman make this proposition his eyes glittered with cupidity.

"And you are willing and content to abide by that?"

"Perfectly."

'Then give me your word."

"I give you my word, which has never once been broken."

Enough."

"You clearly understand, and unhesitatingly agree to the terms?"

"I do."

"Then no more need be said. Let us be off at once. I am ready whenever you are."

Dick's confidence made the stranger somewhat uneasy; but he strove to calm his mind by thinking that it was more braggadocio on Dick's part than aught else.

"How shall we arrange to start at the same moment?"

"Easily. You see the moon yonder? It is just emerging from behind that dark cloud. When it perfectly breaks forth make your start."

"Agreed!" said the stranger again.

He slightly shifted his position as he spoke, so as to be just abreast of the highwayman.

They had not to wait long before making the start.

The moon came completely out from behind the cloud which had for so long obscured her radiance.

The very instant that the whole of her silvery disc was exposed, the stranger cried:

"Off now and away!"

At the same moment he gave his horse so vicious a dig with the spurs that the animal cleared a tremendous distance at one bound, and then went tearing along at a speed which could only be characterised as terrific.

But Dick adopted no such violent means.

Simply dropping the reins upon the neck of Black Bess as he was in the habit of doing, he cried:

"Now, old lass—forward—forward! Let us see what you can do to-night! I have staked my life on your powers, old girl—don't forget that! Forward, now—forward! That is it!"

It was truly beautiful now to see the manner in which Black Bess covered the ground.

Her gallop just resembled that of the greyhound—being composed of long, swinging, graceful bounds.

But the horse upon which the stranger so prided himself was of no every-day kind.

The start that it gained at the first it preserved well, and Dick found before he had gone far that Black Bess would have to tax herself to the utmost to beat him.

The stranger pressed his hat tightly on his head, and from time to time looked back behind him with the greatest exultation.

But Dick took it very easy, making no further effort to increase his mare's speed—in fact, he had hit upon a capital mode of proceeding.

About her competency to outstrip the horse in front he had not the least doubt. He had tried her too often for that. It is true he recollected how well Sir George's horse had kept behind him on a former occasion; but then Black Bess was wounded and weak from loss of blood, while now she was in the best possible condition.

Going at the furious pace they did, it was not long before Ealing came into view.

At this time the two horsemen were almost level with each other.

But there was this difference to be noted between them.

The stranger was spurring his horse at every step, and making the most frantic efforts to urge him onwards at a more rapid rate.

Dick, on the contrary, was sitting quite at ease, letting Black Bess have all her own way.

It was not until within a quarter of a mile from Ealing that he made the least effort.

Then all he did was to say:

"Sir, you have lost your race."

That was all that reached the stranger's ears, for at the very moment that he pronounced the words Dick slackened the reins still more, and gave utterance to that strange sound so well comprehended by Black Bess, and which meant that she was to put forth her very utmost powers.

She responded right gallantly, for she dashed past the bay horse like an arrow, and at each stroke of her hoofs the distance could be seen to increase between them.

Although he must have seen that it was totally impossible for his horse to win, the stranger was so exasperated at his defeat that he continued to goad the poor creature in a most fearful manner.

Dick drew up with some suddenness in front of the Horns.

"Bravo, Bess!" he cried, exultantly. "I knew you would not fail me. Bravo, old lass, you have behaved yourself right gallantly and well! Ah, here he comes!"

These words were called forth by the clatter of hoofs, for the stranger came thundering along like a whirlwind.

He pulled up, however, a moment after in front of the inn, where Dick was waiting for him so calmly.

The stranger's horse was covered from head to foot with white foam, and now that it had been brought to a standstill it trembled in every limb.

Black Bess, on the other hand, though breathing rapidly, showed no other sign of distress. Her flanks were a little wet, but nothing more.

"I told you you would lose," said Dick; "but I hope you are satisfied that all was quite fair?"

The stranger was silent.

"Don't be disappointed, man," cried Dick. "It is no disgrace to your horse that he has been outrun by Black Bess. When I staked my life you might have guessed what would have been the result. Don't think any the less of your horse either for this defeat, for I question much whether there is another that could have done to-night what he has done."

"He is beaten," said the stranger, "that is enough. He has now lost all value in my eyes."

"Nay—say not so."

"I do say it, because I prided myself upon possessing the fleetest horse in England."

"And I repeat that it is no depreciation to him that he has been outrun by Black Bess."

But the traveller would not look at it in this light.

Attracted by the noise made by their arrival, several persons sallied forth from the inn, which was only waiting for the stage-coach to pass by to be closed for the night.

Among these were the landlord and ostler.

The latter came close to Dick, who beckoned him to approach still nearer.

Then, in a low voice, he said:

"Be quick. I want you to bring me a quart of brandy—the best, mind—in a stable bucket."

The ostler opened his eyes in amazement.

"A quart of brandy in a bucket?" he ejaculated

"Yes—make haste! The sooner you are back the sooner you will see what I intend to do with it."

Struck probably by the force of this remark, the ostler hurried away.

"Now, sir," said Dick, addressing himself to the stranger, "let us settle our little affair before we go any further. I cannot spare any more time, I assure you."

For his honor's sake, the stranger could not refuse compliance with this request.

But, nevertheless, it was with the very worst possible grace in the world that he thrust his hand into his pockets and produced—first a purse, then a pocket-book, then a watch, and lastly some rings from his fingers, and jewellery from various parts of his apparel.

This operation occupied some little time, however, and while he was thus engaged the ostler made his appearance, carrying a bucket in one hand and a quart measure in the other.

"You are sure you want the brandy in this here bucket?"

"Yes—pour it in. Be quick, and then fill it up with water."

The ostler obeyed, indulging the while in vague speculations as to whether the gentleman was going to drink a bucketful of brandy and water for a wager.

"Here it is sir," he said, as soon as he had added the water.

"Just give it my mare, then."

The ostler's astonishment reached its culminating point.

Brandy-and-water to a horse! He had never heard of such a thing.

But Black Bess, knowing full well that the compound was intended for her, began drinking away at it at a rate that left no room for doubting whether she liked it or not.

It was just as Black Bess drained the last drop, that the stranger said:

"There, then, is all I have. I have kept my word to you, have I not?"

"You have, indeed. Here, take this five-pound note back again—it will do to pay the toll-gates. Now what will you take to drink at my expense?"

"Nothing."

The tone in which the traveller pronounced this one word showed what an amount of aggravation he felt.

"Come—come, sir," Dick cried, "think no more of your defeat."

"I have kept my word to the letter," said the stranger, raising his voice so that all around might hear what he said; "but having done so, I call upon these good people for assistance!"

"Assistance?" Dick echoed, while he tightened his grasp upon the reins.

"Yes. Although I promised to surrender to you all I had, I did not undertake that I would keep your identity a secret."

"But it would be base to disclose it!"

Dick backed his mare as he spoke, for the people were clustering around him by far too closely to be pleasant.

"Base or not, I don't care!" shouted the traveller, now quite beside himself with vexation. "Good people all, this is Dick Turpin, the celebrated highwayman, for whose apprehension a thousand pounds reward is offered! Help me to secure the rascal!"

This announcement was productive of an immense commotion.

"My blunderbuss," cried the landlord—"where is my blunderbuss? I will blow him to atoms!"

"Will you help me?" roared the traveller.

"Yes, yes," was the unanimous cry.

"Then, gentlemen," said Dick, "I can only say you will have a long and fatiguing run. I have the honor to wish you all a very good night."

So saying, Dick slackened the reins upon the neck of Black Bess.

As usual, the gallant creature perfectly well understood what was required of her.

Before the landlord and the others in front of the inn could quite make up their minds where to turn and what to do Dick Turpin was full half a mile off down the road, and going at a pace that soon promised to take him out of sight.

Muttering curses, the discomfited stranger rode off in pursuit, though the exhausted condition of his steed showed how perfectly ridiculous it was for him to attempt a pursuit.

But the traveller just then was not in a condition to think very clearly or reason very correctly about anything, and so, with his breast full of angry feelings, he pushed on, trusting in the end either to overtake the highwayman, or else meet with officers or others whom he could set upon his track.

CHAPTER CMXCV.

TOM KING IS FRUSTRATED IN HIS ATTEMPT TO TAKE POSSESSION OF OLD MATTHEW'S LETTER.

"Easy—easy, Bess—take it easy, old lass! There is no need for you to exert yourself now. You have behaved yourself bravely, old girl! By Jove, who would have thought that such an odd, unlooked-for adventure should have turned out so profitably? I am possessed of six hundred pounds in value, at the very lowest estimate. Of that I am quite certain. Well, well, it could not have dropped into my hands at a better time. I have a use for every penny of it."

He was thinking of Tom Davis.

"If old Matthew's plan can only be carried out," he said, half aloud, as Black Bess went slowly on her way, "it will be a glorious thing, and for my part I can see no reason why it should not. I should feel, then, that I had done my duty to one who has ever been a faithful ally."

The hour now was very late—or, more strictly speaking, very early. There was little probability of meeting with anyone upon the road, and so Dick made his mind up to ride direct to the castle.

Accordingly he left the high-road and struck off across the open country, thus unknowingly completely disappointing the traveller in his hope of getting upon his track.

Upon Dick's arrival at the ruins the ostler at once came forward.

"You are back soon to-night, captain," he said.

"Yes," replied Dick. "The others have not returned, I suppose?"

"Not yet, captain."

Dick dismounted and gave Black Bess into the charge of the ostler, who at once took her off to her accustomed place in the ruins.

Maud had heard Dick's arrival, and hastened forward to meet him.

"Well," said Tom King, as soon as Dick entered the subterranean apartment, "have you been successful in finding a friend for the little girl? You do not know how much I regret parting with her. She had quite won my heart!"

"I believe," answered Dick, "that I have left her in the hands of one who is better able to befriend her than almost anyone."

"But will he?"

"Well, little Ruth's uncle is his personal enemy, and he has suffered much at his hands. However, I can see by both of your looks how interested you are, so I will give you an account of every incident that has befallen me."

"A rare night's sport!" said Tom King, as soon as the narrative was concluded. "I wish I could only be fortunate enough to meet with such a one. I feel to be growing absolutely rusty!"

"How is your arm?"

"Better—much better. In fact, I feel nothing of it worth mentioning. It is getting well as fast as it can, and I shall be all the better for a little exercise."

"You still think of looking for old Matthew's letter?"

"If you have no objection, captain."

"Well, to speak truth, I had quite made up my mind to look after that bit of business; but as you seem to desire it you shall go."

Maud heard these words with manifold pleasure, though she said nothing.

Morning came, bright, clear, and beautiful; but it did not bring either Sixteen-String Jack or Claude Duval.

Their non-appearance excited but little apprehension in the breasts of those who watched for them.

They had to endure suspense as to the safety of their comrades; but it was better for them to do that than for the security of their abiding place to be affected.

During the day Tom King was restless to the utmost degree. His impatience made him feel as though night would never come.

No sooner was it dusk than he was in perfect readiness to start.

His pistols had been loaded and put ready for use, his horse saddled, and every possible preparation made at least an hour before.

Dick restrained him until it was really dark enough for him to take his departure safely.

No prisoner released from a long and weary confinement ever felt more elation of spirits than Tom King.

He would have shouted out aloud in his gratification, but the manifest imprudence of doing so fortunately presented itself to him and restrained him.

Dick Turpin and Maud watched him till he passed out of sight, then the former turned round to the ostler and said:

"Is Black Bess saddled?"

"Yes, captain."

Maud clung to Dick's arm, and looked appealingly into his face.

"Surely—surely," she said, in a tremulous voice, "you are not going away to-night?"

"Yes—why not?"

"Consider I am quite alone."

"There is Jack. He will keep good watch and ward."

"I do not doubt it; still think what long and weary hours they will be till you return; besides, Claude and Jack are absent, and how can you tell but what they may be in danger?"

"All the better reason, then," said Dick, smiling, "why I should go out in quest of them. I might chance to be of real service."

"No, no—for once stay here!"

"As you wish, Maud," said Dick after a brief pause; then, turning to the ostler, he added: "Take the saddle and bridle off again. Black Bess shall have a rest to-night."

With these words Maud and Dick made their way down below, where we will leave them watching for the return of Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack, while we follow in the footsteps of Tom King.

The elation of spirits which he experienced increased rather than otherwise as soon as his horse broke out into a gallop. The animal was very fresh and full of spirit in consequence of the long rest it had had.

Tom King was so familiar with the country that he was able to take his way almost in a direct line to the bridge over the river Brent, which, it will be remembered, was the appointed spot.

He was sorely tempted to indulge in some adventure on the way; but the uncertainty of how long it might be the means of delaying him, and the remembrance of the importance of reaching the bridge early, enabled him each time to overcome the inclination.

Coming at length to a portion of the river Brent at some distance from the spot where it flowed under the Edgware Road, he pulled up his steed and indulged in a brief consideration as to the best thing he could do.

He quickly determined to follow the windings of the little stream, which, at the place where he had halted, seemed more to deserve the name of brook than the ambitious appellation river.

Tom recollected that near the old bridge the river was bordered on one side by a line of tall, stately trees.

Under cover of these he expected to be able to reach the appointed spot without danger of being seen by anyone.

The event proved him to be perfectly right.

The night was not a dark one, yet the shadow cast by the row of trees was dense indeed.

Upon reaching the bridge, Tom alighted, and secured his horse to a tree in such a manner that he could feed in plenty upon the luxuriant grass beneath his feet.

This done, the highwayman crept cautiously forward on foot, and at length took up his position behind a projecting buttress of the structure.

The kind of recess in which he took up his station was wrapped in such obscurity that a passer-by would have required a keen eye to detect him.

From this point Tom King commanded a view of the whole of the bridge, and also of a considerable portion of the road stretching towards London, so that it was quite impossible for anyone to approach from this direction unseen by him.

The silence was profound, and on that one particular night the Edgware Road appeared to be deserted.

This soon began to grow very irksome to Tom, when, all at once, the idea flashed across his mind that old Matthew's messenger might have come and gone, and that the letter he was waiting for might be at that very moment lying beneath the stone.

This was a point Tom resolved to satisfy himself upon without delay, but first he listened intently in order to make sure that no one was close at hand.

The continuance of the unbroken silence made him certain that he had the place all to himself, and that a more favorable opportunity than the present could not be found.

Accordingly he quitted his hiding-place, and with rapid steps made his way to the opposite end of the bridge.

Selecting the stone which had been described to him, he lifted it carefully.

But there was no letter beneath it.

Resolved to be satisfied beyond all possibility of doubt, he lifted successively every stone he could find loose upon the parapet.

This examination convinced him that old Matthew's messenger had not arrived.

The clatter of a horse's hoofs coming upon his ears at this moment warned him to once more seek shelter in his hiding-place.

Ere long a horseman appeared in sight, and as he drew nearer the bridge he reduced his horse's pace, which made Tom think that this must be the messenger.

He quickly found, however, that he was mistaken.

The traveller had merely reined-in his steed to ease him up the rather steep hill which led on to the bridge.

Upon reaching the summit the horse was again put in motion, and the traveller rode on.

Tom gazed after him longingly.

Somehow or other, and certainly without any good or sufficient reason, the idea had taken firm possession of Tom's mind that Matthew's messenger would be of the male sex and that he would arrive on horseback.

Therefore when, some time afterwards, his quick ear detected a light footfall on the hard road, he paid no attention to it.

Presently, however, a female form appeared walking slowly up the hill.

Tom looked at her attentively for the simple reason that he had nothing else upon which to bestow his notice.

As she came nearer, Tom perceived there was a certain air of mystery about her, for she glanced behind her repeatedly with an air of apprehensiveness, as though she feared some one was behind her watching her movements.

Upon nearing the bridge her pace increased until she fairly stood upon it.

Then she stopped abruptly.

She listened.

Then, with great rapidity, she darted to the left side of the bridge, lifted a loose stone from it, and afterwards Tom distinctly saw her place a letter beneath it.

No sooner was this action performed than the girl bounded on as swiftly as an antelope, passing Tom King in his hiding-place so closely as almost to touch him with her garments.

"That's neatly done," said Tom King. "And now for the letter. The sooner I take possession of it the better, that's certain! Ah! what is that?"

Tom heard a slight noise, and darted back into his place of concealment just in time.

Peering out cautiously, he saw a dusky figure approaching.

It was a man.

He was glancing around him with great keenness.

When he came fairly on the bridge he paused, and Tom King heard him mutter:

"That's the little game, is it? Well, I'll see if I can't spoil it, as sure as my name's Bishop. I'll keep an eye upon you, my lady—I shall know you again, never fear!"

Upon hearing these words, Tom King did indeed congratulate himself upon having got back to his hiding-place in good time.

He could see the new-comer now very plainly.

His dress proclaimed him to be a police officer.

It was indeed no other than the individual who had tried so unsuccessfully to capture Dick Turpin in the stable at Piccadilly.

"Confound the fellow!" Tom King said, mentally. "He has been following and watching that girl, and of course has seen her secrete the letter.

Tom said this, and endeavored to reconcile himself to it as a certainty, yet at the same time hoped that the contrary would prove to be the case.

Whatever suspense he may have felt in this respect was very quickly put an end to, for Bishop, the officer, said:

"I saw her with a letter—I'm sure I saw her with a letter, and she has hidden it somewhere on the bridge—under one of these loose stones, I expect."

From these words it became manifest that he had not been near enough to observe where the letter had really been placed.

But in a very matter-of-fact, business-like way he lifted the stones one after the other, looking carefully under every one before he replaced it.

All at once he uttered an ejaculation

The letter had been found.

"What shall I do now?" asked Tom King, of himself. "I must have that letter, and the question is which will be the best way to obtain it?"

This promised to be a very difficult problem, and its difficulty was increased owing to the fact that Tom King's attention was pretty fully occupied in watching the movements of the officer, and this distraction prevented him from giving the subject proper consideration.

"I wonder what the letter is about?" was Bishop's next remark, as he seated himself upon the parapet of the bridge. "I ought to find out who it's addressed to, at any rate. Ha, ha! If it should turn out as I expect, I rather think I shall have you, Mr. Matthew Gale, clever as you think yourself! Ha, ha! I should catch you then nicely! Wait a bit!"

Bishop placed the letter carefully beside him, and then began fumbling in his pockets.

The first object he produced was from the skirt of his coat.

It was something dark looking, and afterwards proved to be one of those dark lanterns which all police officers made a point of carrying.

After a little delay the officer succeeded in lighting his lantern, for the wind blew rather strongly on the bridge, making this operation a matter of no small difficulty.

Then he said, in a satisfied tone, as a broad beam of light came shining through the lens:

"There, that will do nicely. Now to see the address on the letter. Really, I do believe this will turn out to be about the best night's work I have ever done!"

The letter was then placed so that the light of the lantern fell fully upon it.

Bishop uttered an exclamation of angry impatience.

"Confound his caution!" he cried. "But I might have expected as much—it's just like him. But I'll try my best to nail him, and so I'll see what the letter contains."

There could be no doubt that Bishop fully expected that he was about to make some very important discovery—indeed, he fairly believed that the communication he held in his hand was of such a character as to place old Matthew completely in his power.

A dreadful disappointment was in store for him, as the reader very well knows.

With much superfluous caution, the officer opened the letter and unfolded it.

"Hullo!" he cried. "What's this? Am I done after all? Is there nothing in it? There must be something surely; and yet perhaps this paper was only placed here to throw me off the right track. The girl may have gone on with the real letter, and by this time doubtless has delivered it."

This was such a dreadful idea that the officer felt almost inclined to fling himself backwards off the parapet of the bridge into the water below.

Indeed, in his state of intense aggravation, there is no knowing what he might have done, had not his eyes all at once lighted upon something in the letter.

"Ah!" he cried, "what's this?—something after all?"

He looked closely, and then perceived the figures that Matthew, in case of such a contingency as the present, had agreed to write.

"What does it mean?" asked Bishop, looking up and apparently addressing himself to the obscurity around him—"what does it mean? '9,' and then 21?' Who can make anything out of such a letter as that?"

Having asked this question, Bishop made a microscopic examination of the sheet of paper, the result of which was to convince him that nothing more than the figures had been written upon it.

Then he appeared to give himself up to deep reflection.

Tom King was full of exultation.

"Bravo, Matthew!" he exclaimed, mentally. "You are a clever fellow—indeed you are—a wonderfully clever fellow! 9 and 21! I shall not forget. That is all I want to know. Ha, ha! Mr. Bishop, you have been so sagacious actually as to outwit yourself."

Tom King's satisfaction is something to be imagined more than described.

"I'll be off now," he murmured. "I know all that I wish to learn, and, if I do not linger here, I shall have time, perhaps, for an adventure. No doubt I can steal away unheard and unperceived, and yet very likely if I stay here a little longer, Mr. Bishop will be good enough to take his departure."

Tom's attention was now particularly directed towards the officer, who by this time seemed to have reached a definite point in his reflections.

"I'll put the letter back again," he said, as he put his finger cunningly by the side of his nose—"that's what I'll do. I'll put it where I found it, and then I'll hide. Ha, ha! capital! That letter is put here for somebody who hasn't arrived yet, and if I stay here he won't approach. Who knows, it may be Dick Turpin who is coming, and if so, I'll have him, dead or alive—I don't care which of the two."

With these words, Bishop quitted his sitting position on the parapet of the bridge, and carefully placed the letter where he had found it.

"Now I'll hide," he muttered. "Let me see," he added, as he looked about him, "where will be the best place? Why, yonder buttress, of course! I should think it was made on purpose. I'll hide there, and wait patiently—yes, patiently, for in this instance I feel sure patience will meet with its due reward."

So saying, Mr. Bishop put his legs in motion.

From the direction in which he now made his way, it was evident the buttress he had decided upon as being a good hiding-place was the very one behind which Tom King had ensconced himself.

Immediately upon making this discovery, Tom King cautiously withdrew, and so well did he accomplish his difficult task that he got completely away without causing Bishop to have the remotest suspicion that any other human being save himself was near.

Tom King glided gradually away, but ere he had gone far an unexpected difficulty presented itself.

If Bishop should keep a sharp look-out—as beyond a doubt he would—Tom felt it would be next to an impossibility to make his way unseen to the spot where he had left his horse.

It is true he might have managed to get off without any danger of an encounter with the officer, but that was not what Tom wanted.

He was exceedingly anxious that Bishop should remain all night watching behind the buttress.

"I'll find some means of circumventing you yet," the highwayman said to himself, as he glanced back at the tenant of his late hiding-place. "You shall have no suspicion of my presence, and you shall have the comfort of a long watch in the cold till daylight. If all is quiet, he may even in his exceeding cleverness be fool enough to come here to-morrow night. I hope he does—it will keep him out of further mischief."

With these words Tom King set himself in motion again, and, as there was no longer so much need of silence in his movements, he made much more rapid progress.

He made a very considerable detour, and at length emerged upon the high-road at a spot rather less than half a mile from the bridge.

No sooner had he reached here, however, than he heard a sound upon the road which told him that a traveller of some kind or other was approaching.

"I don't like to pad the hoof," said Tom, to himself; "still, it would be a capital joke to do a bit of business while that highly-intelligent and astute officer, Bishop, was so close at hand."

CHAPTER CMXCVI.

TOM KING TAKES A PRIZE, AND BEFOOLS THE OLD MISER TO HIS HEART'S CONTENT, AND BISHOP, THE OFFICER, AS WELL.

To attempt to stop a traveller in such near proximity to a police officer seemed to be a needlessly daring and reckless experiment; but by the way in which Tom King produced his pistols, it became evident that he fully intended to carry his expressed resolution into effect.

"How wild old Bishop will be with himself," he muttered, "when he comes to know what has taken place. He will wish he had employed his time better than by watching on the bridge. Ha! the traveller is close at hand. I shall soon see whether I am to have anything worth while for my trouble."

Tom was right.

The traveller was indeed very close at hand.

On he came at a steady jog-trot pace, little thinking of the interruption he was so soon to meet with.

"Hold!" said Tom King, the next moment—"hold, I say! Pull up, on your life!"

He spoke in a suppressed tone, for he did not want his voice to travel far through the still night air.

So long as it reached the ears of the traveller and made a due impression upon him, that was all he required.

His command was obeyed.

"What is it—oh, what is it?"

The trembling tones of the voice and the appearance of the rider made Tom King aware that it was an aged man he had stopped.

He also saw that he presented the oddest figure he had ever seen.

His clothes were of the most tattered description, seeming here and there to hold together by nothing but a thread, while the animal he bestrode was a vicious-looking mule, that seemed to be quite as odd a character as its rider.

At a first glance, one would have come to the conclusion that this old man was miserably poor; but a more attentive observation, such as Tom King bestowed upon him, served to show that his poverty was more assumed than real.

Moreover, the highwayman's keen eyes detected that, upon being challenged, the old man suddenly clasped his hands over his breast, as though he had something of value secreted there.

In reply to his question, Tom King said:

"I want what money and valuables you may happen to have with you! Be quick—hand them over, for there is a police officer a little way up the road!"

The old man laughed a shrill, imbecile laugh.

"The idea now, that anyone should think of robbing a poor wretch like myself! Why, I am not worth a groat—absolutely not worth a groat! Let me pass on in peace, young man, otherwise I will raise my voice and summon the police officer you mentioned. Ha—ha!"

"If you did," replied Tom King, with a most menacing voice and gesture, "that cry would be your last! Before you had well finished uttering it the bullet in this pistol would clear a passage through your skull."

"Nay—nay, young man!" said the traveller, with increasing agitation and uneasiness. "Never mind threats, but allow me to pass on. I am poor—oh, so very, very poor!"

"That may be; and yet I am not going to allow you to proceed until I have thoroughly satisfied myself that you do not carry anything about you that I think worth taking."

The old man uttered a cry of dismay.

"No—no!" he exclaimed. "You are wrong—quite wrong!"

He would have pushed on, but Tom prevented him.

"Hark ye!" he said, "I am not inclined to stand any bother! Either you must give me what you have, or else I must search you; and, for your information, let me tell you that I never search a living person—I shoot them first, and then examine their pockets afterwards."

This threat greatly terrified the old man, who pressed his hands more tightly than ever upon his breast.

"I have nothing," he repeated—"absolutely nothing!"

"Then what is that you hold so tightly?"

"Hold so tightly?"

"Yes—I spoke plainly enough, did I not?"

"Well, then—a—it—it—is nothing!"

"False!" said Tom—"false!"

He had been watching the old man closely, and now availed himself of an opportunity to seize him by the breast of his apparel, for at the moment when he replied the old man had removed his hands

A loud yell was the result of this action.

Then a frantic but vain struggle.

Tom King felt something hard, and the next moment beheld in his hands a large leather bag so full of money that scarcely room was left to tie up the mouth.

"What do you call this?" said Tom King, as he flung the heavy bag in the air and dexterously caught it as it descended. "How could you sit there and proclaim such a monstrous falsehood?

But the old miser, for such indeed he was, suffered too much agony of spirit to be able to pay any attention to what the highwayman said.

"My gold!" he said—"my gold! Give me back my precious treasure! It has cost me years and years to amass it, and many a sleepless night to guard it. Oh, if I had only taken the landlord's advice and stopped at his inn all night, this would not have happened! Oh, my gold—my gold! What now will become of me?"

The apparently old man—for he was not old in reality, but merely aged with penury and anxiety of mind—fairly wept over his loss like a little child.

But the spectacle of so much avarice raised no feelings of compunction in Tom's breast. He believed that he was really doing the poor wretch a service by despoiling him

"Ilde on!" he said, "or if you linger I may be tempted to make a further search about your person, and then I doubt not I shall discover some other hoard. Feel thankful that I have let you off so easily, for your avarice and lying deceit disgust me!"

Mournfully and sadly the old miser set his mule in motion.

Tom King gazed after him with mingled feelings, but ere he had gone many yards a fresh thought entered Tom's mind, and acting impulsively upon it, he said:

"Stop—stop, my friend! I want to speak to you! I have something of importance to say—something that will very likely turn out to your advantage."

Hearing these words, the old man, after a little hesitation, pulled up.

"If you like to render me a little service," cried Tom King, a wicked smile playing round his lips the while, which the old man, owing to the darkness, could not see—"if you are willing to do what I require, I will, by way of recompense, give you back the bag of gold I have just taken from you."

"What—what is that you say?"

"You are incredulous; but, believe me, I am quite in earnest."

"What is it, then, you want me to do?—some fearful crime, perhaps? What is it that I can do to be worth so great a sum?"

"I place a different value upon money to what you do. But, in a word, are you willing to undertake this service?"

"What is it?"

"Listen, and I will tell you."

The miser leaned forward eagerly.

"A little further on along the road you will come to an old stone bridge that crosses the river Brent."

"Yes—yes, I know it well."

"Attend, then. Under one of the loose stones upon the parapet there is a letter. I want you to go there, fetch it, and bring it to me."

"And is this all?" asked the miser, in tones of wonder. "Would you pay so much for this slight service?"

"I have said so."

"Then—then——"

"Then what?"

"There must be some special and hidden danger connected with it?"

Tom nodded.

"There most certainly is," he replied.

"But let me know its nature."

"I am quite willing. You must know, then, that I have good reason to believe that the bridge is well watched by police officers, who are on the look-out to capture me. The letter contains the description of the place where a comrade of mine has hidden a vast treasure."

"Treasure, say you?" for the old man's faculties became, if possible, doubly sharpened by the pronunciation of this word.

"Yes, treasure! You understand, my comrade buried it, then wrote down a description of the place, and left it beneath the stone."

"Then why not fetch it?"

"Because if I venture to go near, the officers will seize me, while of you they will have no suspicion whatever. You can take up the letter, bring it back to me, and when you do I promise faithfully to return you your bag of gold."

The old miser's eyes sparkled brightly.

"It is a bargain," he cried—"it is a bargain!"

"I am glad to hear it," said Tom. "Set forward now, at once."

"And where shall I find you?"

"I will sit down here upon this old milestone, and wait patiently for your return."

"Good—good! Do not stir."

"I will not, depend upon it. Be quick!"

"I will; and if you do not stir I shall be sure to be able to find you."

The old miser, without another word, urged his mule forward at the best speed it was capable of making, which was not very rapid.

Tom King watched him for some moments.

He observed the old man frequently and anxiously look round, in order to be sure that Tom had not stirred.

The latter waited until a turn in the roadway hid him from his sight.

Then he sprang from his feet.

"If events turn out as I believe they will," he exclaimed, "you will be taught a lesson you will never forget to your dying day—perhaps it may cure you of your insatiable avarice—and it is pretty sure to make a fool of clever Mr. Bishop."

Having uttered these words half aloud, Tom sprang lightly over the low hedge that bordered the high-road.

He alighted upon the soft turf of a meadow, and then, crouching down, he ran along at a rapid rate.

He did not keep altogether under the shadow of the hedge, but left it some distance on his left.

By doing this, he cut off the curve of the high-road.

Having gone some distance in a straight line, he reached the hedge, and waited there a moment, partly to recover his spent breath and partly to listen.

He then discovered that he had outstripped the old miser, who came jogging along and muttering all the time.

"Yes—yes," Tom overheard him say, "I can see my way clearly now in all I have to do. Yes—yes, beyond all doubt this will turn out a good night's work for me. What a shallow fool he must be. Let me consider now how I shall act. I will, first of all, obtain possession of this letter he speaks of—I will secure it. Fool—fool, to let me know that it contained such priceless information! Then, having done that, I will find out the officers who are lurking near, and tell them where the rascal can be found. Yes, yes—that will be it. They will make their way round to him by the meadows, and pounce out upon him. Yes, yes—of course; and if necessary, I can hold him in conversation. I shall then get my share of the reward—perhaps recover possession of what he has robbed me of, and—then—then afterwards," he added, in shrill tones, "I will repair to this secret spot, and obtain possession of the buried treasure!"

Either he had brought all his arrangements to a satisfactory termination, or else the prospect of obtaining the buried treasure overpowered him to such a degree that he could only muse upon it, not speak, for having said so much he became silent.

"Just what I expected," said Tom, mentally, "though I scarcely thought I should obtain so good an insight into your plans. It will be a lesson for you, old man, and one which you richly deserve."

With these words, Tom King continued to make his way forward, though this time with more caution.

He was as anxious to get as close to the bridge as he could without being perceived, in order that he might be an observer of the scene that was about to be enacted.

To this end, he followed in the footsteps of the old miser, whose mule went at his steady jog-trot on to the bridge.

Oh, how Tom laughed and chuckled to himself!

The old miser had comprehended very well whereabouts the letter had been hidden.

So well that the first stone he raised proved to have the letter beneath it.

He seized the precious paper with a frantic gesture of delight.

But his feelings were destined to undergo a thorough alteration.

Bishop, the officer, had watched the old man seize the letter with almost as much extravagant delight as the old miser himself had experienced.

Like some wild beast that had been long and patiently awaiting the coming of its prey, he bounded out of his hiding-place and seized the miser by the back of the neck with a grip so powerful that it forced him to utter a loud yell of surprise and fear.

Bishop nothing doubted that he had got one of the highwaymen in his grasp, who had thus disguised himself in order to avoid recognition.

It was a very probable supposition indeed for him to make.

"Release me!" said the old man, speaking with a difficulty—"release me, I say!"

"Oh yes! of course I shall—you may depend I shall do that! Is there anything else in a trifling way you would like? If so, speak out—don't be bashful, pray!"

Bishop was so delighted that he grew quite facetious.

"You make a mistake in seizing me!" whined the miser. "I am no highwayman!"

"Very likely not; but I intend to take you whether you are or not—so surrender, and let us have no more fuss!"

The miser groaned.

"Ay, groan away!" cried Bishop, in great exultation. "You feel very bad, I daresay; but you will feel worse before long! Short work will be made of you, that I can promise you!"

"I am a wretched man!"

"No doubt of it."

"I am lost—lost!"

"Not a bit of it, my spark; it rather strikes me you're found! Ha, ha!"

At which stroke of wit Bishop laughed so heartily that he almost released his hold upon the miser's collar.

"Get your lantern," cried the latter, at length—"get your lantern, I say, and look in my face! You will see then that you have made a mistake—a great mistake! You will find I am not the man you take me for!"

By this time Bishop's excitement had abated somewhat, and consequently, being calmer, the old man's peculiar, shrill voice falling upon his ears, made him feel cold and clammy with a dreadful doubt.

Surely such a voice as that was not simulated.

In his nervous agitation, he thrust his hand into his pocket and drew forth his lantern.

Is was still burning.

With an unsteady hand, he directed the light upon the old miser's countenance.

The very first glance at the pinched features and attenuated form convinced him that it was no highwayman he held in his grasp.

With a sigh of bitter disappointment, he restored his lantern to his pocket.

"If you are not actually one of the accursed lot," he cried, wrathfully, "you are one of their agents, and being such, I will take good care that you receive in full the punishment which the law awards. Come with me—you are my prisoner! If you resist, it will be all the worse for you!"

"Mr. Officer!" said the miser, earnestly—so earnestly that Bishop felt constrained to pause and say:

"Well?"

"You are laboring under a great mistake. I am not indeed the man you take me for; but I assure you I know where he is, and if you will only listen to what I have to say, I will make a clean breast of all, and take you to where he is now awaiting my return."

"Cut along then," said Bishop, "and be quick!"

CHAPTER CMXCVII.

IN WHICH TOM KING GETS HIMSELF INTO SERIOUS TROUBLE.

"PATIENCE!" said the old man—"patience, and I will tell you. But I am old and I am frightened well-nigh out of my life."

"Well, go on, can't you?" interrupted Bishop, angrily. "Don't let us have so much of your palaver!"

"As I was journeying along the road, I was stopped by a man who, with many fearful oaths, despoiled me of my purse and threatened to deprive me of my life."

"Where was this?"

"A few hundred yards off, down the road."

Bishop ground his teeth savagely.

"But at last," resumed the old man, "he promised to return me all he had taken from me if I would only undertake to render him a service. I asked him what it was, and he told me merely to fetch this letter, which he stated I should find hidden under one of the stones on the parapet of the bridge."

"Well, what then?" asked Bishop, in a suspicious tone.

"I agreed, and you seized me."

"And what arrangement did you make about the delivery of this letter?"

[THE FOUR HIGHWAYMEN IN WAIT FOR THE PRISONERS' VAN.]

"I will tell you. The robber promised to remain seated on a milestone about half a mile hence, where I left him, until I came back. Then I was to give up the letter in exchange for the purse."

Having heard this much, Bishop for several moments gave himself up to deep reflection.

At last, in a wrathful voice, he said:

"Old man, I believe you to be neither more nor less than an infernal liar!"

"I'll swear I speak the truth!"

"I don't doubt but what you would swear to anything. Of one thing I am certain: If you are not actually one of the men I am so anxious to capture you are at least one of their accomplices. Don't deny it, for to prove you I will walk quietly down the road with you to the milestone you mention, and if there is no one there I shall haul you off to jail, you may depend upon that!"

The old man wrung his hands in despair

"I am lost and undone!" he said.

"Why—why? What is the matter now? Does your heart begin to fail you?"

"No—no! I will swear by all that is sacred I speak nothing but the truth!"

"Come on, then! Why do you object that your words should be proved?"

"Because," replied the miser, "he will beyond a doubt be on the look-out, and when he finds I am returning with some one in my company he will conclude at once that I have betrayed him, and be off!"

This struck Bishop as being a very reasonable remark, for in spite of all he had said to the contrary, he could not help thinking that the old miser was telling him the truth.

"Look here," he said, abruptly; "I will deprive you of even that excuse. I will go on the other side of the hedge and creep cautiously along under cover of it. Be will know nothing of my presence then. But if you attempt to escape! will put a stop to you by firing a bullet after you!"

"You have no occasion for such threats. It is not my intention to play you false."

"We shall soon see about that. Start on!"

"Yes, the sooner the better. The delay that has already taken place may make him suspicious."

Bishop just glanced at his pistols as he walked off the bridge.

Then forcing his way through a prickly hedge at the expense of his skin and clothing, he said:

"Ride on, old man, and beware how you attempt to play false with me."

The miser complied.

Tom King had been a witness of this scene with the most unbounded delight.

"Clever Mr. Bishop!" he said, as he emerged from his place of concealment. "You have overreached yourself this time and no mistake, and so have you, old man. Your covetousness will meet with its due reward, and I hope it will be the means of teaching you a lesson."

As the coast was now quite clear of his foes, Tom King, in the most leisurely manner possible, made his way to the spot where he had left his horse.

"I am much obliged to you, Mr. Bishop, for being so kind as to take yourself out of the way just at the time to suit me. I am very much obliged indeed!"

Tom found his horse in perfect safety.

He mounted and rode up on to the bridge.

By the time he reached it he could hear sounds of contention in the distance.

"They have failed to find me, I suppose. Well, here goes for something to bewilder them a little more, and after that I will be off!"

With these words, Tom King discharged two pistols in rapid succession.

The reports rang out clearly and sharply upon the still night air, and were doubtless heard far and wide

The explosion of the gunpowder produced a momentary illumination.

After that a double darkness seemed to reign.

Tom King's object was to puzzle the police officer and the miser, and there can be no doubt but that he fully succeeded.

Of course he did not wait to hear the result, but at once rode off towards London.

He did not for long continue in this direction, for the night was already far gone—so far that it became time for him to think about making his course towards the ruined castle.

Yet he felt unwilling to make his way back there exactly until he had tried his hand at another adventure.

But as he continued to ride on he found the roads were completely deserted.

"Confound it!" he exclaimed, as he pulled up at length at a spot where three roads diverged. "I wonder which will be the best way for me to take?"

He had nothing whatever to guide him in making his selection, and while he sat there debating, he was suddenly startled by a violent downpour of rain.

At first he could not make out what was the matter, the storm came on with so much suddenness.

The hard pelting of the hailstones, which were of unusual size, soon made him conscious that the pleasantest thing would be to seek out some place of shelter.

The question was, where would this be found?

He took the road before him at a venture, and soon discovered that his choice was a wise one, for directly he passed round a bend that was a few yards off he came in sight of a small public-house.

The sign that swung upon the post outside the door was creaking most dismally as the force of the wind compelled it to swing backwards and forwards with more than usual violence.

The exterior of the inn was completely dark, as though the inhabitants had long since retired to rest; but in despite of this, Tom King determined to make an effort to get shelter from the storm, the violence of which increased rather than abated.

"Hilloa — hilloa!" he shouted. "House — house! Hilloa!—house! Open—open!"

His words were echoed by a loud cry as if of execration, and immediately afterwards a man appeared, who seemed to spring up out of the darkness so quickly that it was impossible to say from whence he came.

Nor was he much less speedy in disappearing, for he dashed past Tom King and forced his way through the hedgerow on the opposite side of the way.

He was gone almost before Tom King was thoroughly cognisant of his presence.

But the highwayman noticed that as he fled some rather heavy objects appeared to fall upon the ground.

To attempt to pursue this man was perfectly useless; moreover, Tom had no particular motive to do so.

But he could not resist the temptation of springing off his horse and looking to see what the man had dropped in his hasty flight.

The first thing Tom's hand came in contact with as he groped along the ground was a bag, which by its feel evidently contained money.

Tom King weighed it in his hand, then complacently consigned it to his pocket.

A few steps further on he found another bag of similar appearance; and perhaps there might have been another still further on, but he did not stop to look, for just then doors and windows were suddenly thrown open, showing that the inhabitants of the inn were thoroughly aroused.

Tom King advanced, leading his horse by the bridle.

"I want shelter from this storm," he said. "Can I have it, and can you put my horse under cover until the fury of it is past?"

"Yes, sir—yes—yes—certainly!"

At this moment loud sounds as of a great disturbance taking place within came upon their ears.

"I rather think," said Tom King, "that you have been robbed, for just as I pulled up before the door a man ran away at full speed, breaking his way through the hedge yonder."

"Thieves—thieves!" cried a loud voice at this moment—"thieves—thieves! I have been robbed! Call the police! Thieves—thieves!"

In front of the inn there was a large old-fashioned, overhanging porch, upon the trellis-work of which there grew in summer time quite a profusion of leaves, and it was under this that Tom had stood while these few words passed between him and the landlord.

The porch was quite large enough to shelter his horse, so Tom, without more ado, secured the reins to a ring in the doorpost.

Upon hearing these words from Tom King, and upon hearing the alarming cries in the house, the landlord stood struck with consternation.

Lights could now be seen approaching, and directly afterwards a throng of excited persons appeared in the entrance-passage of the inn.

Foremost was a tall, thin, wiry man, attired in a very singular-looking dressing-gown.

He sprang forward and clutched the landlord by the throat.

"Wretch—rascal! Do you hear what I say? But this is all your work! I might have guessed it when you showed yourself so anxious that I should stay here all night. You preached well about the dangers of the road but you said nothing about the dangers of this d—nable inn, curse you!"

"I protest," said the landlord, speaking with some difficulty, for the traveller's clutch upon his throat was a very tight one—"I protest I am quite innocent in the matter!"

"D—n you, yes—of course you are!"

"I am sure I am; and if you ask this gentleman he will tell you all—that just when he rode up he saw a man ride away."

"Yes, yes—it's all very well managed indeed! But let me tell you I can see a hole through a ladder before anyone knocks a round out. This is part of your plan Gentleman, forsooth!—more likely the robber!"

"You are heated," said Tom King, "and I excuse you for you are speaking quite at random. What I tell you is no more than the truth."

"Of course not—I know all about that, very well. Let me tell you I've seen a thing or two, and you won't impose upon me very easily."

"If you want to find the man who robbed you, just push through that gap in yonder hedge—that is the way he took."

"Wouldn't you like it? A light—a light! D—n it all, won't you give me a light? I will just have a look at this fly-by-night's face! What respectable traveller would be abroad at this hour? I may recognise him, for aught I know."

Upon hearing this, Tom King, as may be expected, felt anything but comfortable.

He wished to escape observation as much as possible, but, if the traveller did not happen to recognise him, perhaps when the light of a candle fell full upon his features some of the others would.

It was a very serious risk indeed, and Tom glanced around him without seeing any means by which he could avoid it.

During this conversation, he had been gradually surrounded and hemmed in by the various inmates of the inn, and to such an extent did they now press upon him that he could not possibly beat a rapid retreat.

A candle was quickly thrust into the traveller's hand.

He held it in such a manner that its rays fell full upon Tom's features.

"Ha!" he yelled, in a furious voice. "This is just what I expected! Now, then, to prove whether you are good men and true, or whether you are all rascally accomplices of this execrable wretch! Assist me to take him prisoner!" he cried, as he sprang at Tom, and fastened on his throat like a tiger.

"But who is it? What has he done?" cried all, in chorus.

"Done?—what hasn't he done? Why, he has robbed me to-night, and many another before me! But his time is up! This is Tom King, the highwayman! I will swear to it! I say again, this is Tom King the highwayman!"

CHAPTER CMXCVIII.

RELATES TOM KING'S ADVENTURES WITH THE TRAVELLER AT THE INN.

In anticipating the worst, Tom King had hardly thought that the stranger would have recognised him so readily, therefore our old friend was taken somewhat by surprise.

The feeling passed away so quickly, however, that not one of those who were present could have told that it had existence.

The people in the inn crowded closer and closer.

Tom's first act was to free himself from the stranger's grasp, a feat which apparently he performed with the greatest ease.

"Your loss has turned your brain, sir," he said, in a cold and haughty tone of voice, "and you may think yourself fortunate that I have not as sudden and hasty a temper as yourself, otherwise——"

Tom did not trouble himself to finish the sentence—the significant look with which he accompanied the words rendering it quite unnecessary.

All traces of his early life and training had not become extinct in Tom King. In spite of his continual attempts to disguise his nature, there were times when the true gentlemanly bearing would peep forth and show itself.

The present was one of them.

His manner caused the traveller for a moment to recoil, wondering whether he was a victim to a complete delusion of the senses.

But he quickly recovered himself, and, with a passionate exclamation, sprang forward again.

But this time Tom King was prepared for him, and stopped him.

"Keep your hands off!" he roared—"keep your hands off, or I shall lose all control over my temper!"

The stranger was awed.

Nevertheless, he cried out:

"I declare this is Tom King, the highwayman! I declare he has robbed me! If his pockets were searched, you would find my money upon him!"

This was true enough, and it seemed to be quite a problem how Tom would get out of his awkward position.

But Tom, with his ready mind, had thoroughly comprehended his situation, and, what was more, had resolved what to do.

"It is generally a hopeless task to attempt to reason with a man in your condition, but, if you like to step with me into any of these adjoining rooms, I will quickly give you a proof that you never made a greater mistake in all your life"

"Why not give the proof now?"

"Simply because I do not choose to do so, and, if you hesitate a moment longer, I shall refuse to satisfy you at all—mark that!"

Tom King's cool, collected, haughty bearing produced an immense effect upon the stranger.

Although it seemed against his inclination, he could not resist compliance.

Pushing open the door nearest to him, he strode into the chamber beyond.

Tom followed.

"Close the door," he said, as he entered, "and lock it as well."

"What for?"

"In order to guard against interruption; and, if you are still demented enough to persist in your belief, it will be a means of preventing my escape."

Whichever of these reasons it happened to be which weighed with the stranger does not matter; but he obeyed Tom's order, closing and locking the door.

Then, turning round, he said:

"Now, sir, as I have complied with all your demands, let me request you to be quick."

Tom King approached very closely.

Strangely enough, the traveller's suspicions were not at all excited.

But with the suddenness of lightning, Tom seized the stranger by the throat, at the same time that he thrust a pistol roughly into his mouth.

"A word," he murmured—"a syllable above a whisper, and your brains will be scattered round this room!"

The stranger turned pale, and was silent.

Much of his excitement had abated.

"Make no mistake," said Tom King—"I am indeed what you declared me to be; and your position just at the present moment is one of great danger, though perhaps you may not realise it. If you know anything of me, you will be certain that I shall be as good as my word in this affair."

Evidently the stranger thought so, for he neither offered to speak nor to make the slightest movement.

The knowledge that the muzzle of a cocked pistol was between his teeth, and that its trigger was encircled by Tom's finger overawed him.

"You might have known that single-handed you could be no match for me. You do not take into account that when a man is fighting for his life he would do that from which all others not so circumstanced would naturally shrink. I could have escaped without this trouble, but I did not want a hue and cry at my heels—do you understand?"

The traveller nodded, to show that he thoroughly comprehended.

"Then," said Tom King, "you will have to submit to be bound and gagged. When I know you are safe I shall take my departure from the inn. You will not suffer the inconvenience long—the people here will soon peep in upon you."

"But my money?" the traveller managed to summon up courage enough to mutter.

"I tell you the truth concerning it," replied Tom King, "and you may believe me or not, just as you like: I am quite indifferent upon the point. Once more I repeat that when I rode up to the front door a man hastily started up and ran away; I have not the least doubt that he was the robber."

"Then have pity upon me," said the traveller, in a husky voice, "for I assure you I am a worthy object of commiseration. The money and valuables I have lost represent a very large sum indeed. Had the amount been my own, I could have borne my loss with more patience; but, unfortunately, I only held it in trust for another In fact, sir, as you have kindly taken away the pistol, I assure you that I am neither more nor less than a commercial traveller, and the goods I carry with me consist of watches, rings, and other such articles—very valuable, and all lying in a small space. To-night, at this accursed inn, I have lost all. I question whether I shall ever recover a fraction."

Tom was silent. He was interested in what the traveller was stating; but he kept a sharp eye upon him, and waited to hear more.

"My master," continued the commercial traveller, "is a Jew, and as I don't happen to be of his religion he will have no mercy upon me. I am a ruined man; and when I make known my loss, what will become of my poor wife and children I know not. And yet, in what way am I to blame, except that the violence of the weather—which I ought to have disregarded—made me comply with the urgent solicitations of the landlord to remain all night at this place."

"I do not see that you are to blame," replied Tom King, for the great distress which the traveller manifested touched him to the heart.

But his words produced no consoling effect.

"Go," said the traveller—"go! I will do nothing to hinder your departure—I will not say one syllable. I will take your word that you have had no hand in robbing me of what I have lost."

He sank down upon a seat while he spoke, and bowing down his head, covered his face with his hands.

Tom King moved slowly towards the door; but when within a few paces of it he paused, and stood irresolute.

The traveller appeared to be unconscious of everything.

Tom King did not feel quite at his ease, and while he continued to gaze upon the sorrowing form he felt less and less so.

The traveller had acquitted him of all share in the robbery; but this was wrong, and Tom felt it to be so.

Then a struggle began in his breast.

Should he give up the two bags of money he had picked up? Surely that would be better than taking them away.

Thinking so, Tom King turned round with the intention of restoring them; but all at once he thought how strange it would be for them to be found in his possession, for the stranger had stated his disbelief that Tom had had any hand in the robbery, and our friend had not denied it.

Quickly he thought of a means by which he could relieve himself of his embarrassment.

Taking from his pocket the money he had obtained from the miser, he exclaimed:

"Look, sir—to show you there is such a thing sometimes as good returned for evil, I give you this money. Take it, and never mind troubling yourself to utter thanks; you are heartily welcome. Not a word! I am off."

The traveller took with trembling hands the wealth that was so unexpectedly offered him.

But he was not going to allow Tom to depart so easily.

Springing up, he caught him by the hands, and in a broken voice, poured out his thanks.

So firm was his grasp that Tom felt himself unable to shake it off without doing so roughly.

At length the traveller, completely overcome by what had taken place, burst into tears.

Tom took this opportunity to break away from him.

But ere he left the room he exclaimed:

"I have good reason to think the robber was disturbed, and that in his hasty flight he dropped some portion of his booty, which he did not dare stop to pick up. He broke through the gap in the hedge yonder, so you will have no difficulty in getting upon his track."

With these last words, Tom King passed hastily through the doorway

Just outside he encountered the landlord and the other inmates of the inn, who doubtless had been eager listeners to what few chance words happened to fall upon their ears.

They regarded Tom King distrustfully.

But the highwayman took not the least notice of this, apparently but said, with admirable coolness:

"The storm is well over now, I think. Good night, gentlemen. I think if you go in yonder room you will find that I have succeeded in satisfying the gentleman that he was laboring under a most extraordinary delusion.

There was a general move in the direction of the room the traveller occupied.

Tom took advantage of it.

Passing out quickly, he sprang into the saddle, and rode rapidly away.

The storm was indeed fairly over, but a soft and gentle summer rain was falling.

This Tom paid no attention to—in fact, he found the cool sprinkling drops rather agreeable than otherwise.

He was not in the mood for any further adventures that night, so turned his horse's head at once in the direction of the ruins.

Fortunate it was that he did do so, for although he made quite as much speed as he well could without distressing his horse, daylight was very close at hand indeed when he arrived.

He found Dick Turpin waiting for him at the usual spot amid the ruins, and quickly learned that the captain had yielded to Maud's persuasions, and had remained there all the night.

Dick was very anxious about the letter.

"Did you get it?" he asked.

"I did not. But yet I was made acquainted with the contents; but the circumstances were so very strange that I will relate them to you at full length."

"Satisfy me first," said Dick, "what time they start."

"At nine o'clock."

"In the morning?"

"I suppose so."

"And the day?"

"The twenty-first."

"Two days hence," said Turpin, musingly. "That will give us time to mature all our plans and make every preparation. There is only one thing that I am afraid of."

"What is that, captain?"

"Why, starting at so early an hour in the morning, I am afraid they will reach their destination by daylight, in which case the difficulties of our task would be increased tenfold."

"Yet they must be overcome."

"Yes, as you say, they must be overcome; and, between now and the time mentioned, we shall have ample opportunities for consideration."

"We shall. But where are Claude and Jack?"

"Not returned."

"Not returned?"

"No—I have seen nothing of them since they left last night—or, rather, the night before last, for it is fairly morning now."

"It is. I sadly fear——"

"That something serious has happened to them?"

"I do indeed."

"That, also, is my fear. Still, a little time must elapse between now and daylight. Let us hope that they will return."

Tom did not say a word in reply, for his mind was full of uneasiness on account of his absent comrades.

He shifted his position to a place where he was able to obtain a more extensive view of the way by which they would be likely to approach, and looked out anxiously.

But he was unable to see anything of them.

Dick placed himself by his old companion's side, and immediately afterwards they were joined by Maud.

She needed only to give one glance at their countenances to see that their minds were greatly troubled.

"What is it?" she asked—"oh, what is it?"

Her tones were filled with alarm.

"Nothing—nothing serious—that is, at present."

"But tell me!"

"It is a dread."

"Caused by the long-continued absence of Claude and Jack?"

"Yes, Maud, that is it. When they did not return yesterday morning I thought but little of it, believing that they had got too far away to be able to return without the risk of being seen. But if that supposition had been correct, they would have been here soon after midnight."

"Yes, that was the arrangement," said Tom King.

"Then," exclaimed Maud, in much anxiety, "you justly dread that some serious accident has befallen them?"

Dick was silent, but Tom King said:

"Certainly, our uneasiness ought to abate when we think how well competent both are to take care of themselves, and how often they have got themselves out of difficult situations."

But Dick Turpin appeared to derive but little consolation from this reflection.

As minute after minute passed away, the gloom upon Dick Turpin's countenance settled and deepened while Maud's features soon became the reflex of his own

And thus they stood and watched for the coming of the absent ones, and while thus engaged and a prey to all manner of anxious doubts and fears, we will go back and endeavor to explain the mystery of their long absence.

It will be recollected that Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack both set off together with no other object before them than that of obtaining an additional amount of money to be placed along with that they had already in their possession.

The purpose for which this money was destined we need scarcely inform the reader was to enable Tom Davis and his relations to quit England, and find them in such means as would enable them to live in tolerable comfort and independence abroad.

Whether the highwaymen were ever destined to acnieve this important purpose time alone can show, but, as we have said, we will in the meantime follow the fortunes of Sixteen-String Jack and Claude Duval, on whose behalf it is hoped the reader feels the same amount of anxiousness as their companions in the ruins.

CHAPTER CMXCIX.

IN WHICH CLAUDE DUVAL AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK SEEK FRESH GROUND FOR THEIR ADVENTURES.

We go back, then, to the time when they took their departure.

For some considerable period, the highwaymen rode onward without pausing. This was for a double reason. They did not wish to make an attack too near their present abiding-place, and, what was still more cogent, they did not meet with anyone, so they were not assailed by temptation.

"The roads seem empty enough to-night, Claude," said Sixteen-String Jack—"at present by no means promising for our expedition."

"You are right," was the reply. "Do you know what I have just been thinking?"

"No."

"Well, then, I will tell you. It is that for once in a way we quit the highway and try our fortune in some of the by-lanes, or cross-country roads."

"But why?"

"Because it is so generally known how much the high-roads are, and therefore I fancy people are in the habit of making their way from place to place by other routes, less frequented in a general way, and therefore by them considered as safer."

Sixteen-String Jack reined-in his steed as he said:

"Claude, my friend, there is a very great deal of truth in what you say, depend upon it; I wonder we have not thought of that before."

"Well, it is all in good time."

"So it is."

"Are you agreed, then, that we shall turn down the next narrow turning we come to?"

"Yes—quite."

"Forward, then."

At a more gentle rate of speed than before, Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack took their way along the high-road.

Ere they had gone far, they came upon the entrance of one of those picturesque, leafy lanes that form so characteristic a feature in English scenery.

So densely overgrown was it that had the highwaymen been journeying along more rapidly they would in all probability have passed it unperceived.

"Here we are, then," said Claude, changing the direction of his horse's head.

Sixteen-String Jack followed his example.

It was intensely dark; but after going about thirty yards, the trees on each side by no means grew so thickly, so that it was much lighter in consequence.

They pushed on for nearly a mile at a tolerable speed, then they paused, in order to allow their horses to ascend a hill.

It was not that this hill was so very steep, but the ground underfoot was very miry, and as the soil was of a clayey character it clung almost as heavily to the horses' hoofs as new-ploughed land would have done.

"There is one thing about these lanes, Claude," said Jack, "if their condition in a general way is at all like this, they must be very unpleasant to travel over."

"You are right there; but people afraid of losing their purses would consider it of minor importance, I expect."

Just then the summit of the hill was reached, and at the same moment Sixteen-String Jack, with a slight exclamation, drew his horse close to one side of the lane, in order to be shadowed by the hedgerows.

"There is some vehicle below us, Claude, toiling up the hill. Draw aside, or we shall be seen"

Claude lost not a second in complying with this hastily-uttered injunction, and from the secure position he occupied, proceeded to reconnoitre.

He quickly made out the character of the approaching vehicle.

"Why, as I live, Jack, it is nothing more than a clumsy old waggon! Push on once more. The driver in all probability is fast asleep, and therefore will not heed us."

"Gently!" said Jack. "Do you know in all probability we shall find a booty in that waggon well worth our taking?"

"What makes you think so?"

"You must be aware that there are many who, whenever they can, adopt such a conveyance as this in preference to the stage-coach, because it costs much less money, and, by the rule you have just been mentioning, people travelling with valuable property may be riding in this waggon, being under the impression that by so doing they were running a much better chance of security."

"That is, if this waggon should happen to be empty."

"Of course; and as there will be little trouble to ascertain, I propose that we ride on."

"Why not wait till the waggon reaches the top of the hill?"

"We can stop it more easily where it is. Come on!"

No second bidding was needed, and so, at a smart trot, the highwaymen made the descent of the hill.

Reaching the waggon, Claude Duval cried, in a stentorian tone:

"Stop! Confound you, stop! Are you asleep that you can't see the toll-gate? Stop, I say—I want the toll!"

The driver was really asleep when Claude spoke. He knew from experience that his horses were well enough acquainted with the road to make their way to their destination by their own instinct.

But Claude's words bothered the driver completely.

Although he had been awakened so suddenly, yet he seemed to know just whereabouts he was, therefore he gazed about him with the most perfect bewilderment.

"Toll-gaate?" he drawled, in a strong provincial dialect. "There's ne'er a toll-gaate here, mun, nor never was. Get out—you're drunk! Come up, captain!"

The last words were addressed to the leading horse, who beyond shaking his ears lazily made no movement.

"Come," said Claude, "let us have no more nonsense. There's a toll-gate on this or any other road whenever we feel inclined to set one up. Keep still and quiet as you value your life."

"Highwaymen by Gom!" ejaculated the waggoner.

"Yes, depend upon that."

A chorus of screams came at this moment from the interior of the vehicle, at once letting our friends know that it carried a living freight.

"Take care of the front, Jack, and just let me have the pleasure of looking after those inside."

Sixteen-String Jack complied without any hesitation, and Claude Duval rode direct to the back part of the waggon.

As usual, the interior of the vehicle was concealed from view by means of two huge canvas flaps, but Claude very quickly drew these on one side.

The interior of the waggon was then dimly revealed to him—the illumination, such as it was, proceeding from a small oil lamp that was flickering as though at the point of extinction at the upper end of the waggon.

At the first glance Claude Duval saw that the vehicle contained several persons of both sexes.

But it would appear that he was even more distinctly beheld by the occupants of the waggon, for immediately upon his appearance there arose a general cry of dismay, while one fearfully stout old lady went right off into a faint at once, falling rather heavily upon the person who sat next to her.

As soon as ever he had a chance of making himself heard, Claude Duval spoke.

Taking off his hat and making a very deep and respectful bow, he said:

"Ladies and gentlemen, I beg you will not be under the least alarm: there is not the slightest occasion for it—that is, unless you wilfully bring danger upon yourselves, and I hope you have all too much sense to think of doing that."

"Since you are so d—nably polite," said a voice at the further end of the waggon, "perhaps you will be kind enough to inform us why we are thus stopped and hindered in our journey?"

"I have no objection whatever," replied Claude. "In fact, that was just what I was about to inform you when you spoke."

"What is it, then?"

"To levy a contribution upon you—not for any charitable purpose, mind—so please be generous. You will comprehend the facts of the case immediately when I inform you that this is a portion of my dominions, and it is always a custom for persons passing to pay tribute. That is my business on the present occasion, ladies and gentlemen, and I hope you will not delay me any longer than you can help."

Claude said all this in such a calm, matter-of-fact manner, that the people in the waggon looked at each other in perfect bewilderment.

"It's a d—d odd thing," said the voice which had previously spoken, "but I have travelled this way for many a year and never before heard of anything of the sort!"

"That may be," said Claude. "But as you are doubtless anxious to resume your journey, and as I am not desirous of losing any more time, I should be glad if you would at once begin to make a display of your liberality. Here, take my hat and pass it round—it will serve admirably well to receive donations."

But the person to whom he offered the hat refused to take it.

"Confound it, ma'am!" cried the individual upon whom a fainting female had chanced to fall, and who had been making frantic but unavailing efforts to restore her to consciousness. "Confound it, ma'am, wake up! You lie on a fellow just like a ton weight!"

There was a general laugh at this.

Claude Duval even joined in the merriment.

The incident was a most ludicrous one; the female was truly of Herculean dimensions, while the unhappy wight upon whom she had fallen was one of those little men who cannot be better or more forcibly described than by the word insignificant.

But his words were paid no attention to by his burden.

He strove at first to lift her up, but he might just as well have tried to lift up a house.

Then he endeavored to wriggle himself from underneath her, but in this second attempt he succeeded no better than in the first, so, with a sigh of despair, he was obliged to resign himself to his situation, being about as helpless as a worm under a stone.

"It seems to me," said another person who had not as yet spoken—"it seems to me that all this foolery means neither more nor less than highway robbery."

Claude assented by a bow and a smile

"Highway robbery!" cried a shrill female voice. "Highway robbery! Do you hear that, Captain Septimus Smith, or have you turned deaf all of a sudden?"

"I hear it plain enough, ma'am—a d—d deal too plain!" said the first speaker, who, as it would appear, rejoiced in the name and title of Captain Septimus Smith.

"Then in that case, sir," said the lady, addressing him with still greater asperity of tone—"in that case, why don't you give us the opportunity of witnessing a little of your prowess? You were telling us all a little while ago what you should do in such a case as this. Why don't you blow the robber's brains out at once? I would pretty quick, if I only happened to be a man!"

"I wish you were, with all my heart!"

"Do you, you abominable wretch? But I'll be even with you, you contemptible, not-worth-looking-at scum of the earth! I'll be even with you, depend upon it! The idea of such a creature as you being a captain! Faugh! it's enough to make anyone sick!"

"Really, ladies and gentlemen," cried Claude Duval, in a deprecating tone of voice, "I am extremely sorry to interrupt your agreeable conversation, but the facts of the case are just as I have laid them before you. Once more I present my hat. Make it heavy enough to satisfy me, and you can depart in safety; until then you will remain where you are. I don't wish to threaten, but still if you persist in giving me trouble, I shall take the wheels off the waggon and leave you to perform the rest of your journey on foot. You won't like that, for perhaps I need not tell you this is a very lonely part of the country, and you will have to go a great distance before you either meet with a human habitation or any other means of conveyance."

"Come—come, all of you," said the little man with the fainting lady, and speaking with difficulty in consequence of the great weight upon his internal combinations, "why don't you contribute a little each, and let the gentleman ride away?"

"That is a very sensible speech indeed'" said Claude Duval, approvingly.

"Perhaps, my little Jacky," said the person who sat opposite to him, "you will be kind enough to set us the example."

This undignified epithet threw the little fellow into an ungovernable fury, but he managed to reply:

"How the devil do you think I am going to get to my pockets with this great porpus atop of me? I'll be d—d if she doesn't grow heavier every minute!"

Upon this the huge female uttered a scream.

"Oh, you have woke up at last, have you, ma'am? I'm glad to hear it! Just put out your strength a little, and then, perhaps, you will be able to raise yourself up, with my assistance."

"Your assistance, you miserable little dandiprat—your assistance? I wonder what good that would be? Talk of strength—why, you could not crack a flea, you contemptible, under-sized mortal!"

This scene in the waggon amused Claude mightily, and there is no knowing how long he might have felt disposed to remain as a witness of it had he not been aroused by the sound of Sixteen-String Jack's voice calling out to him in very impatient tones.

"Hark—hark!" exclaimed Claude. "Do you hear, ladies and gentlemen, my honorable companion is growing tired of being kept waiting so long. Be good enough to comply with my demands!"

"I'll be hanged," said a respectable-looking man, who sat at the tail-end of the waggon—"I'll be hanged if you are not about the coolest customer I ever met with or even heard of!"

"Yes, very likely—I always was. But excuse me—we must make a beginning, so, as you happen to sit nearest, be good enough to let me have your donation."

Although Claude Duval spoke in such a tone of banter, yet the person he addressed could tell that he was thoroughly in earnest, and he felt it would be unwise to tempt the highwayman too far.

Notwithstanding this conviction, he produced a purse, and flung it into Claude's hat with a very bad grace indeed.

"That is a capital commencement!" ejaculated the highwayman. "Pray hand it round to the next!"

This was done, and very slowly the hat made a complete circuit of the different people occupying the waggon.

At last it reached Claude.

He took hold of it with a very dissatisfied air, for, looking in, he saw that it contained very little indeed beyond the purse which had been first of all placed into it.

"Upon my word," he said, "this is what I call too bad—by far too bad! As there are so many young and charming ladies present"—here Claude made a bow and gave a glance which comprehended all of them—"I can not bring myself to utter any threats or resort to any violent measures; but, unless I am treated better I cannot say what I may be tempted to do!"

"Oh, you paltry villains!" cried the lady with the shrill voice. "How I wish I was a man, that I might give you an example of what a man's conduct ought to be in an affair like this! You mean-spirited wretches, either give up what you have and let us go on our way in quiet, or else stand up for your own, and fight it out like men!"

This martial address was, however, provocative of little effect.

Either the male travellers were sadly deficient in courage, or else they felt that they did not carry about with them enough of this world's wealth to make it worth their while to run any great risk in order to retain it.

"Very good!" responded Claude, in a deep voice, after a brief pause had taken place. "The lady speaks well. Just be good enough to let me know whether you intend to deliver up quietly what you have, or whether you intend to fight it out—I shall know then what to do."

CHAPTER M.

CONTINUES TO FOLLOW IN THE FOOTSTEPS OF CLAUDE DUVAL AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK.

THE travellers quickly came to a decision.

The hat was once more passed round.

By this time Claude's eyes had become much more familiar with the dim light which pervaded the interior of the waggon.

At first the obscurity was so great that he could scarcely distinguish the outlines of the people.

Now he could see them quite plainly, and, moreover, was able to make out all that they did.

The contributions cast into the hat were now of a much more valuable nature than before.

Every time a fresh object was dropped in, Claude nodded his head approvingly.

Presently the hat was placed in the hands of one who immediately attracted Claude's notice.

This was a young girl, upon whose thin and pallid features the marks of premature old age could be descried.

She was attired in deep black, which made the ghastliness of her countenance seem more apparent.

By the peculiar cap she wore, she was proclaimed a widow.

She gazed at the hat for a moment, as Claude thought, with tearful eyes; then, with an audible sigh, she produced from a little reticule she carried a small bead purse.

There was another moment of hesitation—another deep sigh, and the little purse was dropped into the hat, which was passed on to the next passenger.

When it again reached Claude's hands, he found the weight very much increased—indeed, the booty was quite as much as he could have hoped to obtain from such a source.

To be sure, if he had searched the travellers one by one the booty would have been increased, but then Claude Duval infinitely preferred his present mode of managing the affair.

Emptying all the valuables into his capacious pockets, he made another bow, and said:

"Ladies and gentlemen, I have the honor and the pleasure of wishing you a very good-night."

"Hark ye!" said the man who sat nearest to Claude. "You have carried things off with a very high hand, and doubtless you are mightily satisfied with what you have done; but let me tell you I have in the meantime had a very good look at your face all this time. Your features are so imprinted upon my memory that I shall never forget them, and no matter when or where I see you again, I shall know you. And what is more, should you ever be captured, as no doubt you will be, I will make my way to the court and swear this little job on to you, which will be quite sufficient to insure you a hempen collar at Tyburn."

"Thank you!" said Claude, quite calmly, though inwardly he could not help feeling a good deal of annoyance—"I am much obliged to you for your candor, and when I am captured, I hope to have the pleasure of seeing you again. Once more, good-night, ladies and gentlemen!"

The last words particularly were pronounced with a most unruffled demeanor.

At the same moment, he turned his horse's head and rode away.

Perceiving this movement, Sixteen-String Jack discontinued the guard he had been keeping over the waggoner.

"Drive on," he said, "and be quick!"

The waggoner smacked his whip; but before his heavy team had fairly got the cumbersome vehicle in motion again, the two highwaymen were a long way off down the lane.

"I'll be hanged, Claude," exclaimed Sixteen-String Jack, "if I did not think you never meant to bring that adventure to a conclusion! What on earth were you about to be so long? I shall expect to see a capital booty."

"You will have little to grumble at on that score, my friend. But the incident altogether was such a comical one, owing to the number of odd people who rode in the waggon, that I could not forbear lingering over it."

"I heard a great deal that passed, and could not help laughing heartily myself."

"You ought to have seen as well as heard," replied Claude, laughing at the bare recollection; but suddenly the sounds of merriment died out, and his countenance assumed an unusually grave appearance.

At the same time, very much to the surprise of his comrade, he reined-in his steed.

Sixteen-String Jack of course did likewise.

Then, in a voice the tones of which well expressed his wonder, he exclaimed:

"What on earth is it, Claude—what is the matter?"

"I did not tell you, Jack," was the slow reply—"I did not tell you there was one seated in the waggon with the rest, whose years were little more than those of girlhood, who was attired in widow's weeds. Her face was pale and deeply marked with careworn lines."

"Well," said Jack, interrupting him and speaking somewhat impatiently, "what of her?"

"Why," said Claude, huskily, for the saddened face rose up vividly in his mind, "she seemed half dead with fright; and when the hat was handed to her she dropped a little bead purse into it, and as she did so she gave a heavy sigh. I do believe, Jack, that was all the wealth that she possessed."

"Why did you take it?"

"I know not; but now I bitterly reproach myself for having done so. Poor thing! I'll warrant she has had trouble enough already, without any of my causing."

"Never mind, Claude. Come on—it is past and done for."

"No, no, Jack, I feel that I cannot come on."

"Not come on?"

"No. Although I have taken the poor widow's all, it is not too late to make restitution."

"Restitution?" repeated Jack. "Do not think of anything so foolish."

"Foolish or not, I mean to take back her little purse."

"Think of the risk! We got off safely, but by this time perhaps——"

"Jack, it is quite in vain for you to urge any such considerations; I cannot—will not listen to them. Risk or no risk, that purse shall be returned."

He thrust his hand into his pocket while he spoke.

"Think again!"

"Never, for fear I might change the resolution I have come to, and which I feel to be a right one. If you do not like to accompany me in my return you need not. Stay where you are until I return."

"Nay, Claude, I can tell now that you are offended."

"No, but if you do not like to come——"

"Where you go I go too; if I did not, I should be unworthy of your comradeship."

"That sounds more like yourself, Jack. Come on!"

As he pronounced these last words Claude Duval turned his horse's head in the opposite direction and rode swiftly after the waggon.

At the rate he went, it was clear he would not be long in overtaking it.

On the way no further words were exchanged, although Sixteen-String Jack kept breast to breast with him.

Although he could not but condemn Claude's act as being a most imprudent one, yet Jack could not withhold his admiration of the motives which had prompted his friend to act in this manner.

In a short time the waggon appeared in sight creeping on its tedious way like some huge black snake.

"Hold!" cried Claude, at the top of his voice. "Hold, I say!"

But as the sound came from the rear, all the waggoner did was to whip his horses, for he feared nothing else than another attack, out of which he might not chance to come so well as out of the last.

This was a circumstance that signified little, for Claude was soon able to overtake the slow-moving vehicle.

But even as he reached the back, some horsemen suddenly reined-up in front, and in a loud voice called upon the waggoner to stop.

"Officers, by all that's unlucky!" ejaculated Sixteen-String Jack, who at once perceived who the new-comers were.

"Impossible!"

"It is true, Claude. Fly—fly at once. That is the only chance you have of saving yourself! Fly—fly!"

"Never—at least, not until I have performed my errand!"

These proceedings occasioned a vast amount of commotion inside the waggon, the inmates of which, filled with an insatiable curiosity, drew aside the back flaps just as Claude reined-in his panting horse.

This was fortunate, as it prevented a delay, the consequences of which might have been most serious for him.

Claude knew just where the young widow was seated, so, leaning slightly forward in the saddle, he tossed the purse into her lap.

"Take it!" he cried—"take it, and keep it, and remember that it is possible for a highwayman to have as much feeling as anyone."

At the same moment, Claude drew back, or, rather, attempted to do so, for all at once he experienced a sudden check upon his movements.

The traveller seated next the end, and who had announced his intention of appearing against Claude should he ever have the opportunity of doing so, seized him by the arm with a tenacious grasp.

"Help, ho!" he cried—"help, ho! Assist me, all of you! The officers are at hand, and if we can only keep him a moment or so all will be well!"

"Fool!" said Claude Duval, as, by an exertion of the immense strength he possessed, he shook off the traveller's detaining hold. "You will tempt me too far!"

But just as he spoke Claude gave his horse the reins, and pressed him sharply on the flanks with the spur.

The animal obeyed the impulse bravely.

With one bound it cleared the low hedgerow, and afterwards flew at a tremendous rate across the long stretch of meadow land that lay before it.

Sixteen-String Jack, as the reader may make sure, was not very far behind his old ally.

It must be understood, however, that the officers, when they rode up to the waggon and hailed the driver, never suspected for an instant that those they sought were so near.

Their object in speaking to the waggoner at all was merely in order to ask him whether he had chanced to notice on the road any such persons as they required.

The bulky waggon hid the highwaymen from their view, while the clatter of their own horses' feet effectually drowned those of our two friends.

But the loud cries coming from the interior of the vehicle soon made them aware of what was amiss, though at first they were unable to credit that the highwaymen, bold as they knew them to be, could actually have the audacity to plunder the passengers in the waggon while they were by, and this, of course, not knowing the facts of the case, was just what they thought.

With a loud hue and cry, the officers set off across the fields in pursuit of their prey.

The highwaymen were fairly in sight, and their gratification was extreme accordingly.

They had come out purposely with the hope of meeting with their prey, and this success so far was much more than they had ventured to look for.

Their horses were fresh, and of the best quality they could procure.

The riders themselves were bold and determined.

Under these circumstances, despite the number of their failures, they not unreasonably hoped on the present occasion to bring the chase to a successful termination.

As for the highwaymen, their danger had been so imminent and so great that, by comparison, they were now at ease.

But Sixteen-String Jack, happening soon to look back over his shoulder, perceived with what vigor their pursuers were pushing on after them.

"You must push on, Claude," he cried, "we have been taking matters too easily! Look behind you and see how close they are."

Claude did so, and immediately increased his speed.

"What course shall you adopt to shake them off?" asked Jack, riding as close to his companion as he was able. "Have you made up your mind? It will never do for us to have them dangling at our heels all night."

"I am inclined for making one good hard push—a sudden effort. So far as I can tell, that seems to me the most likely means of shaking them off."

"It does indeed."

"Are you agreed?"

"Yes, quite."

"Then make what effort you are able."

Now the police officers had indulged themselves in the flattering but fallacious hope that the horses ridden by the highwaymen were weary.

What words, then, would suffice to paint their chagrin when they, all at once, noticed their prey start off at almost a double rate.

Already the officers had been urging their horses to the utmost of their capacity, so that the manner in which the two highwaymen shot ahead seemed alarming indeed.

The one in command of the officers could not help feeling this, and he could tell that the same might be said of his companions, for the expression of their countenances spoke plainly enough.

Wishing to encourage them as much as possible, he assumed a cheerfulness of manner that he was far from feeling as he said:

"Come, come, my lads, don't be downcast at such a trifle as this. It is only a spurt, and will soon be over, leaving their horses more exhausted than before. You have only to keep steadily on their track, and we shall have them in the long run."

If the police had not failed so very, very often, it is probable that this speech would not have been made without good effect.

As it was, the officers would not allow themselves to be much animated by it, and no wonder, for they saw the distance between them and the highwaymen was rapidly and surely increasing.

Claude and Jack certainly did push their steeds unmercifully; but they did so, believing that it would turn out the best in the long run.

The event proved that they were right.

It was shortly afterwards that Claude, looking behind him, exclaimed:

"Look back, Jack! Your eyes are much better than mine if they can descry them now!"

"They are out of sight, surely enough; but it will not be for long—we shall soon lose what ground we have gained."

"I know that, but while they are out of our sight we can make up our minds what step to take next."

"What do you think?"

"Why, to hide will be best."

"We have no other resource. But where?"

"That is just the question. It won't do to push our horses much further at this rate; if we do, we shall knock the poor beasts up completely."

"We shall indeed."

Claude Duval took a good look around him.

"For my part," he said, at length, in a deliberate tone of voice, "I don't believe we can do better than get under cover of yonder trees. They are close at hand, and seem to form a portion of a wood of very considerable extent."

"But we must get within their shelter unseen."

"That will be easily managed if we are speedy, and if even they do suspect us of having entered the wood, it will be just like looking for a needle in a bottle of hay for them to attempt to find us."

"So it would—so it would. Push on, a couple of minutes' gallop will take us fairly under the trees."

[THE HIGHWAYMEN'S ATTACK ON THE PRISONERS' VAN.]

CHAPTER MI.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK AND CLAUDE DUVAL FOLLOW THE MYSTERIOUS LIGHT INTO THE RECESSES OF THE WOOD.

As soon as the two highwaymen fonnd themselves fairly past the border of the wood they pnlled up.

"Safe and sound so far, Jack," cried Claude Duval.

"Yes, undoubtedly."

"Then we ought to congratulate ourselves upon our good luck."

"Decidedly. But hark! How the wind has got up and how the darkness has increased all at once. What does it mean?"

During the excitement of the chase, the two highwaymen had failed to notice the changes which had gradually come over the face of nature.

The wind had increased from a stiff breeze to what might, with scarcely any exaggeration, be called a hurricane.

This had been accompanied with dense, heavy rain-clouds, which, by the immense force of the wind, were drifted furiously across the face of the heavens.

There is no doubt that had the wind lulled but a single second they would have poured down their contents upon the earth.

But the darkness grew greater and greater every moment as more and more clouds were drifted in from windward.

"What a gust that was!" exclaimed Claude Duval, as the wind rushed and roared with terrific violence among the tree-tops.

"A gust indeed! And how dark."

"Yes; if the officers find us now, I will admit that they possess far more cunning than I give them credit for."

No. 209. Price One Halfpenny.

No. 210 will be Published next Thursday.

"Nevertheless," answered Jack, "it would be best not to make too sure."

"Decidedly."

"Then let us penetrate still further into the wood. We shall not be so exposed to the storm which I feel sure is about to break out, and we shall not be in so much danger of being seen by our foes."

Claude turned round without a word, and led the way into the recesses of the wood with as much confidence as he would had they been thoroughly well known to him.

The space between the trees was narrow, so Jack had to follow at his heels.

At last, having as they believed gone far enough to answer their purpose, Claude said:

"We will tether our horses here for awhile, Jack. It is a quiet, retired spot, and it will take them some time to recover from their late exertion."

"And in the meantime we can shelter ourselves from the storm."

"Just so."

The wind still blew with great fury among the tree-tops, but no rain fell.

Suddenly Claude Duval gripped Sixteen-String Jack tightly by the arm as he said, in a low whisper, which the angry blast made almost inaudible:

"Look—look! What is the meaning of that? Do you see? Yonder—look—look! Surely they cannot have tracked us so quickly and so well!"

"What—what?" exclaimed Sixteen-String Jack, who was slightly taken by surprise—"oh, what is it?"

"There—there! Surely you see now?"

"That light?"

"Yes."

Sixteen-String Jack now observed that a faint light was at some distance glimmering through the trees.

He gazed at it attentively, and so did Claude.

To both the light appeared to flit about in a most extraordinary fashion.

At one moment its light would seem to be absolutely brilliant—then the next moment it almost died away.

"What do you make of it, Claude?" asked Jack, at length.

"I am unable to form any opinion. My first idea was that it proceeded from a lantern carried by some officer."

"No, no—I scarcely think it can be that."

"Nor I now."

"Then you confess yourself puzzled?"

"I do."

"I have only one idea about it, which is, that it must be some will-o'-the-wisp. You have heard of that, have you not?"

"Yes, and seen one; but this light seems altogether different."

"It is getting further and further away."

"It has that appearance."

"I am sure of it."

"Shall we follow it?"

"If you like—we have nothing else better to occupy our time just at the present moment, and I look upon it as in some sort our duty to look closely into everything we cannot understand."

"Decidedly."

"Come on, then."

"Yes—but be silent. There is no fear that we shall be overheard, still it is always wisest to remember to be cautious."

With these words the highwaymen crept forward with stealthy steps.

In good truth this seemed like a superfluous amount of caution, for the wind was, if possible, blowing with greater violence than before, and the noise that it created among the tree tops was sufficient to drown completely every other sound.

Sixteen-String Jack happened to be first as they stood, and so he led the way, his comrade keeping close upon his heels, for the way between the trees was not wide enough to allow two to pass.

The mysterious light—for it had good claims to this designation—continued to flit about in a very remarkable and eccentric manner.

Sometimes it would disappear altogether.

Then the next moment they would see it shine at some distance off.

As they pushed still deeper and deeper into the recesses of the wood the curiosity of the highwaymen increased.

Suddenly the wind dropped.

At this instant a scud of rain, that actually seemed to have been held in suspension by the gale, fell with great violence to the earth.

It lasted only for about a couple of seconds—then the wind, as it rested by its short lull, began to blow more furiously than ever.

It so happened that the countenances of the two highwaymen were turned in such a direction that the mass of rain dashed upon them, and such was the suddenness of it that for a moment or so they were half blinded. The effect was as though a quantity of sea spray had been dashed into their faces.

But when they had succeeded in removing the moisture from their eyes and took another glance around them, the light was nowhere to be seen.

At first this occasioned them but slight surprise, and they continued to gaze around, expecting to see it start out again in some fresh quarter.

But they were disappointed.

They waited for what seemed to be a long and weary time; but they perceived no signs of the light.

"How vexatious!" cried Sixteen-String Jack.

"It has gone now for certain," replied Claude. "I begin to think it was a will-o'-the-wisp after all."

"Can you form any precise idea of the spot where it disappeared?"

"I think so."

"Then let us push on. Perhaps when we reach there we may be able to make some fresh discovery. It galls me to be baffled thus!"

Accordingly they advanced.

Before they had gone very many paces they found themselves in a small open spot that was not more than ten or twelve feet in diameter.

It was thickly surrounded by trees, which cast a deep gloom upon it.

"A strange place," remarked Claude, as he glanced around.

"Yes, and, if I am not very much mistaken, this is just where the light vanished."

"But where can it have gone?"

"I know no better than yourself."

"Hilloa! Why, there it is! Look! Can you see it?"

"Yes—quite plainly."

"Then follow it."

The light had indeed most strangely reappeared among the trees.

The highwaymen quickly quitted the enclosure; but before going many paces Claude stopped.

"Why do you halt?" asked his companion.

"Why, look! Can't you see the light is actually approaching us?"

A second glance satisfied Sixteen-String Jack that this was indeed the case.

"That is very odd," he ejaculated. "We shall soon know now the solution of the mystery."

"It seems like it."

The light most unquestionably advanced, and it was apparent that it burnt more steadily than before, although it occasionally vanished and reappeared; but this might be caused by the interposition of one of the thick-trunked trees.

"Stand back," said Claude. "The light is manifestly coming nearer. If we conceal ourselves here, we may watch it closely as it passes by."

"A good thought," replied Jack, as he at once concealed himself among the dense vegetation.

Both now bent the whole of their attention upon the approaching light.

After looking at it very steadily for some time, during which it came closer and closer, Sixteen-String Jack whispered:

"As I live, Claude, I do believe that it is some one carrying a lantern, after all."

"I should think so but for the odd, fantastic manner in which it has flitted about. What on earth object could anyone have in turning and winding about among the trees at this hour?"

"It is very strange."

"Very strange indeed. But keep quiet—perhaps we shall yet succeed in finding a solution to the mystery."

"Hush—hush!"

There was an immediate silence.

The light was now very close at hand—so close that the highwaymen could no longer doubt the correctness of their conjecture.

Moreover, there also came upon their ears at frequent intervals a rustling, crackling sound, which made itself occasionally heard above the howling of the wind.

This sound was just such a one as would be produced by a man forcing a passage through the thickly-growing forest trees.

"It is a man with a lantern," said Claude, faintly. "What can be his errand and his purpose in wandering thus among the recesses of the forest?"

"That, I trust, we shall shortly find out, my friend."

"Hush—hush!"

"He cannot hear us—the wind roars too violently."

Nevertheless, his comrade preserved silence.

To watch the proceedings of this man sufficiently occupied their attention.

He came on with tolerable steadiness, though he swung the lantern carelessly about in his hand.

By the course he was taking, it was certain that he would pass very near the spot where our two friends had hidden themselves.

To descry what kind of looking individual he was seemed impossible, owing to the dazzling effect produced by the lantern.

At length he passed them—so closely that if the highwaymen had chosen to extend their arms they could have touched him.

Our friends held their breaths.

The man passed on, but when he gained the little open space which Claude and Jack had so recently quitted, he came to a dead stop.

"I dare not go any nearer with the light," he muttered—and the highwaymen heard him plainly, for his position was such that the wind carried all sounds from him to them—"but curse all such caution, say I! Just tell me, will you, who is likely to be watching for a light in the forest at this time of night? But here goes—anything for a quiet life!"

Having uttered these singular words, the man opened the door of the lantern, and extinguished the light.

A double darkness then seemed to reign around, but, by straining their eyes to the very utmost, the highwaymen were able to keep him in view.

He advanced a few more paces, and finally paused again at the opposite side of the clearing.

Then above the roaring of the wind there arose shrilly and clearly the sharp notes of a whistle, whose tone admirably counterfeited the cry which would be uttered by some night bird.

The whistle was repeated thrice.

Scarcely had the last notes died away than a faint gleam of light ascended into the air.

"Is that you, Drotchill?"

"Yes."

"Come down, then! Be quick with you!"

By the misty illumination which was shed around—and which appeared to emanate from some light burning beneath the surface of the earth—the highwaymen saw the form of the man more distinctly than ever.

He gradually descended till he passed out of sight, then there was a faint sound, succeeded by darkness and silence.

The two highwaymen were so much surprised—for what they beheld was something quite unexpected—that some moments elapsed before they either moved or spoke.

At last Claude said:

"Well, Jack, what do you think of that?"

"I scarcely know at present."

"Nor do I, though I have arrived at one conclusion."

"What is it?"

"Why, that the light we saw first of all was not the same as that which has just been extinguished."

"What was it, then?"

"Why, it must have been some other man. His passage through the wood may not in reality have been so devious as we imagined. Then don't you recollect that upon reaching this spot the light vanished?"

"Yes."

"Then the second light was carried by some other person approaching this self-same spot."

"No doubt you are right, Claude. I thought it odd the light should show itself again so far off and in a different direction. But still, that does not enlighten us much."

"Not very much; still, it is something."

"At any rate, there is some underground cavern hereabouts, inhabited by at least two persons."

"Yes, that much is certain."

"Then shall we rest content with possessing that amount of knowledge, or shall we try to make some further discoveries?"

"I am in favor of the latter course."

"So am I, for, who knows, it may turn out to our advantage."

"Creep forward, then, and let us try to discover the exact spot where they disappeared."

"Yes, but be cautious."

The highwaymen crept forward with great stealthiness.

Beyond their determination to discover, if possible, the entrance of the cavern, they had made no arrangements as to what else they should do, and it was quite as well, for they would have been rendered of no avail.

Suddenly, to their great surprise, the dim light showed itself again not many paces off.

The murmuring of voices could be heard.

Then, one after another, the two highwaymen, who had at once drawn back into concealment, counted fourteen men appear.

They all looked dusky and shadowy.

"Are you all here?" said a voice.

"All but old Robin."

"Then let him come forth as well, for what we have to do will require the united assistance of all of us."

CHAPTER MII.

IN WHICH CLAUDE DUVAL AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK SUFFER THE PENALTY OF INTRUDERS.

THE man who pronounced these words spoke in an authoritative tone of voice, and stood rather aloof from the rest, his manner and bearing being clearly that of a leader.

In response to his words, one said:

"Hilloa, Robin! Come forth! You will have to quit grubbing underground for an hour or two. Come forth, you lazy old mole!"

"I'm coming," said a grumbling voice—"I'm coming! But what on earth do you want me up above for?"

"You must ask the captain if you want to know."

"Robin," said the one who had been styled captain, "you are wanted to come with us—let that much suffice."

"But the old place?"

"It must take care of itself for once. We cannot spare anyone. Make up the entrance as well as you are able, then be in readiness to follow us."

Old Robin made some grumbling reply.

After that the faint halo of light which had ascended from below, rendering these strange beings dimly visible, faded completely away.

No sooner did this happen than at a word all the men walked hurriedly off, quickly disappearing from view.

Our two friends waited until all sounds of their progress had died away, and then Claude cried:

"Fortune favors us, Jack!"

"It does indeed. That secret band have a habitation of some kind underground, and it seems to me that at the present moment all its inhabitants appear to have departed."

"There can be no doubt of it."

"Then, my friend, if you feel half as curious as I do, you will not miss the opportunity of paying their stronghold a visit."

"There is only one thing—it is getting on towards daybreak, remember."

"We have some hours before us yet, and this little adventure will not occupy us for long, you may depend."

"Come on, then, I am willing."

So saying, the highwaymen quitted their place of concealment, and stepped forward as well as they could judge in the direction of the opening into the cave.

"It must be somewhere near here," said Jack, as he paused and bent down towards the ground. "Yet I cannot see anything of it."

"Depend upon it, we shall have to get a light."

"Then we must be cautious in its use. Remember the light of a lantern betrayed these men to us."

"It will be easy to be as careful as they were."

With these words, Claude produced a small lantern which he invariably carried.

It was quickly ignited by means of a phosphorous match.

The lantern was provided with a condensing lens of excellent quality, and the beam of light that came from it, though small, was very brilliant.

Claude turned it so that the light fell upon the greensward, of which he was thus enabled to make an accurate examination.

But nothing whatever resembling the entrance to a cavern met his view.

"If I did not know for certain that it was somewhere close here," he said, at length, "I should begin to grow doubtful."

"So should I."

The search was continued for some moments longer, but with no better result.

"The entrance is indeed well hidden!" exclaimed Jack, in a tone of mingled vexation and admiration. "Where on earth can it be?"

"I don't know," said Claude. "Let us sit down here for a moment, and look carefully all around."

He pointed, while speaking, to the stump of a huge old tree, which projected some little distance above the ground.

There were several stumps scattered about the open space, which served to show that the clearing was an artificial one, but this was the largest of all, since it allowed the two highwaymen room to sit side by side.

There was a silence of a few seconds, and then Sixteen-String Jack observed:

"Claude, I feel certain we are as nearly as possible on the very spot where those men stood."

"So am I," was the unexpected reply; "and what is more, I believe we are at this moment much nearer the secret entrance than we have been."

"What do you mean?"

"Why," said Claude, rising to his feet again, "it is my belief we have been sitting upon it."

Sixteen-String Jack sprang quickly to his feet, for this was an idea which had not occurred to him.

"Why do you think so?" he asked. "The stump looks as natural as the rest."

"Well, we shall soon see," said Claude, kneeling down and making a rigid examination of it.

But he saw nothing.

He tried to move or shake the mass of wood, but in vain.

But he was not to be baffled very easily.

All at once, Sixteen-String Jack uttered a low cry of gratification.

"Have you found the secret?"

"I have. Look here!"

Just as he spoke, he pushed against the stump horizontally, and the result was that the upper portion slid quite away, turning freely on a kind of pivot at one side.

The reason the highwaymen had not made this discovery sooner was because they had been looking for a secret spring or fastening of some kind, whereas, the entrance had been left quite unguarded.

"That's very odd," said Claude, remarking it; "but I suppose they had no means of fastening it outside."

"No; depend upon it that is the reason. Old Robin, as they called him, was always left in charge."

The dim, misty light again rose into the air, and upon looking down, the highwaymen perceived that it proceeded from an oil lamp that was hung many feet below them.

The construction of this covering to the cavern, though so simple, was admirably planned.

The upper portion of the stump of the old tree had been carefully sawed off, then the remaining or lower half next the ground had been as carefully hollowed out.

As we have said, the upper part had then been fitted on and secured in its place by a pivot at one side, which allowed it to turn freely.

The aperture at the top was not much larger than would suffice for the passage of a man's body; but a little way down the width materially increased.

Some rudely-cut steps were discernible.

"Here we are," said Jack, after they had both peered down for some time in silence.

"It seems quiet enough."

"As the grave."

"Let us descend, then."

"With all my heart."

"Will you go first?"

"Yes, if you like."

Jack nimbly descended.

Claude followed with the lantern.

"Wait a moment," the latter said; "perhaps there may be some kind of inner fastening; if so, the best thing we can do is to make use of it."

"Certainly."

"Just hold the light, then."

Claude was glad he thought of taking this precaution, for, upon examination, he found that there was a very strong fastening indeed, consisting of a hasp and staple, into which fitted an iron pin.

"There," said Claude, in a tone of very great satisfaction, "I shall feel much better contented, I can assure you, for I feel certain that no one can make a sudden entrance upon us. We shall have timely warning if anyone attempts to gain admittance."

"Very good," said Jack, as he cautiously descended the rude flight of steps; "but I rather think before any of that crew returns we shall be many a mile away."

Just as he spoke these words, he reached the bottom of the steps, and having done so, he paused to look about him at the strange place in which he found himself.

The oil lamp was a very primitive affair, and was suspended by means of an iron chain.

The use of this lamp was obvious.

It was placed there in order that the difficult descent of the steps might be made in safety.

Leading from the bottom step, and sloping downwards, was a kind of passage, the extremity of which was covered over with some dark substance.

Advancing, the highwaymen found this to be a kind of curtain.

As it hung there, it served the purpose of a door.

Drawing this aside, they saw before them an underground chamber, which, from the regularity of its form and the manner in which it was shored up with wooden supports, was evidently the work of human hands.

A stifling kind of heat was in this place, arising doubtless, in part, from defective ventilation, and partly from a smouldering, half-extinguished fire.

This chamber, if so we may term it, was furnished with a rude kind of table and several blocks of wood, which did duty for chairs.

On this table stood bottles and glasses, presenting an aspect of great disorder.

It seemed as though some merry-making had recently been going on.

The floor of the cavern was littered all over with objects of every description—articles by far too varied and numerous to allow of recapitulation.

"A strange place," was Jack's remark, after a silence of some minutes, during which they had been engaged in gazing upon the various objects to which we have adverted.

"Very," said Claude. "Yet there can be no doubt as to the profession of these men."

"Robbers?"

"Most certainly, and, I will warrant, of the worst sort, accompanying all they do with deeds of ruthless, needless violence."

"What makes you think so?"

"The aspect of this place, and the fact that so many are banded together. They are arrant cowards, every one of them, I'll warrant."

"Let us come a little closer and make a better examination. I am inclined, however, to think you are quite right."

"I am sure of it."

The highwaymen now advanced into the cavern; but they did not find within it anything more than they had already noted.

On the opposite side, however, they came to a crevice in the wall, that was protected by a door, dark so far in as to be at first invisible.

"Now, then, Jack," cried Claude, "the light!"

The door yielded to a touch.

Crossing the threshold, the highwaymen found themselves in another cavern, much smaller than the first, but stored up with a great number of small packages, doubtless containing articles of value.

There was another door close at hand, leading into another cavern; but this was perfectly empty.

"Snug quarters, truly," observed Jack, as they returned to the outer chamber, "and it is certainly too bad that they should be occupied by such a crew as hold possession of them."

"Have you seen enough?"

"Yes," was the reply, given in a lingering tone, and with a reluctant glance around.

"Then let us be going. Time is flying past; and this close atmosphere is disgusting to me."

Without waiting to hear what more his companion might have to say upon the subject, Claude led the way to the flight of steps.

He ascended them as rapidly as he was able.

Jack followed more slowly at his heels.

The iron pin was withdrawn from the staple, the hasp removed, and Claude, with a sigh of satisfaction, was about to push the covering away, when, to his dismay, he heard a voice close to him exclaim:

"What the devil is the matter with the trap? It's d—d odd that it should be fast. There cannot be anyone below? I'll try again."

What was Claude to do?

It was too late to refasten the hasp and staple. Moreover, if there had been time for him to do so it would have been of no avail—they would have been like rats in a trap.

Jack overheard what was said, and luckily decided on the right course to adopt.

"Down, Claude—down! Leave the door—we must hide!"

Even while he uttered these words in a suppressed voice, yet quite loudly enough to reach his comrade's ears, he descended the steps with the utmost precipitation.

Claude heard the individual above endeavoring to remove the trap.

A kind of instinct made him follow in Jack's footsteps.

The cavern was quickly reached, and then both gave a hasty glance around them in search of some place of concealment.

But at first none presented itself.

Footsteps were heard upon the stairs.

"Where shall we hide?" asked Claude.

"I see no other place than this. Be quick, and all will yet be well!"

Sixteen-String Jack, as he spoke, placed his hand upon a large barrel which was standing upon end in one corner.

It had evidently served for a seat, and as there was a large bunghole at the side, it was quite clear that it was perfectly empty.

"Do you mean inside?"

"Yes."

"But there is not room for two."

"There is another barrel yonder, of similar appearance. Quick—quick! If you stay to utter another word, we shall be lost!"

About this there could be no doubt, for the sound of a footstep could be heard just outside the covered doorway.

Sixteen-String Jack at once crept into his hiding-place, and Claude, who had not yet recovered from his bewilderment, hastened to do the same.

They were only just in time.

Scarcely had the barrels been settled into something like their former position than the curtain was drawn aside with an impatient hand.

It was rather strange, our two friends thought, that the man should have been so long in making his appearance; but the fact was that he had stopped to carefully secure the trap-door in its place.

The delay was most fortunate for the highwaymen; without it they could not have escaped discovery.

Upon entering, this man paused and stood near the threshold.

The two highwaymen were able to observe his movements with ease and precision by placing their eyes close to the bungholes, which, as we have said, were in the sides of the barrels.

The new-comer looked about him for some moments with a suspicious air.

But the quietude of the place appeared to reassure him.

He passed his hands once or twice before his eyes.

Then spoke.

"It's d—d odd!" he said; "but I could have sworn that when I tried the first time the trap-door was fastened. And yet it could not have been, for it yielded easily the next time I tried. I must have bungled. My brain feels strange and dizzy. I have not had enough—certainly not enough. I want more brandy to steady my nerves."

From off a small shelf at one side of the cavern the man took a bottle, which without a moment's hesitation he placed to his lips.

A loud gurgling sound followed, and from the length of time which this continued it was evident that a great quantity was imbibed.

"Ah!" he ejaculated, "I feel better now; and yet if I did not know that was the best spirit to be had, I should declare it to be no better than water. Bah! but I am better—much better!"

Claude and Jack had thought it strange that the man's suspicions about the fastened door had very quickly been allayed; but now it was accounted for by the fact that he was some distance gone in intoxication, yet not so far as to prevent him knowing what he was about, or to incapacitate him for action.

CHAPTER MIII.

THE TWO HIGHWAYMEN ARE WITNESSES OF SOME VERY SINGULAR SCENES BENEATH THE EARTH'S SURFACE.

To speak the honest truth, Sixteen-String Jack, now that he found himself ensconced in a comfortable hiding-place, felt rather pleased than otherwise with the turn affairs had taken.

Although his attention was fully occupied in watching all the movements of the man, yet each moment he recovered more and more his usual self-possession.

With something like sensations of perfect composure, he noted that this man had nothing peculiar enough in his dress to make him conspicuous among his fellow-creatures.

As to his countenance, that was about as hideous and repulsive as a countenance well could be and yet reserve some traits of humanity about it.

Jack anxiously wondered who he could be, and what was the errand that had brought him back there alone.

Beyond all doubt, patience and the progress of time would give a satisfactory answer to these questions.

"Now, to complete my work," the man muttered, "I have got rid of them all; and what is more, without exciting any suspicions against myself. But I must make the best use of my time. It is lucky that I have so little left to do."

With these words on his lips, the man opened the door communicating with the cavern where our friends had noticed so many articles stored up.

Making use of the utmost expedition, this man rapidly carried out the various packages, and stored them in the contiguous chamber that had been so recently explored by the highwaymen.

This labor he continued for a great length of time, so long that the two watchers grew tired of observing him.

There was one discovery, however, which both made, and almost at the same moment.

This was that this man was no other than the one who had assumed the manner of a leader among those outside, and who had uttered his commands in so peremptory a voice.

It was strange that he should be there alone, and under circumstances of so much mystery.

One inference could only be drawn, which was, that he was engaged in doing something which, for particular reasons, he wished to keep secret from his companions.

Such an act must be one of a villanous character—at least, that was Jack's assumption, and he determined to do his best to prevent its consummation.

Claude Duval, on the other hand, felt fidgety and uneasy.

He was sure, from the length of time that had elapsed, that dawn could not be far distant, and he had wished to return to the ruins.

Clearly, however, it was too late to think of doing this now.

Then there was no knowing how long he might be detained by this man and his associates, and he looked forward to remain cooped up under the barrel for an indefinite period with anything like pleasure.

There was no help for it, however, and this knowledge, so far from enabling him to become reconciled to his position, only made him chafe the more.

In the meanwhile, the robber captain—for such Sixteen-String Jack had designated him—proceeded steadily with his task until he had completed it.

This was not until what seemed to the highwaymen a long and weary time had passed—how long they were unable to form any definite idea.

"At last," he murmured, with a heavy sigh of relief, as he sank down and wiped the perspiration from his face—"at last the task is completed. Now I am in readiness, let them come when they choose."

He waited for a short time as if to recover himself; then, having closed both the doors and restored the place to its ordinary appearance, he entered the passage, ascended the steps, and, so far as our friends were able to judge, pushed open the trap-door and went outside.

For some moments our friends remained perfectly silent, listening intently.

But Claude, whose impatience had in no degree abated, at length said, in a faint whisper:

"Jack."

"Yes, Claude?"

"Has he gone?"

"I think so."

"Then let us go too."

"That would be most unwise. He may be only waiting just above. Consider that by this time it is daylight."

"Yes, confound it, I have no doubt it is!"

"You seem vexed."

"Yes, I cannot look forward with anything like calmness to remaining here for perhaps twelve or fourteen hours."

"It will be irksome; but, then, as it is impossible to return, and as the day must be spent in some place or other, I think we cannot do better than remain here. In all probability we shall be quite safe."

"I should prefer being above ground."

"I don't know that I should."

"You seem to like your quarters."

"Not particularly; but I have a presentiment that if we only remain we shall see and hear something well worth witnessing."

"Then, if that is your impression, I will reconcile myself to remaining."

"Hush—hush!"

There was instant silence.

After a short pause, Jack spoke again.

"I thought I heard him returning," he whispered, "but it must have been my fancy. How lucky it was we escaped down the steps so well as we did!"

"Most lucky! I can scarcely understand how it was the fellow did not discover us."

"He is in a state of great excitement—that is it; and, if I am any judge of matters, I should give my deliberate opinion that this man meditates an act of more than ordinary atrocity."

"But of what nature?"

"There I confess I am in the dark. We must watch closely the course of events."

"And what do you think of doing?"

"Interfering, if I can see my way clear to so doing."

"Well, Jack, my friend, I will not say to you one word of my private thoughts, simply because they are in entire opposition to yours. But it is quite clear that you have set your heart upon seeing this little drama played out, and therefore I will not attempt to balk you."

"I shall avail myself of your generosity of spirit, Claude, and I am moved to do so because I feel more strongly than ever that you will have no cause to regret having done so."

"Very well, Jack—I resign myself entirely. You will excuse me, however, for just mentioning one thing."

"What is that?"

"Can you tell me how we are to make our exit from this place when you feel that we have stayed here long enough?"

"I have not thought about that, Claude."

"I fancied not."

"And, what is more, I believe it would be foolish to think of it, because we cannot possibly tell what extraordinary turn events may take. At any rate, if we find here a day's safe shelter, that will be something to feel satisfied about."

"So it will. Yet I could have wished for more comfortable quarters."

"It is the barrel you don't like, Claude?"

"I confess it."

"Well, then, as this fellow seems to have sought the upper earth we may venture to emerge. It will be more comfortable than remaining cooped up, and when we hear him returning there will be plenty of time for us to conceal ourselves again."

"I was thinking so, but was in doubt whether it would be prudent."

But Claude hesitated no longer, for he lifted the barrel to one side and crept out.

Jack did the same.

Their first act was to hasten to the curtained doorway.

They listened a moment or so, and convinced themselves that the man had really passed out at the trap-door.

And now really one would have thought the wisest course that the highwaymen could possibly have adopted would be to have taken advantage of the present opportunity to get away from such close and uncomfortable quarters.

By remaining they ran a thousand and one risks.

But Jack would not think of any one of them.

It was decidedly a comfort to be freed from the casks, and they stretched themselves every now and then, as if rejoicing in their liberty.

Their conversation was not sufficiently to the point to be worth placing before the reader—it consisted chiefly in speculations as to what was likely to be the termination of what they had witnessed.

In this manner the whole day passed—not that they were able to tell anything about light or darkness by absolute observation, but Claude happened all at once to recollect that he had a watch in his pocket.

They remained, then, quite undisturbed until close upon the verge of midnight.

Then a faint, grating sound reached their ears.

It was produced by the removal of the cleverly-contrived trap-door.

No sooner did the sound strike upon their ears than our friends hastened to regain their respective places of shelter.

This was quickly done, but, although they were so rapid in their movements, they had scarcely settled themselves before some one entered.

The noise which now became audible informed them that the whole of the gang had in all probability come back.

Our friends at first rather shrank back, but gaining confidence after the lapse of a few moments, they looked through the bungholes.

Among the rest, they quickly caught sight of the leader, who looked more flushed and excited than usual.

In a voice that sounded high and unnatural, as though he was endeavoring to conceal feelings which would be betrayed by the tones of his voice, he said:

"Gallant comrades, are we all here?"

This question caused everyone to glance in the countenance of the one who happened to be standing next to him.

Then followed a unanimous:

"Yes!"

"Good! And is the trap-door above secured?"

"Yes, captain."

"Is that you, old Robin?"

"It is."

"And you have fastened it?'

"I have."

"Then we need not be much afraid of being disturbed. Seat yourselves, my gallant comrades—seat yourselves once more around this board, which has witnessed so many of our meetings. Come, come—be quick. As you know, we have much before us to-night."

"What the deuce," Jack asked himself, "can it be all about?"

Consequent upon these words from their captain, the men assembled themselves round the table, choosing for seats whatever movable object came nearest to hand.

And now our friends found themselves threatened with a great danger, because it was altogether unlooked for.

One man walked deliberately up to the barrel beneath which Jack was concealed, and placed his hands upon it, in order to roll it up to the table.

Jack considered all was over.

But a feather will serve to turn a balance.

If the man had actually moved the cask, Jack's presence must infallibly have been discovered.

At the very moment that he stooped, however, the captain called out:

"Don't roll that great lumbering thing up to the table; see, there are plenty of seats without that!"

With a grumbling sound, the man rose again.

What a long-drawn breath of relief Jack gave!

It was about as narrow an escape from discovery as anyone well could have.

Little dreaming what had been the consequence of his speech, the captain, with a kind of forced hilarity, invited the men to seat themselves around the table.

They complied, and in a short time something resembling order was obtained.

Several bottles were placed upon the table, containing wines and spirits of every variety.

Glasses were rapidly filled and emptied, and at length the captain rose to his feet and glanced down the table at the two rows of ferocious-looking faces.

There was a general silence.

"My gallant comrades," said the captain, "let me, first of all, drain a bumper to the good luck that has attended us in our late enterprises."

The bumper, without the least hesitation, was drained with enthusiasm.

In fact, the men seemed as though they were quite inclined to drink upon the least pretext or provocation.

"Now, then, friends all," the captain resumed, "according to our usual custom, let the proceeds be produced. I will set you the example."

So saying, he took from his pockets a considerable quantity of gold coin, which he placed in a heap on the table before him.

No sooner had he finished, than those around him followed his example.

In the space of a few moments the table was covered with an immense amount of money, which was roughly made up into one great heap.

"Is not that a glorious sight, my comrades? Have we not had a slice of luck?"

Various murmurs escaped the lips of the men—apparently murmurs of dissatisfaction.

It was evident the captain took them for such, for he cried:

"What—what! do I hear grumbling? Who could find fault with such a night's work as this? What do you all mean? Speak, somebody! Let me know what is passing in your minds. Remember, no concealments is our rule."

Some whispering followed this speech, and then one of the men, with the common consent of his fellows, said:

"Captain, it is because we are satisfied, not dissatisfied, with our night's work that we grumble."

The captain opened his eyes wide with astonishment.

"Because you are satisfied?"

"Yes. You seem surprised. But it is because we see what can be done if we remain together, that makes us dislike agreeing to your proposition. Now it's out, and I hope you will not be offended, captain, but that you will think twice before you act."

The captain's countenance was fully revealed to Sixteen-String Jack, who noticed that there came over it an awful and ominous change.

It would seem as though the captain himself was conscious that his face betrayed the state of his mind, so, to conceal it, he poured out a glass of brandy and held it to his lips.

But Jack noticed that his hand trembled so excessively that much of the brandy was spilt.

But of this fact the captain either was, or affected to be, unconscious.

The men sat in what seemed to be a sullen silence.

They were evidently waiting in great anxiety for the captain to speak.

They had not long to wait.

CHAPTER MIV.

IN WHICH THE CAPTAIN FINDS THERE IS SUCH A THING AS RETRIBUTION EVEN IN THIS WORLD.

THE captain, still holding the glass of brandy in his hands, rose deliberately to his feet.

"My comrades," he said, glancing all around him, "I am not altogether surprised at your feelings in one respect. But in another I am. I quite thought that this business had been so far settled as to need no further discussion, but simply a few plain statements from myself. What say you?"

There was a silence.

"Then," said the captain, after a brief pause, "I shall take your silence for consent. What I have to say, then, is this: We have carried on our little transactions for a long time in perfect immunity. We numbered twenty at the first, but one after another your companions have in various ways been removed from you."

The captain moistened his mouth with some brandy, for he spoke with difficulty.

"I need scarcely remind you of the terms of our association. We were to remain banded together for a certain time for the general good, then at the last all which we had was to be equally divided and the association dissolved.

"The time has now come, but at the very last moment it seems to me some of you are inclined to raise disputes. Once for all, I will not listen to them; the general safety compels the adoption of the plan I laid before you."

The excitement under which the captain labored visibly increased.

To what point his remarks were about to tend, or what would be the upshot of the whole affair, the highwaymen could not, for the life of them, imagine, and this made them look on with redoubled instead of diminished interest.

"It is not necessary to tell you that we have been surprisingly successful, and I have no doubt many of you think that the association can be carried on for a much longer period to our mutual advantage."

There was a general murmur of:

"We do—we do!"

"That is just what I thought, but let me assure you it is an error—a fatal error; and what is more, if we were to adopt it we should lose what we have already, instead of gaining more. No, no, take my word for it, the scheme has been carried on quite as far as will be safe. After to-night, any attempt to prolong it will end in destruction."

There was a whispered conference among the men, and then one said:

"Well, captain, you know very well by the terms of our agreement that we are bound to obey you. We have always done so, and don't intend to break through a good rule now."

"That is well!" cried the captain, trying hard to stifle the sigh of relief that rose to his lips.

"But," said the man who had hitherto served as a mouthpiece for the expression of the opinions of his comrades, "after this association is dissolved, I suppose there is nothing to prevent those of us who choose to do so forming another association of a similar character?"

"None whatever," cried the captain—"none whatever—only bear in mind no persuasion will induce me to join you."

This announcement was received with silence.

Then, with a resumption of all that excitement and nervousness which had previously characterised his words and movements, the captain said:

"A few words now will have to pass between us. The time has come for the wealth which has been accumulated to be divided amongst you all. That shall be done at once. You have all helped to pack this wealth up into a portable shape—all except this gold on the table, which remains to be divided. It was placed in yonder inner cavern, as you all well know."

So saying, the captain pointed to the door communicating with the smaller cavern, in which our friends had seen so many parcels packed up, all of which, it must be understood, had been most carefully removed by the captain on the preceding night, or rather morning.

"When you are ready," continued the captain, "rise and go, all of you, to the door, bring forth the wealth, and let it be divided."

With surprising alacrity all the men rose to their feet in perfect readiness on this occasion to obey their captain's commands.

A grim smile came over the latter's countenance as he observed it.

In a dense throng they stood together, as if waiting for the captain to lead the way.

But he hung back, pretending to be very busy with a small hand-lantern which he carried.

"Go on, my friends," he cried, in quavering tones—"go on. There is no need for you to hold back for me. Go on. Be quick, and bring forth the wealth."

Still keeping in a body, the men advanced to the door which had been indicated.

They threw it open on its hinges and entered.

No sooner had the last one crossed the threshold than the door closed.

Then the captain, who had been stooping down, flung himself flat on his face.

There was a flash of light—

A dull, heavy, roaring sound like thunder—

Blows—cries—groans—another roar—then silence.

Silence and darkness.

The highwaymen were stunned and bewildered.

The barrels in which they had concealed themselves were overturned, and hurled with great violence against the walls of the cavern.

Upon recovering possession of their senses, Jack was about to call aloud to his comrade, when fortunately he was arrested by hearing a voice exclaim:

"It is done—the deed is done! At last—at last all—all is over! Dull fools never to suspect me! But that is over now. I will get together all these valuables, and depart. Then, sleeping or waking, I will try to forget that there is, or ever was, such a place as this. How the powder roared. Well—well, I will not think of it. Why should I? It did its work effectually and well. They are dead—all dead—every one perished, and so there is no one who can contest my claim to the whole. Ha, ha! This is indeed a good night's work, and yet why should I feel so nervous? Why should my flesh crawl, and the blood seem to turn cold in my veins? It is all fancy! I must, and will get the better of it! It is impossible for one of them to be alive."

By the time the man had done giving utterance to these ejaculations, Sixteen-String Jack was able to arrive at a tolerably correct conclusion respecting what had happened.

Much that had been obscure to him before was now made clear.

He guessed at once what would be an awful punishment to this treacherous monster.

Placing his hands in a peculiar manner before his mouth, he gave utterance to a most awful groan.

It was echoed by a shriek of dismay.

"Mercy—mercy!" cried the captain—"have mercy upon me! Is it possible that some one has escaped with life?"

Jack groaned again—this time more awfully than before.

The captain seemed to fall down on his face.

To him the intense darkness that prevailed had a thousand terrors.

His imagination peopled it with all manner of hideous things, and it is no exaggeration to say that in a few moments he suffered whole ages of torment.

Claude Duval had been dashed down with greater force than his companion, for he appeared to be much nearer to the doorway.

Consequently, it was some time before he recovered possession of his senses.

He did so with Jack's first groan ringing in his ears.

Puzzled and bewildered, he remained perfectly still for a moment, not able to comprehend exactly where he was or what had happened.

Then came the second groan.

Recollection then rushed full upon him.

His first thought was for his companion's safety

"Jack—Jack," he cried, "where are you? Speak—speak! Are you much hurt?"

The captain heard these words.

His terrors increased, for the impression came over him that his deliberate plan of wholesale murder had by some mysterious means or other completely failed, as in his agitation he did not notice that Claude's voice was a strange one.

"Help—help!" he gasped—"help and save me! No—it is useless to ask for mercy—I must escape! If needs be, I must fight my way to freedom! No mercy—no mercy!"

Jack guessed at once what were the captain's feelings, and hastened to take advantage of the circumstance.

"Villain!" he cried, at the very top of his voice, "you shall receive the reward due to such atrocity as yours! It will be in vain for you to attempt to escape—you are doomed!"

With a wild shriek of terror, which proclaimed the fearful condition of his mind, the captain sprang to his feet and made a frantic dash across the cavern.

Jack heard him, and felt certain that he had gone in the direction of the steps.

Fearful that his knowledge of the intricacies of the cavern would enable him to escape—a thing which Jack was most anxious to prevent—our friend cried:

"Hold—hold, villain that you are! If you attempt to move another step your death will be certain!"

But his words were disregarded.

The captain was struggling furiously with the curtain which obstructed his progress, and which, for the life of him, owing to the state of mortal fright he was in, he could not dash aside.

"Hold!" cried Jack, again groping his way through the darkness—"hold, or I fire!"

But the captain gave a cry of delight.

The curtain was now torn down, and he was now hurrying towards the steps.

Guided by the sound only, Jack raised his pistol and fired.

There was a tremendous report, which caused numberless fragments of earth to fall to the floor of the cavern—fragments which had been detached by the explosion.

Then came an awful cry that rang with terrific effect through the cavern.

It was a cry such as Claude and Jack hoped never to hear again.

It was followed by a heavy, crashing noise.

"Claude—Claude!"

"Yes, Jack?"

"Where are you?"

"Here—here."

"Quick—a light!"

"In a moment. Are you unhurt?"

"Yes, quite."

A momentary delay, which seemed almost like an age, took place.

Then there was a faint glimmering of light.

Claude quickly had his lantern lighted.

Then, advancing, he held it up.

The first object upon which its beams fell was the haggard countenance of his companion.

"Why, Jack," he exclaimed, "you look as though you had seen a ghost!"

"No matter—no matter," was the impatient answer. "Give me the light, and follow me. This way—this way!"

Guided as much as anything by a succession of awful groans, the two highwaymen made their way across the cavern.

Upon reaching the kind of passage leading from it, a most horrible sight presented itself.

[TOM DAVIS IS OVERCOME WITH GRATITUDE.]

Lying in a strange, huddled-up mass, and literally bathed in blood, was the man who had been styled captain.

Jack's bullet had told fearfully.

But without any great stretch of the imagination, it would be easy to believe that the bullet had been guided by some retributive power that was unwilling to allow such a monster to escape.

At any rate, there he lay, bleeding profusely, his eyes almost starting from his head with horror.

It would seem that at the time when he was struck by the bullet he was in the act of ascending the rude flight of steps.

It was either that, or else, directly after the infliction of the wound, he had staggered and attempted to ascend—

Then fallen headlong back.

Jack turned the light of the lantern full upon him.

After the first glance, however, he was compelled to avert his eyes.

"Mercy—mercy!" gasped the captain, in a feeble voice. "Oh, have mercy upon me! I was tempted—yes, sorely tempted to do this deed; and you see how I have been punished! Mercy—mercy—oh, have mercy upon me!"

"You are past our help," said Sixteen-String Jack, "but you have brought death upon your own head."

"I know it—I know it, and rejoice in the knowledge that at the most I have only a few minutes to exist. After this night, life would be a greater punishment to me than I could bear."

"I meant not to slay you," said Jack; "my intention was merely to put a stop to your escape."

"And you have done it. But ah! who are you? Strangers—yes, strangers, for although the mist of death is thick before my eyes, yet I am sure that I never saw you before."

No. 211 will be Published next Monday.

It was strange that the captain had not made this discovery sooner.

"Yes, we are strangers," said Jack, "but, beyond saying that, I do not intend to give you any information."

"I do not want it—I do not want it! I fancy, too, that there is little need for me to tell you what is the meaning of all that has occurred."

"I think we comprehend it pretty fully."

"I had laid my plans well—yes, exceedingly well. All went well to the last—quite well; then I—I—I——"

He gasped painfully several times for breath.

But at each effort to recover the wonted action of his lungs, he grew palpably weaker and weaker, until, after a long-drawn sigh, he expired.

After this there was a momentary silence.

It was broken by Sixteen-String Jack, who simply exclaimed:

"He is dead!"

"Yes, quite dead," said Claude, touching the bleeding mass with the toe of his riding-boot. "Now let us get to the upper air; this place stifles me."

He pushed forward as he spoke; but Jack cried:

"Hold—hold, my friend! You forget."

"Forget what?"

"Why, it is just within the bounds of possibility that some of this man's companions may have escaped the effects of this explosion; if so, it is clearly no more than our duty, bad as they are, to render them what assistance lies in our power."

This was something which Claude could not dispute.

He turned back, though somewhat reluctantly.

Jack led the way with a rapid step across the cavern, and paused at the door, or rather where the door had been.

The doorway was now filled up with earth, and a little examination seemed to show them that the force of the explosion had caused the roof and side of the inner cavern to fall in.

Therefore if any of those unfortunates who entered it had happened to escape from the explosion they must have been buried under many tons of earth.

"We can do no good here," cried Jack; "they are past our help."

"Hark!"

Both listened.

But the silence of the very grave itself reigned around them.

"All is over," said Jack—"all is over. But what an awful slaughter!"

He shuddered as he spoke, and turned to leave the cavern.

Claude hastily followed him.

As he did so, his eye fell upon the pile of glittering gold, which, strangely enough, had remained undisturbed.

"What shall be done with this?" he asked.

"Nothing—at least, nothing just at present. Like you, I feel sick and faint. Some other time perhaps——"

Jack ceased abruptly, for just at that moment a death-like feeling came over him.

With an effort, he shook it off, however, and managed to stagger across the cavern.

The steps were ascended with still greater difficulty; but at last the top was reached, the strange covering was removed, and then, with a sensation of most indescribable and inexpressible relief, the highwaymen found the fresh breath of heaven blowing in their faces.

CHAPTER MV.

THE TWO HIGHWAYMEN MEET WITH A SINGULAR INCIDENT AT THE ROADSIDE INN.

For some moments Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack literally seemed to do nothing but drink in the cold night air.

No words can describe how welcome and refreshing it was to their panting lungs.

"Thank Heaven, Jack," said Claude Duval, "that we are safely out of that place! It will be some time before I feel inclined to burrow underground again, I rather think!"

"It has been an awful escape. Would—oh, would that I could have guessed at the intentions of that monster! It is terrible to think that so many have perished."

"Well, Jack, you may think so."

"Do not you?"

"I cannot exactly say I do. They were a very bad lot indeed—that is quite certain; and we may be sure that, if they had lived, every one would have come to some bad end or other."

"That may be, and yet——"

"Do not waste time to speak of them. Are you better?"

"Much."

"Then, my friend, if you will be guided by me, you will do your best to recover possession of our horses, and after that we will make our way back to the castle."

"I shall be ready in a few moments, but I cannot so readily banish from my mind the remembrance of this affair. Besides, before we leave we ought to take accurate note of the exact position of this place, so that, should it ever be necessary, we can find it again."

"I don't think there will be much difficulty about that."

Sixteen-String Jack looked well around him, so as to imprint every feature of the place upon his mind, then glanced upwards to note the position of the stars.

"I shall know it again," he said. "But the gold which was upon the table—what about it, Claude?"

"If you ask me, I should say let it remain where it is. What would it be worth, think you, to encounter that dreadful scene again?"

Jack was silent.

"My opinion is," continued Claude, "that the best thing we can do is to lay all the facts before the captain when we return, and hear what he has to say upon the subject."

"Agreed, then. There are many things connected with the affair which I should much like to have cleared up. But I suppose we can do no more than indulge in speculations?"

"Nothing; but, for all that, I feel tolerably certain that we shall come somewhere very near the truth."

"Do you think so?"

"Yes. These men have been in the habit for some time past of committing depredations. The booty was brought here. At first, no doubt, it was intended that all should be fairly and equally divided, but the spirit of avarice came in and took a lodging in the captain's breast. That led him to the deed he perpetrated to-night."

"Yes, that must be so."

"He must have availed himself of various opportunities to lay a mine beneath that small cavern, in which, of course, his companions, when they entered it, believed the booty was stored."

"He must have made some excuse to them to get away from them during some part of their last expedition."

"Yes, and all the rest is clear. As soon as all were standing in the treacherous inner cavern, he applied his light to the train of gunpowder. That, it seems to me, is the long and the short of the whole affair."

"But how awful!"

"Truly so."

Sixteen-String Jack sat still for some time in perfect silence.

At length rising and giving a parting glance around him, he exclaimed:

"Come, Claude, let us go. But, like you, I think I shall be most reluctant to visit this place again."

Without another word, the two highwaymen set out in quest of their horses.

As may be imagined, it was no easy task for them to retrace their steps among the trees, for not the slightest trace remained to show them the track by which they had come.

They soon discovered, too, that the wood was of a much greater extent than they had at first imagined it to be, and the trees were all so much alike that they began to fear their search was a hopeless one.

Suddenly, however, Claude paused and exclaimed:

"Hark, Jack—did your hear that?"

"Yes, quite plainly. It was a neigh, and of course from one of our horses. We must be close to them now."

"Have you a good idea of the direction from which the sound proceeded?"

"Yes, I think so."

"Lead the way, then."

Jack stepped forward with a tolerable amount of confidence, and, after a brief search, the eyes of the two highwaymen were gladdened by the sight of their steeds.

They were standing just as they had left them, having made apparently no effort to break their tether.

Taking them by the bridles, our friends led them towards the borders of the wood.

From the length of time that had elapsed, and from the fact that their horses had not been discovered, there seemed little to fear that the officers were still on the look-out for them.

No doubt when they once discovered that the highwaymen had fairly gained the recesses of the wood, or forest—for it seemed more like the latter than the former—they gave up the chase in despair.

Nevertheless, Claude and Jack did not venture to quit the protecting shadow of the trees until they had satisfied themselves by reconnoitring that there was no one lurking about.

The darkness prevented them from executing their task with any amount of exactness, still the darkness was in their favor, for it would serve to keep their forms concealed.

"I think we may venture," said Jack; "there does not seem to be anyone about."

"The coast seems perfectly clear," replied Claude. As he spoke he at once rode out into the waste ground with which the wood was engirdled.

"The night is already far spent," exclaimed Jack. "I think now our wisest course will be to make our way back to the ruins where, doubtless, Dick and the rest are waiting for us with great anxiety."

"That is exactly what I was about to propose."

"Push on, then. Our horses, after their long rest, ought to be able to make tolerable speed."

Having uttered these words, the two highwaymen without further delay set their steeds in motion, and soon were stretching across the open country in the direction of their destination.

During the time, however, that they had remained concealed in the cavern much rain had fallen, and they soon discovered that the heavy, soddened nature of the ground taxed their horses' powers most severely.

Presently they pulled up, and with some abruptness, for they saw that a ploughed field of vast extent lay before them.

"It will never do to attempt to take them across there, Claude," said Jack—"it would knock them up completely."

"You are right, it would; even now they show signs of great exhaustion."

"What is to be done?"

"I fancy the best thing will be to keep along under this hedge until we meet with a lane or cross-country road. Rely upon it, we shall not have to go far before finding one."

The direction of their horses' heads was now changed, and at a much slower rate than before, they journeyed on.

Our friends found their anticipations well founded.

Ere they had gone much more than half a mile they found themselves near a narrow winding lane.

It was separated from them, however, by a tall, stout wooden fence, the top of which was garnished with a great quantity of rusty iron hooks.

Claude and Jack shook their heads at this obstruction.

It would not only be foolish but cruel to make their horses face such an obstacle, as in case it should not be cleared very serious injuries would be the result.

"We must look for a gate," said Claude. "It will never do to try such a rasper as that while our horses are in this exhausted condition."

"There is no occasion for the attempt to be made, I think," replied Jack, "for unless my eyes deceive me I can see a gate a little way down yonder."

Claude looked in the direction to which his companion pointed, and cried:

"Yes, there is a gate, sure enough We are all right now."

Upon the gate being reached, however, it was found to be very strongly and carefully secured by means of a padlock and a stout iron chain.

Claude was unprovided with any materials requisite for removing such an obstacle as this, but he dismounted quickly, for his eye happened to light upon a large round stone at least as large as his own head.

Raising this with both his hands, he flung it against the gate.

A sharp crash was the result, and upon examining the padlock afterwards it was found to be completely demolished.

The gate swung open, and Claude rapidly remounted.

Neither had a very good idea of where this lane was likely to take them, for to the best of their knowledge they had never been in it before.

After a brief consideration, however, they turned to the right.

For some time they rode on rapidly and in silence, for the ground beneath their horses' feet was good, showing that the lane was well cared for.

Passing round rather a sharp curve, they came in sight very suddenly of the high-road.

Mechanically they drew rein and looked around.

The first thing that attracted their notice was a building situated just at the spot where the lane joined the highway.

A second glance at it made them aware that the building was an inn.

Having made this discovery, they rode forward with greater cautiousness than ever.

Lights were shining from most of the windows on the ground-floor, showing that the inmates had not yet retired to rest, or, what was more likely, that they had just risen, for the hour was that dark one which is popularly supposed invariably to precede the dawn.

Seeing that the inhabitants of the roadside inn were astir, Claude said:

"What say you, Jack, to halting here for a few moments? There cannot be much risk in doing so, and our horses will be all the better for a little refreshment."

"They are sorely in need of it; and I feel that nothing would be so welcome to my lips as a tankard of good home-brewed ale."

"We are very likely to get it here. No doubt they are up at this early hour to be in readiness for one of the coaches passing by."

"No doubt that is it. Come, I can see there is a horse-trough in front. We have no time to spare, but yet our halt here will not prove any loss of time."

With this understanding the two highwaymen guided their horses to the front of the inn.

No sooner did they pause than a man made his appearance from round an angle of the building.

"Well, gentlemen," he said, "are you going to favor me with a call?"

"No, I think not," answered Claude. "But if you will bring us a tankard of your best ale, and while we are drinking it supply the horses with something eatable that they can amuse themselves with while we drink it, I shall be obliged."

"Your instructions shall be carried out, gentlemen. But, excuse me, I have no stable accommodation at disposal; but if you like to let your horses stand round the corner for a few minutes with the rest, they can have what they require, and you can step indoors the while and warm yourselves, for it is 'nation cold."

"It is indeed," said Jack, shivering, "but we are in too great a hurry."

"You know best, gentlemen, so wait half a moment while I attend to you."

"That must be the landlord, I should think," observed Jack, as the man bustled into the house.

"What horses did he mean?" asked Claude. "I have a great mind to have a look."

Just then there seemed to be a great commotion all at once within the public-house, and in a second afterwards several individuals rushed forth.

Our friends did not need to give a second glance to recognise them.

They were police officers.

"Off and away, Jack!" cried Claude Duval, for he perceived at once that they were known.

It was a great disappointment to be disturbed at this moment, but they thought not of it.

Wheeling their horses round with great suddenness, they set off at a full gallop along the road.

As they passed the angle of the inn from where the landlord had appeared, the highwaymen caught sight of the horses belonging to the officers, which were standing with their heads turned to the wall, and eating away at a great rate.

"What a narrow escape!" cried Jack.

"Yes—yes! But push on—push on! We must get clear of them at once, or we shall take them too near the castle."

Jack felt this, and spurred his horse hard.

For one thing, they had obtained a good start, for as yet their enemies had not begun the chase.

Jack glanced back again, and as he did so he uttered a loud laugh, for a most amusing spectacle met his gaze.

Claude turned round and laughed heartily as well.

Still they did not linger, and the next moment a curve in the road hid the inn from their sight.

To explain what Jack saw, it is necessary to go back a little.

These officers, then, were no others than those who had made such strenuous efforts to overtake the highwaymen on the preceding night.

They had kept up the chase ever since, but fruitlessly, for they were clever enough to get altogether upon a false scent.

Worn out at last with fatigue, they all pulled up at the inn where our two friends chanced to pause.

In default of stable room, the horses were placed at the side of the house, where they were tolerably well sheltered from the cold.

The officers went inside.

This was about half an hour previous to the arrival of Claude and Jack.

When the landlord entered for the purpose of obtaining the tankard of ale Claude had asked for, he remarked that two travellers had arrived outside, and were in too great a hurry to enter.

This communication caused a couple of the officers to start up and look through the window.

They recognised the highwaymen at the very first glance, and rushed out pell-mell.

They made a frantic dash for their horses, shouting and swearing all the time at the very top of their voices.

In order to allow the animals to eat more at ease, the landlord had taken upon himself to remove the bits from their mouths and also to loosen their saddle-girths.

The first delay occurred in replacing the bits.

This done, the officers went in hot haste to mount.

But the moment they put foot in the stirrup and sprang up, the weight of their bodies caused the saddles to turn round.

Down went the officers on their backs in a moment.

As they lay sprawling about under their horses, they did indeed present a most ludicrous spectacle.

No wonder Jack and Claude laughed so heartily.

The officers, however, failed to see the most distant semblance of a joke in the incident.

Covered with mud from head to foot, and suffering some little pain from the bruises they had sustained, they struggled to their feet, pouring out, as they did so, the most awful imprecations that can be imagined.

But it was against the landlord that their wrath was directed, for beyond doubt he was the cause—though an innocent one—of the mischief.

Animated by a spirit of revenge, which for a time made them oblivious of all else, they made a simultaneous rush upon the unfortunate man.

He was seized in a moment.

The officers' fury was augmented by the landlord's demeanor, for the accident had so tickled his fancy that, instead of hastening to the assistance of his guests, he had leaned up against the wall, and, with his hands to his sides, had indulged in a tremendous burst of laughter.

The officers' rage was redoubled.

"To the horse-trough with him!" roared one. "D—n him—I'll let him know whether he is going to play off such tricks as these upon us with impunity! This way—this way!"

Never was command more promptly obeyed.

The landlord's merriment subsided with amazing suddenness.

In vain he assured them that it was no practical joke that he had played upon them.

In vain he entreated them to have mercy upon him.

The officers were completely deaf.

In the hands of so many, the landlord was utterly powerless.

His frantic struggles were as unable to save him from his impending fate.

The horse-trough was reached.

By main strength the unfortunate man was raised and tossed into it.

Then, not content with giving him this icy bath—for the morning was a bitterly cold one—some held him down, while others with hearty good will plied the handle of the pump which stood at one end of the horse-trough.

Nor did they cease their discipline until compelled to do so, partly from exhaustion, and partly because reflection returning reminded them that all this time they had been neglecting important business.

Ceasing suddenly, then, their treatment of the landlord, they hurried back to their horses.

With many horrible curses they tightened the saddle-girths, and, having seen that all was secure, mounted.

By this time the landlord recovered himself sufficiently to scramble out of the trough.

He presented a deplorable spectacle.

The water ran from him in streams, and as he walked he left a perfect brook behind him.

He was breathless, yet he contrived to stammer out threats of vengeance.

But the officers only laughed at him, which increased his incensement tenfold.

"Forward!" cried the police officer who was in command of the rest—"forward, I say, or we shall be too late!"

As he spoke, he clapped spurs to his horse's sides.

His example was followed by his companions, and away they went at full speed down the road in the direction the highwaymen had taken.

But a considerable delay had by this time taken place—so considerable that it enabled the highwaymen to obtain an excellent start.

Although their prey was now out of sight, the officers pressed onwards.

Their course, however, was taken completely at random.

Yet it was not until daybreak that the chief officer admitted that he had been utterly foiled.

"It's no use, my lads!" he cried. "D—n that landlord—it's all his fault, though. But we'll be even with him one of these next days. It's no good going on any further—not a bit. We must turn back. But, for all that, I mean to have another try, whenever I get the chance."

So saying, the officer turned round, and the whole of the troop, looking very tired, very angry, and very crest-fallen, retraced their steps.

In the meantime, Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack had improved this incident to the utmost.

By pushing their horses to the utmost of their capacity at the first starting, they had managed to get quite out of sight of the officers.

Then, gradually reducing their rate of speed, they changed their course again, and once more rode direct towards the place they wished to reach.

CHAPTER MVI.

THE FOUR HIGHWAYMEN DEPART ON THEIR PERILOUS EXPEDITION.

It was very close indeed upon daylight when Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack reached the ruins of the old castle.

While approaching it, they had kept the most careful look-out, and felt satisfied that they had gained the rendezvous unperceived.

As they fully anticipated, they found their companions anxiously awaiting and looking for their arrival.

"Safe and sound, I see," were Dick Turpin's first words. "I had begun to grow anxious about your safety."

"And no wonder," said Claude, as he alighted. "Here Jack Ostler, take my horse; I am too weary to do anything myself."

Sixteen-String Jack was not less fatigued.

Nevertheless, they were not permitted to rest until they had given an account of their adventures.

Dick Turpin listened to the whole recital with great interest, and so did Maud.

"Have you any idea," asked the former, "what might be the actual amount of wealth contained in the cavern?"

"I have not," replied Jack; "it is, however, of considerable amount, though, if it was twice as much, I question whether Claude would descend to fetch it."

"Is, then, the sight so very horrible?" asked Maud, speaking with considerable hesitation.

"It is indeed," answered Jack, with a shudder.

Maud looked deeply disappointed.

"At any rate," said Dick, "should we ever be badly in need of a sum of money, and not know where to obtain it, there would at least be that resource to fly to."

"Beyond all doubt there would."

Hearing these words, Maud's countenance brightened again.

The reason why she grasped so eagerly at the idea of taking possession of this wealth was that during the night Dick and herself had passed alone in the ruins she had made use of every argument she could think of to induce him to abandon his present mode of life.

Dick loved Maud too tenderly and truly to listen unmoved to her entreaties, yet he knew not how to comply with them.

At last he was induced to promise that, should he ever be able to amass a sufficient sum of money to keep them above want, he would, without delay, seek out a place in some foreign land where he was unknown, and live there a life of peacefulness and rest.

Oh, how glad this promise made the heart of Maud! for she could at last see something like a definite prospect of her husband quitting his perilous career.

How this account of Sixteen-String Jack's coming so close upon the promise naturally filled her with excitement!

As for Dick himself, he felt inclined to look upon the matter in a light more serious than he had hitherto done.

It was with a keen pang at his heart that he reflected how truly fearful would be Maud's career should he by any means be deprived of life.

It is true that so far he had with impunity braved almost every danger; but yet a time might come when his good fortune would desert him.

At any night, upon one of his excursions, a bullet might lay him low.

Then, deprived of his support, what was Maud to do?

It is easy to understand how well calculated to induce serious feelings these thoughts were.

Yet, with admirable self-possession, he contrived to keep them locked up in his breast, though he could not help dwelling mentally upon the account which his two comrades had given him.

There are moments in our lives when all seems dark and dull—when favourite and eagerly-followed pursuits lose all their charm—when a kind of despondency weighs upon the spirits, and when we long for some great change to take place in our lives.

It was thus, to a certain extent, with Dick Turpin at this moment.

A longing for something like repose came over his mind—a desire for some sort of respite from his adventurous course.

The prospect of a peaceful, happy home with Maud, in some fair clime, where summer always reigns, and where he would have nought to fear from his fellow-creatures, seemed most enticing, and just then he longed ardently for its realisation.

He believed that could this dream only become reality he should be happy and content.

It is very questionable, however, whether such would have been the case for long.

After a time, in all probability the desire would return with redoubled force for adventure and excitement.

Whether this was ever destined to be the case, the course of events only can disclose.

During that day nothing occurred important enough to deserve recordation.

At nightfall, however, the highwaymen assembled, and gave themselves up to a careful consideration of the enterprise that lay before them.

Despite its risks, they were fully resolved to undertake it.

Still they consulted carefully together, for, despite their resolution, they could not but feel that they were about to run into a very serious danger—perhaps the conflict in which they were about to engage would prove fatal to one or more of them.

It is not necessary to place their deliberations before the reader.

Events will soon show their nature.

Every preparation was made

Maud wept bitterly.

She dreaded to see Dick depart on an errand fraught with so much peril.

Most earnestly did she entreat him to allow her to accompany them.

Over and over again she assured him she would not be in the way—that she would be brave, and that the expedition would be shorn of half its dangers.

But Dick felt it impossible to accede to her request, though it pained him much to deny her.

He felt that Maud's presence at such a time would be the very thing that would unnerve him.

He would be concerned and abstracted all the while, on account of her safety, whereas, by leaving her at the ruins, this anxiety was avoided.

But to Maud there was something inexpressibly dreadful in remaining for so long a period in the ruins by herself.

She soon found, however, that Dick was determined, and that it would be utter futility to attempt to persuade him to change his resolution.

But it was with a heavy heart, and with many forebodings of coming danger, that she resigned herself to her dreary fate.

What caused the highwaymen the most consultation and the greatest uneasiness was the doubt they experienced as to whether the van would start in the morning or at night.

In the former case their destination would be reached before midday, in the latter, before midnight.

It was as likely to be the one as the other.

If the first, the hazard of making the attack would be so great that one would think no sane men would venture it.

But Dick and his comrades were not ordinary mortals, and therefore unswayed by ordinary considerations.

It was finally thus determined by Dick Turpin:

"We will make sure both ways," he cried, "and we will contrive to do it in this way: On the night of the 20th—that is the night next following—we will set out for our destination."

"That is very soon," observed Maud, timidly.

"Not a moment too soon," replied Dick, with decision "In case the van should start at nine in the morning we shall be there in readiness to intercept it. If at night, so much the better. It will be an easy matter for us to conceal ourselves until the proper moment arrives."

It was felt at once that no better arrangement than this could possibly be made, and it was decided upon without the least hesitation.

So great was the suspense and impatience of all concerned, that the time seemed as though it would never pass away.

At the appointed hour, however, the shades of evening began to close in, and the ruined castle at once assumed an aspect of bustle and excitement.

So soon as ever it was dark enough to make it safe, the highwaymen mounted in readiness to depart.

Maud clung tightly to Dick, and seemed as though it would be a total impossibility for her to part with him.

Gently but firmly, however, Dick released himself from her close embrace.

As he did so, he said:

"Be brave, Maud—be of good heart! Believe me all will yet be well. Do not suffer greater apprehensions on my account than you can help; and above all things do not on any account be induced even for a moment to leave the protecting shadow of the ruins. I leave you with one whose fidelity has been well tried, and I do not feel afraid but that he will protect and save you from all harm. Farewell for a brief space, and, while I am away console yourself with the thought that you are perhaps much nearer to the realisation of your great hope than you imagine. Once more, farewell!"

As he uttered this last word, Dick Turpin rode somewhat hastily away, for he was afraid to trust himself to linger longer.

Maud, with a faint, moaning cry, sank back and leaned against the ruins for support.

It was only with the greatest difficulty, and by the exercise of the greatest possible amount of self-control, that she prevented herself from fainting.

What helped her, however, perhaps more than anything else to retain possession of her senses was the strong desire she felt to watch as long as she was able the retreating forms of her husband and his companions

Pressing her hand, then, tightly upon her heart, and leaning against the crumbling walls, she watched them until a projection of the stonework hid them from her sight.

Dick did not trust himself to look back, but pushed on at a pace almost too rapid for the exercise of due caution.

London lay between the highwaymen and their destination, but they carefully avoided the metropolis.

This necessitated a very considerable detour, but then there was not so much fear that they would encounter any band of police officers, and, moreover, they were able to put their horses to good speed.

Dick's intention was to ride direct to Greenwich with all possible speed; then, upon his arrival there, to work his way back towards London, until they could either obtain the information they required, or else take up their position in a favorable spot.

Owing to the unfrequented routes they were careful to take, they succeeded in reaching Greenwich without encountering any interruption whatever.

They paused outside the town, and just then a church clock began to strike.

By counting the strokes they found the hour to be ten.

"We have plenty of time before us," Dick remarked, "but we must be careful what we do. It is quite certain that we are here first, and all we have to do is to go quietly towards London. We shall then be certain of meeting with the van.

Accordingly, keeping in twos and at some distance apart, so as not to appear all in one company, which might have attracted suspicion, they journeyed at an easy rate along the high-road.

By the hour of eleven they found themselves some six or seven miles distant, and close to an inn that was very pleasantly shaded by some tall trees of luxuriant foliage.

"This is the place to gain the information we require," said Dick.

"But you must conduct your questionings carefully."

"Oh, of course! We will just pause here for some few moments, but not dismount."

To this Tom King assented, at the same time making a sign to his comrades behind to ride on without taking the least notice of them.

It was a bold step for Dick to take, but then he had borne in mind the fact that he was now in a part of the country which he had never before visited, and where, consequently, there was not much fear that he would be recognised.

"House—house!" he cried, in a loud voice; but, to his surprise, no notice was taken of his summons.

He repeated it, with no better effect.

"One would think, Tom, that all the people had gone to bed, only it is scarcely likely they would do so and leave the house open and lighted up in this fashion."

"It is odd," said Tom. "I will call; perhaps my voice may reach further than yours."

Tom called accordingly, but all remained as silent as before.

This was more than strange.

The inn had a remarkably quiet look, as though, as a rule, but little trade was done at it; and if the present was a sample of the amount of attention they paid to callers, want of business was not to be wondered at.

Our two friends waited for several moments in patience, but with no better success than at first.

"This is about the oddest thing that ever happened to me," said Dick.

"It seems to me we shall get no good by waiting here," rejoined his comrade.

"It does indeed; but still my curiosity is excited by such an unusual circumstance. Let us alight for a moment, and ascertain, if we can, what it means."

Nothing loth, Tom King left the saddle.

The two horses were then secured to a couple of rings fixed in the trough for that purpose, and then the two highwaymen boldly crossed the threshold of the inn.

The first room they came to was illuminated by the blaze of a cheerful fire, but a glance served to show them that it was vacant.

Wondering more and more, the two friends strode on.

Suddenly both paused, for a strange and muffled noise had just then assailed their ears.

After listening for a moment they ascertained its character.

Some person or persons were sobbing and sighing at a great rate, as though suffering an extremity of woe.

Guided by the sounds, they pressed onwards, and presently paused at a door that was slightly ajar.

It was evidently from the room beyond that the sounds of sorrow came.

Dick gently pushed the door open about an inch wider, and peeped in.

His eyes then fell upon a most sorrow-stricken group.

Seated in a most dejected attitude by the fireside was a man.

Dick could not see his features, for his face was turned towards the fireplace.

Next to him sat a woman, who, though of middle age, yet preserved in a remarkable degree an appearance of youthfulness.

Her face Dick could see, and as he gazed upon it, he felt that he should not forget it for many a day.

The expression it wore was one of stolid, soul-chilling despair.

It was as though all hope had been frozen in her bosom.

Near her was a young girl, whose face was buried in her hands.

But glistening tears forced their way through her fingers, while her sobs were truly heart-rending to listen to.

A man, attired half like a waiting man, half like an ostler, was sitting on one corner of a table, dangling his legs to and fro, and keeping his eyes resolutely fixed upon the floor.

There seemed to be several others in the room, but these were all that could be seen distinctly through the narrow crevice of the door.

For a moment or so, Dick hesitated.

He was in doubt whether he should retire quietly, leaving the people at the inn altogether ignorant of his visit, or whether he should make his presence known.

It almost seemed as though their grief was of too deep and sacred a character to be intruded upon by strangers.

It was evident that it utterly absorbed their faculties, rendering them quite oblivious of all that was taking place around them.

But it was the very intensity of this grief which made Dick Turpin hesitate.

He was full of curiosity to know what species of calamity it could have been to have wrought such great effects.

His inclination was strong to enter, and most assuredly he would have done so had he had the slightest inkling that he could have been of any service to them, or if he thought he could in any way assuage and mitigate their great grief.

With a sudden effort, he arrived at a decision

Pushing open the door somewhat suddenly, he strode into the room.

The noise made by his entrance caused the different members of the group to look up.

But when Dick encountered so many tearful visages, and saw so many stony eyes turned upon him, he wished he had decided differently.

But it was now too late to retreat.

All gazed at him inquiringly.

"I am very sorry to intrude upon a scene of such great domestic trouble," he said, in a gentle voice that came naturally to him on occasions like the present, and which had a most soothing effect upon his hearers. "I repeat I am sorry to intrude, but I did so inadvertently. We halted at your door, called aloud in vain, and at last entered to see whether the place could be deserted."

"Gentlemen," said the man before the fire, and who, beyond a doubt, was the landlord—"gentlemen, if you wish for refreshment of any kind do not seek it here—quit this abode of misery. Ride on a little further, and you will find another inn where all your wants will be attended to. We cannot serve you here."

It was palpable that the landlord spoke with only the greatest possible effort.

Every now and then his voice would become choked and almost lost.

Then it would quaver in a manner which showed to what a sore extent his heart was oppressed.

Again Dick hesitated.

The landlord, without troubling himself to see whether his words were attended to, resumed his former attitude.

So strange a reception surely was never given in an inn before, and Dick wished from the bottom of his heart that he should be able to arrive at some solution of the mystery, though how to set about it he had not the least idea.

CHAPTER MVII.

IN WHICH IT WILL BE SEEN THAT FORTUNE FAVORS THE HIGHWAYMEN IN AN UNCOMMON DEGREE

A FEW moments elapsed, and then the landlord, raising his head, said, in a voice of extreme bitterness:

"Is the sight of our woe so pleasing to you that you can do nothing but feast your eyes upon it? If so, gaze on—you are welcome."

"You mistake my motive for lingering altogether," said Turpin, who was not a little embarrassed by the manner in which he had been addressed

"What is it, then?"

"To offer you consolation, such as——"

The landlord interrupted him with a shrill, contemptuous laugh.

"Or, what would be better," continued Turpin, retreating towards the door, "to do anything which happened to be within my power to alleviate your distress, which, I can assure you, wrings my heart to witness."

It was impossible for anyone to doubt the earnestness of what Dick said.

Sincerity itself was in every tone of his voice.

The landlord seemed to think so, for, in a voice of less asperity, he replied:

"Sir, such behaviour as this from a stranger is unusual indeed. I am sorry I so much mistook your intention. Let me assure you, however, that my grief is so deep and so irremediable that it must be far beyond the power of any stranger to mitigate it in the least degree."

"I regret to hear that," answered Turpin. "Still, it would be quite possible for you to be perfectly ignorant of the powers I possess. Would money serve you?"

The landlord slowly and sadly shook his head.

"I see how it is," he said. "You are curious, and it is not unnatural that you should be. Have what you want. You shall not depart unsatisfied, and I will lay bare all my troubles to you."

"I can only express my satisfaction at your determination; and, oddly enough, there comes over my mind a conviction that I may be able to soothe your pangs."

The landlord shook his head in token of dissent, then said:

"Sit down, gentlemen—sit down. What I have to tell I shall not be long relating, though I little thought that I should ever make a stranger acquainted with my disgrace."

This was rather a difficult speech to make any reply to, so, very wisely, Dick Turpin remained silent, waiting for the landlord to commence.

His suspense was soon at an end, for in a trembling, hesitating voice the landlord began thus:

"Sir, you must understand I had a son—indeed, I have him now in one sense, though he is lost to me for ever. My only son, sir, you understand, and therefore petted and fondled, and indulged too much—until, in fact, the very kindness with which we treated him proved his ruin. I lay the blame more upon myself than upon him," he added. "Don't you, wife?"

This appeal was answered by a loud and passionate burst of grief.

After a brief pause the landlord resumed:

"He was always a wild, harum-scarum young fellow—always in mischief from his very birth; but his pranks amused us, and, so far from checking him, we encouraged him in them. But I shall tire your patience if I go on thus."

Dick warmly protested the contrary.

"Nevertheless, I will pass over all that, and come to my trouble at once. Things went on and on, and at last my poor boy got into companionship with a lot of bad fellows. I was sure they would bring him to no good, and remonstrated with him on the subject, pointing out to him what would be the inevitable result. But he only laughed at my 'groundless fears,' as he called them, and went on as before. Then, indeed, did I blame myself for the course I had pursued. Had I kept a better check upon my boy in his younger days I should have been able to control him then. As it was, I had not the slightest influence or power over him. And then he was always so lively, so kind, so generous, and so happy. His cheerful spirits always filled the house with sunshine, and I, weak, insensate fool that I was, could not bring myself to think even of adopting any harsh measures towards him. But I am running on and on, and not coming to the point."

But Dick again declared how deeply interested he was in every word, which was not to be wondered at.

There was a rude kind of pathos in the landlord's manner, and the way in which he spoke of his scapegrace son, and the construction he tried to place upon his acts, showed all a fond parent's devoted love.

Alas, how often is this precious love poured out and unrequited!

"In a word, sir," resumed the landlord, suddenly, and speaking with apparent effort, "my boy got from bad to worse. Insensibly his bad companions led him on, and he began to descend the steep hill of ruin. He was past me now, although I still made use at every opportunity of prayers and expostulations.

"At length, sir, he—he was accused of being concerned in a robbery.

"The charge seemed to crush me, but, rallying myself, I set forth at once to see what could be done on my boy's behalf.

"I tried my utmost to compromise the affair, but the prosecutor was a stern, unmerciful man, who had never known what it is to feel a father's affection for his child.

"Despite all my efforts, my boy was arrested, brought up before a magistrate, examined, and, on the evidence then produced, committed for trial.

"Still, I did not relax my efforts, but they were all quite unproductive.

"He was carried to Newgate, and a few days ago took his trial.

"I engaged eloquent counsel on his behalf, but their skill availed not against the array of incontrovertible evidence.

"The rascally crew with whom he had been associated managed matters so that my boy was their scapegoat.

"He suffered for all their sins, while they escaped scot-free.

"Oh, sir," the landlord continued, with a fresh burst of feeling, "you cannot conceive what a terrible blow this has been to me! To think that my only, much-loved son should be the first to bring shame and disgrace upon our name! It is more than a hundred and fifty years since this house was built by one of my ancestors. His descendants have lived in it ever since, and during all that time there has not been even the shadow of a stain cast upon their characters.

"Now that good name, so long preserved, so highly valued, is gone—gone for ever!"

With a sob that sounded more like a groan, the landlord allowed his face to fall between his hands.

Dick and Tom King were deeply moved by this recital, for quite unconsciously the landlord in his excitement ha-risen to a pitch of rude, untutored eloquence that was all the more touching on that very account.

Quickly raising his head, he continued:

"I ought to disown him—to cast him forth—never to think of him again! He has proved himself unworthy of all consideration. I ought to curse him—to curse the very day and hour——"

"No, no, John," said his wife, tearfully, rising from her seat and placing her hand upon the landlord's shoulder, 'you ought not to curse. It is not so much our poor boy who is to blame, but ourselves. If we had acted more wisely, the result would have been very, very different."

"Yes, wife, you are right!" ejaculated the landlord, dashing his hand violently against his forehead—"you are quite right—the fault is ours. And now, sir, I have done. Is not my grief inconsolable?"

"I trust not."

"Trust not? In what way can i. be relieved?"

"You have not told me the result of the trial."

"No, no—I forgot that. Well, then, by the sanguinary laws of this land, my poor boy was liable to a shameful death upon the scaffold."

"Yes," said Turpin; "but the time will come when that sanguinary law will exist no longer, and when the legislature will not believe the theft of any sum over a shilling in value shall be heinous enough to deserve death."

"Well, well, it may be so, but that will not alter my case."

"No, truly. But your boy—is he——"

"Condemned to die, you would say."

"Yes."

"He had a narrow escape, but the counsellor I engaged pleaded for mercy so effectually and so well that his sentence was commuted to transportation for life."

"For life?"

"Yes, and we are now about to gaze upon him for the last time—one more glimpse will be accorded to us. As if to make the disgrace more bitter and hard to bear, he will be brought from London to this place, where we are all known so well, and from whence he will embark on board a vessel chartered to take out him and other condemned prisoners. Now, sir, you do indeed know all, and I cannot but thank you for the interest and sympathy you have shown in the whole narration."

Again the landlord buried his face.

Dick glanced into Tom King's countenance.

A meaning look was exchanged between them.

Dick rose.

"Perhaps," he said, "we may be able to render you more effectual assistance in your strait than you imagine; but before I commit myself by saying anything further, I will just hold a brief conference with my companion."

The landlord was so amazed at this speech that he could not utter a single syllable.

But his countenance well expressed his astonishment.

Tom King followed Dick Turpin to the front of the inn, where they found their horses in perfect safety.

"Could anything have happened more fortunate than this?" exclaimed Dick.

"Fortunate! that is a strange word to use."

"It is on the present occasion, but you know what I mean?"

"Oh, yes."

"It was very strange that I should feel so much curiosity in the landlord's trouble from the very first."

"I suppose you intend to tell him what we are to do?"

"Yes, in this way: If he is willing that his son should be rescued——"

"You may make sure of that, Dick. He is so fond that he would sacrifice his own life for him."

"Well, then, supposing that to be so, he will be a most important ally—in fact, just the man we require, and that we could not very well do without."

"We should have pretty good hostage of his fidelity."

"Yes, I should not be afraid to trust him, and now I propose that we broach the subject to him. Should he fall in with our views, he will find us safe shelter till the moment for action arrives."

"And he will be able to tell us what time we may expect the van."

"Of course he will, and we could scarcely have put the question to anyone without exciting suspicion,"

"That is just what I was thinking."

"Well, then, suppose you mount and ride after Jack and Claude, bring them here, and you can explain matters on the road."

"And you?"

"I will remain here and sound the landlord."

Feeling certain that no better arrangement than this could possibly be made, Tom King sprang upon the back of his horse and galloped after his companions.

Turpin watched him for a moment, then turned into the inn.

He encountered the landlord in the passage, that individual having recovered possession of his senses sufficiently to rise and walk towards the front door.

"Step into a private room with me," said Dick, "I have something of importance to communicate."

Almost mechanically the landlord obeyed.

Dick shut the door.

Then turning round, said:

"In the first place, I am about to confide to you a momentous secret, but I shall trust to your honor to keep it inviolate. If you betrayed me it would be the depth of baseness."

"Never fear, sir; but what may this secret be?"

"Wait a moment and I will tell you; but first of all you must answer me some questions."

The landlord inclined his head.

"In the first place, you would be glad if by any means your son could recover his liberty?"

"Sir—sir, forbear!"

"Forbear?"

"Yes; do not mention such a thing to me, or you will drive me mad! That is a hope and a thought I dare not entertain!"

"But for supposition's sake?"

The landlord shook his head.

"Tell me," said Dick, speaking in an impressive whisper; "suppose it should be possible to set him free, should you scruple much at the means employed?"

"I do not understand you," answered the landlord, breathlessly.

"If you could rescue him from his guard, would you do so?"

"But that would be utterly impossible."

"But supposing it was in your power, should you do so?"

"Yes; and if I thought I should succeed I would gladly pour out every drop of my heart's blood."

"That is exactly what I expected," said Dick; "but hark! I hear some one approaching—they are friends of mine."

"Friends of yours?"

"Yes, true, devoted allies—not friends in the ordinary sense of the word. Wait a little while. What else passes between us shall be said in their presence."

There was a brief pause, and then the three highwaymen entered.

"I should think we had better not leave our horses outside," said Tom.

"No, no, gentlemen, you shall not. I will see to them. Here, Isaac—Isaac!"

In response to this call the servant man appeared.

He looked to the full as dejected as his master; but then the landlord's son had ever been his favorite.

"Only put the horses somewhere under cover," said Dick; "do not remove any of their trappings. We may require them at an instant's notice."

The ostler simply nodded his head, and passed out.

"You can trust to him, gentlemen," said the landlord. "In his charge your cattle will be perfectly safe, I will answer for that."

The door was then carefully closed.

The landlord trembled with excitement, while his heart beat at so violent a rate that he could scarcely breathe.

He expected some strange and startling disclosure, yet could not for the life of him make out what its exact nature would be.

But Dick Turpin soon relieved him from his state of suspense.

"Just listen attentively," he began. "We have all made up our minds to stop the prisoners' van before it reaches Greenwich and to rescue from it one of the prisoners—a friend of ours, you understand—who, like your son, is under sentence of transportation."

Upon hearing this announcement, the landlord staggered back, until he was brought up rather violently by a wall behind him.

Dick spoke in the calmest and most matter-of-fact manner possible to conceive, and, having spoken, waited patiently for the effect it produced upon the landlord to subside.

"Stop the prisoners' van?" he gasped, at length.

"Yes, such is our intention."

"What, you four?"

"Yes."

"Impossible!"

"Why so?"

"It is too well protected by officers. You would lose your lives in the attempt."

"Leave that to us," said Dick. "We are not at all alarmed on that score. Now I will tell you what we require of you. In the first place, we want to know when the van is likely to reach here—in the second, whether you will afford us safe shelter until then? If you consent, then, in return for doing so, we will take care to set your son at liberty. You are surprised, but take a minute to recover yourself."

"No, it is not requisite. Still, I must say that I consider your attempt will be nothing short of utter madness, and will inevitably result in your destruction."

"As I said, you must leave that to us. You can believe me or not when I say we shall do it. Now, then, are you inclined to agree?"

"It would be folly to hesitate in such a case."

"I thought that would be your decision."

"But—but I have my doubts still about your success."

"Time will soon show whether they are well or ill founded. But about the van—when will it pass here?"

"I expect between ten and twelve to-morrow."

"That is awkward."

"That is what I thought," said the landlord. "If you had proposed to carry out your attack under cover of darkness I should have thought it much more feasible."

"Daylight does indeed fearfully augment the difficulties of our task; but still, for all that, our associate must be set free."

"I don't see how it is to be done. The van is always so well guarded, and, except at night, this road is always well frequented."

A shade of uneasiness overspread Dick's face upon hearing this intelligence, for, of course, the landlord knew perfectly well what he was talking about.

"No matter," he said, resolutely—"it must be done, and I have never set my mind upon a task yet and failed in it. However, we must have a private consultation among ourselves. Are you willing that it should take place in your house?"

"How could I refuse you so reasonable a request, for, crack-brained as I consider your scheme to be, yet, for my son's sake, I most heartily hope that you will be successful, though, at the same time, I feel that it is hoping in defiance of probability. Can I be of any further assistance to you?"

"Not at present, I think; but you can bring us some refreshment, for we are all thirsty."

"You are heartily welcome to all the house affords; and if you only save my son from his dreadful fate, I shall ever look upon you as the greatest benefactors the world can show."

"Hark!" said Dick.

"What do you hear?"

"Horsemen on the road."

"Yes, I hear them now quite plainly," answered the landlord.

"Who are they, think you?"

"It is a troop of some kind—ten or a dozen at least; but I will soon have a look."

With these words the landlord sallied forth.

"I do believe," he said, returning quite out of breath, "that they are soldiers."

"Or police officers," suggested Dick.

"Yes, or officers."

"Then, if they are, you can easily understand that we wish to run no risk of being seen by them. Have you got any private chamber that we can occupy?"

"Yes, upstairs."

"Then conduct us to it."

"I don't think it at all likely the officers will call here."

"Still, in case they do?"

"You shall go if you wish it."

"We do."

"Then follow me at once."

With these words they all sallied forth into the passage.

They were headed by the landlord, who at once led the way to the staircase.

Just as he placed his foot upon the bottom step the horsemen drew up with a dash in front of the inn, and began bawling at the top of their lungs for the landlord.

"I did not think they were so near," he said.

"Nor I," answered Dick. "Tell us which the room is, and we will ascend alone. You go at once to the door, and, above all things, preserve your calmness."

"You may depend upon me doing that."

"Which room?"

"The first door on your right at the top."

"Enough; and bear in mind if those outside are officers, and if they ask you any questions about us, you must be careful to tell them that you have not seen us."

CHAPTER MVIII.

DICK TURPIN AND HIS COMRADES LEARN SOME IMPORTANT INFORMATION FROM THE POLICE OFFICERS.

WITH these words, Dick Turpin and his comrades rapidly ascended the staircase while the landlord hastened to the front door of the inn.

It took our friends but a moment to reach the door which had been described to them.

Opening it, they found themselves in a tolerably spacious and well-furnished apartment.

It was quite dark, with the exception of what slight amount of illumination proceeded from the two latticed casements, through which the night sky could be dimly seen.

But our friends liked it all the better for being dark.

Their first act was to secure the door.

This done, they crept on tiptoe along the flooring towards the windows, being careful not to make an uproar by coming unexpectedly into collision with any article of furniture.

Two things afforded them especial gratification.

The first was that the room was in the front of the house, and that the windows commanded a view of the high-road below.

The second was, that one of the windows was open.

At a first glance they saw that a troop of mounted police officers had drawn up near the horse-trough.

Upon counting, they found the number to be nine—in all probability eight subordinates and a sergeant.

Our friends were careful to keep back so as to be out of sight.

The open window allowed them to listen to every word that was uttered below.

So expeditious were they in their movements that they had actually just taken up their position at the window when the landlord accosted the officers.

"Good evening, gentlemen!" he said. "What shall I have the pleasure of serving you with?"

"Nothing on the present occasion. We are on important business, which admits of no delay, only we called here to ask you a question."

"A question?" echoed the landlord, not knowing exactly what better to say.

"Yes. I want to know whether you have happened to see four dashing-looking horsemen anywhere in the vicinity—one mounted on a magnificent coal-black mare?"

"Four horsemen?"

"Yes. I may as well tell you who they are. Their names are Dick Turpin——"

"Good gracious!" ejaculated the landlord.

"Tom King," continued the officer, without heeding the interruption in the least, "Claude Duval, and Sixteen-String Jack."

"Good gracious!" said the landlord again. "You don't mean to say that those desperate characters have taken this road? If they have, there will be an end to my custom!"

"I will tell you how it is," said the officer. "But stay, here is a bill describing their persons, and offering a reward of three thousand pounds if they are all captured. A gentleman who has been robbed lately has just added five hundred pounds to the amount."

"Three thou——"

"Sand pounds," added the officer. "Bear that in mind, and keep a sharp look-out, will you?"

We are sure the reader can form but a slight idea of the state of mind the four highwaymen were in during this conversation.

They were apprehensive, and not without good cause.

They knew but little of the landlord, and, for aught they could tell, the hope of gaining a share of so large a sum as three thousand pounds might overcome all other considerations.

Then any incaution on his part would serve to excite the suspicions of the officers.

If once these were aroused their situation would be ticklish indeed, for they were quite ignorant of the whereabouts of the stables, so it was scarcely possible that they would be able to gain possession of their steeds.

It was, therefore, with the most acute suspense and anxiety that they watched the progress of events below.

The landlord, by the aid of the lamp hanging over the front door of the inn, had taken a good look at the bill.

Of course he had perused the descriptions, and if so, could not have failed to know who his guests were.

It was a critical moment.

"Well," asked the officer, "have you seen any one answering that description lurking about?"

"No—I am pleased to say I haven't, and, what's more, I hope, for the sake of my trade, I never shall."

The highwaymon drew a long breath of relief.

One anxiety was removed.

The landlord had committed himself, and, for his own safety's sake, would take care not to betray the highwaymen, otherwise he would be liable to punishment as an accomplice.

Still the danger was by no means over yet.

"Then you haven't seen them?" said the officer.

"I haven't."

"Well, then, just let me tell you the best thing you can do is to keep an uncommonly sharp look-out."

"But are they really on this road?"

"It is suspected so, and, if you must know, the facts are just these: An accomplice of theirs has been sentenced to transportation. It was expected they would try to rescue him from Newgate, and every precaution was taken in case the attempt should be made. But all has gone quiet so far; but, from circumstances which have occurred, there is reason to believe they will attack the van that will convey the prisoners to Greenwich."

"Good gracious!" said the landlord again.

"They are known to be somewhere north of London, and at this moment all the roads about London are so closely watched that they cannot get here unseen."

"But you fancy they have been beforehand with you?"

"Well, there is just the possibility of it, and we are determined not to leave a point unguarded, so we have come on in order to clear the way for the van."

"But that won't be here till to-morrow, will it?" asked the landlord.

The officer put his finger to the side of his nose, and assumed a highly sagacious look.

"That's just where we shall trick 'em."

"Is it, indeed?"

"Yes—nine o'clock to-morrow morning is the time given out for the van to start from Newgate; but we are to steal a march upon the rascals altogether. By that time all the prisoners will be safe under hatches, or it's d—d odd to me!"

"I see," said the landlord; "and a very good plan it is."

"Yes—there is reason to believe they know the time first appointed for the setting out of the van; but that they are quite ignorant of the alteration. So they will come a day after the fair, and we shall be assembled here in such force that we cannot fail to capture them."

"I hope you will, and not let them play up their game on this road. It is no credit to you that you have not captured them long before this."

"It's because so many innkeepers like yourself befriend them," said the officer, "and, while that continues to be the case, we shall have a good deal of trouble in capturing them."

"Well, they won't make any such friends on this road, I assure you."

By this time the officer seemed to realise that he had stopped chatting long enough, so he at once gave the word to push on, repeating his caution to the landlord to keep a sharp look-out.

Not until the last man in the troop of police officers was fairly out of sight, did the landlord venture to quit his position beside the horse-trough.

But as soon as the last one was invisible, he hurried with all speed up-stairs.

"There," he said—"there, did you hear that?"

"Every word."

"And what do you think?"

"That fortune is befriending us as she always does, and this time to a greater extent than we could have ventured to hope for."

"Fortune favours you?" repeated the landlord, as if unable to credit the evidence of his own senses.

"Yes—most assuredly. Our chief obstacle is removed."

The landlord clearly could not comprehend our friend at all.

"I suppose, now," said Dick, "there is no certainty when the van will arrive?"

"No—it may reach here at any moment."

"It won't be long first, I feel convinced, and so I will make my arrangements accordingly. Come on—we will set out at once."

"Stay," said Claude Duval. "Perhaps the landlord here, from his knowledge of the locality, may be able to tell us which would be the most advantageous point at which we can take up our positions."

"Well thought of," said Turpin, who at once turned an inquiring glance upon the landlord, who replied:

"About a mile from here, or it may be rather less, there is a capital place—just suited for your purpose. It is what we call about here a holloway, and even by daylight it is quite gloomy there, and at night, pitch dark."

"I know what you mean," answered Dick. "It will suit us excellently—nothing could be better."

"Is this holloway to the right or the left when we leave your door?"

"To the right."

"Then the van will pass this house before we attack it?"

"Yes."

"So much the better, then. Is there any chance of it stopping?"

"I think not."

"Still, if it should, endeavour to loosen the pins in the wheels. If there should be a break down it will make our task so much the easier."

"I fear there is not much chance of that either. However, you may depend that I shall do all that lies in my power to assist you."

"I do not doubt it."

"Will you start now?"

"Yes, if you will lead us to the stables."

"Follow me, then."

Without another word, the landlord conducted the highwaymen to the stables, where they found all the horses perfectly safe and looking very comfortable.

To lead them out and mount only occupied a few moments.

"Be prepared for the result," said Dick, to the landlord.

"I will."

But fancying his meaning was not thoroughly comprehended, Turpin added:

"The chances are a thousand to one whether you will see any of us again."

"I shall never forget you!" was the answer, given with great warmth. "My everlasting gratitude——"

"Tush—tush! I want to hear no more of that. We are merely serving ourselves."

"I cannot look upon it in that light."

"Well—well, what I was going to say is that, immediately upon releasing our friend we shall beat a precipitate retreat—in a short time we shall be miles from here, no doubt."

The landlord nodded.

"Your son will then be left to shift for himself. I shall not be able to single him out from the rest, for I have not the slightest idea what his personal appearance is like, and, even if I have, I question whether I should have any chance of recognising him."

"What will he do, then?"

"That I must leave to you. If you can contrive to meet with him soon after his liberation is effected all will be well. Of course he will have to quit the country."

The landlord sighed.

"Better do that voluntarily than in the convict ship. One thing you may depend upon, and that is, that the closest search and most vigorous pursuit will be made after all those who are set at liberty, so that your son will have to be both careful and expeditious in his movements."

The landlord's countenance grew still more thoughtful in its expression.

It was pretty clear that he had been too much excited and bewildered by what had occurred to give much thought to future arrangements.

"If—if——" he said, and then stopped.

"Speak on," cried Dick.

"If, then, you would not mind adding to the bond of obligation——"

"Pooh—pooh, State your wish freely and clearly."

"You are generous. I was about to ask you to give me your advice in this matter. What do you think would be the best thing for my son to do?"

Dick seemed deeply plunged in thought for a few moments.

Then, looking up, he replied:

"My advice is simple enough."

"And no doubt all the better on that very account."

"You shall judge. I should recommend your son to push on with all speed to Sheerness—or the nearest point on the coast where he can get a ship. Then let him embark, and as soon as he is in a place of safety he can communicate with you."

"Nothing could be simpler and better!" cried the landlord, with the air of one who feels immensely relieved. "My best thanks, gentlemen, are your due; and should there ever be an opportunity, you may depend I shall do my best to requite you."

"Enough—enough! As that point is settled, we will say farewell. It is quite time we took up our position."

In this the landlord coincided, and after the exchange of a few more words they separated.

It was at a quiet, easy pace that Dick Turpin led the way towards the spot that had been described to him by the landlord.

"We have abundant cause to congratulate ourselves," he remarked to his comrades. "Fortune has indeed favoured us to an extraordinary degree."

"You are quite right, Dick," returned Claude Duval, "and, what is more, I am inclined to look upon the good luck we have already met with as a presage of the success which is to attend our efforts."

"It will be well to think so—at the same time, in spite of every obstacle, Tom Davis must be set at liberty!"

"We will do our best, Dick, and we can do no more."

"I am aware of it. I am chiefly concerned to know how many officers are actually in attendance upon the vehicle."

"That is an important point; but we have no means of ascertaining it."

"That is just what I regret. However, as soon as we commence the attack let us direct all our energies to the liberation of the prisoners, because, as soon as they are free, they will assist us in our struggles with the officers."

This speech was received in silence, from which it may be inferred that Dick's comrades felt somewhat doubtful regarding this conclusion.

Dick did not speak again, but changed his mare's speed from a walk to a gentle trot.

This soon served to bring them to the spot they wished to reach.

Upon arriving, they found that the landlord's description of the holloway was perfectly correct, and a close examination convinced them that a better place for their purpose could not possibly have been found.

They looked upon this as a good omen, and were in the best of spirits accordingly.

At one time it would seem as though the high-road had been carried over a high but steep hill—or, more properly, ridge, which extended to the right and left for a considerable distance.

The difficulty and danger consequent upon making so steep an ascent and descent had led to the road being made level, or nearly so, by cutting a way through the ridge in question.

The consequence was, that for a distance of something like two hundred yards the road was bounded by a high and almost perpendicular embankment, which was somewhat higher on one side than the other.

These embankments were covered all over with orake, furze bushes, and such like vegetation, while here and there a huge tree rose up, stretching its giant branches far over the roadway.

The size of these trees sufficed to show that this lowering of the road was no modern improvement.

From these causes this part of the roadway was involved in great obscurity.

The high banks shut out a great deal of light, and cast a deep shadow, and the trees only served to increase the gloom.

So dark was it that when they backed their horses close to one side and stood together, the highwaymen were scarcely able to distinguish each other's countenances.

They listened for some moments in perfect silence.

No sound, however, resembling the approach of the vehicle reached their ears.

"Look to your weapons," said Dick, at length, and setting the example of examining his own while he spoke. "You cannot be too careful, and, above everything, have your firearms in readiness."

His companions soon ascertained that all was well in this particular, and Tom King observed:

"I have been wondering, Dick, what means you think of adopting in order to bring the vehicle to a standstill. It will not be like calling out to an ordinary driver, bear in mind. The officers, depend upon it, will be sharp enough to know that their best chance will be in lashing their horses onwards, and you may depend this is what they will do. If they once get out of this shadow they will ascertain our exact force, and I fear matters will go hardly with us."

"I have been thinking about all that," replied Dick, "and I cannot quite see my way clear at present."

"How, captain?"

"Why, if we place any obstruction in the road it must be of a somewhat substantial character to bring a heavy vehicle to a standstill."

"Well, what of that?"

"Why, it will necessarily take some time to construct, and then, by the time we have done it, something else may come along."

"You are right, captain."

"Then if we wait till we know the van is coming we shall not have time to get ready the obstruction at all."

"Some means of stopping the van must most certainly be devised," replied Claude Duval, "and I should suggest that one of us should ride on towards London for some distance, take up a good position, and then, upon hearing the van approach, gallop back and let you know."

"That is about all that can be done, I fancy," returned Dick. "Who will take this duty?"

"I will, if you like," said Claude.

"Then do so, as you were the first to propose it."

"Then about the obstruction?"

"That can easily be managed," Sixteen-String Jack cried, "for in the yard at the back of the inn we have just left I saw some large, strong, square pieces of wood. One of these brought, and placed right across the roadway, and firmly fixed a foot or two above the ground, will be the thing above all others to stop the van."

"It will," said Dick, "and now let us spend no further time in consultation. You, Claude, ride off at once, and give us timely notice of the police officers' approach; and you, Jack, obtain one of the pieces of wood you mention. In the meanwhile Tom and myself will remain here together, awaiting your return."

CHAPTER MIX.

DICK TURPIN AND HIS COMPANIONS ATTACK THE PRISONERS' VAN.

Upon this understanding both Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack took their departure.

Dick Turpin and Tom King watched them in silence till they had both disappeared in the darkness, then, turning round, the latter said:

"It will be sharp work, Dick, you may depend; and after this event, rely upon it, the officers will make greater efforts than ever to capture us."

"I have been thinking so myself, and believe the best thing we can arrange to do is to lie quiet for a time somewhere."

"Unquestionably it would; but what shall you do with Tom Davis?"

"Get him safely out of the country, I think."

"It would be much the best; for after having been successful so far the authorities will be furious when they find their prey has slipped through their fingers."

"And, what is more, they will spare no efforts to make him a prisoner again, and should they once do that it will be all over with him. Hark!"

"What do you hear?"

"It is Sixteen-String Jack, I think."

"Yes, or some one else on horseback coming from the direction of the inn. But, Dick——"

"What now?"

"I have just thought of something which we have forgotten."

"What is it?"

"To provide a horse for Tom Davis."

Dick uttered an exclamation.

"That quite escaped me altogether; but it is not now too late to supply the omission."

"Stay. I think is is quite as well that we have not incumbered ourselves with a spare horse."

"But where is Tom to ride?"

"Why, it will be better for him to ride by turns behind all of us. Besides, he may not be altogether in a fit condition to spring on to a horse and ride off at full gallop. We think nothing of it because we are used to it; but it is impossible to say in what way his imprisonment may have affected him."

Dick assented, and then both became silent.

After the lapse of a few moments, during which the beat of a horse's feet had become more and more distinct, Sixteen-String Jack appeared dragging after him a long piece of wood, such as would be suitable for building purposes.

His companions sprang forward eagerly to assist him.

"This is just what we want," cried Dick.

"Is it long enough?"

"Yes, quite."

Nevertheless, to make quite sure, the wood was tried, and found to be quite long enough.

They also perceived that there would be little difficulty in wedging the ends of it between the masses of sandstone of which the lower part of the holloway was composed.

Once more drawing back to their former positions, they waited with great impatience for Claude to appear and give them warning of the approach of the prisoners' van.

It so happened that their suspense was not put to a very severe trial, for Claude Duval appeared suddenly among them.

So suddenly that his appearance caused them all to give vent to expressions of amazement.

"Is it coming?"

"Yes—yes," he answered, somewhat breathlessly.

"But how is it you have come upon us with so much abruptness—we never heard your horse's hoofs."

"I did not intend you should. I purposely took to the meadows at the side of the high-road in order that no suspicions should be awakened in the breasts of the police officers."

During this hurried conversation all four of the highwaymen were busily occupied in raising the barrier which they had devised.

It promised to be an effective one, for the piece of wood, though slight, was strong, and, as they expected, they succeeded in wedging the ends in between the rocks with great firmness.

"Now, my comrades," said Claude, "just let me bid you to prepare, for we shall have the toughest bit of fighting to do to-night that we have ever had in all our lives before!"

"We are ready."

"So am I. Did I tell you I had a peep at the van?"

"No, no—have you seen it?"

"Yes. After going some distance I took to the meadows, and pushed on until presently a vehicle came in sight. I pulled up, and, taking care to keep well under cover, watched it go by."

"And was it well guarded?"

"Pretty well."

"By how many officers?"

"Six or seven."

Dick gave a long whistle, and then ejaculated:

"Rather long odds!"

"Very, I should say."

"Are you sure there are so many?"

"Tolerably so. I saw either four or five riding on the outside of the van, and two more were riding on horseback at the sides."

"Indeed, then, you may depend that these will be the men who will give us the most trouble. There must be no blundering, mind," Dick added. "You must understand that it is a life or death matter—either they will slay us or we must slay them, and of the two evils I should prefer the latter. When those officers come, attack them at once, and down with them!"

"There they are, then," cried Claude.

Scarcely had the words escaped his lips, than a distant rumbling sound was heard—a sound which could not be mistaken.

"Are your weapons all ready?" asked Dick. "Make quite sure."

"All's well, captain."

"Then keep well out of sight until the horses reach the barrier, then the greater suddenness with which you spring out the better."

They were anxious moments that elapsed while they listened to the approach of the heavy vehicle—anxious in every sense of the term.

Keeping a tight hand upon their bridles, they watched with eyes strained in the endeavour to pierce the gloom.

At length a dark object appeared in view, and, as if to assure his comrades that there was no mistake, Claude whispered:

"There it is—that is it!"

"Be ready, then," said Dick, in a low but firm tone.

There was neither time nor opportunity to utter another word.

The prisoners' van was drawn by four horses, for the authorities were anxious that the journey should be made with all possible speed, and it came on at a truly slashing pace.

This the highwaymen were glad enough to see, because it promised them all the more success.

Even if the driver should catch sight of the barrier he would not be able to pull up in time to save his horses, while, if they kept up their speed, the vehicle would be brought to a standstill with so much suddenness that the whole of the officers would for a second at least be quite overcome with surprise.

And now, strangely enough, the two officers on horseback who had been riding a little in advance of the two leading horses dropped back to the rear for some purpose or other.

Had they kept their proper positions, and the positions they were intended to take, namely, about twenty paces in front of the leading horses, the barrier would have been discovered.

But it was fated that events should turn out otherwise.

With a crash that was truly awful and sickening to hear, the two first horses dashed with full force against the barrier.

Down they went as if struck by lightning, and it was a thousand wonders they did not bring the other two horses down with them. They lay on the ground kicking and plunging at a furious rate, and making terrific though ineffectual attempts to rise.

Owing to the sudden stoppage, the van swayed backwards and forwards in an alarming manner for a moment, and it really seemed for a time as though it would overbalance and topple to the ground.

But it righted itself.

In the meantime Sixteen-String Jack had hastened to the spot where the two fore horses were lying.

With about three strokes of his sword he demolished the harness which obstructed their movements.

No sooner were the animals freed from this incumbrance than, making another tremendous effort, they rose to their feet and started off at a headlong gallop down the road.

While Jack was thus employed, his comrades were fully occupied.

The police officers for a few fleeting seconds seemed absolutely paralysed by the suddenness of the shock.

Our friends made the most of this advantage.

In a loud voice Dick Turpin cried:

"Surrender—surrender! Resistance is folly, and can only end in death! Our force far exceeds yours, and we are determined; therefore surrender ere blood be spilt!"

"Surrender be d—d!" said a voice. "Here they are at last! Down with them! One good volley sweeps them from our path! Fire!"

Before the officers had time to obey this order of the one who had command of them, the highwaymen fired their pistols, then rapidly shifted their positions.

The consequence was that when the officers fired their volley—and as they had their fingers pressing on the triggers they could not stop themselves—it was absolutely of no effect, while the highwaymen had seriously wounded two of their assailants, and injured the right arm of another.

It was at this moment that a tremendous uproar began to make itself heard within the van.

The prisoners, with wonderful quickness, seemed to have arrived at a correct conclusion respecting what was going on outside, and were making the most frantic efforts to liberate themselves accordingly.

At this our friends rejoiced, nor did they fail to call aloud to the prisoners, urging them to use their best efforts to procure their own liberation.

The officer who drove the van was possessed of no ordinary amount of courage, for, in spite of the peril of his position, he laid about him with his whip with great vigour, doing his utmost to get his horses once more in motion.

He might have succeeded in his intent, for the barrier had been broken down by the weight of the horses falling upon it, but Claude Duval kept a tight hold upon the bridle of the off horse with his right hand, while with his left he brought down with one shot the remaining mounted officer.

The odds against the highwaymen were now by no means so great as before, therefore not unreasonably they looked forward with great hopes to their success.

Still there was much to be done.

The officers who remained were resolute, determined men, and seemed as though they would fight to the last gasp rather than surrender their prey.

There was great necessity for speed, as the alarm might be spread and reach the officers who, as our friends knew, were before them on the road, and who had almost had time enough to reach their destination and turn back again.

In all probability it was the belief that assistance was near at hand which made the officers hold out and fight with so much desperation.

All at once there was a terrific crash.

The prisoners within, by some means or other, had contrived to burst open the door at the back.

They rolled out pell-mell, and the scene of confusion which now ensued defies all description.

When this event took place the officers gave up.

They knew too well the general character of the prisoners to doubt but that they would seek the very earliest opportunity of wreaking vengeance upon them.

Therefore those who were unhurt, and those who were wounded as well, turned towards the highwaymen and cried:

"We surrender—we surrender, upon condition that you save us from the brutality of the prisoners!"

This supplication was at once granted.

At the command of Dick, the officers unharnessed the two remaining horses, mounted them as best they could, carrying their wounded companions with them, and so they made their escape; for, as Dick said, he could not possibly hope to exercise much control over the men who had been liberated, and who, for the most part, were quite unworthy of receiving such a benefit.

But in the haste and hurry of the moment, Dick and his comrades overlooked a most important circumstance.

They ought to have taken care that the officers had ridden off in the direction of London, as then there would have been less danger of meeting with assistance; as it was, they were permitted to gallop off in precisely the opposite direction.

The coast was now quite clear, and Dick called out, in a loud voice:

"Tom Davis—Tom Davis, where are you? Speak out! We are your friends come to your assistance!"

There was no reply.

The highwaymen looked uneasy.

But just as they were beginning to wonder whether, after all, they had not made an awful mistake and released the wrong lot of prisoners, they heard a well-known voice say, faintly:

"Here I am, captain—here I am! I could not speak before—joy overcame me, and took away my voice."

Guided by the sound, Dick and his comrades made their way towards the back part of the van.

Then ensued an immediate hush and silence.

Those who had been thus unexpectedly released stood still and noiseless, in order that they might catch sight of their deliverers.

"Quick—quick!" cried Turpin, to them. "Do not dally, as you value your liberties! Fly—fly at once, or you will have the officers once more among you!"

The prospect of this event seemed to strike an immediate panic to their hearts.

With one rapid and simultaneous rushing movement, they turned round, and, with incredible swiftness, disappeared in the darkness.

They dispersed in all directions, so that it would be no easy task for the officers to capture them now.

But Dick soon ceased to observe them.

His attention was concentrated upon a single object.

This was Tom Davis, who still seemed thoroughly overcome.

All at once, however, he started to his feet, and sprang towards Dick Turpin, whose hands he seized upon with a frenzied grasp.

Despite Dick's resistance, he carried them to his lips, pressed them to his bosom, and displayed a thousand frantic emotions of joy and gratitude.

Then, sinking down upon one knee, he said:

"Captain—captain, my life now is yours—do with it whatever you think fit! I could not believe that you would forsake one who has proved true to you after so many have proved false! And yet this was more—far more than I dared hope for—nay, more than I deserved, for you have all perilled your lives for me."

"Nonsense—nonsense, Tom!" cried Dick Turpin, in careless tones. "You might have known that we should not abandon you to your fate without making at least an effort to save you. Rise—rise! Quit that position, for we must fly at once if we mean to secure your safety!"

With much difficulty, Tom Davis was prevailed upon to rise to his feet, and even then he continued to pour out his protestations of gratitude.

His state of mind is easily understood, for he had been suddenly and unexpectedly transported from the lowest depths of despair to the very summit of hope.

He had given himself up for lost when, on leaving Newgate, he was placed with the rest in the hearse-like prisoners' van.

Now, almost with the suddenness of enchantment, he was a free man.

The change was almost enough to overpower anyone.

With what rapidity they could, they mounted their horses, Tom Davis being first accommodated with a seat behind Dick Turpin.

It was then found that Sixteen-String Jack had been wounded in the conflict.

The others had sustained no greater injuries than a few scratches, and these were of so insignificant a character that they were not worth talking about.

Jack, however, had been struck in the left shoulder by a pistol bullet.

At first he had thought nothing of it whatever, believing the wound to be much less serious than it proved.

Now, however, that he had had time to grow somewhat cool, he found, upon attempting to move, that his shoulder was perfectly still and the least change of position was the cause of intolerable pain.

So great was the anguish caused by the exertion of mounting his horse that he almost fell from the saddle after he had seated himself, owing to the deathlike feeling of faintness and dizziness that came over him.

Claude was the first to notice this circumstance, and he cried out:

"Jack—Jack, you are hurt more severely than you gave us to understand!"

"I—I—fear I am."

"I am sure you are."

"I should be better, I think, if you could bandage my wound up with my neckcloth. Now I have moved, I can feel it has begun to bleed afresh."

"By all means do so," said Dick Turpin, who, nevertheless, felt rather uneasy at the delay that must of necessity occur.

But Claude Duval was very expeditious in his movements.

It was by no means the first time that he had bandaged a wound, though this time the difficulty of the operation was much increased, owing to Jack's position on horseback, and he would by no means allow him to alight, for his experience told him that the dressing of the wound would cause a renewal of the sensation of faintness; moreover, there would be the danger of shifting the bandage in the act of mounting.

A piece of the linen was first torn off his neck cloth and soaked in water, plenty of which was trickling down the sides of the rocks.

This piece was folded square and placed upon the wound, and the neckcloth bound tightly over the whole.

"There," said Claude Duval, "it is true a professed surgeon might have made a better job of it perhaps, but I question whether it would have been more effectual in stanching the blood."

At this moment the attention of all was aroused by hearing on the road the clatter of horses' feet.

"The officers at last!" ejaculated Dick. "I have been expecting them for some time! Forward—forward!"

"Ride on first," said Claude Duval; "you carry a double burden. I shall have time to complete my operations."

"No, no," said Sixteen-String Jack, "you shall not run any risk of fresh danger on my behalf; I shall do very well as I am."

"Be quiet!" said Claude. "Save your strength for something better than mere words."

"Yes," said Dick, "go on with your task; we will neither of us start until it is completed."

It would have greatly annoyed anyone to have seen how coolly Claude Duval proceeded with his task; one would have thought that there was no occasion for haste at all.

But those who watched him closely would have seen that this slowness was only apparent, and was caused by his extreme calmness.

That he was, on the contrary, very rapid in his movements was evinced by the few seconds it took him to finish properly bandaging the wound.

Nevertheless, by that time the officers had now got very close to the highwaymen.

Looking along the road, the officers could plainly be distinguished coming along like a cloud, though it was questionable whether they could see the highwaymen as yet, because our friends were standing in the deep shadow of the holloway.

CHAPTER MX.

THE HIGHWAYMEN SUFFER THEMSELVES TO BE LULLED INTO A STATE OF FALSE SECURITY.

"ARE you ready, Claude?" asked Dick.

"Yes, quite."

"Forward, then—forward, then! We have not a second to lose! Follow me!"

As he spoke, Dick Turpin turned Black Bess's head in the direction of London.

But he did not long pursue this course.

He availed himself of the first lane he came to being anxious to get fairly into the open country.

The turning down the lane, however, was not accomplished without being seen by the officers, who, observing the movement, uttered a cry of gratification.

They did not dare to expect that they should be able to overtake the fugitives; but they did hope to be able to keep upon their track, and not lose sight of them.

As was generally his custom in such a case as the present, Dick Turpin urged his mare onwards to the full extent of her power, being aware that a sharp push for a short time would not be likely to fatigue her so much as a long gallop at something like an ordinary rate of speed.

Although Black Bess carried a double load, it was surprising to see with what ease she maintained the lead.

The other horses had all the advantage, but yet they kept in the rear.

The speed they made, however, was something prodigious, and it is probable they would never have accomplished it but for the stimulus Black Bess was to them.

The officers were quickly left in the rear; but yet, as the lane had gone winding on without branching off in any fresh direction, there could be no doubt that they were still fairly on the track

This was a state of things, however, that Dick Turpin was resolved to put an end to.

Finding a five-barred gate some distance ahead which led into a field, he pulled up.

His companions hastened to follow his example, and when the commotion caused by their stoppage had died away, Dick assumed an attitude of listening.

"I can hear nothing of them," he said at length, "so it is fair to presume they cannot hear us—indeed, they may not be listening at this precise moment."

"Black Bess has carried her double load long enough, I think," responded Tom King.

"Yes, and you may take your turn next, if you have no objection," replied Dick.

"None in the world," was the answer. "Come Tom Davis, the sooner we are off again, I am sure, the better."

"Through the gate yonder," said Dick. "I will open it and close it securely afterwards. In the meanwhile, you push across the meadow; I will quickly overtake you"

"Shall you attempt to regain the ruins to-night?"

"I think not; it would be unwise, for at the most we cannot count upon more than an hour's darkness."

"Scarcely that."

"But I was thinking of Jack's wound. If we could by any possibility get back it would be an advantage to him."

"Never mind me," murmured Sixteen-String Jack, faintly.

Tom replied, without taking any notice of the interruption.

"We can easily obtain some place of shelter where we can pass the day, then we can set out for the ruins at nightfall; rely upon it, that would be much the best in every way."

"It would be better for Jack," said Claude Duval "The less exertion he goes through during the next few hours the better, and the sooner he will recover."

"That is sufficient to decide me. Quick! On—on, or we shall have the officers at our heels again! Once through the gate we shall be tolerably safe from their pursuit, for they will, ten to one, ride on."

Not another moment was lost in carrying out Dick Turpin's suggestions.

The gate was opened, the little party passed through, and Dick carefully closed it after them, so that there was actually nothing whatever to induce the officers to suppose that the fugitives had passed that way.

Rapidly mounting, he rode after his comrades.

Trifling as was the delay caused by fastening the gate yet, as his companions had put their horses to speed, it had enabled them to get a long way in advance.

But Black Bess seemed to pass over three yards while they passed over two, so that very quickly indeed she was in her accustomed place in front.

Dick then checked her speed, and as he did so, and thought how quickly she had outstripped the rest, he could not help the reflection occurring to him that had he been alone he could easily have regained the ruins before daylight, and so have saved Maud many hours of anguished suspense.

Somehow, whenever he thought of her he experienced a strange tightening at the chest and heaviness of heart, which made him dread that some evil had befallen her.

And yet in the next breath he would ask himself what harm could happen to her there.

Certainly none.

The only fear was that she might find the solitude insupportable and quit the protection of the ruins.

In this case it was hard to say what harm might happen.

So much did this feeling of uneasiness grow upon him in spite of all the strenuous efforts he made to banish it, that he felt almost inclined to propose to his comrades that he should gallop off alone, and leave them to follow at their leisure.

But this looked by far too much like deserting his friends to make Dick feel inclined to adopt it, and so he rode on, though his impatience was manifested by the long distance he kept in advance of his comrades, who continued to press forward with all the speed their horses were capable of.

In this manner they continued the journey on across the open country without meeting with any interruption till morning dawned.

Where they were was rather a difficult thing to ascertain, and Dick began to look around him accordingly, in the hope of being able to recognise some features of the landscape.

But no—all was strange to him, and to the best of his belief it was a portion of the country he had never before been in.

Upon making inquiry of his companions he found them to be equally at fault.

"No matter," he answered. "In all probability before going much further we shall find a little habitation where we can ask for shelter without fear of being recognised."

"Yes, surely no resident of this part could be familiar with our outward appearance."

"I should think not."

During this brief consultation the little party had halted upon the summit of a piece of gently-rising ground, from which a tolerably extensive view of country could be obtained.

It was growing lighter every moment now, and the longer they gazed more objects came into view.

Raising his arm and pointing straight before him, Tom King exclaimed:

"Look, Dick, I fancy among those trees I can perceive a thin wreath of smoke curling up as though from a cottage fire freshly lighted!"

Upon looking in the direction indicated, Dick perceived that his companion was right.

"Shall we make our way towards it?" asked Tom King. "It seems to be in a very sheltered situation, and therefore just the place for us on that very account."

"Yes," said Dick, "that will suit as well as anywhere, no doubt."

Accordingly they set out for the cottage, the thin wreath of bright blue smoke curling upwards enabling them to direct their course with great precision.

The scenery around was truly delightful, and from every bush and tree birds could be heard pouring out their twittering melodies, to which the murmuring of water and the rustling of the tree-tops made an excellent accompaniment.

Gazing upon such a scene, it was hard to believe that there could be in the world such things as strife and crime.

As they rode on there was not one of the group that was not amenable to the influences of this sweet morning in early spring.

As they drew nearer to the hut or cottage the harmony of the scene was rudely broken in upon and disturbed by the sound of harsh, discordant voices engaged in quarrelling.

Our friends heard this long before the habitation itself came into view.

At last, breaking through the trees, they saw before them a little thatch-covered building of picturesque appearance.

In front and at the rear was a large piece of garden ground, which showed signs of having once been in the highest state of cultivation, but now everything had a forlorn, neglected look.

At one time, and certainly not long ago, the front of the house had been ornamented with honeysuckle and woodbine, which had been made to twine all over it, but now their long branches trailed upon the ground in the utmost disorder.

Near the garden gate were a couple of children, a boy and a girl, both of whom were crying bitterly.

The sounds of contention that had come from within now abruptly ceased.

Probably those engaged in the wordy war had looked through the windows and witnessed the arrival of the new-comers.

This was no doubt the case, for at the door two specimens of humanity made their appearance.

One was a man of particularly brutal and sinister aspect, although there lingered about him indications which to a close observer pointed to the fact that he had once been a very different individual.

Behind him, shading the light from her eyes in order to take a better view of their visitors, was a dirty, untidy woman—undoubtedly the wife of the man.

Dick Turpin, as may be guessed, was by no means pleased with the exterior of these people, and wished from the bottom of his heart that they had turned some other way.

There was no positive reason why they should not ride on and seek some other place, but a second's reflection told Dick that it was the best and wisest course to keep out of sight as much as possible.

These people had seen him, and he was determined if possible that they should be the only ones who would.

Therefore, controlling that disgust which he could with difficulty prevent from showing in his countenance, he said:

"We are travellers, as you see, and have been so unfortunate as to lose our way in the darkness; we have wandered I know not how many miles, and have not been able to find a human habitation of any kind except this cottage of yours, which we deem ourselves lucky in having lighted upon. We are now quite weary, and should be glad if you would allow us shelter for a little while in order that our horses and ourselves may obtain a rest."

This was a very long speech for Dick to make, but he paused frequently in order to give, as he thought, an opportunity of speaking or of offering that for which he was in the end obliged to ask.

He might have spoken for an hour resultlessly, for even after he had finished there was no reply whatever made.

The man and woman looked in each other's faces and seemed to be having a silent conversation between themselves—most likely as to whether an affirmative or negative answer should be returned.

At last, with considerable awkwardness and embarrassment, the man said:

"If your honors don't mind taking up with such an untidy place as ours is——"

"It will suit us very well," said Dick. "We are quite exhausted, so make no more apologies."

"I was only going to say," continued the man, "that not very far from here there is a decent inn, where you would find much better accommodation than we can give; there are also stables where your horses could be fed."

Dick's determination to keep as much out of sight as possible exerted its full influence on this occasion, and made him resolve to refuse this tempting offer.

"We will go there if you like," said Dick, "but we prefer staying here to going even a yard further, we are so completely knocked up—so if you like to do your best, rely upon it we will pay you well for the accommodation."

These last words appeared to be productive of great effect.

"It shall be just as your honours like," replied the man—"it is not for such as me to dictate to you."

While the man was giving utterance to these not very hospitable words the whole party alighted.

It was now for the first time that it struck Dick that the fact of one of their horses carrying a double burden was, to say the least of it, a suspicious circumstance.

This might perhaps account to some extent for the surliness of the man's behaviour.

What plausible explanation to give Dick did not know, therefore very wisely determined to pass it over in silence.

The highwaymen all regretted that there was no accommodation for their horses, but this could not be helped, so they had to submit to it.

The man, upon promise of reward, however, undertook to obtain for them a plentiful supply of fresh green grass.

Our friends now entered the cottage, and found that the interior corresponded well with the exterior, for it was a complete picture of dirt and neglect.

That the woman was not dead to its condition was proved by her apologies.

[THE DREADFUL FATE OF MAUD'S COMPANION.]

"Ah, gentlemen, this is a sorry place for you to put your heads in, is it not?" she exclaimed, heaving a deep sigh while she spoke. "It was not always so, however, though I am in despair of any change for the better taking place again. It's drink that's done all this, sir—nothing but drink. My husband was the best man in the whole country-side until he became what he is now—a confirmed, hopeless drunkard. It will bring us to the workhouse yet, for I have followed his bad example, and am little better than he is, though I take shame to myself for saying it. But, then, if it was not for the drink stupefying me, how do you think I could bear all this?"

The woman paused in her gossip, and with her apron wiped the tears from her eyes.

The cottage was divided into two rooms, and into the inner one she now proceeded to usher the highwaymen.

It had no doubt been called at one time the parlour, but now most of the articles it had contained had been carried away, though still it was a comfortable apartment contrasted with the other.

It was not likely that our friends would fare very well in such quarters as these, yet they managed to make a tolerable meal.

Their success, however, and the belief that they were now in a position of absolute safety, caused them to forget that amount of caution which they generally exercised, for they talked loudly, and called one another by their names without the least reserve.

As the day wore on, they one by one felt a great drowsiness come over them, to which the profound silence around in no slight degree contributed.

The woman, who, like all her sex, was curious in the highest degree, crept cautiously close to the door, and, applying her ear to the keyhole, listened intently.

She had little difficulty in making out what was uttered.

After listening for some time, she rose, and quitted the house.

She glanced around for her husband, and caught sight of him carrying some fodder to the horses.

"Jack, you lazy, drunken villain," she said, in a suppressed voice, "come here!"

"What now?" he growled. "What do you want to be throwing that in my teeth for ever?"

"You deserve it, you idle wretch! Come here, I say! What was that I heard you talking about the other day? You know what I mean—about those robbers?"

"What robbers?" said the man, sulkily, having apparently paid but slight attention to his wife's words.

"You know very well what robbers without asking. I mean Dick Turpin, and all that lot."

"Don't bother."

"But I shall, you idle sot! What reward did you tell me was offered for them?"

"Why, somewhere about three thousand pounds, I think. But why do you ask?" he added, struck by the unusual expression upon his wife's countenance.

"Because," said she, clutching him by the arm so tightly that her nails were almost buried in the flesh —"because they are all four in the house now, and another man with them, whom they call Tom Davis."

Having made this communication, she released her hold upon her husband's arm.

He staggered back aghast with surprise.

"How do you know, you witch?" he at last gasped out.

"Be quiet, fool; they will hear you!"

"But how do you know it?"

"I have been listening at the door, and have heard them talking."

This was so rational and probable a source of knowledge that the man could not utter another word.

He sat down upon a log hard by, and rubbed his forehead vigorously.

It was more than his mind could take in at once.

"Now, dolt," cried his wife, "do you know what you must do?"

He gazed blankly at her.

"Listen to me and I will tell you," she added. "You must make the best of your way to the nearest place where you are likely to find any officers—don't speak a word to anyone on the way, mind, or you will lose the reward—then tell them to come here."

"And perhaps by that time they will have left."

"No fear of that if you make haste. They seem very tired, and some are actually going to sleep, so you cannot have a better chance. They are sure to stay an hour or two; but make as much haste as you can."

Upon this the man rose from his seat and prepared to start.

Just then his eyes happened to alight upon the horses, and as they did so his face brightened as though he had been struck by a capital idea.

"Hadn't I better take one of those horses?" he said. "I could be back then in half the time."

"No, you fool," was the reply, "you had better do nothing of the sort! Ten to one if they did not hear you, and then it will be all up at once; and one might pop out while you are away and then what could I tell them? and besides, you have never been across a horse's back in your life, you looby, so how can you ride. I should like to know?"

The woman's words were poured out with that particular amount of fluency for which the feminine organs of speech are so remarkable.

The last point seemed to settle the matter.

"Make haste, you besotted idiot," she muttered, "and never mind bothering your own stupid brains; just attend to me—that is all you have to do! Be off, I say—be off without another word!"

With these words ringing in his ears, the man hurried off, while the woman, in a perfect fever, returned to the house.

All was silent in the inner room, or parlour, as she always called it.

The fact was, the whole of the party was asleep with the exception of Sixteen-String Jack, the pain of whose wound prevented from slumbering, therefore he had undertaken to keep good watch and ward while his companions reposed themselves.

But even the silence was not without its effect on him, for he was greatly fatigued, and every now and then he dozed off for a few moments; but the intolerable smarting of his wound would make him start awake again.

At length, desirous to shake off his drowsiness, he rose and gently opening the door, stepped out.

The woman no sooner saw him than she appeared overcome with terror.

Jack noticed her confusion, but was very far from suspecting the cause of it.

Passing out quickly, he made his way to where the horses were standing.

The animals were perfectly safe and quiet, and apparently tolerably comfortable.

Observing that all the grass was eaten, he looked around him for the man, and not seeing him, went back towards the front door of the house.

"My good woman," he said, "where is your husband?"

"My husband, sir?" she said, her voice quavering like some extraordinary musical instrument out of tune—"my—my—husband, sir?"

"Yes!" said Jack, speaking rather angrily, for his wound just then gave him a terrific twinge. "Where is he? Where's he gone, I say? What's the matter with you? Are you struck dumb or what?"

CHAPTER MXI.

THE HIGHWAYMEN RETURN TO THE RUINS AND MEET WITH A SURPRISE OF AN UNEXPECTED CHARACTER.

How true it is that a guilty conscience stands in need of no accuser!

The woman jumped at once to the conclusion that Jack had fathomed all, without pausing to think how highly improbable it was that such should be the case.

Her hesitation and confusion went far towards changing suspicion into certainty.

Jack eyed her closely.

"I—I am not drunk, sir," the woman managed to articulate at last; "but you spoke so sudden and sharp-like, that I thought something must be the matter, and felt frightened."

Jack was only half satisfied with this explanation.

"Where is your husband, woman? Why do you not answer me that question?"

"I—I thought he was outside. He—he must have gone to look for some more food for the horses."

"It may be so," said Jack, "for they require it, and I was going to tell him to seek for some at once."

The woman drew a long breath of relief.

Finding that her worst expectations had not been realised, she recovered her usual calmness and presence of mind with wonderful rapidity.

"Shall I go and look for him, and tell him what you say? I daresay I can find him."

"Yes, do so. If our horses are not fed we cannot complete our journey."

Without another word the woman withdrew.

Jack stood at the front door and watched her take her departure.

He was unable to see her for long, however, as the dense masses of trees around quickly hid her from his view.

How long he remained leaning idly against the door-post Sixteen-String Jack had no conception, for he seemed to fall off into a drowsy half-slumber, during which he was just conscious of where he stood and nothing more.

When at length he started up wide awake, he found the setting sun shining redly in his face.

At first he was dazzled and half blinded with the glare, but putting his hands to his eyes to screen off the ardent rays, he perceived the woman approaching.

She was alone.

"Have you found your husband?" Jack asked, as she came nearer.

"Yes," was the reply. "All is well. He will be here in a short time."

If Jack had known exactly how long he had stood at the door his suspicions would have had full force.

As it was he turned round and entered the room where he had left his companions

The noise he made in entering aroused them.

They all looked up inquiringly.

"Well," said Dick, who was the first to speak, "how now, Jack? Is all well?"

"I scarcely know how to answer you," said Jack, in a faint whisper, for the conviction irresistibly came over him that the woman was listening at the door. "But the man has gone off somewhere—perhaps, for aught I know, to betray us."

"Pooh—pooh, Jack," returned Turpin, "there is no fear of that. How is he to know us? Just tell me that."

Jack was silent.

"It's your wound," added Dick. "It has made you feel nervous and unnecessarily alarmed. Sit down and calm yourself. We will make another levy upon the provisions in this house, and then we will depart. By then darkness will have fairly set in."

Sixteen-String Jack was not, however, in the least inclined to sit down.

He walked to the window and looked out.

Suddenly he uttered an exclamation.

"Look—look!" he ejaculated. "This is just exactly what I feared and expected."

"What—what?"

"We are betrayed! Yonder is a troop of police officers! Quick—quick! If we are speedy we may be able to mount and ride away."

This intelligence was so startling and unexpected, that for a second or so it had a paralyzing influence upon all present.

Then simultaneously they rushed to the window, as though unable to credit the statement that had just been made by Jack.

One glance, however, served to dissipate every doubt.

A troop of police officers were just emerging from the trees.

They did not stay to count them; but from the bulk of the throng their numbers could not have been much, if any, under a dozen.

They were every one well mounted, and by their manner it was evident that they were approaching stealthily in order that they might take the highwaymen all the more by surprise.

There could be no doubt in the minds of the highwaymen as to the person by whom they had been betrayed, for the man was walking in front of the officers, and pointing excitedly in the direction of the cottage.

Dick's course of action was decided upon in a moment.

"Come, my friends," he said; "I do believe it is possible for us to get round to the place where our horses stand without being seen by these fellows. If so, we shall be off and away before they are aware of it, and shall in consequence obtain so good a start that by nightfall there is every probability that we shall elude them altogether."

"Come on, then!" cried Tom King. "Do not let us waste another moment."

As he spoke, Tom hastened to the door, and placed his hand upon the latch.

In an instant he discovered the door was fast.

"Caged!" he shouted. "The door is locked!"

"Stand aside, then!" said Claude Duval.

Tom did so, for he guessed what his comrade was about to do.

Gathering up all his energies, Claude Duval rushed across the room, and bore with full force against the door with his shoulder.

It turned out that he put forth about three times as much force as was necessary.

He had not taken into consideration the flimsy construction of the door, and the consequence was that no sooner did his shoulder strike against it than it flew open with great suddenness.

Claude could not stop himself, and, indeed, before he well knew what had happened, he was half-way across the outer apartment.

In his headlong course he came in contact with the woman, who had not time enough to get out of the way.

Down she went, as if struck by a cannon ball, and down went Claude as well, after making several futile efforts to retain his footing

Despite the peril of their position, our friends could not forbear a hearty burst of laughter at this incident.

It was clear, however, that the noise of the scuffle had reached the ears of the police officers, for they could now be seen coming across the open space very rapidly indeed.

"Quick!" said Dick Turpin, as he observed this circumstance—"quick, or we shall, after all, be too late Through yonder window—that will be the best and nearest way. The officers may not see us at all until after we are mounted. Quick—quick!"

Dick Turpin set his companions the example as well as issued his directions

Flinging open a small window, he sprang through it with remarkable dexterity, and found himself close to Black Bess.

"Now, Tom Davis," he exclaimed, "come on! I fancy you had better share my saddle."

In less time than anyone would have deemed possible, the highwaymen were all fairly seated in their saddles, though a slight delay had taken place owing to Sixteen-String Jack having but one arm at liberty.

The police officers, however, must have guessed the highwaymen's design, for they came galloping up at full speed, and, despite all the expedition our friends had used, they found themselves threatened with a hand-to-hand encounter.

This was by no means what they desired, and no sooner had Dick seen that Jack was safely seated in the saddle than he gave the word for an immediate rush.

This was obeyed, though the officers set up a loud shout, in which the word "Surrender!" could be detected.

Not the least notice was taken of it by the highwaymen, however, who bent all their energies to get clear from the present embarrassing situation.

Finding no regard paid to them, the officers discharged a volley from their pistols, and set off in immediate pursuit.

The first act was a very thoughtless and inconsiderate one, but it was performed upon the impulse of the moment.

When the pistols were discharged the fugitives were well out of range.

Consequently no harm was done.

It was fortunate that the trees grew so close at hand, for Dick was thus enabled to get himself and his comrades out of sight of their pursuers almost immediately.

Still, he was careful not to penetrate too deeply into the recesses of the trees, lest they should suddenly encounter some obstacle to their progress.

The police officers, however, were by far too resolute and too close behind them to be shaken off very easily or rapidly.

Dick Turpin nevertheless experienced but a slight amount of uneasiness.

Every moment the shades of evening grew darker and darker, for by this time the sun had dipped below the horizon.

In a short time, however, the confines of the wood were reached, and a vast extent of open country lay spread out before them.

Dick paused a moment, in order to allow Tom Davis to change to Tom King's horse.

The officers could not be very far in the rear, but at present the trees hid them from sight, while the soft turf which was growing everywhere prevented the hoof-beats of their horses from being heard.

"I think the best plan now will be to push on with all the speed our horses are capable of making," said Dick Turpin. "And, if we are careful to make a considerable detour, I believe we shall be able to reach the ruins unperceived, while the period of our arrival need not be later than midnight."

"As you like, captain—you shall decide."

"Forward, then!" cried Dick, without another second's hesitation.

It was perfectly certain, though, that, let them use what speed they might, it would be impossible to get so far away as to be out of sight of the officers, who they expected each moment to see make their appearance among the trees.

The speed at which our friends started off however was such that in a very little while they got over a great deal of ground.

Looking back, however, Dick perceived that the officers had by no means abandoned the chase, nor did they show any indications of being about to cease their endeavours.

That they would be able to come up with our friends was most unlikely, however, for almost at each moment it could be seen that the distance between them had increased.

As they journeyed thus rapidly along that feeling of uneasiness and impatience to which we have before adverted again filled Dick's breast, and this time the intensity of the feeling was increased tenfold.

His imagination busily suggested a thousand evils which might have happened in his absence, and as he went the presentiment of some great grief and danger in store pressed more and more heavily upon his spirits.

In vain he tried, as before, to banish these sensations.

They seemed to laugh at all his efforts.

In such a state of mind as we have faintly and imperfectly described the rapid motion was a relief rather than otherwise, though to his feverish mind the speed at which they went seemed tediously and insufferably slow.

The desire to reach the ruins with as little delay as might be caused him not to make so considerable a detour as he had at first proposed, although by doing so, as he was well aware, he voluntarily courted danger.

His comrades noticed the change in his course with some surprise; but they had undertaken to leave the carrying out of the affair in his hands, and they had so high an opinion of his abilities in such a matter that they never once for a moment thought of making any comment upon it.

The pursuing officers were by this time completely out-distanced, and this circumstance made a great difference.

In the midst of all his terrible forebodings, Dick did not forget what he had overheard respecting the roads being watched, in order that he might be intercepted, and therefore, to guard against any possibility of coming into collision with his foes, he directed his course in such a manner that the ruins were left considerably on his right hand.

He rode on, bending round slightly, and at length, with a sigh of relief, made his way in a direct line to the place he wished to reach, though, as well as he understood, he approached in precisely the opposite direction to what be expected.

He congratulated himself upon having adopted this course, for they met with no opposition whatever.

They did not so much as catch sight of a single living being.

But as he drew nearer and nearer to the ruins, instead of increasing his pace in order that he might all the sooner put an end to the suspense he had been so long enduring, an unaccountable feeling made him tighten his hold upon the rein, until Black Bess's speed was reduced to a walk.

He did not attempt to analyse this feeling, but he seemed irresistibly impelled to act in the manner we have described

"Hullo!" said Tom King, pressing forward a little. "What is the matter, captain? Why are you pulling up?"

Just as he spoke he happened to catch sight of Dick's countenance.

He was so struck by its aspect that he immediately added:

"Why, what on earth is the matter, Dick? You seem as though you had seen a ghost! Can it be possible that you are hurt?"

"No—no, Tom, it is not that. I am almost ashamed to confess it; but if you will believe, my heart is so heavily oppressed that it seems as though it would weigh me down."

"But what is the cause, captain?" asked Claude Duval, who was close enough behind to overhear what had passed.

"I fear that—that while we have been away some great calamity has happened, of what nature I cannot even guess; but so strongly has the presentiment taken hold of me that I positively dread to approach any nearer, because—because I feel some terrible discovery awaits me."

"Why, Dick," said Tom King, after a long pause, for, to tell the truth, he scarcely knew how to reply, "I thought you were one never troubled by any such fancies."

"Fancies or not," said Sixteen-String Jack, "I should be the last to disregard them. Still, let us approach. Knowing the worst will not be so bad as this state of terrible suspense, with our suspicions suggesting all manner of terrible occurrences."

"Jack says rightly," observed Claude. "Come, Dick, shake off this heaviness—let us approach."

Thus urged, Dick Turpin once more pushed Black Bess forwards at a better speed.

There was one spot where, on nearly every occasion when they returned, they had found Jack the ostler waiting for them.

It was a kind of out-post in the ruins, from which a view of considerable extent could be obtained.

This time he was not to be seen.

His absence struck a chill to the breasts of everyone—it seemed so like a confirmation of Dick's forebodings.

It was a moment before anyone could speak, and then Dick said:

"How strange it is that Jack Ostler is not here to meet us as usual!"

His voice was unsteady and constrained.

"It is," returned Tom; "but push on. It may be that Maud feels disinclined to remain alone in the ruins."

Dick shook his head at this supposition.

He knew full well that Maud's anxiety would be equal to, if not greater, than his own.

So far from making any such excuse, he thought she would be the first to place herself at the nearest point, and watch untiringly for his return.

With a thousand more apprehensions than before, Dick continued on his way.

By this time his apprehensions were fully shared in by his companions, so highly contagious is everything resembling fear.

It might have been fancy in a great measure, and yet to them it seemed as though there was an unusual air of desolation pervading the place—

A desolation and silence which they had never before noticed.

A few minutes brought them to the courtyard, where, at least, Dick felt certain Maud would be watching for his arrival.

But this spot seemed even more silent and deserted than elsewhere.

Without a word, Dick alighted from his steed.

He did not speak, but all could see how deeply his heart was moved, and they knew that such feelings as he then experienced could not be expressed in words.

Silently, then, they too followed his example.

At length, in a faltering voice, Tom ventured to suggest that both Maud and Jack had for a short time descended into the secret chamber.

Dick shook his head.

"That is a point soon enough ascertained," said Dick. "Follow me."

"Shall we lead the horses after us, or leave them here?"

"Better leave them here. They are familiar enough with the place not to stray away. If it turns out as you suggest, they will quickly be attended to."

From this speech it was evident that Dick Turpin was doing his best to cheat himself into the belief that Tom King's suggestion was likely to prove correct.

The horses were released, though no attempt was made to remove any of their trappings.

The animals justified the remark that had been made.

They were familiar with the place, and showed no disposition to stray off.

Indeed, Black Bess seemed more than half inclined to follow at her master's heels; but after going a little distance she, at a word from him, came to a halt.

In perfect silence, then, and with heavy, slow, lingering footsteps, the highwaymen made their way in the direction of the entrance to the subterraneous apartment.

To reach it took them little more than a moment.

The aperture was not closed, and this discovery caused a thrill of delight to shoot through their frames, for it did indeed seem as though Maud and Jack the ostler were below.

"It's all right," said Tom. "Go on, Dick; you had better be the first. They will be surprised at our return; rely upon it, they did not expect us back so soon."

"Maud—Maud!" cried Dick, as he began to descend. "Maud—Maud, speak to me—let me hear your voice! Maud, I say! I have returned in safety and unhurt!"

Dick paused.

His heart beat violently.

A cold perspiration started forth in large drops upon his forehead, while he gasped painfully and laboriously for breath, as though his lungs had suddenly refused to perform their proper functions.

"Good heavens!" he exclaimed, his voice seeming rather to burst from his lips than to be a natural articulation. "What can be the meaning of this? What—oh, what can have happened?"

"Descend—descend!" cried Claude Duval. "Be quick! We can ascertain nothing here; or stand aside, if you would rather, and I will go first and lead the way."

"No—no!" groaned Dick, while they could see that he trembled from head to foot like an aspen. "My worst forebodings are now realised! This was the direction in which all my ghastly fears pointed! Alas!—alas!—what is to be done?"

"Descend—descend!" said Tom King, in a scarcely less agitated voice than that of his leader.

His injunction was complied with.

The whole party slowly descended the flight of steps, and with faltering steps made their way along the passage.

It was at this moment that, with a triumphant shout, or rather yell, of exultation, an officer dashed round from one of the corners of the ruins, where evidently he had been in hiding.

He was followed quickly by a dense throng of others, who exhibited scarcely less frantic demonstrations of excitement than himself.

They clustered round the entrance to the underground apartment.

Then the first, who was no other than Bishop the police officer, threw his hands up above his head and screamed aloud:

"Caged—caged! I knew it would be done! Ha, ha! Ha, ha! Earthed—earthed—run to earth! I told you so! Caught—caught! Caught at last!"

CHAPTER MXII.

EXPLAINS THE APPEARANCE OF THE POLICE OFFICERS AT THE RUINS.

To explain the mysterious disappearance of Maud and Jack the ostler, and the no less mysterious appearance of Bishop and a troop of officers, it will be necessary to go back and relate sequentially what took place at the castle ruins after the departure of Dick Turpin and his comrades

We have said already that Maud stood and gazed after her husband until the stonework hid him from her sight.

But she continued to gaze long after that, for in fancy he was yet present to her vision.

Jack Ostler withdrew to a distance, leaving her to herself.

When afterwards she came to give an account of what had happened, she was unable to give anything like a clear idea of how long she might have remained in this position.

Her thoughts wandered, and she gave herself up to a kind of waking day-dream.

She was longing for the time when Dick would leave England with her, and when there would succeed to this turbulent career a period of peace and rest.

Suddenly, however, her attention was aroused by a sound which instantly put all her dreams to flight.

It was only by the exercise of the greatest self-control that she was able to suppress a shriek.

The sound which struck upon her ear was the one above all others to cause her the most alarm.

It was a human voice.

At first she might have been incredulous, but soon there was no room left for the least amount of doubt.

The sound of voices continued, and Maud quickly became conscious that more than one person was approaching the ruins.

How many more she could not estimate.

Her heart fairly stood still.

The feeling was an awful one

In vain she tried to draw her breath.

In vain she strove to move.

Then she became conscious that she was about to fall into a swoon.

This knowledge enabled her by a sudden effort to regain possession over her almost paralysed faculties.

It was just as she thus recollected herself that she found Jack the ostler was standing by her side.

His presence was to her a source of infinite relief, for she had just been assuring herself that it was necessary for her to set out in quest of him.

Jack placed his fingers to his lips, in token of silence.

Then, in the faintest possible whisper, he murmured:

"Don't be alarmed, but strangers have entered the ruins."

Maud nodded, and by her manner signified to him that she was already acquainted with the fact.

"There's three of them," he continued, in the same cautious tones, "and what they want I cannot imagine."

"They—they—are not——" gasped Maud.

"No—no," answered the ostler, without waiting for her to complete her question—"they are not police officers."

Maud involuntarily gasped:

"Thank Heaven!"

The knowledge that these new-comers were not police officers had a wonderfully reassuring effect upon her.

"Who can they be, then?" she murmured. "What can they want here?"

Jack shook his head.

"It will be best not to talk, miss," he said—he always called Maud "Miss"—"we may be overheard. Look there!"

He pointed across the ruins as he spoke.

Maud looked in the direction in which he pointed, and then saw three persons come into view.

One walked in advance of the other two, and by his costume it could be seen that he belonged to a higher grade of society than they did, while their manner showed that they were ready to do his bidding in anything that he required.

The first one came very near to the spot where Maud and Jack Ostler were concealed.

Indeed, they had to shrink back very closely into the shadow of an abutment to escape detection.

Even then they would have been in great danger of being seen but for the obscurity which prevailed, and which seemed to increase rapidly every moment.

The gentleman—for such by his attire he seemed to be—paused, and raising one arm, pointed towards the keep.

"There can be no doubt this is the place," he said—"not the least doubt in the world; but if I had known it was such a devilish long way off, I should have waited till the morning."

"What is to be done, then, sir?" asked one of the men, in a respectful voice.

"Done?—why, nothing at all can be done to-night—that is the worst of it."

"Shall we go back, sir?" asked the one who had before spoken.

"Wait a moment—I will think."

The stranger appeared to consider carefully for a minute or two, and then he replied:

"My orders were, not to leave this place until my task is completed; but, as I said before, it is no use attempting to commence to-night. You two shall stay here, however, and make yourselves as comfortable as you can, and I will ride on to the next village, and try if I can find any accommodation at an inn."

By the expression upon the countenances of the two men, it was quite evident that they by no means relished this proposition; but they were too much under the subjection of the stranger to utter even a word by way of remonstrance.

By the way the gentleman spoke it was clear that he intended to seek accommodation for himself only.

"You quite understand," he added. "On no account are you to quit these ruins even for a moment, and wait here till my return. I will be here by daybreak in the morning, and don't you stir till then—you know what the consequences will be if you disregard my injunctions. You have some provisions, so make yourselves as comfortable as you can."

"And the horses, sir?"

"Oh, they will be right enough—there is plenty of good grass about. Above all, mind what I have said."

With these words the gentleman turned on his heels and departed.

The men looked after him very sullenly, and as soon as ever he was out of sight, one said:

"Curse me, Isaac, if I like this job!"

"Nor, I," was the answer given by the other; "it was a fool's trick to start so late from London."

"We had better have come in the morning, that's certain."

"We must grin and abide by it, mate, I suppose."

"Come further into the place, then. Let us have a good look all over it first of all. It will serve to pass the time away."

The other assented, and the pair passed on into the courtyard, going so close to Maud and the ostler in doing so that it is a thousand wonders a discovery was not made.

Jack waited a moment or so after they had disappeared before he ventured to speak.

Then he said:

"I can't think who they are, miss, nor what they want here. It bothers me entirely."

"Alas," replied Maud, "I fear we shall be no longer able to find a shelter within these crumbling walls. The one who announced his intention of returning by daybreak seems to me to have some authority—perhaps he is the owner of the property."

"That's very likely," said Jack. "I never happened to think of that; but in the meantime, miss, what are we to do?"

"Alas, I know not!"

"Don't be down, miss—don't be down. If we think a little while we are sure to be right."

Jack's confident and cheerful manner was not without its effect upon Maud.

"I'll tell you what," Jack continued. "I can give these chaps a regular fright, and perhaps scare them off in that way."

Maud shook her head.

"That won't answer, Jack, because they would come again in the morning."

"True—true, we should be no gainers in the end, I can see."

Jack scratched his head with a puzzled air.

"It seems to me," said Maud, after a brief pause, and her heart beat hard and fast as she spoke—"it seems to me that the only course open to us is to follow them to Greenwich."

Jack looked very grave at this proposition.

"It would be running a very great danger," he said; "perhaps we might get the captain and the rest into trouble."

"Yes; but it will not do to let them arrive here while these strangers are here. They would be discovered."

"True again," said Jack, who was now quite unable to see his way out of the difficulty.

While in this state of indecision his attention was distracted by another sound.

This was most unmistakably the trampling of horses' feet, and of a considerable number.

They came nearer each moment.

"Fresh arrivals," said Jack, as he passed his hand over his face. "Sure, the place must be bewitched."

Maud trembled and turned very pale.

"Who can these be?" she gasped. "Surely they have not returned already."

"No—no, they are not back—besides, I can hear at least a dozen horses."

"A dozen?"

"Yes. Hush—hush!"

The horsemen were now very close at hand.

It was quite evident that the ruined castle was their destination.

In another moment they came into sight.

Their arrival had been heard by the two men, for they came out into the open space again with their countenances wearing an expression of the utmost surprise.

The new-comers were police officers, and they numbered something like a dozen.

"Surrender—surrender!" they cried, as soon as they caught sight of the two men. "Surrender, if you wish your lives to be spared!"

"We have no intention of resisting," said one of the men. "What on earth do you want with us?"

"Well, curse me, that's cool! Seize them, my lads—seize them!"

"Perhaps you will first of all be kind enough to show me your warrant?"

"Warrant? the idea of such a thing!" said the chief officer, who was no other than Bishop. "Well—well, I never heard a richer thing than that in my life—never!"

"You are all mad or drunk," said the other man, "or labouring under some strange mistake or other!"

"Nothing of the kind! Seize them!"

The order was promptly obeyed, for the men never offered to make the least resistance.

"Now, then, out with your lanterns."

Bishop fully believed that he had made an important capture, but the coolness of these men, and the quiet way in which they surrendered, caused him to have his doubts.

For this reason he called for the lanterns.

They were quickly produced.

Long and earnest was the scrutiny bestowed upon these two men, and in the end, though most unwillingly, Bishop was obliged to admit that he was very far indeed from having made the important capture he had imagined.

"Perhaps," said the man who had previously spoken—"perhaps now you will be good enough to explain all this? Pray, who did you take us for?"

His manner irritated Bishop excessively, and therefore, with ill-suppressed rage, he cried:

"You may consider yourselves in custody. Keep them secure, my men! Your presence at this hour in this place is sufficiently suspicious to warrant me in taking you prisoners."

"Oh, is it?" said the man, sarcastically. "I have always heard that police officers were promoted and placed in command in proportion as they showed themselves blundering and incompetent. I believe it now, and what is more, I am sure your talents fit you for the highest position in the force."

Bishop ground his teeth with rage—indeed, his anger was so great that it stifled him.

Had his life depended upon it he could not have uttered a syllable.

The man continued:

"You will please understand that we are here by the express commands of the Lord Chancellor, whose express commands to us were that we were to take up our quarters here, and on no account to leave—even for a moment. If you don't like to believe us you can run the risk of not doing so. The Chancellor's private secretary is now at the inn in the next village. He will be here again at daybreak. If you remove us from here you will forfeit your place, for not even ten times the amount of stupidity you possess would save you."

There was something so clear and distinct in this man's voice—something so calm and unruffled in his demeanour, that every word he uttered carried an impression of truth along with it.

There was not one of the officers—even including Bishop—but what was compelled into belief.

The latter at length commanded himself sufficiently to speak.

"What you say may or may not be true, but we have information that four highwaymen have been seen in this vicinity, and your looks are such as to raise suspicion in anyone's mind."

Bishop felt he had his antagonist there, for the man's outward appearance was certainly most unprepossessing.

"That may be," was the answer, "but if they looked people up on account of their looks you would never be out of jail."

"Come—come," said Bishop, biting his lips and endea evening to assume a calmness that he was far from feeling, "let us have no more of this. At the least I consider you ought to give a more satisfactory account of yourselves than you have yet done."

"I don't know what more you can want. I can only say that you will find every word we have uttered perfectly true."

"Tell him," said the other—"tell him all, or we shall have no peace."

"Well, then," said the man, "since you must know, this property belongs—or rather did belong, for he's dead now—to Lord Comynge. His daughter, a little girl, is now a ward in Chancery. Her uncle, who has for some time been known as Lord Comynge, is accused of attempting to murder his niece."

"Yes," said Bishop, interrupting him. "I have heard something of this before."

"Perhaps you have heard all, in which case I may as well save myself the trouble of talking as not."

"No—no. Go on, I beg."

"In the morning we are to make a thorough search all over these ruins."

"What for?"

"Ah, that's just what we don't know."

"It seems like a matter in which police officers ought to be employed."

"But you see," replied the man, maliciously, "the Lord Chancellor happens to be of a precisely opposite opinion."

Bishop could make no reply to this hit, so he turned the conversation.

With an affectation of great communicativeness he exclaimed:

"The reason why we are here is, that from information we have received, we believe Dick Turpin and his gang have been secreting themselves somewhere in this neighbourhood, and this ruined castle struck us as being the most likely place."

Upon hearing these words, the two men exchanged significant glances.

Bishop's eyes were keen enough to perceive it, so he at once said:

"You know something of this."

"Well, it is not much, but from the look of the inside of the place I should say there have been several horses here for a length of time."

"Are they here now?"

"No, and I don't believe anyone else is, for we have had a good look around."

Bishop considered for some time in silence.

At last he said:

"Let me enter and have a look, I shall then be able to judge for myself."

With these words, Bishop and his companions followed the two men into the interior of the ruins.

It needed only a glance to convince the police officers that horses had been there, and very lately.

"We are on the scent at last," he cried, in an exultant voice. "Do you know we have been quite at a loss where to look, although we have known them to be in hiding somewhere."

"But I rather think the scent is cold," said the man Isaac.

"I don't believe they have left here yet," said Bishop, confidently.

"Why not?"

"Because they would never quit such a place of shelter unless driven from it."

"Then you think they will return?"

"Undoubtedly. Depend upon it, they are out upon some expedition, and will return here towards daybreak."

"There is a good reward offered for their capture, is there not?" asked Isaac's companion.

"Yes, very good," said Bishop. "And, if you like, we will share your watch in this place, and you shall take an equal share of the reward with the rest."

"Providing we are successful?"

"Yes, of course; but I don't feel very doubtful this time."

"Well, we agree," replied Isaac, after a brief whispered conference with his companion.

"Very well, then; we will say that is settled."

"Yes, quite."

"You say there is no one in the ruins but ourselves?"

"No one but ourselves, though, depend upon it, we have yet some discoveries to make."

What is your meaning?"

"Why, you don't suppose these fellows kept out of doors all the time, do you? No, no—rely upon it there is some chamber or such-like place where they could make themselves tolerably comfortable."

"Of course not," said Bishop "I wonder I did not think of that."

"So do I," said Isaac, in his usual sarcastic manner. "However, let us set about it."

The police officers were by no means loth to comply with this proposition.

In one throng the whole party passed into the recesses of the ruins, and, after dispersing themselves, they after a brief search discovered the entrance to the subterraneous chamber.

Indeed, it is rather wonderful they did not make the discovery earlier, for, owing to the sudden manner in which the secret apartment had been left, the highwaymen had omitted to close the entrance.

They would scarcely have thought such a thing necessary, as Maud was about to return to it in a short time.

The man who noticed the opening at once set up a loud shout, which had the immediate effect of assembling all the rest around him.

The exultation of Bishop knew no bounds, and no doubt his delight would have manifested itself in some extravagant manner or other but for the sarcastic observations of Isaac.

After a brief consultation held round the entrance to the subterranean chamber, it was decided that they should descend and make a thorough exploration.

Some little difficulty then arose as to who should be the one to lead the way.

Bishop, for his own part, was inclined to take up a general's position—that is, keep in the rear, so as to be as much out of danger as possible, but it was insisted on all hands that no one was so fit to lead the van as himself.

The jeers of Isaac made him unwilling to refuse.

It was, however, with no slight amount of reluctance that he began the descent of the steps.

He was by no means assured that the highwaymen had all left the ruins, and he was haunted by the terrible dread that, if really absent, the highwaymen might have left behind them some contrivance for bringing down death and destruction upon the head of any intruder.

It was, therefore, with very slow and cautious steps that he advanced.

Each moment, however, as he found no ill consequence ensue, his confidence increased.

At length they fairly stood within that little chamber wherein the highwaymen had passed so many hours in perfect security and freedom from interruption.

Here abundant proofs of their recent presence manifested themselves to the lynx-like eyes of the officers.

The result of their search convinced them that the whole of the highwaymen were really absent.

This being ascertained, they made their way once more to the upper air.

A consultation was now immediately held.

"The direction of this affair must be left to me!" cried Bishop, arrogantly. "And when you have heard the plan of operations I am about to propose I am sure you will agree with me that nothing better could by any possibility be devised."

"Well, that's modest, anyhow," observed Isaac, in his usual aggravating manner.

Bishop affected to take no notice of the remark, but spoke shortly and decisively to the point.

"Depend upon it," he said, "these fellows will come back if we are only careful to keep from them the knowledge that we are here. We will hide ourselves behind yonder wall, and on their arrival will wait until they have every one descended into the cavern—or whatever you like to call it. Then all we shall have to do will be to rush forward and surround the entrance. They will be completely at our mercy, and we shall make them prisoners with scarcely any trouble whatever. Let me hear a better plan than that proposed," he added, giving a triumphant glance around, "and I will give in at once and for evermore."

CHAPTER MXIII.

MAUD AND JACK THE OSTLER DETERMINE TO WARN DICK TURPIN AND HIS COMRADES OF THEIR DANGER.

Bishop paused, and he had the infinite satisfaction of finding that his plan was received with universal acclamation.

Not even Isaac raised a dissentient voice.

On the contrary, he liberally applauded the plan as being of all others the one best calculated to succeed.

In order that there might be no further difficulty, they at once withdrew to the place mentioned, which was exactly calculated to afford them safe shelter.

The horses were taken with them, and every precaution adopted to efface every trace that they or their animals might have left behind them.

Once having taken up their position behind the wall, several huge blocks of stone that had apparently fallen from the summit of a crumbling tower were rolled up into convenient situations, so as to serve them for seats.

Here they resolved to wait patiently for the arrival of their prey.

Leaving them here, we will revert to the proceedings of Maud and Jack the ostler.

After a little deliberation, they decided that it was most important that an effort should be made to overhear, if possible, the plans of their foes.

"If you will only stay here, miss," said Jack, "you will be perfectly safe. I will then creep on silently, and gather all the information I am able."

"No, no," said Maud—"I cannot remain here alone! Let me come with you!"

"But, miss, consider the extra danger."

"I will be cautious—very cautious! But do not ask me to remain here—anything would be preferable to that!"

Jack hesitated.

"Oh, stay," said Maud—"you remain here, and I will venture nearer to listen. I could not bear suspense."

As she spoke she moved forward.

Of course, Jack did not for one moment think of remaining behind.

Without uttering a syllable, he followed cautiously in Maud's steps.

All the time he was in an agony of dread lest the slight rustling of her dress should betray them to their foes.

But Maud was extremely careful, and at length was fortunate enough to approach sufficiently near to overhear every syllable.

She listened with the utmost dread and terror, though there was little fear Dick and the rest would arrive that night.

When the officers withdrew behind the wall and seated themselves upon the stones in the manner we have described, Jack endeavoured to persuade Maud to retreat.

But she refused to listen to any such suggestion, and changed her position, so that she was able once more to listen to their conversation.

The first words she caught were uttered by Bishop, who said:

"We have told you our business here, and a good thing it is for you, I consider, therefore you ought to satisfy our curiosity as to your presence in this place."

"We have little to tell," replied Isaac, "beyond what you know already. We have been sent down here on behalf of the little heiress, and we are thoroughly to search the ruins for something, but I know not what."

"Still you could hazard a shrewd guess?"

"Perhaps I could."

"Let us hear it, then."

"I don't know whether I ought to mention anything of the kind," was the hesitating reply.

"We have taken you into our confidence, so I don't see how you can with very good grace refuse."

Isaac was silent a moment or so; then, in a lower voice he said:

"Well, it is my own belief that somewhere among these ruins a large amount of money has been hidden, and in the morning when the Lord Chancellor's secretary arrives we shall have to search for it. Don't ask me for any more information, because if you do you won't get it."

"Very good," said Bishop. "But you might say whether what I have heard about Lord Comynge is correct or not."

"What is it?"

"Why, that he made an attempt upon the life of his niece."

"Yes, it was—in these very ruins."

"And that in consequence, although he stood so high in the favour of the King, he has been arrested on this capital charge?"

"Quite right," said Isaac. "But I don't suppose that result would have been brought about but for the Prince of Wales."

"Indeed. How so?"

"Why, you see, Lord Comynge has ever been his most bitter enemy, and done more towards estranging him from the King than all the world besides, therefore it may be chiefly on this account that he has taken up the case of the little heiress. Anyhow, he has declared that he will know no rest until he has seen her fully restored to her rights, and until her guardian has been justly punished for his crime."

At this moment Maud touched Jack upon the arm, and made a sign that she had heard enough, and was ready to retire.

Jack moved away with great readiness and willingness, for he was well aware of the great risk they were running by remaining so near.

The retreat was effected with the utmost amount of caution, and without raising the least suspicion in the breasts of the ambushed officers.

As the reader may suppose, it was with feelings of the greatest satisfaction that Maud listened to the communication made by Isaac.

Her interest in the fate of the little girl was great, and she was truly rejoiced to learn that she was at last in safety, and in so fair a way of recovering her rights.

But the circumstances of her position prevented her from dwelling so much upon the subject as she would otherwise have done.

So soon as ever they had got to a safe distance from the wall, Maud asked, eagerly:

"What is to be done now, Jack—oh, what is to be done?"

"Well, miss," was the answer, "it seems to me that the best thing will be for us to have a few words together about that."

"Give me your opinion—you are calmer than I am."

"Come on, then, miss—we will get as far away from that varmint as ever we can."

"But we can talk now as we move forward?"

"Oh, yes, of course we can!"

"Well, then, what do you advise? Let me hear, for I am all impatience and anxiety."

"Well, miss," said Jack, with great emphasis, "if so be the captain or any on 'em walks up to the secret entrance without knowing what's o'clock, why, nabbed they would be to a certainty; and if they went down below they would be caught like rats in a trap."

"Very true," said Maud, shuddering at the bare idea of such a catastrophe. "The thing for us to decide is, how we can prevent it."

"Right you are, miss."

"How is it to be done?"

"In my opinion there is just one way, and only one."

"And that is——"

"For you and me, miss, to leave this here place at once and meet the captain and the rest on their way back. We should then be able to warn them of their danger."

"Yes—yes, so we should. That is the course we must pursue, Jack."

"You are decided, miss?"

"Yes, quite."

"I only wish, then, we had a couple of horses, for in that case it would make our task infinitely easier; however, as we are without them, the less said the better."

[MAUD'S ARRIVAL AT THE ROAD-SIDE INN.]

"Yes, yes, we can do quite well on foot. Come, come, Jack, we will not lose another moment. I shall know no rest until I have seen and warned them."

"Nor shall I."

During this conversation they had been moving forward somewhat rapidly, and by this time had got quite clear of the castle ruins.

Jack knew well enough what was the destination of the highwaymen; but another difficulty presented itself rather vividly to his mind.

It was more than he or anyone else could tell which way they might take on their return.

Therefore, although they thus set out, the chances were a hundred to one that they would be missed.

This consideration, however, had evidently not yet presented itself to Maud, and Jack had not the heart to suggest it to her.

She was now in the best of spirits, doubting nothing that she should be able to convey her warning in good time.

It is not to be wondered at that the excitement she had so recently undergone should render her less capable than usual of calm thought.

No surprise must be manifested, then, that she should, without asking a single question, walk confidently by the side of her companion, for she firmly believed that he was capable of conducting her to her destination.

A furious blast of wind coming from the north-east caused her to shiver and draw her little cloak or cape she wore closely around her shoulders.

Jack noticed the movement, and looking up, observed:

"I am afraid, miss, it is going to turn out a roughish night."

Maud looked up, and for the first time noticed that the sky was covered up with dense, black clouds, which went scudding onward at a violent rate as they were driven by the fury of the gale.

So preoccupied was she that not until now had she observed the aspect of the weather.

"I—I fear there will be a storm," she said.

"Yes, miss," was the reply, "it looks uncommon like it."

"Then we will push on with all the speed we are capable of making, so as to get as far as possible before it breaks forth."

As she spoke she quickened her steps to such an extent that Jack found some little difficulty in keeping pace with her.

But soon the indications of the approaching conflict of the elements became more and more unequivocal.

Large, heavy spots of rain began to fall, the precursors of the drenching descent of water that was to follow.

Still Maud hurried on with more rapid though uncertain steps.

She was filled with the foreboding dread that this storm would be the means of preventing her from giving the necessary warning.

The plashing of the rain-drops increased, and then from the distance came a low, muttering sound.

"Thunder," observed Jack, as soon as ever he heard it.

Scarcely had the words escaped his lips than there came a sudden flash of lightning.

When it was over a double darkness seemed to prevail around them.

Maud stopped affrightedly.

In common with many persons, the crashing of thunder and the vivid coruscations of the forked lightning filled her with the utmost alarm.

"Can we not seek a shelter somewhere?" she asked. "This storm is terrible!"

"And the rain is not comfortable, by any means; and if we are not quick we shall be drenched to the skin!" answered Jack.

"But is there no shelter?" Maud asked, for the flashes of lightning terrified her to such a degree that she dared not lift up her head to look.

"There is a big tree yonder, miss," said Jack. "I should think that will serve our purpose."

"Yes—oh, yes!"

"Come, then—do not be afraid; I will lead the way."

Maud grasped Jack's arm very tightly, and ran by the side of him to the tree of which he had spoken.

It was a magnificent oak—many centuries old, no doubt—with huge branches stretching far across the roadway.

Its leaves were large, and grew so closely together that they formed an almost impervious screen from the rain, which, however, raised a prodigious pattering upon them.

"That is better, miss, is it not?" said Jack, speaking in as encouraging a tone as he was able.

The shadow of the huge tree was indeed most welcome to Maud, who, cowering down, clasped her hands over her eyes so as to shut out the vivid flashes of lightning.

In a few moments the storm was at its height.

The forked lightning flashed almost without intermission, while the claps of thunder followed each other so rapidly that the effect produced resembled a continuous peal.

Maud's alarm increased tenfold.

The rain descended in a deluge, and in order to escape it they both tried to press as closely as they could to the trunk of the tree.

Maud closed her eyes, for intense fear made her unable to keep them open any longer.

Suddenly she experienced a strange sensation.

It was altogether indescribable, and quite different to anything which she had previously experienced.

For a few seconds she seemed deprived of all motion, though she partially retained possession of her senses.

There was upon her mind an impression of an intense scorching sensation—a faint cry, and now her sense of smell was invaded with an odour of a sickening character, and which she could liken to nothing.

An oppressive stillness reigned around her, for the thunder no longer reverberated in such incessant peals.

Tremblingly she opened her eyes, and was confounded by the intense darkness.

She called aloud upon her companion, who she was unable to perceive.

In vain.

There was no response to her words.

Then a terrible, indefinable feeling of dread took entire possession of her.

She apprehended something awful, but what she knew not.

She called again.

The same result.

Then, with a frenzied step, she advanced a pace or two.

It was at this moment that the lightning again blazed forth.

The brilliant though evanescent illumination disclosed to her eyes a sight of horror.

Lying stretched at her feet—she must have stumbled over him had she attempted to advance another step—lay the body of Jack the ostler.

He was dead—dead beyond all doubt.

One glance was sufficient to assure anyone of this, for his countenance was so scorched and disfigured as to present an awful spectacle; and had not Maud been aware of who had been standing by her side she could never have recognised him, for his features were so distorted and rendered so hideous that their appearance was totally changed.

Maud shrieked in horror at the awful sight thus for a second revealed to her affrighted gaze.

How thankful she was when darkness again surrounded every object!

Cautiously, though trembling in every limb, she turned away.

She felt that no earthly consideration whatever would induce her to bestow another glance upon anything so fearful.

She quitted the dangerous, treacherous shelter of the tree, and with a sensation of relief felt the heavy rain-drops beat upon her head and face.

There could be no doubt about the cause of Jack Ostler's sudden death.

The lightning, attracted by the tree, had struck it, and the treacherous fluid, passing through his body, instantaneously deprived him of his life.

Maud must have escaped by something little short of a miracle, for she was standing close beside him.

She must have been affected in some slight degree, as was evidenced by her partial loss of consciousness.

No words of ours can adequately describe the nature of her feelings at this juncture.

A sudden death even of a stranger cannot fail to make a deep effect upon the most callous heart.

How much, then, must the effect be increased when the person is one who stands in the light of a protector!

Maud was distracted, and as she stood alone in the drenching wet, wrung her hands in anguish and despair.

Deprived of the ostler's faithful guidance and advice, where was she to turn—what step should she take next?

She stood distracted.

All the difficulties of her position rushed upon her with overwhelming force, and she felt crushed by them.

No one could possibly be more ignorant of her whereabouts than she was, and she had not the remotest idea of the direction in which her destination lay.

Under these circumstances the task of meeting with Dick and his comrades seemed a hopeless one.

While she was thus wandering at random they might pass her a thousand times.

This knowledge increased if possible the poignancy of her grief.

She wept and sobbed aloud, and to her distempered fancy the very wind seemed to laugh among the branches of the trees and mock her grief.

For a brief space she indulged in the only hope that was left to her.

This was, that Jack the ostler might not have perished.

Oh, how she clung to this vain, improbable idea.

She felt it was improbable, for it was as much the dread of having this last hope destroyed as it was unwillingness again to encounter the hideous spectacle that made her hold back.

At length she raised her voice, but there came no reply.

At last, with a fresh burst of grief, she exclaimed:

"Alas—alas! there can be no doubt that he has perished—and I am indeed forlorn! What to do now for my own safety and for theirs I know not."

It was a long while before she could arouse herself and calm in a slight degree her agitated feelings.

But the necessity there was for immediate action pressed itself most strongly upon her.

With a resolute effort she dashed the tear-drops from her eyes and gazed about her.

She was standing either in a lane or cross-country road, and that was the sum total of the knowledge she was enabled to gather.

Hesitatingly she advanced with the air of one ignorant of where their steps may lead.

But the remembrance of her husband's danger and the reflection that her husband's life rested in her hands were burnt into her brain and served to animate her.

Her hesitating steps became decisive ones, her walk quickened into a run, nor did she pause until compelled to do so by sheer breathlessness.

During this time she had done nothing but follow the winding of the road, which bent about in a most disheartening fashion.

Again Maud looked about her, but was unable to form any better opinion of her locality.

The thunder and lightning had altogether ceased, but the rain continued to fall with unabated steadiness, and by the inky aspect of the sky above there seemed every probability that it would continue to do so for a considerable length of time.

Her impatience would not suffer her to pause and recover possession of her breath and strength, but she struggled on, though her pace was exceedingly slow, yet she was comforted by the knowledge that she was advancing.

At the same time, however, the utter hopelessness of her undertaking pressed more and more heavily upon her.

She was conscious—fully conscious that success was all but an impossibility.

Could she but have seen before her the prospect of ultimate success it would have urged her onward with unflagging spirit.

As it was, her bodily strength decreased as her spirits sank lower and lower.

More than once, overcome by fatigue, she felt as though she must sink down upon the damp earth in the road, but with a sudden effort she would start and struggle on her lonely way.

No sounds of human life—no prospect of a human habitation, however humble, gratified her view.

All around was a darkness and gloom that well typified the condition of her own mind.

Never before in the whole course of her life had she experienced so much utter wretchedness.

She was drenched to the skin now with the rain, and her soaked garments clinging tightly to her materially increased the difficulty of motion.

At last, after a weary interval, she saw before her a dark-looking mass of something, but what she knew not.

A closer approach showed it to be a dwelling of some kind.

She was now so entirely overcome, that it was only by the greatest effort that she could place one foot before the other.

When nearly opposite the building she was compelled to pause, for all strength seemed to forsake her.

Had she not clung tightly to the massive wooden post which supported the swinging sign she must have fallen.

As it was, it seemed as though the earth and all things else were slipping away from beneath her feet.

CHAPTER XXIV.

MAUD MEETS WITH A STRANGE ACQUAINTANCE AT THE JOLLY SAILOR INN.

Several moments elapsed before Maud became conscious of the nature of the support to which she clung, but, having ascertained it, she knew at once that by great good fortune she had halted before an inn.

Either her eyes had become more accustomed to the darkness, or else the obscurity was not so great as it had been, for she was now able to make out that the structure was a very old-fashioned, picturesque one

From the manner in which it was built, it was clear that at least a couple of centuries had elapsed since its erection.

The exterior, however, was plunged in utter darkness.

Not even from one of the upper windows did a gleam of light appear, so that Maud very justly concluded that the whole of the inmates had retired to rest.

Just as she made this reflection, such an accession of the fainting feeling came over her that she feared this time consciousness would entirely abandon her.

As before, a vigorous effort of the will saved her.

She then determined that at all hazards she would knock at the door of this inn, and endeavour to arouse its inhabitants.

She would implore them to allow her brief rest and shelter, for she was now so fatigued that it was impossible for her to proceed any further.

Another reflection only served to confirm her in this resolution.

This was that it might be that at this inn she should be fortunate enough to find a horse which she could hire or purchase.

Luckily, she carried with her a considerable sum of money, so that all was well upon this score.

The prospect of obtaining a horse seemed in a wonderful degree to reanimate her drooping spirits.

She fancied that with a good steed beneath her all those difficulties which now appeared so gigantic would shrink into comparative insignificance.

She would be able to take so much wider a range with so little fatigue to herself, that the chances of her success were at least doubled.

It was these considerations that lent her the requisite strength to quit her sustaining grasp upon the sign-post and totter to the front door of the inn.

She knocked loudly and boldly at it, the sound echoing strangely in the intense silence which prevailed.

For a long time she knocked in vain.

At length, however, a crashing sound was heard above.

This was followed by a volley of oaths.

Looking up to ascertain the cause of this, Maud found that a gust of wind had torn the latticed casement from the grasp of the man who opened it, and dashed it with such violence against the wall that several panes were totally demolished.

"Hilloa!" cried a rough voice—"hilloa! I say, who is there—what is the matter?"

"I want shelter from the storm," answered Maud, in a faltering voice, for her heart sunk within her at such a reception as this. "Fear not that I am unable to pay for the accommodation," she added—"rest assured that I will reward you well."

These words were not without their due effect.

In a considerably mollified voice the man above said:

"Wait where you are a moment, miss, and you shall be attended to. We are all a-bed."

"I will wait," said Maud—"wait patiently."

A brief space of time elapsed, and then her ears caught the welcome sound caused by the removal of bars and bolts.

The next moment the door was opened.

Such a blaze of light seemed to stream across the threshold that for a moment or two Maud's vision was quite confused.

But this was only the effect of the darkness.

When it wore away, she perceived that the illumination proceeded only from a candle, behind which stood a man of sinister aspect

He was regarding Maud suspiciously

Her drenched and bedraggled appearance by no means prepossessed him in her favour

Maud by one glance into his face could read his thoughts with as much ease and readiness as she could have read a book.

"I don't know whether I can accommodate you," he said, at last, in gruff, surly tones

"You judge from my appearance," said Maud, "that I shall be unable to pay you."

The man started upon finding his thoughts so rightly interpreted.

"You need have no fear on that head," Maud continued. "Look—here is more than sufficient to discharge the most extortionate reckoning."

So saying, she produced from her pocket a good-sized purse, which she opened just wide enough to allow the man to see that it was filled with guineas.

The sight of this wealth wrought an immediate change.

All his gruffness and sullenness vanished

He was ready to prostrate himself before Maud, and in the most cringing tones invited her to enter.

Maud was so disgusted with his behaviour that she felt almost inclined to retreat, but the uncertainty of whether she should be able to find another place of rest overcame every other consideration, and she entered.

The man, with great obsequiousness, ushered her into a room, in which he requested her to seat herself.

At the same time he placed the candle upon the table.

"I cannot eat," said Maud, in reply to his question as to what he should place before her. "I feel that if I attempted to swallow a mouthful it would choke me. No—no! all that I require is the opportunity to rest my wearied limbs."

"Very good, miss," said the man, with a peculiar light blazing in his eye, which if Maud had noticed would have served to make her feel very uneasy. "Indeed, I will make you as comfortable as I can. But, perhaps, while I am getting your bed-room ready, you would like to take a glass or two of wine?"

Maud did not reply, for just then her thoughts were wandering far away, and although the man's words fell upon her ears, yet their signification did not penetrate to her understanding.

He, however, evidently took her silence for consent, for he left the room immediately, and after the lapse of a few moments returned with a bottle and a wine-glass.

"Here you are, miss," he said, as he put the articles down upon the table.

His entrance roused Maud from her reverie.

"Your room will soon be ready," said the man. "As you are so wet, a glass of wine will do you good."

Maud shuddered, for just then her thoughts reverted to Jack the ostler and the fearful aspect he had presented as he lay stark and stiff beneath the tree.

The man, attributing this to cold, officiously poured out a glass of wine, and pressed her to drink it.

Maud was just about to raise the glass to her lips, when, happening to turn towards the door, she saw the most singular-looking head and face she had ever happened to behold.

It was only for a moment, however, that she caught sight of it.

The man, following the direction of her eyes, no sooner caught sight of the head and face than he seized a heavy boot-jack that happened to lie upon the table and flung it with all his force.

So suddenly was this act performed, and so accurate was the aim taken, that before the head could be withdrawn it received a terrible blow that echoed and re-echoed through the house.

A loud yell of pain followed, succeeded by a lumbering sound.

Then all was still.

Maud put down her glass of wine untasted on the table, and gazed on the man with mingled wonder and disgust.

Perceiving the nature of the regard that was bent upon him, he said, in an apologetic tone of voice, and with considerable confusion in his manner:

"You see, miss, I am apt at times to be a little short-tempered. But it's over in a moment, and then, Lor' bless you, I thinks nothing of it. Now, that was a rascally young nephew of mine, who has been shamefully misbehaving himself, and I ordered him to keep his room, do you see, miss, but he must needs disobey, and come peeping and prying, so you see he has got what he deserved."

Maud could by no means see this very clearly, but was silent for she felt however much she might disapprove, yet she could not presume to find fault with the domestic arrangements of the house.

"You have not drunk your wine, miss."

"No—no; believe me, I cannot. Is my room ready?"

"I dare say it is, by this time."

"I do not want to remain here any longer than will be necessary for me to recover my strength; but in order to continue my journey I want a horse. Can you provide me with one? I will either buy or hire it."

"I can accommodate you, no doubt," answered the man, with a grin that much increased the natural hideousness of his countenance; "but as you are very weary, suppose we leave the settling of that until after you have rested yourself."

Maud was only too willing to consent.

Her fatigue momentarily increased, and her eyelids seemed as though pressed down with leaden weights.

Mechanically, like one walking in a dream, she followed the man up a flight of old-fashioned, crumbling, oaken stairs.

He paused at a door situated at the extremity of a long corridor.

Pushing it open, Maud saw that a lamp was burning on a large chest.

As she crossed the threshold, the man said:

"I don't know whether you need anyone to wait upon you, miss. If you do, I will call up my wife, and she will be with you in a few moments."

"No—no," said Maud. "I shall manage best by myself."

"Very good," was the gruff answer. "Good night—or, rather, good morning, for it is nearer the one than the other."

With these words the man departed, closing the door carefully behind him.

Maud shivered from head to foot, and glanced around her with a sensation of trembling dread for which she could not account.

It was probably imagination merely, but to her it seemed as though the atmosphere of this bed-chamber was heavily laden with some thick, oppressive, sickening odour, of a kind she had never experienced before.

The aspect of the room, too, was in itself quite enough to strike a chill into any heart.

It was barely and plainly furnished; the principal articles consisting of a massive bedstead and a huge oaken chest, which did duty for a dressing-table.

There was no fire in the grate, and the damp and cold from without seemed to penetrate through the window.

But Maud's exhaustion was complete.

Despite the oppressive odour, the chillness, the cheerlessness, she removed a portion of her upper apparel, and lying down on the outside of the bed, covered herself with the coverlet.

Almost as soon as she assumed a recumbent attitude her eyes closed, and she fell off into a deep sleep, that for a time rendered her oblivious of everything.

How long this heavy slumber continued she knew not; but presently she began to dream.

She fancied that Dick Turpin was in some place, and only separated from her by a window.

Slight as this obstruction seemed, yet it appeared to be more than Dick could overcome, so he was tapping upon it with his finger nails, and making signs for Maud to open it for him and allow him to escape.

Maud comprehended this fully, and made the most superhuman efforts to rise and do his bidding.

But every limb refused to obey the dictates of her will.

Again and again she struggled to rise, but it seemed as though tons and tons had been piled upon her breast.

Her anguish was increased by the impatience which was expressed upon Dick's features.

Suddenly, however, the spell was dissolved.

She opened her eyes, and found herself lying on the bed.

During that confusedness of feeling which all experience when awaking in a strange place, her ears were still assailed by the faint clattering, tapping noise which she had heard in her dream.

She listened for several moments; but the sound continued without any intermission.

"What can it be?" she murmured, as she gently raised herself to a sitting posture

Her heart beat quickly with alarm.

She apprehended she knew not what.

On retiring she had left the candle burning.

It was alight now; but it carried a wick of such portentious length, and with such a huge Turk's head surrounding it, that it gave forth only the dimmest and most uncertain illumination conceivable.

Her alarm increased, for either in fancy or reality the tapping increased in loudness.

With the exception of this the silence which prevailed was oppressively profound.

The longer Maud remained thus the more did her courage evaporate.

The dread of all kinds of evil came over her.

At last, by a most vigorous and determined effort, she slipped off the bed, resumed those clothes she had removed, and looked around her with a calmness that was more assumed than real.

It appeared now that the sound was less equivocal in its character.

Maud was certain that it was produced by tapping upon glass.

But the sound was so strange, so constant, that all kinds of superstitious imaginings came crowding unbidden into her mind.

To what kind of visitation was she to be subjected? for she could scarcely believe that the mysterious sound proceeded from any human agency.

Her heart throbbed so painfully that she seemed every moment in danger of suffocation.

Nevertheless, it was almost involuntarily that her eyes turned in the direction of the window.

Having gazed upon it, she could no longer doubt that the tapping was given upon one of its panes.

But by whom?

For what reason?

Vainly she asked herself these questions.

Her curiosity was raised to the highest pitch, yet it was some time before she could summon up sufficient courage to enable her to move slowly towards it.

As she approached, the tapping abruptly ceased.

Drawing closer still, Maud endeavoured to peep through the glass, but at first the intense darkness without completely baffled her.

Another tap, tap, was given.

She saw something move, and recoiled in affright.

Just then she thought of the condition of the candle, and, with a trembling hand, removed the snuff.

A bright, clear light immediately ensued, by the aid of which, as she again glanced towards the window, she saw a human face pressed closely against the panes.

She seemed about to shriek aloud in the extremity of her alarm, but terror seemed to freeze up her voice, and only a hoarse whispering sound escaped her lips.

The countenance was one well calculated to strike terror into any sensitive breast, and its ugliness was probably much increased by the manner in which all the features were flattened against the glass.

Maud had to clutch the edge of the table very tightly to support herself, otherwise she must have fallen.

All the time her eyes remained riveted upon the face at the window as though her eyes had been fascinated by some serpent.

The tapping was resumed, and Maud was no longer in any doubt as to the exact cause which had produced it.

The person outside, whoever he might be—Maud had no doubt about the sex—was clattering with his finger nails upon the glass.

As she continued to gaze, however, she could not help fancying that the face had upon it a friendly expression, and which, if rightly interpreted, meant that, for some reason or other, a communication was desired.

This idea, having once taken possession of her mind, increased so much in force that she by slow degrees again approached the window.

There could be no mistaking the satisfaction visible upon the features of the face outside.

The hand that had been so busily engaged in tapping was now employed in making signs, the evident purport of which was that she should open the casement.

But naturally Maud hesitated to comply with this demand.

It might be a most serious thing—perhaps a fatal step to admit this stranger to her apartment

Her feelings must have expressed themselves upon her countenance, for the face assumed an aspect of so imploring and entreating a nature as to be almost irresistible.

Hesitatingly Maud stretched forth her hand to remove the fastening.

Then drew it back again without effecting her purpose.

The face looked deeply disappointed—nay, despairing.

Again Maud hesitated.

Her hand touched the fastening.

It was removed, and a gust of cold night air, carrying upon it some thousands of watery particles, dashed into the room.

Its immediate effect was to extinguish the candle.

Finding herself in the dark so suddenly by no means tended to calm Maud's feelings, though the cool wind seemed to disperse those vapours which hitherto had seemed to hang about her brain.

"Don't be afraid, lady," said a suppressed voice, in what was doubtless intended to be a very encouraging tone—"don't be afraid. I have come to save your life! Do not doubt me, but let me enter."

"Come in," said Maud—"come in. If you intend me any harm, may Heaven pardon you for your wickedness in thus deceiving a poor, helpless woman!"

Almost before she had finished giving utterance to these words, she found one of the strangest and most uncouth-looking figures she had ever beheld standing before her.

Her first sentiments were those of undissembled terror.

The being who had entered was scarcely an inch taller than the oak chest close to which he stood, yet his head and face had the appearance, both in size and expression, of a full-grown man.

In this appearance his shoulders joined, for they were uncommonly broad, square, and muscular.

His arms, too, were long and powerful, and so out of proportion to the rest of his body that when he stood upright he could almost touch the ground with the tips of his fingers.

His back seemed to have received some kind of injury in childhood, which had prevented the growth of the lower part of his body, so that, in fact, he presented the appearance of a child's body surmounted from the waist upwards by the body of a man.

Well, then, might Maud feel terrified at beholding this intruder into her chamber, for the darkness, although it permitted her to make out his general appearance, would not allow her to scrutinise him with any closeness.

"Don't be afraid, lady," he said, in a faint, piping voice, which sounded very oddly coming from so capacious a chest, "Hunch will not hurt you, lady. Wait a moment—I will shut the window and get a light."

There was something assuring in these words, and also in the manner in which they were uttered, and Maud felt much of her fear abate.

The window was closed, and when the candle was relighted, Maud was able to look more closely at the form of her nocturnal visitor.

So far from exhibiting any aversion or disgust, her heart filled with pity and commiseration for the unfortunate being.

She was, however, scarcely prepared for the result.

He recognised in a moment, as if by intuition, the state of her feelings towards him, and the tears rose thickly to his eyes.

At the same time he threw himself down upon his knees, and seizing her dress, pressed it repeatedly to his lips.

"My life is yours—my life is yours, lady, for you are the very first that has ever given a kind glance at poor Hunch! Be kind to me; but whether you are or not, I have come here to save your life! Don't be frightened, Hunch can do it! Hunch will save your life—he will indeed, lady—he will indeed!"

CHAPTER MXV.

FRESH DANGER IS FOUND BY MAUD AT THE OLD INN.

MAUD gazed for a moment or two in silence upon this singular specimen of humanity.

Then in a low voice which she vainly tried to make calm, she asked:

"If my life is in danger, how came you to know it?"

Upon hearing these words, Hunch, as he called himself, looked around with wildness and terror in his looks.

Then, very faintly, he whispered:

"Hush, hush, lady, and I will tell you all!"

"All what?"

"All the mysteries and crimes of this fearful place. Have you not felt the effect of its shadow upon you? Does not your breath come short and thick? Does not your heart knock against your ribs?"

Maud was fain to confess feeling these sensations.

"It is because," continued Hunch, in a more hollow whisper—"it is because you scent the blood which is in the air—because you feel that you breathe the atmosphere of murder."

At these dreadful words, which were pronounced with bated breath and flaming eyes, Maud's very lips grew white.

"I frighten you, lady," observed Hunch, perceiving the effect his words had wrought. "But be not afraid. I will save your life."

"If you would tell me how it is in danger," answered Maud, "and if you would make me acquainted with the means by which you intend to save it, I should be more content."

"I know that, lady."

"Satisfy me, then."

"I will, without delay; but do not speak so loud, or you may be overheard; then even I will be powerless to save you—ay, as powerless as you would be to save yourself."

"I will be silent."

"I wonder how it is," began Hunch, musingly, "that ever you came to cross the threshold of the Jolly Sailor?"

"Is that the name of the inn?"

"It is. Did you not see it on the sign, and the figure of the sailor over the door? Ha, ha! the Jolly Sailor and myself are the very best of friends!"

These words, coupled with the wildness and strangeness of his appearance and demeanour, strengthened an opinion which, during the last few minutes, had been growing in Maud's mind, namely, that this uncanny creature was not in proper possession of his senses.

"It was dark," she said, replying to his question, "and I was unable to see anything. I came in here for shelter from the storm."

"Yes, yes, I might have known that. And now, lady, listen to me. You have had the ill-fortune to enter a den of murder, for this place is nothing more"

Maud gasped for breath.

"Whenever a solitary traveller enters this place, who happens to have about him any considerable sum of money, he never departs again. He is ruthlessly slaughtered, and his body thrown down the old well. Ha, ha! what a tale could be told by that old well, to be sure, if anyone would bring its contents to the light of day!"

"You affright me," said Maud; "surely you cannot be in earnest in what you say?"

"You shall judge shortly. Did you not show my uncle your purse when you stood outside the door?"

"I did—I did! Oh, Heaven! Yes, I did!"

"That obtained your admittance," said Hunch, slowly, and nodding at every word as though in order to give the utmost emphasis to what he said, "but it was only in order that you might be murdered and despoiled of it. Oh, I know all!"

"Then—then—the landlord of this awful place is—is—your uncle?"

"He is, and treats me just like a nephew. Did you notice him throw the boot-jack at me?"

"Was it at you?"

"Rather! Look here."

As he spoke he removed a rough frieze cap which he wore, and showed one side of his head, in which was a deep gash, from which the blood was slowly oozing.

"I wonder it did not kill you."

"Lor' bless you, lady, that's nothing. He has treated me like a dog, and so has everyone else that I have met with except you. But I am planning my revenge, and before the new day comes it is odd to me if I am not fully satisfied for all the injuries he has done me!"

"What do you mean?"

"Hush—hush! I will explain directly. Hark! hark!"

A strange sound came from below.

"He is getting ready," said Hunch, in a hoarse whisper. "What, after all, if they should be too late!"

"Explain—explain yourself!"

"No time—no time!" said Hunch, moving to the window and looking out. "Listen—listen! Can you hear anything like the tramp of horses' feet? If so, all will be well."

"No—no!" said Maud, with chattering teeth. "I can hear nothing but the sighing of the wind among the tree tops."

"Then he will discover us!"

"Can we not escape?"

"What, by the window?"

"Yes."

"No, no; that would be impossible."

"How so—how so? By what means did you ascend?"

"Lady, they tell me I am like a cat—can climb anywhere. Look, here is an old, half-rotten pear-tree fastened to the wall—that was the means I used to make my ascent."

"Can it be possible?"

"You cannot get that way; but I have another expedient ready. Quick—quick! Off with your dress and cloak."

Maud hesitated to comply with this demand, and yet she could see by the hasty movements of Hunch that there was the utmost necessity for speed.

As for the latter, he with great rapidity removed every object which stood upon the oaken chest we have before had occasion to mention.

There was so much mystery in all these occurrences that Maud could do nothing more than stand still like a statue and watch all that her companion did.

The lid of the chest was very heavy, and she saw him struggling to raise it.

Although quite ignorant of his intentions, she, unbidden, stepped forward to assist him.

But when, by their united efforts, the lid was fairly raised and Maud took a glance at the interior of the chest, she almost swooned with horror and disgust.

For a few seconds everything spun round her with lightning speed.

She could tell Hunch was saying something to her in earnest tones, but his voice sounded only like the faint and distant murmur of the sea.

The first words she distinguished were:

"I ought to have told you of this; but here is a proof—an awful proof of the truth of what I have told you. That which lies within the chest is the body of a traveller who halted here last night after sunset. You see how he has been treated. He was lying on your bed; and how do you think this room was prepared for your reception? Why, simply by lifting the murdered traveller out of the bed and placing the body in this box, as there was no time to carry him to the well in the cellar!"

The reader may perhaps be able to form some slight idea of the effect which these horrifying details produced upon Maud.

She stood like one changed into stone.

But her companion's next words aroused her.

"Look here, miss, this is what I intend to do, and, rely upon it, the scheme will answer. I am going to lift this fellow out of here on to the bed again, wrap him in part of your clothes, and leave him there. My uncle will know nothing of the substitution, for he is always obliged to prime himself well with brandy before he can undertake a job like this!"

Maud's blood ran cold.

"And—and we," she gasped—"where—where shall we be?"

"We will hide."

"Where?"

"Beneath the bed."

The sound of a footstep ascending the staircase could now be heard.

"Quick—quick," said Hunch, "out with the candle! There must be no light save the one he will bring with him. Then lend me your cloak. I will make shift for that to do. Never mind your dress."

While issuing these hasty injunctions Hunch was by no means idle

With an exertion of strength for which, certainly, no one would have given him credit for possessing, but which was due to the singular conformation of the upper part of his body, he raised the dead body of the traveller from the box and staggered with it to the bed, which, luckily, was only about two paces distant.

He had to be particularly careful in placing the body upon the bedstead, but he accomplished the feat successfully.

Quickly, then, he wrapped Maud's cloak about the inanimate form, and covered it over with the bed-clothes.

Without any pause he then closed the chest, replaced the articles upon it, and taking Maud by the arm, bade her creep beneath the bed.

This was no time for demur, and Maud obeyed with the utmost promptitude, for happening to look towards the door she saw a bright light shining beneath it and heard some one speak in a low whisper.

All attempts to describe her feelings now must be futile.

We leave it for the reader to imagine her sensations while she waited for the conclusion of this the most awful adventure she had ever encountered, or ever heard of.

It was some satisfaction to her when she felt her strange companion take hold of her hand, for it assured her that she had a protector near.

All considerations were, however, quickly swallowed up by the absorbing interest caused by the events that ensued.

The whispering sound lasted only for a few seconds, and was succeeded by a profound silence.

Probably those outside were listening.

Maud fancied she had secured the door, but if so, the intruders must have possessed some ready and mysterious means of removing the fastenings, for the door was slowly and gently opened just wide enough for one person to enter.

Then came another pause.

At last, with a slow and shrinking step, a man entered the room.

Maud could see him plainly, for the person by whom he was accompanied stood upon the threshold holding a light, the rays from which fell clear and bright into the room.

The man crept towards the side of the bed, then pausing, faintly whispered.

"Why the devil don't you come nearer with the light! Are you afraid, or do you wish me to blunder up against something in the dark and spoil the game?"

"I was afraid the light would wake her."

"Never fear! You mean you are afraid to come in."

"Nothing of the kind."

With these words, the second speaker came into view of the two watchers.

It was a woman, though both in her mind and person all traces of femininity had long since been trampled out.

The former was embrutalised, and the latter hideous in the highest degree.

Although she had declared herself free from fear, yet the candle trembled in her grasp, while she shook like an aspen from head to foot, thus giving the lie to her assertion.

She did not advance very far into the room, but stood near the door, and held the candle in such a way that its light was well diffused, though the draught which seemed to ascend the staircase caused the flame to flicker in such a manner that the illumination was most uncertain.

Nevertheless, it was sufficient to enable the murderer to make out that something resembling the form of their last guest was lying on the bed.

He did not dare trust himself to look at it too closely, lest the spurious courage which enabled him to execute such deeds should abate.

"Get your knife," whispered the woman—"take my advice and get your knife! It will be much the best."

"Not I," answered the man, in the same hushed tones—"there is no need for it. The pillow will do as well."

"Bah!" ejaculated his companion, contemptuously.

"You know I hate to have anything like this to do with a woman. I don't think it worth while even now."

"Bah!" said the woman again, but with much greater contempt than before. "Either do it or stand back and let me!"

The man did not say a word more, but took a step towards the bed.

He did not approach any nearer the head of it than he was positively compelled, but, stretching out his arm as far as ever he possibly could, he took hold of the pillow.

His movements now were all very rapid.

Neither Maud nor Hunch could see exactly what he was about, yet they could tell that he took hold of the pillow, and, placing it over the face of the supposed sleeping person, held it in that position for several minutes.

During this time, Maud and her companion only drew their breaths by stealth, so fearful were they that the slight sound would be overheard by the two watchers in the painfully-intense silence that now prevailed.

At length the woman whispered:

"That will do—that is quite long enough! She has drawn her last breath now."

Silently the man removed the pillow, and stood listening.

Maud and Hunch now held their breaths altogether.

"It's all right," cried the woman. "Come away now. She is dead enough!"

Just as she spoke these words, the sound of a tremendous knocking from below reached their ears.

The two guilty wretches were so alarmed at it that they both ran against each other.

The candle was knocked from the woman's feeble grasp, and, falling to the floor, was instantly extinguished.

The man, upon gaining possession of his voice, poured out a volley of curses.

"What—what can it be?" gasped the woman.

"Why, some one at the door."

"But who—who?"

"Why, some chance travellers, of course. Who else?"

"I—I felt terrified, and so did you, though now you will try to brave it out!"

"Nothing of the kind, fool! Stand aside! What the devil did you want to drop the light like that for, curse you!"

With these words the man groped his way out of the room in the best way he could, and stumbled down the stairs.

The woman followed him, all the time crying on him to stay.

But he disregarded all her appeals.

No sooner had they both quitted the apartment than Hunch quitted his place of concealment.

Maud hastily followed his example, though such was the state of horror she was in that she was scarcely conscious of what she was about.

Hunch rubbed his hands together briskly, and in various eccentric ways testified to feeling a great amount of satisfaction.

"Do you hear that knocking?" he asked, gleefully. "It seems to have increased tenfold."

"It does—it does!"

"Hark! is it not music!"

"Do you know the cause of it?"

"I do—I do!" replied the singular creature, more triumphantly than before.

"Explain it—explain it! Do not keep me for a moment in suspense! Let me know at once just what it means!"

"Be under no apprehension—all is well. You are safe now, lady—quite safe; and, as for my uncle, why, his little game is done with for ever."

"Still I do not understand. Speak plainer."

"Well, then, I will make all so clear that you cannot fail to understand it."

"Quick, then—be quick!"

"Well, lady, if you only knew how ill-treated I have been by my uncle you would not wonder that I should burn to avenge my wrongs!"

"Well?"

"For a long time I have been unable to find any means of doing so, but at last I hit upon the plan. They kept me closely confined here, not allowing me to leave the premises, but I found out how to baffle them—ha, ha! I made a pen with a piece of sharp-pointed wood, and with the blood that I purposely made to flow from one of my fingers I wrote a letter to the magistrate at Bow Street, describing the situation of this house and the awful deeds enacted in it, requesting him to send down a troop of officers with all possible secrecy and despatch. They have arrived now. Hark! how they hammer at the door! Nunky must know who they are, and is frightened to admit them! Ha, ha! Oh, it's good—it's good!"

To say that Maud listened to this explanation with speechless horror would be only to convey a very feeble idea of the state of her mind.

So appalled was she that her lungs refused to perform their usual functions—respiration was completely stopped.

Her eyes started from their sockets.

Her teeth chattered, and she stood slightly bending forward in an attitude of intense fear.

Hunch observed the effect of his disclosure with an astonishment that was ludicrous.

"Have you heard aright, lady?" he inquired at length—"have you understood me?"

She nodded.

Speech was denied her.

"What, then, causes this terror? There must be a mistake somehow."

By making a great effort, Maud managed to murmur:

"No, no—no mistake!"

"Why, then, this terror?"

"Because the presence of officers is to the full as perilous to me as it can be to your uncle."

"But—you—you do not—mur——" gasped Hunch.

"No, no—not that! But I have been arrested and tried for a crime of which I was and am perfectly innocent; nevertheless, I was pronounced guilty."

"And you escaped?"

"Yes, by the aid of friends I escaped, and since then have, with the utmost difficulty, eluded the officers. Now they are here, and I cannot escape. At the first glance they will recognise me. I shall be powerless to resist them! Then—then—oh, then all—all will be lost!"

As she uttered these last words, in tones of indescribable agony, Maud threw her arms up above her head, and, with a cry of intense anguish, sank sobbing and fainting upon a seat.

Hunch gazed at her for a second or two in silence; then, by that time being able to comprehend pretty well what mischief he had caused, he went deliberately to the wall, and dashed his head a great many times against it.

This action diverted Maud's attention, and caused her to look up.

"Good heavens!" she ejaculated, "what are you about?"

"Only serving myself out, lady, that's all," replied Hunch, pausing in his self-inflicted punishment.

"Do not be so foolish as that! What you did was for the best."

"But that does not make matters any better for you, lady."

"No, but——"

What Maud would have said then is uncertain, for she was interrupted by a terrific crash, which came from the bottom of the house, and which completely drowned all other sounds.

"What—what is that?" she gasped, as soon as the noise ceased.

Hunch ran immediately to the door, and opened it to the extent of two or three inches

The crash was caused by the yielding of the front door, which had given way before the furious blows rained upon it by the police officers.

There was then a hasty rush of feet, and a voice cried:

"Lights—lights! Lights, I say—at once!"

Then, almost immediately, the same voice exclaimed:

"Seize them—seize them both, and bind them securely! Beyond a doubt they are the miscreants of whom we are in search!"

A slight scuffle ensued, but the officers were so overpowering in their numbers that after a brief struggle the man and the woman were securely made prisoners.

This scene was imperfectly beheld by Hunch, who projected his head a little way through the partially open doorway and peeped down the staircase.

In his interest there is no knowing how long he might have stood a spectator, oblivious of aught else

Suddenly he felt a slight touch upon his arm.

Turning round, he caught sight of the pallid face of Maud close to his own.

"The officers have entered?" she said, interrogatively.

"Yes," replied Hunch, whose astonishment was unbounded at the calm manner in which Maud now spoke

"Then—then, you must assist me to escape!"

"How—how?"

"Cannot you suggest the means?"

"I fear, lady, it is impossible! Oh, I wish I had died a thousand times before I had lived to bring you into so much peril!"

Some loudly-uttered words now struck upon the ears of both and arrested their attention.

"That is right," said a voice below. "Now search the place thoroughly from top to bottom, and particularly an old well situated in one of the cellars. We shall then soon know whether we have been deceived by false information, or whether what we have heard is quite correct."

An immediate movement followed these words, and the voice continued:

"Two or three of you keep a sharp look-out on the outside of the building, so that no one shall leave the premises unperceived. Then as for the rest, let them follow me upstairs, where I fancy the most important discoveries are to be made."

No sooner were these injunctions uttered than the sound of heavy footsteps informed the listeners that they were in the act of ascending the staircase.

"Fasten the door," said Maud, calmly, though she spoke only with the calmness of despair—"fasten the door; and that, if it does no more, will impede their progress, and give us a little time to think what can be done."

CHAPTER MXVI.

THE OFFICERS ADOPT SOME ENERGETIC MOVEMENTS AT THE INN.

HUNCH rapidly complied with Maud's command, though when she gave it she really knew not what would be the good actually effected.

At any rate, it would prevent the officers from entering so speedily as they would otherwise have done.

"What next, lady?" said Hunch, turning round to her.

"Escape!" she cried. "I must escape!"

"You heard what the officers said?"

"I did."

"Then how is it to be managed?"

Maud only shook her head.

Hunch was anxious and bewildered.

"I must—I must escape," Maud murmured, "no matter what risk I incur in doing so! Not only my own life and liberty, but also the lives of those near and dear to me depend upon my getting away! At all hazards it must be done!"

"I fear it is impossible."

Maud just at this moment darted to the window.

In the tumult of her mind she had forgotten all about it.

Now it presented itself to her as an outlet for escape.

Dashing open the casement she looked out, but the intense darkness appalled her.

"I don't know how you can get that way, lady."

"Did not you ascend?" said Maud, overcoming as well as she could her sensations of terror, and endeavouring to extinguish the nature of the various objects outside

"I climbed up," said Hunch; "but it was by clinging to the branches of the old cherry-tree. You could never make such a descent."

It was just at this moment that the officers, having made a hasty search of the other rooms, came to the one in which Maud and Hunch were.

They tried the door and found it fast.

The sound of her foes being so near to her endued

[BISHOP, THE OFFICER, TRIES A SHOT AT BLACK BESS.]

Maud with a degree of courage which she never dreamt she had possession of.

Comprehending the means by which Hunch had made his way into the chamber, she did not hesitate to attempt to leave it by the same means.

Hunch in vain attempted to prevent her.

Almost before he was aware of it, she had lowered herself through the casement.

Perilous as the attempt was, yet she preferred making it to remaining in the room and facing her foes.

With the strength which nothing but despair can give, she clung to the branches of the tree.

Most fortunate indeed for her was it that she was surrounded by so intense a darkness, for it prevented her from beholding her perilous position.

Could she but have had one glance at the ground below, all nerve, strength, and self-possession would have deserted her.

No. 214.—BLACK BESS.

Clinging close to the wall, however, she directed all her energies to keeping a secure hold upon the tree.

Hunch, finding that she descended with safety, did not hesitate to lower himself through the window.

To him the feat was the most ordinary feat in the world.

The immense strength which he possessed in the upper part of his body easily enabled him to hold on with one hand while with the other he closed the window, though, of course, he was unable to fasten it from the outside.

He had scarcely done this before the door of the room yielded to the violent kick given to it by one of the police officers. Several rushed across the threshold.

Hunch waited to behold no more, but lowered himself with a speed that looked reckless in the extreme.

But he reached the ground with absolute safety.

He found Maud cowering down close to the wall.

No. 215 will be Published next Monday.

Now that she had escaped so far her nerves became unstrung, and she had no longer the power to do anything to assist herself.

Tears were rolling down her cheeks.

Her sudden prostration filled Hunch with surprise.

Without exactly comprehending it, he said:

"Come—come, lady, you must not give way thus. Courage—courage! The worst is over, though we are by no means out of danger."

Maud roused herself a little, as she asked:

"What is to be done now? Tell me—oh, tell me what will be our next step?"

"Why, to get away."

"But the officers are watching."

"True, and on that account it will be no easy matter. Yet it must be accomplished."

"And you remember," said Maud, with a fresh burst of grief—"you remember what I told you about my friends?"

"I do, my lady."

"Time, precious time, is flying fast, and here am I doing nothing on their behalf. If I do not see them and warn them of their danger, they will go headlong to death!"

"Keep your heart up, lady. We have succeeded wonderfully at present. In the end, no doubt, all will be well."

These words had quite an encouraging and reassuring effect upon Maud, who rose silently to her feet.

Hunch glanced up to the window of the room they had just left, through which came a bright light and also the sound of many voices speaking in loud tones.

"They have made a discovery," he whispered to Maud, "which will doubtless occupy them for some time. This is the opportunity we ought to seize to escape."

"Are there any horses on the premises?" Maud asked. "If so, let us endeavour to gain possession of them. We shall not only stand a better chance of getting away from these officers, but I shall be enabled to meet with my friends."

"Yes—we have two horses in the stable close at hand; but——"

"But what?"

"I question very much whether there is the least hope of our being able to get possession of them unseen by the officers."

"Nevertheless, let us try," replied Maud, with that decision which seemed to come natural to her in moments of the greatest difficulty.

"Come, then," said Hunch, in a faint whisper—"follow me. I will lead the way."

Although the storm was over, yet the sky had by no means cleared, and the density of the clouds caused an intense darkness to prevail.

Yet, by straining her eyes, Maud was able to keep the form of her strange companion in view.

She followed him across a kind of yard, littered over with rubbish of every description.

At length, without having apparently attracted the attention of anyone, or raised the least alarm, they paused before a roughly-made door communicating with a wooden shed.

This door yielded to the slight touch which Hunch gave it.

He beckoned to Maud to cross the threshold.

Then closed the door again.

"We may congratulate ourselves so far, lady," he murmured, in the same cautious tones. "If I can only manage to get the horses bridled. I do believe we shall get off safely."

Maud's heart beat high with hope.

Hunch groped about in the dark.

He must have been wonderfully well acquainted with the place, for he found what he wanted with very little trouble.

As soon as the two animals were caparisoned he cautiously led them out.

The utmost rapidity now characterised every one of his movements.

He assisted Maud to mount, and vaulted into the saddle himself.

Scarcely had he gained his seat than a loud cry of alarm was uttered by some one close at hand.

The discharge of a pistol followed, though it would seem that the weapon had been fired merely as the means of attracting attention.

"Follow me," cried Hunch, in his odd, shrill tones—"follow me closely, and all will be well."

Maud followed this injunction without hesitation.

Dimly—very dimly before her she could perceive the form of the hunchback.

In order to leave the premises at the rear of the inn it was necessary to emerge into the road.

This was the moment of greatest danger.

Hunch felt it, and knew that if they could once get a clear start there was a strong probability of ultimate escape.

The explosion of the pistol had put every one of the officers on the alert.

The alarm was general.

"Hold—hold!" cried a loud voice, as the fugitives went dashing by. "Hold, or the consequences of refusal be on your own heads! Pull up, or we fire!"

Hunch took not the least notice of this command, neither did Maud.

The officers, enraged at this contumacy, at once discharged a volley.

The report was deafening, and for an infinitesimally brief space of time everything around was revealed by the flash.

A faint cry came to Maud's lips.

As she uttered it she fancied one of a similar character came from her companion.

Of this she could not be sure; but observing that he put his horse to additional speed she, without hesitation followed his example.

The officers were not mounted, and, consequently, the slight delay which was inevitably caused by their mounting to their saddles enabled the two fugitives to get a tolerably good start.

Maud called out several times to her companion to know whether he was hurt.

But on no occasion did she receive a reply.

She urged her own horse onward, and endeavoured to get breast to breast with Hunch, but was unable to do so, for the more she tried to overtake him the faster he went.

Her fears were now aroused by hearing the tremendous clatter caused by the hoofs of the officers' horses, which were thundering along at the top of their speed.

At this moment Hunch, with great suddenness and abruptness, turned his horse's head down a narrow lane on the right hand.

So short was the turn he took that she feared at first it would hurl him from the saddle.

The manner in which he swayed about from one side to the other was truly wonderful to behold.

Again and again Maud called out to him.

But so far from taking any notice of her voice, he leaned first to one side then to the other in a manner more alarming than before.

It seemed to her as though he was making frantic—nay, superhuman efforts to retain his balance.

All these efforts quickly proved in vain.

With a sudden lurch his body fell over to one side, and reached the earth with a dull, sickening crash.

Maud closed her eyes, and shrieked aloud in horror.

The horse still continued his frantic career, and Maud's horror was now greatly intensified by perceiving that, in falling, Hunch had not been fortunate enough to clear his foot from the stirrup.

At every bound the now thoroughly terrified animal took, his body was dashed with fearful violence upon the ground.

Whether life was extinct or not Maud could not tell, nor had she any means of ascertaining.

In vain she urged her own horse to the utmost of its capacity, in order that she might make an attempt to put a stop to the frantic creature's career.

As before, however, Hunch's horse maintained the lead, and at last Maud was obliged to resign herself to the conviction that it was out of her power to overtake him, or do anything to help or save him.

In the intense interest she felt in this pursuit she forgot for a brief period all about the police officers who were pursuing her so eagerly.

Beyond question the endeavour to overtake her companion caused her to make greater speed than she would otherwise have done.

The intense excitement deadened her to the danger that naturally attached itself to such a headlong course.

The animal in front of her was now quite mad with terror, and consequently it is easy to conceive at what a furious rate it went, since all its efforts seemed to be to outrun the mass that was lumbering at its heels.

Nevertheless, although its speed was so terrific, Maud managed to keep up with it, and the terrified animal, in spite of all its efforts, was unable to increase the distance there was between them.

How long this terrible chase continued Maud knew not, but long ere it was brought to a termination she felt an odd sensation of faintness and sickness come over her for which she was not altogether able to account.

Then she became sensible of a dull, aching pain in her right side.

Mechanically she pressed her hand upon it, believing the pain to be produced by nothing else than the hasty gallop.

She withdrew her fingers with an ejaculation of terror.

Her dress on that side was wet and sticky, and in a moment she became aware that when the officers had fired their volley she had not escaped injury.

She could not believe, however, that the injury was a very severe one, because had it been it would unquestionably have manifested itself sooner and in a different manner.

When the first shock of this discovery was over, Maud again turned her attention to her unfortunate protector.

Just as she glanced down the road the horse contrived in some way to get rid of his burden.

Either from the stirrup-leather giving way, or from his foot becoming released from the stirrup, Hunch's frightful course was brought to a termination.

So suddenly did this event occur that Maud had much ado to pull her horse up in time to prevent herself from riding over him.

As soon as ever her own steed, which showed every symptom of great terror, was brought to a standstill, she dismounted and bent over the prostrate form of her unfortunate protector.

It was now each moment growing lighter, for morning was close at hand.

By the dim, gray illumination, Maud beheld a terrible and fearful spectacle.

Poor Hunch was from head to foot nothing but one disfigured mass of bruises and scratches covered with dust and blood.

The manner in which his torn apparel was soaked by the latter showed that he must have been badly wounded by one or more bullets when the officers discharged their volley.

Maud pronounced his name, but it was in a most hopeless tone of voice.

There came no reply.

Indeed, it was too much to suppose that any human being could survive such frightful injuries as he had received.

Upon making the discovery that he was indeed no more, Maud burst out into a passion of regretful tears.

Misfortune and death did indeed seem to follow in her footsteps, and to be the fate of those who were willing to befriend her.

The fatality was a strange one.

This was the second faithful protector she had lost upon this truly fearful night, and now she found herself once more solitary, alone, and unprotected, and as regards the important expedition upon which she had set out, so far from being nearer, she actually seemed further from the accomplishment of the important errand upon which she had set out.

Despairingly, and with her heart completely weighed down, she rose and looked around.

The dull, distant, but unmistakable sound produced by the horses of the pursuing officers struck upon her ears, and once more aroused her into fresh life and activity.

She remembered most vividly and painfully how irresponsible was her present expedition.

For herself she cared little, if anything.

She felt that her life could not be better spent than in saving Dick, who to her was far dearer than her own existence.

Nothing else but this feeling could have enabled her to struggle against, and finally to some extent overcome, the deathlike sensation of faintness which now came over her.

She reeled, and every object seemed to be gyrating round her at an awful speed.

Nevertheless, with the manner of one deprived of sight, she groped about, in order to obtain a grasp upon her horse's saddle.

The animal stood perfectly quiet, though intense terror caused him to tremble in every limb.

Maud feared, however, that to remount was a task far beyond her failing powers.

She tried again and again.

But in vain.

Each attempt was of a more feeble character than its predecessors.

But now the sound of her pursuers came upon her ears with much greater distinctness than before.

Surely now they must be close—very close at hand.

This knowledge nerved her to one more trial.

Summoning up the whole of her remaining strength, she renewed her endeavours.

This time she succeeded, though before she had time to settle herself properly in the saddle and obtain a firm seat the terrified horse dashed off.

By clinging partly to the mane and partly to the pommel of the saddle, Maud contrived to save herself from falling.

Then, despite her insecurity, she urged her horse onward with her voice, so anxious was she to make all speed.

But there was little need for this.

The creature's terror seemed to increase rather than abate.

Every moment his pace became more terrific.

Closer and closer upon his back Maud crouched as she felt herself in more and more imminent danger of falling off.

Great as this peril was, yet it shrunk into absolute insignificance when compared with that from which she was escaping; and, under the circumstances, there was one thing which could not fail of affording her satisfaction.

She was certainly distancing her foes, for now they could no longer be heard trampling so loudly upon the roadway.

It would almost seem as though Maud was now about altogether to elude her foes.

But such was not the case.

Again, and with tenfold intensity, the sensations caused by the loss of so much blood as had flowed from her side reasserted themselves.

And now indeed was the great danger.

Her position upon the back of the horse was not in the least degree more secure than it had been.

Every object seemed to fade away from her.

The hedgerows retreated until they were lost to sight altogether.

Strange sounds, like the clanging of far-off bells, were ringing in her ears.

Yet, with the grasp of despair, she continued to maintain her hold.

Unconsciously, however, her fingers relaxed.

Gradually all muscular power was departing.

She gasped for breath.

She tried to utter a cry—to call out for assistance in that spot, although she was dimly conscious that she should find none.

More and more to one side her body hung.

The horse, snorting with alarm as he felt the fluttering of her apparel against his flanks, dashed on more furiously than ever.

There was a sudden, rushing sound—

A gurgling cry—

A heavy splash, and the next moment the horse continued his headlong course—

But he was riderless!

CHAPTER MXVII.

CONTINUES TO DESCRIBE MAUD'S MISFORTUNES.

It so happened that at the moment when Maud slipped from the saddle the horse was passing over a rustic wooden bridge which spanned a stream.

In a general way but a small amount of water flowed beneath the rudely-constructed arch, but now the volume of the stream was much increased by the quantity of rain that had so recently fallen.

The effect of this was also that the little water-course flowed with much greater swiftness than was common.

In one sense, it was fortunate that this should be the spot where Maud fell.

In some strange way, she seemed to slip from the saddle, and dropped in comparatively speaking a gentle manner into the brook.

Such was the force of the current that she was instantaneously drifted beneath the arch, narrowly escaping a violent blow from some of the massive wooden supports belonging to the structure.

The sudden immersion into the cold water had the effect of partially restoring her to the proper possession of her faculties.

Still, she was not able to make any effort to support herself upon the surface of the water.

Luckily, her garments becoming distended by wind caused her to float, and to this circumstance alone must the saving of her life be attributed.

She knew nothing about the officers who came galloping up, and who, upon reaching the little narrow wooden bridge, came to a pause, in order that they might ride in single file across it.

These men could still hear the clatter of horse's feet before them; and never dreaming that Maud had quitted the saddle, they continued the chase without delay.

But of all this Maud knew nothing.

The rapid current of the stream carried her along for a great distance, until suddenly she experienced a fall, as though she had passed over the verge of some mimic waterfall.

Then her further progress down the stream was arrested by an obstacle of some kind.

What it was she knew not, but with the instinct of self-preservation she seized hold upon it.

The water no longer rushed past her.

All was comparatively calm and still.

Gradually and slowly morning dawned.

The early light shone grayly and chilly upon the water and the two buildings that were near it.

One was a singular-looking white edifice, built quite close to the water's edge,

The other was a cot—a humble yet pleasant-looking building.

It was just as the sun rose above the horizon that the door of the little cottage was opened,

A man appeared upon the threshold.

The sun fell clear and red upon him, showing that he was past the middle age, and apparently the possessor of immense strength.

In his outward aspect there was, however, little calculated to prepossess an observer in his favour.

Pausing for a moment on the step of the dwelling, he placed his hand before his eyes to screen off the rays of the sun, and as he did so he remarked to some one within:

"Just as I expected, wife—just as I expected. It's an ill wind that blows nobody good, that's true enough. There are plenty no doubt to whom last night's storm has done much harm, but there's water enough now in the pool to turn the old mill for many a day."

These words were uttered with a degree of cheerfulness that one would scarcely have expected in a man of his appearance.

No sooner were the words pronounced than he stepped towards the water.

It now became clear that the singular-looking building was no other than a water-mill.

Having reached the water's edge, the man made his way to one particular portion of it, where some sluice gates were fixed.

His object evidently was to open them so as to allow the water to flow sufficiently to set the water-wheel in motion.

But no sooner did he reach the old, moss-grown sluice gates than he uttered a loud cry, which had the immediate effect of bringing his wife to the door of the cottage.

"What is it—what is it?" she asked.

"Here—here!" said the man. "Look here. Did you ever see the like?"

The woman hastened to place herself by her husband's side.

Then looked in the direction in which he pointed.

"Why," she gasped, "it's—it's a woman!"

"Yes—and a dead one."

"How came she there?"

"I know no better than yourself, for I have only just seen her."

"It is fortunate you did not open the gates."

"It is. If I had, nothing could have saved her from going under the wheel."

The reader probably comprehends that the stream down which Maud had been carried discharged itself into a large pool, which served the purpose of a reservoir to the mill.

This pool had but one outlet—the sluice gates.

It was against those that Maud had been carried, and it was to these she had clung with the tenacity of a drowning person.

The man and his wife gazed upon her for some moments in silence.

At length the woman spoke.

"Surely—surely, John," she said, "she must be dead!"

"Oh, yes, dead beyond a doubt! She cannot be alive! The great puzzle is, to me, how on earth she came there."

"What is to be done?"

"I don't know."

"If she is dead——"

"There is no 'if' about it!"

"Well—well, you need not be so sharp. As she is dead we shall probably find ourselves in some trouble!"

"How so?" asked the man, with a start of surprise.

"Why, as you know full well, we have more enemies than friends hereabouts, and when they come to hear of this we shall have hard work to persuade them that we have had no hand in this creature's death."

The man knit his brows savagely and muttered a curse.

"It's no good swearing!" said his wife. "What is to be done? Be quick and make up your mind!"

"What do you advise?"

"Advise?"

"Yes; let me hear what you have to propose. What do you consider would be the best?"

"Oh, how kind you are, to be sure, John," said his wife, with a sneer; "but don't think I am such a fool as to be taken in by you! Wouldn't you just like me to tell you what to do?"

"I should, for I don't know myself."

"Oh, of course not! You would like to put all the responsibility on my shoulders, so that if anything should arise from it you would be able to say, 'There, that's your doings!' No—no, John Costard, I am determined not to allow you the opportunity! There now!"

These words were pronounced in a very triumphant tone indeed, and their emphasis was increased by the manner in which she clapped her hands together at the conclusion.

The miller looked very wroth for a moment, but probably he had long ago learnt that any demonstration of anger was quite useless.

Therefore, smothering his resentment, he said, in as calm and quiet a tone as he could assume:

"Well, then, in my opinion the best thing that can be done is to get her out of the water at once and ascertain whether she is really dead or not."

"Very well, John Costard. Do just as you like. But I have one great consolation—you won't be able to blame me afterwards for what's done! That is a great consolation!"

The miller cursed again, but this time it was under his breath.

Without taking any further notice of his helpmate, he bent himself seriously to the task of recovering the body of Maud.

This was no easy task, owing to the situation of the sluice gates.

After a short delay, however, the miller succeeded in slipping a rope round Maud's waist.

Then, crawling back to the shore, he, by means of it, pulled her towards him.

When near enough, he stooped down and lifted her on to the smooth grass by which the pool was bordered.

"I fancy she is dead," he muttered, after gazing at Maud for a few moments.

"Then if she is just let me ask you what is to become of us? We shall be found guilty of murder! What is to be done?"

"I should think we had better try all we possibly can to revive her; if we succeed there will be an end to that danger."

"Very well—do just as you like; I shall not have a word to say either way in the affair."

The fear these people had that a dead body would get them into trouble made them most anxious that Maud should recover.

By the assistance of his wife, the miller carried her into the house, and every means was used to restore her to sensibility.

But for a long time their efforts were quite in vain.

In removing her apparel, the weight of her dress was noticed.

The miller's wife was curious enough to ascertain the cause.

It was found to be the heavy purse which Maud carried, and the sight of which had excited the cupidity of the villanous innkeeper.

Even the miller's eyes gleamed when he caught sight of so much wealth.

The interior of his dwelling did indeed present a melancholy spectacle, for on all sides could be seen unmistakable tokens of the presence of the gaunt spectre Poverty.

For a long time things had gone badly with the miller.

The water which turned the mill had lately been very deficient in supply, and consequently his mill had rusted with disuse.

To him the purse of gold that his wife held up before his eyes represented wealth—a fortune.

"Put it away," he said, averting his eyes—"put it away! Do not tempt me with the sight!"

It was at this moment that Maud showed some signs of returning animation.

The woman's guilty conscience made her hastily secrete the gold, and immediately afterwards she was bending over the cold form with an appearance of hypocritical solicitude.

Wearily and heavily Maud opened her eyes.

The daylight confused and blinded her.

"What place is this?" she gasped. "What—oh, what has happened?"

The utterance of these words proved too much for the slight amount of strength which she then possessed.

Her eyes closed, and she again lapsed into unconsciousness.

The fears which had hitherto animated the minds of the miller and his wife were now at rest.

The latter, however, fixing her eyes upon her husband, said:

"What think you now will be the reward we shall receive for thus restoring her to life?"

"Reward?"

"Yes. How much do you think she will give us?"

The miller shook his head.

His wife stamped her foot impatiently, as she exclaimed:

"Answer me, dolt that you are—answer me, I say!"

"Something considerable, no doubt," replied the miller, in a voice of restraint.

"Yes—yes; but how much?"

"The contents of that purse, perhaps."

"Never fear; I'll warrant that is all she possesses, and I don't suppose, by the look of her, that she came by it honestly."

In good truth, poor Maud's outward appearance at this time was far from being prepossessing.

She bore upon her garments the marks of the many vicissitudes she had lately gone through, and in particular this last adventure had by no means improved them.

After a long discussion between themselves, it was determined by this precious pair that they would do the best they could for the stranger who had been in so peculiar a manner thrust upon their care, and that on her recovery they would trust to her generosity to reward them handsomely.

Accordingly, she was laid upon the only bed the place could boast, and it was not until this was done that the wound in her side was discovered.

The hemorrhage had for some time completely ceased.

No doubt the sudden immersion into the cold water had had the effect of checking the flow of blood.

The first shock of surprise being over, the miller's wife set herself to work to examine it.

She quickly found that the hurt was by no means a serious one, and certainly not beyond her own powers of surgery.

With considerabe skill she bandaged up the wound, and then waited patiently for Maud to show some symptoms of returning animation.

But she waited for a long and weary time—until, indeed, the whole of that day had passed—until the thick shadows of evening began to fill the apartment.

Suddenly, with a loud scream, Maud awoke as though from some dreadful dream.

She sprang up at once into a sitting posture, and gazed around her with a countenance upon which alarm was most vividly depicted.

"What is your fear?" said the miller's wife, somewhat gruffly. "Keep still, or you will make yourself worse than you already are."

The voice caused Maud to turn her eyes in the direction of the speaker.

Her gaze was one of inexpressible surprise and wonder.

It was quite evident that at present Maud had no idea of where she was, nor any recollection of what had happened.

"Tell me," she said at length, speaking with a great effort—"tell me where I am and how I came here?"

"Nay—nay," said the woman. "Be calm—be still. You shall know all in good time."

"Calm?" echoed Maud—"calm? You know not whom you speak, or you would not address such a word to me! Keep me not in suspense, I entreat you, but answer my question without delay!"

As she proceeded, Maud's agitation increased.

By degrees recollection was coming back to her, and all this time her heart painfully fluttered with dismay.

With that rapidity of which thought alone is capable, she followed up all the different events which had occurred to her until the fall from her horse, of which she had only a very slight and dim remembrance.

"Tell me," she said again, and with so much additional excitement that the miller's wife was afraid to withhold the information any longer.

Maud listened with a terror and alarm for which the narrator could not account.

"And—and," gasped Maud, with parting lips and panting breath, "you say that it was this morning—early this morning that you found me?"

"Yes, lady, at sunrise?"

"And now—what is it now?"

The woman looked bewildered.

"I mean, how long is it since then?"

"About twelve hours."

"Then it is close upon night?"

"It is. Do you not perceive that the room grows darker every moment?"

"I must go—I must go at once," said Maud, in shrieking tones. "I cannot stay here any longer—I must go this moment!"

"You cannot."

"Woman, do not be so cruel as to try to stop me! I tell you many lives hang upon my movements! Get me a horse. Fear not that I shall fail to reward you well!"

"But I say again you cannot."

Maud, with a cry of despair, slipped off the bed.

No sooner did her feet touch the ground, however,

than she became fully sensible of her extreme weakness.

She tried to move, but all motion was denied her.

"Lost—lost!" she cried, in a voice of such terrible anguish that it penetrated even to the heart of the miller's wife—"lost, now—all—all is lost—lost—lost!"

And with these words upon her lips, she threw up her arms above her head, and sank down upon the floor again totally bereft of consciousness.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

DISCLOSES THE PERILOUS POSITION OF DICK TURPIN AND HIS COMRADES AT THE OLD CASTLE.

To say that Dick Turpin and his comrades were astounded and amazed upon hearing the loud yells of the police officers and their triumphant cries as they clustered around the entrance to the subterraneous chamber would only be to convey a very faint impression of the actual condition of their minds at this juncture.

Dick Turpin stopped short as though by some magical process he had been instantaneously transformed to stone.

His comrades paused as well, and gazed blankly at each other.

In this manner they remained until the first outburst of triumph on the part of the officers was over.

"Below, there!" cried Bishop, in a stentorian voice—"below, there, I say!"

This was probably intended as a summons for the highwaymen to reply; but if so, no notice was taken of it whatever.

"Surrender—surrender!" cried Bishop, "and so save your lives! Dick Turpin, give in game and handsome, as a fellow like you ought to. Our number more than trebles yours, and you are down there like rats in a trap. Escape is out of the question quite, so make the best of a bad job by giving in quietly!"

These words had the effect of dissolving the kind of spell which had hitherto pressed upon the minds of our friends.

So perfectly secure did they consider themselves in their present quarters, that when they first heard the sound of voices and the trampling of feet above they could scarcely believe that their ears had served them aright.

"Good heavens!" ejaculated Tom King. "What is to be done?"

"Alas!" said Dick, "I now feel myself incapable of all action and direction."

"Nay—nay, captain! Look up! Do not suffer yourself to be cast down by this?"

Dick groaned.

"It is not of myself that I am thinking," he responded—"for my own part I care little, but it is Maud—Maud! What can have become of her?"

The uncertainty Dick Turpin was in about Maud's fate, and the apprehensions he experienced concerning it, unmanned him quite.

His companions witnessed it with genuine grief.

"Something must be done," remarked Claude Duval, after a brief pause. "Let us be quick and decide, or we shall have those fellows down upon us."

"But what can be done?" asked Tom King. "They have the advantage of us in every way. I believe any attempt at resistance would be perfectly futile."

A gloomy silence followed the expression of this opinion.

It was so fully shared in by everyone present that not a single word could be said.

As for Dick, he almost seemed as though every word uttered by his comrades was lost upon him, so absorbed was he by his grief for Maud.

The officers, however, by no means seemed to relish the idea of descending the steps.

They much preferred remaining where they were.

A short time having elapsed, however, Bishop bent over the abyss, and in as loud a voice as he possibly could, shouted out:

"Dick Turpin and the rest of you, listen to what I say. I will give you three minutes to consider my proposal, and if at the end of that time we hear nothing from you we shall use our weapons, for this time we are determined to have you, alive or dead! If we suffered you to slip through our fingers on such an occasion as this we should be a laughing-stock for the whole country! Are you listening to what I say?"

The same profound silence was preserved by the highwaymen.

A silence that made the officers begin to feel rather uncomfortable.

Tom Davis all this time had been too dumbfounded to open his lips.

Indeed, the whole place being strange to him, he scarcely comprehended his position.

Yet it was singular that when he did speak he was the first to propound a really practical question.

"Is there no other way of getting out of this place except that by which we have entered it?"

Sixteen-String Jack started at this question.

"A way might be made," he answered, "if those fellows would only allow us the time to do it."

Tom Davis shook his head.

"Is it possible," he asked, "that you have remained here so long without taking care to have several exits? That ought to have been your first care."

"It ought; but it's too late to talk of that now."

Tom Davis was much grieved to observe the apathy which had settled upon the captain.

No one, however, knew Turpin's disposition better than he did, and on the present occasion he hastened to make use of his knowledge.

Touching his old companion on the arm, he said:

"Dick, if you were by yourself, and had no one depending upon you whatever, this total abandonment to grief could be defended. As it is, we are here awaiting your judgment and commands, therefore the indulgence is unjust."

Dick raised his head.

His voice was trembling and almost inarticulate as he replied:

"Tom, you can form no opinion of my feelings, because you have never known what it is to sustain such a fearful loss. However, I must admit that your reproof is just, and therefore, shaking off as well as I can all my own private sorrows, I will do my best to obtain your safety."

"That is spoken like yourself. Now, then, tell us what to do. The officers surround the opening above, so that there is no hope whatever of making our escape that way. As we ascended the steps, we could be picked off one by one, like sparrows; and you may depend the officers would not hesitate to do it."

"No; that is certain."

"I have just been blaming you all," said Tom Davis, "that you did not provide against such a contingency as this by making another outlet."

"It should have been done."

"But it is not," said Claude, "and therefore to talk about it now is only to waste precious time."

"Right," said Sixteen-String Jack; "but if you will go to the foot of the flight of steps, I will show you a passage which I have partially explored."

"And whither does it lead?" asked Dick, eagerly.

"That I cannot tell you."

"Do you know whether there is an outlet?"

"I do not yet. I fancy one might be made."

"Why?"

"Because I could feel fresh air."

"Let us go there, then."

"With all my heart," said Jack; "for we cannot possibly make our position worse by moving from one part of this subterranean place to another."

No sooner were these words spoken than, with the greatest amount of caution possible, they made their way back to the foot of the steps.

Careful as they were yet it would seem that their approach had not been made without reaching the keen ears of the officers above.

"Be ready," they heard Bishop say, in a suppressed voice—"be ready, for I can hear them coming. Perhaps they intend to make a rush. If so, discharge all your pistols at once down the staircase. We cannot fail to have every one of them then."

Bishop uttered this cold-blooded command in the calmest and most business-like tone possible to conceive.

Dick could not avoid shuddering as he heard it, for he thought of what Maud's fate was likely to be, if she had fallen into such hands; and he believed she had, for all circumstances seemed to point to this conclusion.

"Below there!" cried Bishop, again. "Did you hear what I said? Are you inclined to accept my proposal or not? At any rate, I shall wait no longer."

"Hilloa!" said Turpin, though the tone in which he pronounced the word was so unlike his usual voice, that his comrades could scarcely believe that he had spoken.

"Oh," said Bishop, "you have found a voice at last, have you? How do you feel down there now?"

"Much the same as you do above."

"Oh, do you? Perhaps you intend that for a joke. If you do, I can assure you you will find in a little while that you will be ready to laugh the other side of your mouth."

"Oh, shall we! I suppose you are not content with the one capture you have made, eh?"

Now these words were spoken by Dick with a view if possible of ascertaining something about Maud.

Surely, he thought, if Bishop had made her a prisoner this would elicit some remark concerning her.

But Bishop had not been successful enough to do anything of the kind.

Therefore, Dick's words were not a little enigmatical to him.

In the course of a moment, however, that sagacity for which he was so famous suggested that Dick must refer to the capture of himself and companions.

To Dick's great surprise, then, the astute officer answered:

"Yes, I am tolerably satisfied, because I know you cannot escape. I am only waiting to have you securely bound, and then my satisfaction will be complete."

"Will it?"

"Yes, decidedly; and now listen to reason: You must by this time have realized that you are completely trapped—yes, trapped is the word. We could starve you into submission if we only liked to wait and take the trouble; or by making a sudden descent we could, by one volley down the passage, sweep every one of you from the earth. But you are a decent fellow, Dick, and I should be sorry to take your life; I have a respect for you, and I hope you will surrender quietly to my power in order that I may have the credit of having captured you alive."

"You are remarkably kind," said Dick, in a sarcastic voice. "Perhaps you will allow me to speak to my companions and ask them whether they prefer being shot down by your pistols or whether they will give in quietly?"

Bishop concluded from this speech that he really had a chance of achieving what he so wished to accomplish. He believed he could perceive the symptoms of an inclination to yield without bloodshed.

It was, therefore, while labouring under this pleasing but delusive impression that he said:

"You shall never say that I did not treat you properly, so I will give you two minutes to decide."

Bishop thought he was arranging matters very cleverly indeed.

Not so Isaac, who proclaimed his disgust in loud tones.

"You're a d—d fool!" he remarked, in an audible voice, as soon as Bishop had concluded the last sentence.

The chief officer turned round and cried, indignantly:

"Who, sir?"

"Why, you, of course! Did you imagine more than one was in the company?"

"I know there is one," said Bishop, with a significant glance; "and what is more, he is an intermeddler and a busybody besides!"

"I understand your insinuation, but I don't hesitate to call you a blundering fool, nevertheless; and what is more still, I wash my hands entirely of this affair—I will have no more to do with it!"

"Very well, please yourself!"

"The idea," muttered Isaac, "of a man being fool enough to stand at the top of a flight of steps while he knows those he wants are below, and, instead of rushing down upon them at once, kindly gives them as much time as they want to make an escape!"

"Hold your row!" said Bishop, savagely.

"I shall speak if I like; and this I will say, I have wondered many and many a time how on earth it was that Dick Turpin and his comrades have managed to avoid capture on such a many occasions. But I shall wonder no longer, for I daresay your brother officers have been kind enough to allow them every opportunity of escape, as you have!"

"How escape?" asked Bishop, contemptuously. "If you must make your voice heard, do let us have the satisfaction of now and then hearing a few words of sense! How can they escape, you idiot? Ain't they as fast as rats in a trap?"

"Don't you make too sure of that, my friend!—don't you make too sure! However, I am clear of the whole affair now; and whether you capture them or whether you don't does not signify to me in the least degree. I know I should have acted very differently under the same circumstances!"

"And pray," said Bishop, putting on as sneering a tone and manner as he knew how—"and pray may I make so bold as to venture to ask what my very wise friend would have done under the circumstances?"

The mock humility which Bishop displayed, he thought, was cutting in the utmost degree.

"Yes," said Isaac, "I will tell you, though I don't suppose you will have the sense to act up to it on another occasion."

"Well, well—I'm a-waiting."

"Well, the moment they descended, instead of flourishing my arms about and bawling aloud like a madman, as you did, I should have rushed as speedily as I could down the steps and should have had hold of every man Jack of them before they had the least idea of what was the matter."

"Very clever—very clever indeed," and Bishop, who nevertheless could not help inwardly succumbing to the conviction that the course of action proposed by Isaac was by far the most rational and the most likely to succeed.

The allotted time had by this time expired, so Bishop approached more closely to the secret entrance.

He was much annoyed with himself, and just in the humour to be put out by any trifle.

A most ominous silence seemed to him to prevail below.

He would not allow any signs of his anxiety to manifest themselves in his countenance, though he could not altogether control a slight unsteadiness in his voice.

"Time's up," he said—"time's up, Dick. Have you made up your mind? Whether you have or have not, I can't wait any longer. Dick, I say, have you made up your mind?"

No reply whatever came to this inquiry.

The men began to murmur.

As for Isaac, he, by various contemptuous and aggravating actions, expressed that this was just what he expected.

"Told you so," he cried—"told you so! You kindly gave them the time and opportunity they required, and by this time are far enough off, laughing at your monstrous credulity."

This speech, and the disagreeable inward conviction that what Isaac stated was no more than the truth, put the finishing stroke to Bishop's aggravation.

He could stand these taunts no longer.

Clenching his fists, he rushed up to the spot where Isaac stood with the intention of administering severe bodily chastisement to that individual.

But Isaac was prepared for him.

With that calmness which was so habitual to him, and which had such an aggravating effect upon almost everybody, he stepped back, and, clenching his fists, struck out straight from his shoulder just as Bishop was rushing up to him.

The consequence was that the last-named gentleman's nose came into most violent contact with Isaac's fist.

Indeed, such was the force of the blow that Bishop's onward career was instantaneously checked and a contrary direction imparted to his motion, inasmuch that he staggered back several paces.

"How do you like that?" said Isaac, more imperturbably cool than ever. "If you are not satisfied with that you had better come on again, my ancient Trojan."

But either Bishop had come a little more to his senses, or else the stunning blow upon his nose had cowed him.

for he showed no symptoms nor inclinations of renewing the contest.

Wiping away the ensanguined stream that flowed from his nostrils, he returned to the secret entrance.

"No more dallying," he said to his men, who could not help smiling at his ludicrous appearance. "Down with you! Take them alive or dead!"

The officers, it would seem, were a little stung by the taunts to which Isaac had given utterance, for with a great assumption of boldness and courage they dashed down the steps.

Some had taken the precaution to provide themselves with lights, and as soon as these reached the bottom they held them aloft.

A ruddy light was cast around.

But it fell only on the damp walls.

The highwaymen were nowhere to be seen.

CHAPTER MXIX.

MR. BISHOP TRIES A SHOT AT BLACK BESS.

Of this, however, Bishop was ignorant, for he very prudently kept in the rear, and did not reach the bottom of the steps until after all the others.

"Down with them!" he cried, now thoroughly infuriated, and only too glad to find some object to expend his wrath upon. "No quarter! Shoot them down and make an end of it!"

The officers were silent.

Of course, as there was no one to be seen, no discharge of weapons took place.

"Why don't you fire?" yelled Bishop.

"There's nobody here, sir."

"Nobody here?" he screamed. "Forward—forward, they can't have got away—they must be somewhere close at hand."

The loud, mocking laugh of Isaac above, who had heard what had passed, made the officer's blood boil in his veins.

The next moment he stood at the bottom of the steps.

When here, he had ample proof that his men had spoken correctly.

Not a trace of the highwaymen could be seen.

The men, however, in obedience to his commands, had rushed along the passage into the chamber habitually occupied by those of whom they were in quest.

But not the least trace could be perceived of them here.

"This way, idiots!" roared Bishop—"this way! Can't you see? this way! Where are your eyes, dolts?"

The officers hastened to place themselves by the side of their leader.

He was pointing to a passage that branched off from the bottom of the stairs, but which, strangely enough, they had not noticed.

"That is the way," he said. "Quick—quick! they have not had time to get far off. Quick—quick, I say!"

The officers hurried down the passage with great alacrity.

They could feel that fresh air was blowing in their faces, and this circumstance caused them to push on at the greatest speed they were capable of making.

In a short time they found the passage communicated with a series of vaults or dungeons.

They did not turn aside or pause to attempt to enter any one of them, for the strong massive doors were all closed, and had been apparently for many centuries.

Moreover, they fancied they could hear in advance the trampling of footsteps, though probably the sound was no more than the echo of their own feet.

Suddenly they came to a door that was partly shut.

Pushing it open, they found themselves in an arched stone chamber.

At one time it had been used as a repository for the dead, as numerous coffins, or, rather, the remains of them, could be seen stacked up in niches against the walls.

Upon these, however, the officers scarcely bestowed a glance.

Their attention was attracted and absorbed by the dusky figure of a man which they could indistinctly see creeping through the window—or, more properly speaking, the grated aperture at the end of the vault furthest from the door.

"Fire—fire!" roared Bishop. "Why do you p Fire—fire!"

Half a dozen of his men obeyed his command.

In the confined space, the noise resulting from the simultaneous discharge of so many firearms was something terrific.

Mingling with the loud report came a loud splash as of some heavy body falling from a considerable height into water.

The vault was instantaneously filled with dense blue smoke, which the light of the torches could not penetrate.

"On—on!" cried Bishop, setting the example of rushing forward.

His men kindly gave him place, and allowed him to take the lead.

The disappointment and rage of the chief officer at the present juncture are beyond all expression.

But what most galled him was not his defeat, but the mockery of Isaac to which he would be subjected.

At the extremity of the vault, and rather high up from the ground, was an aperture in the stone wall.

It was not much wider or higher than was requisite to permit the passage of a man's body through it.

Being near the foundation of the old castle, the wall was of uncommon thickness.

The aperture gradually widened to about double the size at the other end.

By the aid of his men, Bishop was raised up sufficiently high to enable him to crawl along this tube—for this was what it more resembled than aught else.

He called aloud to his men to follow him speedily.

So little time had been lost by these proceedings that when he reached the end he caught sight of those of whose capture he had a little while before made so sure.

But upon reaching the extremity of the aperture Bishop paused, and well he might.

At a distance of about fifteen feet below him was a wide sheet of water, which, from its appearance and situation, was no doubt the remains of the moat which had at one time surrounded the castle.

In the act of swimming across this piece of water was Sixteen-String Jack.

His comrades were all standing on the opposite bank, shaking and wringing the wet from their apparel.

Bishop's position was a most awkward one, yet nevertheless he endeavoured to draw a pistol from one of his pockets.

The attempt was very nearly costing him a good ducking, for he leaned forward so much that he all but lost his balance.

Dick Turpin divined his intention, and producing a pistol, levelled it at him.

"Retreat, Bishop, retreat, and leave us in peace! Retreat, I say, or I fire!"

Bishop had a conviction that from that distance Dick's bullet would be unpleasantly effective, so he drew back with a suddenness that was ludicrous.

"Back again!" he cried to the men. "Up the steps, and run round to the other side of the keep—they are all there, and if you are speedy you may yet be in time! Down with them, if you have the chance! Show them no mercy!"

An immediate movement followed this injunction.

The men had made so sure of gaining the large reward on the present occasion that they could not bear to entertain the idea that they were about to lose it.

At any rate, they determined upon making a last great effort.

Accordingly, very little time was lost by them in gaining the upper air.

To tell the truth, they much preferred being there to groping about in the subterranean portion of an old ruined castle.

For a brief space, however, we will return to the movements of the highwaymen, which must to our readers possess infinitely more interest than the doings of the police officers. Already a tolerably good idea can be formed of the manner in which the escape from the subterraneous passages had been accomplished.

Isaac little thought how truly he spoke when he said that the two minutes' delay granted by Bishop was just what the highwaymen wanted to allow them to get off.

Such, however, actually proved to be the case.

Sixteen-String Jack, who had been the first to mention

[DICK TURPIN ASKS BLACK BESS A QUESTION.]

the other passage, set the example of hastening along it as soon as the conference between Bishop and Dick Turpin was brought to a conclusion.

The others followed quickly in his footsteps.

Upon reaching the dungeon doors we have already mentioned, the highwaymen were in doubt whether it would be policy to open any of them or to rush on.

The latter was the course agreed upon by the general voice.

On arriving at the vault at the extremity, a little delay took place in consequence of the difficulty which they experienced of opening the door.

The rusty old fastening had to be removed by force, and consequently they had no means of securing the door, and so use that as a protection between themselves and their foes.

The aperture quickly attracted their attention.

Dick mounted first, and crawling along, encountered a large iron grating.

But time and the weather had had such a destructive effect upon it, that a few hearty shakes enabled him to dislodge it altogether from its setting.

He released it from his grasp, and it fell with a terrific splash into the water below.

The sound caused Dick great apprehension, for he made sure that it would be heard all over the ruins.

Looking forward, he found that the iron grating had covered a kind of loophole in the outer wall of the castle, that was at a considerable altitude from a large sheet of water.

Escape lay in this direction, yet it was by no means pleasant to think of taking a head-foremost plunge from such a height, and without any knowledge as to the depth of the water.

No. 216 will be Published next Thursday.

Yet there was no resource.

The dimensions of the apartment were so confined, and the stonework so very smooth and slippery, that to turn round seemed a matter of impossibility.

Looking back over his shoulder, Dick explained the situation and the difficulties of it to his comrades.

Tom King was next to him, so he said:

"Hold my hands, and I will endeavour to descend feet first."

Dick tried, and succeeded.

He dropped with unpleasant force into the moat, the depth of the water in which was by no means so great as he had expected.

In fact, when he stood upright the water reached no higher than his waist.

It was lucky he did not try to plunge head first.

If he had he must have sustained some injury.

No sooner did he find himself in safety on his feet than he dashed the water from his face, and said, in cautious tones:

"Come, Tom—it is all right! Be quick, and we shall escape them yet!"

Tom King needed no further bidding.

Following his leader's example, he lowered himself without hesitation.

Dick was standing ready to receive him, so that Tom made the descent with comparative ease.

Tom Davis followed; but as he was of much greater bulk, and by no means so agile in his movements as the highwaymen, he failed to turn, and came down with a splash almost loud enough to rouse the people in the next village.

However, all continued silent.

Apparently no alarm had been given.

Claude followed.

Last of all came Sixteen-String Jack.

He found he laboured under a considerable disadvantage, for he had no comrade to hold him by the hand while he turned round.

Nevertheless, in spite of this and a certain amount of awkwardness resulting from his wound, he accomplished the feat successfully.

But he was just in time, and that was all.

The delay of another couple of seconds must have cost him his life.

Nothing could have saved him when, by the direction of Bishop, the officers fired that volley into the loop-hole.

Indeed, so little was Jack beforehand that the splash which he made by falling into the water, and the discharge of the pistols, seemed simultaneous sounds.

What occurred on the appearance of Bishop we have already described.

The highwaymen and Tom Davis waded quickly to the bank, and did not fail to congratulate each other when they once again found themselves on firm earth.

Perceiving how impossible it was to do anything in his present position, and influenced to a very great extent by the pistol which Dick Turpin had pointed so calmly at him, Bishop, as we have already stated, beat a precipitate and very undignified retreat.

With all the speed he could make, he followed his men on their way to the staircase.

"If we had but our horses," exclaimed Claude Duval, "we should be able to get clear off without much further trouble."

"Or," added Sixteen-String Jack, "by making good speed, we might be able to reach the secret entrance first. We could then close it and make them every one prisoners."

There was a general laugh at this proposition of turning the tables upon the officers, in which Dick Turpin himself could not help joining.

"It is not half a bad idea," said Claude, quickly; "and to prove that I think so, I will try to carry it into effect."

It was a matter that would not allow of discussion, for while the pros and cons were being considered the opportunity would be gone.

All the rest followed rapidly in Claude's footsteps—not that they thought his scheme was likely to be carried out, but because it was necessary for them to go in that direction to recover their horses.

With a great deal of confidence, Claude hurried forward and actually was just in time to close the secret door as the first of the returning officers was about to emerge.

That gentleman, to his very great astonishment, found the door suddenly banged in his face, and then the whole of them were in total darkness, for the concussion of the air consequent upon the discharge of the pistols had extinguished their lights.

But this act very nearly cost Claude his life.

Of course our friends knew nothing about Isaac and his companion, both of whom had been left outside by Bishop.

The former, seeing Claude and guessing from his actions who he was, carefully levelled a pistol.

By great good fortune Dick espied him and fired as well, but without having time to take any particular aim.

Nevertheless, his shot produced just the effect he intended it should.

It startled Isaac and distracted his attention at a very critical time.

Isaac fired, but the careful aim was lost.

Nevertheless, the bullet whistled past Claude in much too close proximity to be at all pleasant.

"This way, Claude," cried Dick Turpin, in a loud voice—"this way! Quick—quick! we shall yet be in time!"

Isaac no sooner perceived how very much he was outnumbered than he very prudently desisted from any further hostilities, and our friends were not the sort of men to seek vengeance for what had occurred.

The cooped-up police officers, however, upon hearing the discharge of firearms, became greatly infuriated.

Loud blows were rained upon the door.

But it was strong, and withstood them well.

They were not in the secret of opening it, and had not Isaac and his companion been outside, the highwaymen would have been able to take it very easily.

No sooner, however, had the latter vanished round a projection of the masonry in quest of their horses, than Isaac with great haste ran to the door.

He was not in possession of the secret, but, his efforts from without, joined to those of the officers on the other side, quickly demolished the door.

On they rushed in such hurry and confusion that the entrance for a moment was choked completely up.

No sooner, however, had Dick and his friends got out of sight than the former said:

"Some inward presentiment—for I can call it nothing else—seems to assure me that shortly before our arrival Maud must have been made prisoner by some of these men. If so, she is now in the ruins, in which case, as I need scarcely say, I cannot think of retreat until she is rescued."

His companions remained silent, waiting to hear what he would say next.

Dick continued:

"To get the horses will probably occupy a few minutes. While you are thus engaged, I will take a stealthy look round and try to ascertain where they have bestowed her."

"Dick."

"Yes, Tom?"

"I am your comrade, am I not?"

"Certainly."

"We are all your comrades," cried the rest.

"And, therefore," added Tom, "we will all join you in your search."

"Many—many thanks!" said Dick. "I should be glad to believe that my poor Maud occupies a warm place in all your hearts."

"She does—she does—believe us, she does."

"Well then, my friends," said Dick, in a voice which displayed how deeply he was affected, "you can render me signal aid by dispersing yourselves all over the ruins, as then we should search narrowly every part—that is," he concluded, "if you are willing to run so much extra risk solely on my behalf, when the path of your own safety lies clear and plain before you, if you only choose to avail yourselves of it."

Tom and the rest scarcely waited to hear the conclusion of this speech, but separated at once, and without hesitation, in order to do their captain's bidding.

Of course, being acquainted with the exact nature of all the events that have occurred, the reader knows how very erroneous was Dick's impression regarding Maud's presence in the ruins.

But a moment's reflection will show that this idea was of all others the one most likely to fix itself in his mind, and one about which there was the strongest degree of probability.

What a pity it was that he and his companions should run this perfectly unnecessary and frightful risk, for, of course, the search would prove totally resultless as Maud was at that time many miles away from the place.

The length of stay, however, which our friends had made at the ruins had enabled them to become well acquainted with all its intricacies.

Therefore the search when once made would be a thorough one, and executed without any loss of time by going over the same ground twice.

As the reader is aware, no trace of Maud or Jack the ostler could be seen.

Dick was distracted.

Rather than abandon his preconceived idea, he contended that she must have been conveyed to some other place.

Very certain, however, was it that she was nowhere about the ruins.

Thus was much valuable time lost, and thus were the officers enabled to improve their position in no inconsiderable degree.

For a brief space, then, we will leave them, and revert to the energetic proceedings which were now taken by the police officers.

CHAPTER MXX.

IN WHICH DICK TURPIN RESENTS BISHOP'S COWARDLY SHOT.

Bishop now was in such an exalted state of exasperation that there is no knowing what absurdity he might have been guilty of had he not happened to catch a remark which fell from the lips of Isaac, and which brought about a condition of partial calmness.

Isaac's remark was this:

"There, I have done with you now—I am determined to have no further hand in the affair; yet, if I had the conduction of it, I should take care to secure the horses belonging to the rascals; it would not be very difficult, and they would find it by no means so easy to get away."

Bishop seized upon the hint at once.

But he pretended not to have overheard one word that Isaac had said.

Summoning his men around him, he gave them the order to, first of all, bend all their energies towards capturing the horses.

An immediate move was made to carry out this direction.

Isaac observed this with a contemptuous, sarcastic smile, but he made no remark.

In his own mind, he was exceedingly sorry to think he had made the suggestion, for his feelings towards Bishop now were of such a character that he really wished the highwaymen to escape in order that he might have the opportunity of exercising his powers of aggravation to the utmost advantage.

The officers were not long in making the discovery that they were just a few minutes too late.

Having satisfied themselves that Maud was nowhere in the ruins, the highwaymen, with the exception of Dick, had taken their horses, and had seated themselves in readiness to start.

But Turpin could not by any means divest himself of the notion that Maud must be there, for he could scarcely think that she had succeeded in making her escape.

It was thus being animated by this feeling that made Dich unable to tear himself away from the castle.

Systematic as the search had been, he was by no means satisfied with it, and therefore lingered until the very latest moment, in the hope of making the much-wished-for discovery.

Suddenly, the officers burst upon the highwaymen.

Claude Duval had taken Tom Davis up into the saddle behind him.

Black Bess was standing at a little distance.

Self-preservation compelled the highwaymen to shift from their position, but they took good care to do so in such a manner that they would prove a partial defence to their captain, to whom they cried aloud at the top of their voices.

"Fire!" yelled Bishop—"fire, I say!"

The order was immediately obeyed, and it was only by making a sudden movement that our friends saved themselves from being riddled by the bullets, which clattered against the stone walls like rain.

It was immediately after this discharge that Bishop caught sight of Black Bess.

He recognised the noble creature instantly.

In a moment the impulse seized upon him to try and capture her.

She was standing there so still and quiet that he fancied the capture would not be a very difficult one.

Not only would Black Bess herself prove to be to him a most valuable acquisition, but if he had her in his hands his chances of capturing her owner would be very much increased.

His men wondered what on earth he was about when they saw him walk quietly forward, for he did not utter one syllable as to his intention.

Black Bess still retained her former attitude.

But she was not unaware of the police officer's approach, as could be seen by the manner in which she projected her ears towards him.

Bishop put into practice all the coaxing ways he could think of.

His heart beat with exultation, for he got closer and closer, and still Black Bess did not stir.

He reached out his hand as soon as he believed himself near enough to clutch the bridle, and made a sudden effort.

But his fingers did not so much as touch the loosely-dangling reins.

Black Bess divined his intention, and gave a sudden bound, that had the effect of making the distance between herself and her would-be captor about the same as it was at first.

Bishop was never blessed with a very patient temper, and now it was exacerbated to such a degree that the moment anything went wrong he fell into a kind of fury that more resembled the transport of a lunatic than an outbreak of passion on the part of a sane person.

"D—n you!" he cried, savagely, "I believe you are no better than a witch! No human horse could have done what you have, and escaped with your life so many times! I will make one more attempt to seize you, and if that fails I will try whether you will be proof against one of my pistol bullets!"

Bishop had a loaded pistol in his hand, and while he spoke these words he rapidly cocked it.

Then advanced in the direction of the spot to which Black Bess was standing.

But this time the gallant animal distrusted him more than before.

She seemed ready to start at once.

Suddenly a faint chirping sound was heard—

A sound which more resembled the twittering of some little bird than aught else.

It was Dick Turpin's well-known signal.

No sooner did it strike upon the ears of Black Bess than she gave a rapid bound, which carried her clear over the trunk of a fallen tree that happened to be lying near her

"Curse the beast!" said Bishop. "I could have wished her alive, for she's a beauty; but I will put a stop to her galloping for the future!"

With this he took as good an aim as he could

His finger pressed the trigger

There was a loud report.

Mingled with it was a faint snorting sound, but so faint and so brief that it was hard to say whether it was reality or fancy.

Bishop shouted aloud to his men, and immediately rushed forward.

He was in hopes of making a capture of Dick Turpin himself, for he gave a shrewd guess as to the meaning of the twittering sound.

In a general way, Bishop took good care not to push himself too forward, for fear he should by chance lose his life, which would have been a serious calamity for the world at large.

On the present occasion, however, his impetuosity carried him more forward than usual, and he soon had occasion to repent it.

All at once Dick Turpin started into view.

Bishop came to a halt at once, and felt for another pistol.

The former, however, cried in a stern, menacing voice:

"You are welcome to try as many shots upon me as you like—I don't mind it, and should never seek for vengeance on that account; but to aim at my mare is an action that I can neither forget nor forgive! Take that—you deserve it, for I believe bonny Black Bess has been severely injured by your dastardly shot!"

While speaking these words, Dick Turpin levelled a pistol full at Bishop's head, and pulled the trigger.

But the weapon only flashed in the pan.

Dick gave utterance to an angry exclamation, and at the same time hurled the pistol with all his force.

His resentment was now worked up to its highest pitch.

So accurate was his aim that Bishop fell to the ground stunned.

But more than this Dick did not wait to see, for the officers now came rushing upon him in a body.

"On, Bess!" cried Turpin, as he ran hastily after her—"on, old lass! Do not stop for me; I can mount easily as you are!"

Black Bess cantered on.

Dick Turpin put forth all his powers.

The officers perceiving him run before them, gave him hearty chase.

They strained every nerve, for they felt that if once they permitted him to mount, all chance of overtaking him was at an end, or nearly so.

But there were few fleeter runners than Dick.

A few seconds enabled him to place himself side by side with Black Bess, for the noble creature doubtless comprehended his purpose, and adapted her pace accordingly.

Suddenly, Dick seized hold of the saddle, and while thus holding it, ran for a moment or so by her side.

Then, giving a sudden spring, he swung himself clearly and lightly into the saddle, where he seated himself in a moment.

His comrades had viewed all these proceedings, but without having a chance of interfering in any way.

No sooner, however, did they perceive their captain mounted than they put spurs to their steeds and galloped off.

Some little delay took place before the officers were ready to pursue them, and by the time the former fairly started, Dick and his comrades had got to a considerable distance.

Still, in the present state of their tempers, it was not likely that the officers would very readily abandon the pursuit.

Bishop, however, was in a state of utter unconsciousness, and therefore unable to join in the chase.

For a time he was oblivious of all things.

Those officers who actually commenced the pursuit began in good earnest.

They were also very well mounted, and therefore, not unreasonably, they looked forward to a satisfactory termination to this troublesome piece of business.

Had not the highwaymen been hampered with Tom Davis, their chances of escape would have been very much increased.

Claude's horse was a powerful one, and carried him with tolerable ease, it is true, but then, had it not been for the double load his rate of speed would have been very much greater.

Of course the others accommodated the pace of their horses to his, for it was important they should all keep together.

Tom Davis soon rightly comprehended his position.

"Put me down," he said. "I can see just how the land lies, and it would be much better that I should be recaptured than that you should all run the risk of another encounter."

"And is that the sort of return, Tom, that you think we should make for the unwavering fidelity you have shown us? No, no, we know better how to serve a friend than that."

"Say no more upon the subject," said Tom King. "Either we will place you in some place of complete security, or else we will perish in the attempt."

Dick Turpin paid but little attention to this conversation.

The pace at which they were going was one that Black Bess could perform without the slightest effort.

As for the injury she had received, it fortunately turned out quite contrary to Dick's fears.

It was what might be termed a trivial one.

The bullet had passed very near to the top part of her head—

So close that it had cut out a small circular piece from the extreme tip of one ear.

The blood flowed freely—but that was in consequence of the motion—but not in any quantity to excite apprehension.

But Dick's heart burned with anger within him as he gazed upon it.

Patting her upon the neck, he muttered:

"A very little more, and there would have been an end to the best piece of horseflesh in the kingdom. The difference of a hair's breadth in pulling the trigger, and the bullet must have entered her brain! It's an escape, old lass, and a narrow one. Most thankful am I that it is no worse!"

But the satisfaction derived by Dick from this reflection was but slight, for the mark was one which his mare would always carry.

Another consideration now pressed itself upon him.

What steps should be taken to shake off the officers who, although not able to get up to our friends, nevertheless succeeded in keeping at a uniform distance behind them?

In a short time morning would be upon them, and Dick felt the stern necessity of shaking off his foes before that time.

The question was, how could it be done?

"Claude," he cried, turning back, "those fellows behind us seem to me to be coming on as fast as they are able."

"They keep well on our track."

"They do, and I want to shake them off"

"How is it to be done?"

"Do you think that for a short distance you could push your horse on faster? If so, we shall soon distance them, and when once out of sight we can adopt twenty expedients if necessary."

But Claude shook his head.

"I wish you would make the effort," said Dick, with an air and tone of vexation. "I don't want to get any further away from the ruins than I can help, and, besides, it will soon be daylight."

"Wait a bit," said Tom King. "If you put Davis behind me, that will give Claude's horse a rest. He seems fatigued already, and for a little while I am sure my horse can push on well."

"Be it so, then. I can see only one objection, and that is, the delay caused in changing. You must be speedy in your movements."

"You had better leave me behind," said Tom Davis; "that will be the easiest. I might slip off and conceal myself behind the hedge without the officers being any the wiser."

"You might, it is true; but we do not intend to give you the chance. No, no, Tom—we would never be so base as to desert you. So say not another word, but jump up as quickly as you can."

The delay caused by this change was really very slight, and no sooner was it effected than a wonderful difference was made in their speed.

Tom King pressed his horse hard without scruple, for he knew that it would only be a sharp touch and soon over, and not so much calculated to distress him as a long, continued gallop.

In order that he might not relax in his endeavours, the others kept a few yards in advance.

The natural spirit of Tom's horse, therefore, made him endeavour to overtake or, at least, keep pace with the others.

The officers observed this alteration with much alarm and dissatisfaction.

They spurred their horses again and again, but to no purpose.

The horses were already going at their best speed.

To their unmitigated chagrin, they perceived the distance between them and the fugitives gradually but surely widening

They felt then that they might almost as well confess themselves beaten; but yet they could not at present bring themselves to admit it.

As for the highwaymen, the success they had met with served to inspire them to make fresh exertions.

At length, when Dick considered that a safe distance had been placed between the officers and themselves, he began to look out for some narrow turning that would enable them to leave the high-road.

Some time elapsed before anything of the kind presented itself; but at length he caught sight of a cross-road—it was too wide to be called a lane.

At this spot stood the remains of what had once been a finger-post.

It had now fallen into thorough decay.

The upright post leaned far out of the perpendicular, and was thickly overgrown with moss, the dampness of which materially served to rot the wood.

One arm, and only one, was remaining, and that was in so mutilated a state that it was impossible to discern any lettering upon it.

Seen by the very dim gray light which now began to creep over the landscape, this finger-post had an inexpressibly forlorn and dreary look.

"This way!" shouted Dick, to Tom King, and pointing to the left while he spoke—"this way: One more push, and then I hope we shall be able to take it more easily."

It did not appear that this cross-road was made much use of, for in the middle were two very deep ruts, and all the rest was overgrown with grass so tall that it reached up to the horses' knees.

Over this their progress could not fail to be silent.

Having gone to some distance, Dick pulled up.

"My friends," he said, "I have an idea; let me know what you think of it."

They prepared to listen intently.

"It strikes me very forcibly that as soon as ever the officers come to the finger-post they will guess which way we have gone, and then, although we may be rid of them for a time, yet they will eventually plague us."

To this all assented.

"Now, what I want to do is to throw them off the track altogether, so as to leave us free to adopt any course we may think proper, without having the dread of their appearance at any unexpected moment upon us."

"That would be very desirable indeed," said Tom King; "but, for my own part, I don't see how it is to be accomplished."

"Listen, and I will tell you my idea—it is only an idea, mind you, and if you don't like it, why, do not, out of any consideration for me or my judgment, omit to say it—promise me that."

"We promise, Dick; but do not keep us any longer in suspense."

"I will not."

The highwaymen were silent, and prepared themselves to listen with the utmost intentness to what Dick Turpin had to say.

CHAPTER MXXI.

DICK TURPIN ASKS BLACK BESS A QUESTION.

"My idea I consider is a very simple one," began Dick Turpin, "and yet perhaps you may think it very extraordinary. It is, to quit this lane at once, and, completely doubling our course, make our way back to the ruins."

"To the ruins?" echoed Tom King, in a tone of voice which showed plainly enough how much he was surprised.

"Just so," answered Dick, gravely.

"But you surely do not think of entering them again?"

"No, I can't say that I do. My intention is merely to get back to their vicinity, for I believe that is about the last place where the officers would think of looking for us."

"Perhaps so," said Tom King.

"At any rate," added Claude Duval, "it would be much better to do that than to attempt to seek any shelter hereabouts, for if we did we should be disturbed in an hour or two at the most."

"I see you are getting reconciled to the idea," continued Dick, "and let me request you to make up your minds quickly."

"You are captain," said Sixteen-String Jack—"the direction of our movements ought to be left to you."

"I know all about that, but the best of generals is not the one who relies most on his own judgment, but the one who in situations of doubt and difficulty holds a consultation with his chief and most experienced officers."

"Then I for one," cried Claude Duval, "am inclined to adopt Dick's idea."

"It is certain," remarked Tom King, "that we must ere long get shelter somewhere. In a little while daylight will be full upon us, and such a party as we now make could not pass anywhere without attracting a great deal of notice."

"Our horses are weary," said Dick; "we must rest, and, what is more, it is necessary that we should find some place where we can remain an hour or two in perfect quiet and talk over our position. We shall have to consider most carefully what is to be the nature of our future movements."

"On, then!" exclaimed Tom King. "Lead the way! Let there be no more delay, for every moment is of value."

This was true enough.

A little time had been consumed by this conference, but it could not by any means be said that time had been lost.

Indeed, the brief halt had enabled the horses to recover their wind to a very considerable extent, and now, after this temporary rest, they seemed to set forward with fresh vigour.

The speed made for some time was all that the highwaymen could desire.

Their way lay across a succession of smooth meadows, the turf in which was particularly grateful to the horses' feet.

Dick's comrades were by no means surprised that he should manifest so strong a desire to return to the old ruins.

Not a word had been breathed respecting Maud, but yet all knew that it was Dick's strong impression that she was in the vicinity of the castle, which made him so anxious to return.

At any rate, the step which they had taken seemed, so far as they could tell at present, a wise one.

The officers appeared to be completely baffled.

By this time the daylight had much increased in intensity, and in the east could be perceived a ruddy glow that proclaimed the speedy rising of the sun.

As our friends happened to ascend some rising ground they were able, by looking back when they had gained the summit, to command a very extensive view of the country around them.

Hill and dale, river and stream, bush and tree, were all revealed with a clearness and brilliancy that was delightful to contemplate.

In vain, however, did our friends strain their eyes in the endeavour to catch sight of their pursuers.

At some distance several men could be seen in the act of crossing a ploughed field; doubtless they were on the way to the scene of their daily labours, but these were the only human beings the highwaymen were able to discern after the longest and closest scrutiny.

"All's well," said Dick, at last, though his voice proclaimed that in truth all was not well with him. "Forward once more, my comrades; the ruins cannot be far distant now."

"Do not forget that we are on the look-out for a place of shelter," observed Tom King. "It is true, we have been singularly fortunate at present, but then we are running a very serious amount of risk by riding thus by daylight."

"I am well aware of that," answered Turpin, "and it shall continue no longer than we can possibly help"

After this the highwaymen rode on for a considerable distance in perfect silence.

Each one, indeed, was busy with his thoughts.

At last they found before them a pretty narrow lane—one of those places that are so charming in the glorious summer time, either at sunset or sunrise.

"We will go a little way up and down this lane," said Turpin, after a brief consideration. "If we do not succeed in finding any shelter near, we shall, at least, have reconnoitred well, and made sure that none of our enemies are lurking near, so that, any way, the step is well worth taking."

From this his comrades did not for one moment think of dissenting.

The hedge dividing them from this lane was a low one, so that it was easily overleaped.

Tom King then went to the right, and Sixteen-String Jack to the left.

The other two waited for their return.

Sixteen-String Jack was the first to appear.

The expression of his countenance showed that he had made some welcome discovery.

"What is it, Jack?" asked Dick Turpin.

"There is an inn a little below here," he said—"a capital place, and one that would suit us exactly, I should think."

"Is it retired?"

"Very. About the most sleepy-looking place you could imagine, I should think. It looks as though never more than one traveller a week stopped there."

"That is the place for us, then. Is it in this lane?"

"Well, scarcely; for about a quarter of a mile below here, the lane, after a sudden turn, emerges into a cross-road, and this inn stands just at the corner."

"Wait a moment, then, I can hear Tom King coming. Let us hear what news he brings."

In a few seconds afterwards Tom made his appearance.

"There is nothing to be seen that way," he said; "the lane goes winding on for I don't know how far, and the further you go the more unfrequented it looks."

"Then you have not seen anyone, Tom?"

"Not a soul."

"Then, Jack, we will bend our way to this inn you speak of."

The next moment the little party was in motion.

It took them but a brief space of time indeed, and on their arrival they found that Sixteen-String Jack's description had been a very good one.

The noise of their arrival brought a fat, sleepy-looking individual to the door.

This they conjectured was the landlord.

It would seem as though he had only recently risen, for it cost him quite an effort to keep his eyes open sufficiently wide to observe our party.

"Going to stop here, gentlemen?" he asked, perceiving that they were drawing rein.

"Yes."

The reply evidently took him by surprise.

He had expected a negative, for such a large party as that to stop at his door for refreshment was quite an unparalleled circumstance.

But the realisation of this fact produced a wonderful effect upon him.

His eyes opened wide at once, and remained so without any trouble while he bawled aloud:

"Robin—Robin! You idle skulk! Robin, I say! This way!"

In response to these words another sleepy-looking personage came upon the scene.

This was the ostler and general factotum upon the establishment.

"Coming, master!" he growled, lazily. "Coming—coming! Oh, my eye!"

The last exclamation was wrung from him by the unexpected sight at the front door.

"Never mind your eye," said the landlord, who had overheard the ejaculation, "but just attend to these gentlemen's horses."

In the meantime Dick and his friends had dismounted.

Just as the ostler took charge of the horses, Dick said:

"I suppose, landlord, you can find us accommodation for an hour or two?"

"Oh yes, sir, the best—the very best, I assure you!"

"That is all right, then. But the fact is, you see, we have made a very long and tiring journey. We did hope to have accomplished the whole of it without making any halt whatever, but one of our horses met with an accident, you understand."

Dick made this remark in order to account for Tom Davis being unprovided with a steed.

The landlord appeared to be perfectly satisfied, and, with a great deal of obsequious ceremony, ushered them into a decently-furnished room.

Dick looked around him with satisfaction.

"The accommodation will suit us very well," he said, "provided you like to agree to one condition."

"And what may that be, sir?"

"Why, that during our stay here we have this apartment entirely to ourselves; we should not like the intrusion of a stranger. Of course," he added, "we don't want to have a private room without paying for it accordingly."

"Lor' bless you, sir! Why, you need not have any fear upon those grounds. Why, I shall think business is very brisk if I see one more traveller between now and this day week."

Our friends heard this declaration with an amount of satisfaction which they could scarcely conceal.

A good meal was then ordered as a preliminary, and during its preparation Tom King strolled about the premises and peeped into the stables with the air of a listless idler.

This, in fact, is what anyone would have taken him to be by his movements.

It would have proved a very great mistake, however, for Tom was busily engaged in making himself familiar with the whole of the premises, so as to know just what to do and where to go in case of an alarm.

Situated as the highwaymen were, the reader cannot fail to see that this was a very necessary precaution indeed.

While thus engaged, the ostler crossed the yard, carrying under his arm a quantity of corn, which he had just received from the landlord.

He touched his hat respectfully to Tom, as he said:

"Perhaps, sir, you would like to see the horses have their corn."

Tom assented eagerly, being only too anxious to embrace any such opportunity as this for the reason above stated.

There was only just sufficient accommodation for the horses, but Tom King had the satisfaction of seeing each manger well filled with corn.

After a few casual, unimportant remarks, he withdrew.

"Is all well at the back?" asked Dick, as soon as he entered the room they had engaged and closed the door after him.

"Yes; we seem to have tumbled into capital quarters. I have seen the horses fed. Each one has a mangerful of corn."

"Then they will do very well."

Just after this, the meal they had ordered was brought in, but before sitting down to it, Turpin rose upon some slight pretext and quitted the room.

He was anxious to see for himself that all was as well as his comrade had reported.

He was absent only a few moments.

As soon as the landlord had retired and they were once more alone, Tom said:

"You found all right, did you not?"

"Yes. But did not you say you saw each horse well supplied with corn?"

"Certainly I did."

"Then they must have eaten it with amazing quickness, for now every manger is quite empty."

Tom looked incredulous.

"It is doubtless some roguery on the part of the ostler," continued Dick. "I have often suspected that some such trick as this was played. Of course, it is impossible that the animals can have eaten such a large quantity of food in so brief a space of time."

"Well, just wait till we have finished this," said Tom King, alluding to the meal they had before them. "I will go out again then and try to find out the trick, for some trick there is I am quite convinced."

"And after that," said Turpin, sadly—"after that——"

"We will hold a consultation," interrupted Tom; "and if we all lay our heads together you may depend we small hit upon the course of action that will be the best for us to pursue."

"Let us discuss this first," said Claude Duval. "My appetite is prodigious, and this is the first comfortable meal I have sat down to for a very long time."

By common consent, all consultation as to their future actions was postponed, while the whole of their attention was paid to the good things before them.

No sooner, however, was the meal over than Tom King made his way to the stables, upon pretence of seeing that the horses had been supplied with water.

He was so fortunate as to enter unseen by the ostler, who just then happened to be engaged indoors.

Tom was considerably puzzled to know how the corn had been disposed of so suddenly and completely, for the mangers were positively bare.

The horses looked hungry and discontented, having nothing to satisfy themselves with besides some not over sweet hay in a rack above.

Tom, however, happening to look very closely, perceived that at one extremity of the manger a small bag was fitted, so placed and so contrived that a great quantity of corn could be swept into it in a moment, which, falling to the bottom of the bag, was of course quite out of the horses' reach.

Having made this curious discovery, Tom scarcely knew what to do.

However, he determined to return and confer with Dick before taking any decisive step.

The ostler being still absent, Tom quitted the stable without any of the occupants of the inn being aware of his visit to it.

He quickly communicated his discovery to Dick, who, of course, was much incensed.

"I don't believe the landlord is to blame," said Tom. "It's the villanous ostler. By adopting this little expedient you may depend he makes a capital addition to his wages."

"Come along with me," said Dick—"I have an idea. You will see what it is in a moment without my taking the trouble to describe it to you."

With these words the whole of the party repaired to the yard.

No sooner did Dick cross the threshold than he gave that signal which always had the effect of bringing Black Bess to his side.

The stable door was open, but Bess was confined by a halter.

One sudden snatch, however, enabled her to break the rope, and she at once trotted out into the yard, to the great astonishment of the landlord and the ostler, who both came out into the yard.

"Hilloa!" said Dick, as soon as he caught sight of his mare. "So there's some roguery here, is there!"

"Roguery!" gasped the landlord.

"Yes," answered Dick; "this mare of mine is a very sagacious and intelligent animal, and whenever she meets with any ill usage she always contrives to let me know of it."

"Ill usage?" ejaculated the landlord and the ostler in one breath.

"Yes; and by the way of her I don't believe she has had any corn given to her. She is hungry—that is what's the matter."

The landlord looked inquiringly at the ostler.

The ostler at once appealed to Tom King.

"Why, sir," he said, "did not you see me carry the corn through the yard, and did not you see me fill every one of the mangers?"

"I did," answered Tom, "and therefore I cannot help thinking my friend is mistaken."

"Of course he's mistaken!" cried the ostler, with a long-drawn breath of relief.

"We shall soon see," said Dick, carelessly, and advancing a few paces while he spoke, so that he could place his hand on his mare's neck.

"See?" ejaculated the landlord. "How can you see? I hope you'll be careful in what you are saying! Don't you try to take away the good name of my house!"

"Well," said Dick, with the same affectation of carelessness, "I shall just ask my mare the question, and shall be satisfied with her reply."

"With her what?"

"Her reply."

The ostler grinned.

"You don't mean to tell me that your horse can speak, do you?" cried the landlord.

"You shall see and judge for yourselves," answered Dick. "Just wait a moment."

With these words he put his mouth close to his mare's ear, and pretended to ask some question in a faint whisper.

Having done so, he touched her upon the flank, and the immediate effect of this was to cause Black Bess to turn her head round so that her mouth was close to her master's ear.

The effect was just the same as if the creature had really spoken.

"Just what I thought," said Dick, looking up, and encountering the wondering countenances of the landlord and the ostler. "My mare declares that she has not had more than one mouthful of the corn that my friend over there put into her manger."

The ostler laughed very loudly, but he was not at his ease for all that—indeed, he felt decidedly uncomfortable.

The landlord looked at the matter in a serious light.

CHAPTER MXXII.

DICK TURPIN AND HIS COMPANIONS MEET WITH A SURPRISE AT THE INN.

"I DON'T know, gentlemen," he said, "what may be the meaning of this little farce—for so I cannot help calling it—but, understand, you have not a fool to deal with, and I won't suffer the good name of my inn to be taken away with impunity! Do you mean to try to impose upon me with the tale that a horse can speak?"

"I have said it," answered Dick, "and, if you don't believe, I will give you a proof."

"A proof?"

"Yes."

"But how?"

"Why, by my mare."

"I don't understand you!"

"Then I will quickly make my meaning clear. I am going to ask my mare what became of the corn that my friend saw put in the manger, and rely upon it she will tell me the truth about it."

At this the landlord looked incredulous and impatient—

The ostler uneasy and confused.

As before, Dick made a great pretence of whispering to Black Bess, and afterwards, in the same manner as before, she placed her mouth to his ear.

Dick nodded his head as though he had received a communication of a very satisfactory nature indeed.

"Well, sir?" asked the landlord, haughtily.

"I am glad to say that all doubt and suspicion will now be at an end."

"How so?"

"Because my mare has given me a proof of her former assertion."

"May I ask what it is?" said the landlord, more stiffly than before.

"Oh, certainly! My mare tells me that fixed at the end of her manger is a bag, into which all the corn was swept by the ostler as soon as my friend's back was turned, and the other horses were served just in the same way."

"And," said the landlord, staggering back a little, "do you mean to look me in the face and say that your mare told you that?"

"You don't believe it, then?"

"We—well, I—I——"

"Your hesitation is quite sufficient. You need not trouble yourself to utter the denial which is trembling on your lips."

"I—I——"

"Enough! I will give you the proof which fortunately is in my power. Stop your ostler from entering the stable, and then come in with me yourself, and then, if you do not find the bags just as I have described them, you are welcome to persevere in your disbelief. If you like, I will lay you two hundred guineas against two that all I have told you is neither more nor less than the truth."

The positive tone in which Dick spoke—

The anxiety which the ostler manifested to rush into the stable first—

And, above all, Dick's offer to stake so large an amount made so deep an impression upon the landlord that he began to waver in his disbelief and credit that a horse could speak.

"If there is any such contrivance as you say," the landlord managed to say at last, "I beg to assure you it is altogether against my knowledge. I would not wittingly allow such a dishonest practice to be followed on my premises."

"I don't say that you know anything of it," cried Turpin, quickly—"in fact, I firmly believe that you are guiltless of all complicity in the deed."

"Thank you for that, sir! I have always taken the utmost care that all should be square and straightforward. As you saw, I do not allow the horse corn to be kept in the stable, but serve it out in the house as wanted."

"Let us have a look," said Dick—"that is the best way to satisfy ourselves. If the bags are not there, I will never believe a word my mare says again."

Leaving Black Bess's side, Dick took hold of the landlord's arm, and led him into the stable.

They walked at once into the stall that had been occupied by Black Bess, because that was the only one that was vacant.

Full of curiosity and amazement, the landlord approached, and quickly discovered that what he had been so strangely informed of was perfectly correct.

The proper end of the manger had been removed, and at this place the bag had been affixed.

A sweep or two with the hand was then all that was required to empty the contents of the manger.

In, fact upon further examination, it was found that this bag contained the whole of the corn.

No one could have been more surprised at this discovery than the landlord was.

Dick at once, and for ever, exonerated him from any share in the petty theft.

"Confound the rascal!" the landlord cried, after having examined all the other mangers and found them fitted with a similar appliance. "Confound him! I can understand how it is that my trade has dropped off so much lately. But wait till I catch him, that's all! I'll be even with him, I'll warrant!"

With these words the landlord rushed hastily out of the stable into the yard with the full intention of visiting condign punishment upon the ostler.

But that individual, finding that his cheat had been discovered, took care to make himself scarce, for he was nowhere to be found.

For some moments the landlord's transport of rage continued.

Then it suddenly abated.

His eyes fell upon Black Bess, who was still standing quietly in the yard.

He gazed at her with a stare of so ludicrous a character that all the highwaymen were forced to laugh.

But the landlord neither saw nor heard them.

All his faculties were centred upon Black Bess

With hesitating steps he ventured to approach her, but stopped short when some few paces distant, and gazed again with a look full of mute amazement.

He was evidently fully impressed with the belief that Black Bess was gifted with the powers of speech—that he had really, for the first time in his life, looked upon the surprising and unheard-of phenomenon — a talking horse.

He peeped at her inquisitively everywhere, as though anxious thoroughly to imprint her image upon his mind.

At length he turned towards Dick, who was so amazed at the scene that he felt he could have continued to gaze much longer without tiring.

"Sir," he said, "this surprises me very much. It does indeed! I can't reckon it up at all—no, not a bit! I never in my born life heard of a horse telling tales—never! Can you give me another proof of her powers in this way?"

Dick gravely shook his head

The landlord looked deeply disappointed.

"At least," he said, "you will tell me how it was you came by her — how it was you found out that she could talk?"

Now this was a difficulty which Dick had not at all taken into consideration.

He felt he had been somewhat indiscreet thus to call such public attention to his mare.

It would have been most easy for him to have declined to answer these impertinent questions of the landlord, but, then, Dick felt it would be far better to allay his curiosity, if possible; otherwise, if permitted to exert itself without restraint, it might pass all bounds.

The highwaymen wished to stay for a few hours—say during daylight—and be perfectly undisturbed the while.

Now, if the landlord was not satisfied in some way, the secret would burn in his breast to such a degree that he would be obliged to ease himself by telling the whole account to some one.

All these considerations presented themselves to Dick in a moment, but he could not so readily or so quickly hit upon the means of doing what he wished.

He therefore affected to hesitate, but in reality it was only to gain a little time in order to think.

The landlord renewed his entreaties, and at length, as if suffering himself to be overpowered by them, Dick led him to one side with a very mysterious aspect, and then said, in a solemn whisper:

"I am going to tell you something which will have the effect of placing my life in your power. Don't start, but listen."

The landlord did listen, with his eyes so staring that they actually seemed as though about to start from his head.

"Many years ago," said Dick Turpin, in the same mysterious and solemn tones, "I devoted myself very closely to the black arts, and made such progress in magic, that I learned the secret of metempsychosis. Do you know what that is?"

The landlord professed his entire ignorance of so abstruse a subject.

"Then," said Dick, speaking if possibly with additional solemnity, "I must inform you that metempsychosis means the art of possessing the power to change the form of living creatures—that is to say, to change a cat to a rabbit, or a rabbit to a wolf, and so forth."

The landlord's jaw dropped.

"I made many experiments, by which I fully demonstrated that I possessed the power; and now I can go no further unless you swear solemnly never to divulge to a living soul what has taken place. Do you swear?"

"I do."

"That's enough. Now, do not start! Don't be incredulous. But you see that mare yonder?"

"I do."

"Then that is my wife."

"Your what?" ejaculated the landlord, fairly staggering back.

"My wife."

"That—that——"

"Yes. Or, rather, I should have said, she was my wife until I practised my art upon her."

"Met—met——"

"Metempsychosis."

"Ah! that's it," said the landlord, drawing a breath of relief and wiping the drops of perspiration from his brow.

"Now, that is all."

"But—but——"

"But what?"

"You have not told me what were your motives for transforming your wife into a horse."

"Oh, I will tell you that."

"Ah, do!"

"She was a dreadful scold."

"Yes—yes."

"So dreadful, that I never knew what it was to have a moment's peace of my life. I tried everything I could think of. In vain. Indeed, I began to think that she grew more and more a vixen every day, so that at last, in sheer self-defence, I was compelled to practise my art upon her."

"And you succeeded!" gasped the landlord.

"Behold the result?"

Dick Turpin pointed to Black Bess as he spoke.

The landlord could not remove his eyes.

Dick Turpin hardly thought the landlord would be credulous enough to swallow so monstrous an invention as this.

[THE DEAD BODY IS CARRIED TO THE INN.]

At his astonishment every word was implicitly believed.

"It's amazing," the landlord at last managed to utter—"truly amazing! But, sir—sir——"

"What now?"

The landlord came closer to Dick, with his face wearing a most mysterious aspect.

He looked cautiously around him in order to make sure that no one was near.

Then he took hold of Dick by the lapel of his coat, and in a whisper he said again:

"Sir—sir!"

"Well, what now?"

"Such a secret as you say you possess must be worth a very great deal to one who—who——"

"Who what?"

"Who happened to be troubled with a scolding wife, as you were, sir."

"No doubt. You see she was before the plague of my life; now I have turned her to the best account. She is invaluable."

"But yet you did not stop her tongue," said the landlord, grinning.

"How so?"

"Why she tells tales now."

"But she can only speak in a whisper," said Dick, who was slightly taken aback by the last remark, "and then not unless I speak to her first, so you see that is an advantage rather than otherwise."

"Decidedly. But now, sir——"

The landlord's mysteriousness increased.

Dick felt curious, for he could not imagine what the man was driving at. There was evidently something trembling on the tip of his tongue to which he hesitated to give utterance.

"Pray speak," he said. "Do not be afraid."

"Well, then," began the landlord, after a second apprehensive glance round the yard and particularly towards the house, "you must know that I am at the present time afflicted in the same way that you say you were."

"With a scolding wife?"

"Yes; but however bad yours may have been, I make bold to affirm than mine is ten times worse."

"Impossible!"

"But I get not a second's rest night or day; I live like a toad under a harrow."

"So did I."

"Then, sir, as you know what it is like," said the landlord, beseechingly, "have pity upon me."

"What do you want me to do?"

"Why, be kind enough to exercise your art upon her."

"Transform her?"

"Yes. I should then be ever your debtor—I should indeed, believe me. You must know that by an accident I have recently lost the very best horse in my stable. Trade is so bad that I cannot afford to buy another to take his place. My wife I could well spare, and therefore if you would only——"

Dick now found himself in another dilemma.

But his ready invention quickly helped him out of it.

"Do you know," he said, "that if what we have been talking about was to come to the ears of a third person it would cost us our lives?"

"Yes, yes—I know that."

"We should be hung, drawn, quartered, and afterwards burnt if we were known to have plotted anything of the kind against a fellow-creature."

"Yes, yes—I know that too. But excuse me, sir, you ran the risk, and I am quite willing to do so."

Dick saw that the landlord's anxiety to get rid of his scolding wife made him credulous to the utmost degree.

No imposition would be too gross for him to swallow.

"I consent," he said, as it appeared, after a few moments' reflection—"I consent, out of the fellow feeling I have for you; but upon condition that one stipulation is scrupulously observed by you——"

"Yes—yes. Anything—anything!"

"In order for my spells to work, time must be had. I have many things to prepare, and you must yourself go through a preliminary course."

"Eh? How?"

"Why, for nine days you must eat nothing but bread, and drink nothing but water. Do you promise to observe this faithfully?"

"I do," answered the landlord, who, as his appearance denoted, was strongly addicted to the good things of this life, therefore he pronounced the words somewhat unwillingly.

"In the next place, not a syllable must be mentioned about what you have seen to-day, nor respecting your intentions. Lastly, but not by any means the least in importance," continued Dick, laying his hand upon the landlord's shoulder, "money must be provided, in order that the necessary preliminaries can be carried out fully and properly."

"How much will be required?"

"Well, of course you cannot expect me to take all this trouble for nothing; besides, it is worth something to possess such a secret, and it cannot be made use of unless well paid for."

"How—how—much?" asked the landlord, breathless now with impatience and anxiety.

"Why, to commence with, I shall want fifty pounds."

"Fifty pounds?"

"Exactly. That you must pay down to me before the business can be carried any further."

"And how much afterwards?"

"Are you in the mind to find the first fifty?"

"Well, you see, sir, my wife is a miser—a regular miser, and that's the long and the short of it. I can never get hold of any money; but she has plenty."

"How shall you manage?"

"Why, it happens most providentially. But this very morning, sir, as true as I stand here, I discovered one of my wife's secret receptacles for money, and I should say there is as nearly fifty pounds there as can be."

"That will be the very thing then. She little thought for what purpose she was saving up her money, did she?"

"No, no—I'll warrant not."

"Well, then, this fifty pounds must be placed in my hands at the earliest moment possible, and the rest——"

"Yes—yes, the rest——"

"That will be fifty pounds more you must bring on the ninth night from this to the ruins of the old castle close by here."

"You mean Conyngs Castle?"

"I do."

The landlord's teeth chattered with fear.

"I have heard frightful stories about that place," he said—"yes, truly frightful stories."

"Disregard them. You must meet me there in the courtyard; at the hour of midnight I shall be with you."

"Midnight?"

"I have said it."

Clearly, the landlord did not relish the concluding portion of the adventure, but doubtless he considered he had now gone too far to retract.

"I—I will be there."

"Give me your hand, then."

A mutual grasp followed, and then Dick, after many more injunctions about secrecy, and particularly bidding him to bring the money at once, he accompanied him to the house.

Dick's comrades followed.

As soon as they had entered the room, and the door was closed, they everyone indulged in a hearty but yet by no means noisy laugh.

Dick held up his hand for silence.

"Oh, captain," said Sixteen-String Jack, in whose eyes the tears caused by his suppressed laughter were standing, "I will give you credit for ingenuity, though I could never have believed that any man would have been such a gudgeon as to swallow so monstrous an invention."

"Nor I," said Dick, "only I discovered his intense gullibility as I went on."

"Do you think he will bring the fifty pounds?"

"I have no doubt of it."

"And shall you meet him at the ruins?"

"That I can't tell at present."

"I only hope," said Tom King, "that he will not be fool enough to leak out anything; if he does, there will be so much curiosity raised that our recognition must inevitably follow; then who can say what trouble will ensue?"

"I don't think there is much need for apprehension. We will keep a sharp watch upon everything that goes forward."

"And we shall only stay here till dusk, I suppose?" said Claude Duval.

"Not a moment later. And now things having been so far settled, let us occupy the rest of the time in deciding upon our future movements," answered Turpin.

At this moment there was a faint tap at the door.

"Come in!" said Dick.

The landlord entered, carrying in his hand a well-filled leather bag, which he placed in Dick's hand.

"I have performed my part of the contract so far," he said, significantly, "and I fancy that ought to be sufficient proof of my sincerity."

He pointed to the bag as he spoke.

"I have no doubt of it," answered the highwayman, as he very contentedly consigned the money to his pocket; "and if you are only careful to be discreet all will be well."

"Depend upon me."

"I will. But understand, the least disclosure—the slightest allusion to what is going to take place, and we shall both be ruined in this world and the next."

The landlord made so many protestations of his determination to preserve strict secrecy that it would be tedious to repeat them.

Much pleased with the prospect of getting rid of his scolding wife, he left Dick and his companions to themselves, though not until the former had impressed upon him the importance of being at the ruins at the appointed hour.

"Now, my comrades," said Dick, "let us dismiss this fellow from our minds. Perhaps it is as well that we have had this little incident to divert our attention [illegible] now we must devote ourselves to more serious business. I want you to view our position in every possible way, and to assist me to come to a determination, for I never felt less able to rely upon my judgment in my life."

"You may depend that we shall do our best," said Tom King; "but still, for all that, Dick, I consider you are the proper person to speak first in the affair."

CHAPTER MXXIII.

EVENTS OCCUR AT THE INN WHICH CAUSE DICK TURPIN TO ALTER HIS ARRANGEMENTS.

"SINCE you will have it so," began Dick, "I can only say that my chief anxiety is to discover what has become of Maud."

"Yes, certainly—that is the first step," assented Tom King.

"It is still my impression," continued Turpin, "that, despite our unsuccessful efforts to discover her, both she and Jack the Ostler have been pounced upon suddenly by the officers, made prisoners, and carried away."

"This must be ascertained," said Sixteen-String Jack—"there must be no doubt about it; and should things turn out as you imagine, she must be rescued."

"Or I die," said Dick, with earnest emphasis.

"And so say all."

Dick was much gratified by the ready response from his comrades; it was a proof of that oft-made assertion that they would if requisite die to serve him.

"Then, now," he continued, "let us think which would be the best and likeliest way for us to gather the information we require. I confess, for my own part, that the likeliest course seems to hover about the ruins, which I believe might be done without the risk of much danger."

In this opinion his comrades coincided.

"You are forgetting me," said Tom Davis, who had been waiting for an opportunity to speak. "I can see very plainly that I am a very great clog upon all your movements, and that I shall be the means of materially increasing your danger."

"I cannot deny that," said Turpin; "still, the evil, such as it is, cannot be avoided, therefore must be endured."

"I do not agree with you."

"Very likely; but you need not imagine that we shall show ourselves so ungrateful for what you have done in our behalf as to abandon you now to your enemies."

"It would be no abandonment," answered Davis.

"But it would."

"Nay, listen. Do not you think that the landlord's credulity could be turned still further to account?"

There was a general laugh at this question, and Dick asked:

"How?—in what way?"

"Why, could you not induce him to give me safe shelter for a few days? I could easily meet you when and where you liked to appoint; and I should think the threat of the disclosure of his plot against his wife would be sufficient to overawe him should he prove refractory."

"We will discuss that further presently," said Dick. "The idea is not a bad one; but, first of all, we will——"

He paused abruptly.

His comrades started rapidly to their feet.

The deep and sleepy silence which had hitherto prevailed around them was now broken in upon by sounds which were precisely of such a character as to excite apprehension in the breasts of our friends—

The hoarse murmur of many voices—

The heavy trampling of many feet.

"That means danger," said Claude, as he hastily seized his pistols.

Dick held up his hand.

"Silence!" he said. "Do not let us be too hasty. Approach the window with me and reconnoitre; but take care that you are not seen by anyone without."

This sensible suggestion was immediately complied with.

Peeping cautiously through the panes, the highwaymen caught sight of a large crowd of persons approaching

They were all on foot

Amidst them seemed to be some object which attracted all their interest.

Dick and his comrades gave a sigh of relief.

The new-comers were not police officers, though a constable and a beadle could be distinguished among the throng.

As they came nearer, it was perceptible that those persons occupying the centre of the crowd were engaged in carrying some heavy object.

What it was our friends had no means of telling.

The very moment, however, that Dick discovered what these people were about, he experienced a sensation such as one might imagine to be produced by the pressure of an icy-cold hand upon the heart.

His cheeks blanched, and he leaned forward without daring to breathe, for now his mind was occupied by a worse foreboding than he had hitherto entertained.

The procession, if such we may term it, came steadily along the road.

It was approaching the inn, and by the glances given and motions made by the beadle and the constable, it would seem as though this was to be their destination.

We cannot possibly describe with what intentness and anxiety all the highwaymen watched the movements of the throng.

All seemed to feel that it was in some way connected with them and with their fortunes.

At length the door of the inn was reached, and then all doubts as to the destination of these persons was set at rest.

They stopped, and the beadle spoke for a few moments with the landlord, who, no less full of curiosity than our friends, stood upon the threshold.

What it was the beadle said the highwaymen could not overhear, but it was certainly assented to by the landlord.

They could tell that by his gestures.

The beadle raised his long gilt-crowned staff, and cried, in a loud, authoritative voice:

"Now, then, you who are carrying the body, this way! Keep quiet—no rushing! Only the bearers will be allowed to enter the inn. Mr. Samuels, please stand by that doorpost, and between us we shall be able to keep the rabble back."

The person thus addressed was the parish constable, and he took up the required position without a moment's hesitation.

A great deal of dissatisfaction was, however, created among the crowd by this order, but the two officials stood firm.

The crowd of people, being thus forbidden to enter, clustered thickly round the door—so thickly, that none of our friends were able to obtain a single glimpse of what was carried by so many men.

From the beadle's words, they knew it to be a body; but without this it could have been guessed by the expression upon the countenances of the crowd.

There was a hurried trampling of heavy footsteps in the passage outside—the same continued upon the staircase, then a heavy lumbering overhead, and finally comparative silence.

Those five persons in whose fortunes we are so much interested stood and stared blankly at each other.

But Dick Turpin was the one who was most overcome.

His countenance was pale even to ghastliness, while the manner in which his features quivered was painful to behold.

Fain would they all have hastened to the room above, whither the body had been carried, and by one glance have satisfied the terrible doubts which assailed their hearts.

But the fear of recognition held them back, for it could scarcely happen that among so many persons the appearance of our friends was unknown.

The risk was one too great to be run.

"It is strange," said Tom King, breaking the oppressive silence, and speaking with a palpable effort—"very strange that this incident should have had such an overpowering effect upon us."

"I—I—would give much for one glance at the body."

Dick did not speak.

"Let us call the landlord," suggested Sixteen-String Jack. "There is a bell here by which we could summon him."

Dick held up his hands.

"This suspense and uncertainty is painful—very pain ful to all of you, but especially to me; but I feel that our wisest course is to remain quiet a little longer, and endure it as best we can. In a short time these people will doubtless leave the inn. Let us keep out of sight till then. If we make no movement, the landlord may, in the excitement of this fresh arrival, forget all about us, and so these others will be quite ignorant of our presence here."

Dick spoke firmly and quietly.

His companions listened intently to every word, and, when he had finished, unanimously signified their belief that the course proposed was the best that could be adopted.

But to no wretched criminal awaiting the pronunciation of his doom did time lag so fearfully as it did on this occasion to Dick Turpin and his comrades.

It seemed as though the curiosity of the crowd outside would never abate.

There was a complete Babel of sounds.

Fruitlessly did the highwaymen endeavour to make out a few distinct words from the mass of gabble.

More than once they felt as though their patience must give way.

At last the constable, beadle, and those who had carried the body left the inn.

Some who were outside followed them.

Others indulged themselves with a longer and more minute inspection of the building before they finally took their departure.

Shortly after, according to Dick's anticipation, the landlord knocked at the door.

Now that the moment had arrived when all their doubts would be resolved, Dick Turpin became quite unnerved.

He was too agitated to pronounce the words, "Come in!"

The landlord, however, did not wait for this, but opened the door.

His face was full of mystery and importance.

"Gentlemen," he said, with a deprecating bow, and rubbing his hands together as he spoke, "I hope you have not wanted for anything, and that you will pardon my neglect, but—but——"

"What has all this commotion been about?" asked Tom King, speaking with tolerable steadiness. "I thought you told us this inn was such a quiet place?"

"Gentlemen," said the landlord, uplifting his hands to give additional assurance to what he said, "I assure you this is such a thing as has never happened at this inn since I have been the landlord of it, and that's a good many years, I can assure you. Why, you see, it's quite, as I may say, a history—yes, quite a history."

"But come to the point at once."

"I am sure I don't know how, for, you see——"

"What was it those people brought in?"

"A body."

"A dead body?"

"Yes, a corpse."

"Of—of—wh——"

"Ah," cried the landlord, interrupting him, "that's what nobody knows?"

The highwaymen repeated the words in extreme astonishment.

"A perfect stranger, gentlemen—a perfect stranger."

"But cannot you tell us," cried Dick Turpin, in a voice of the utmost agitation, for this suspense was to him the most acute of tortures—"cannot you tell us whether it is a man or ——"

The landlord gazed at Dick aghast, and well he might.

His eyes were gleaming, his lips trembling, and the cold dew of apprehension was on his forehead.

Well might the landlord be surprised at the manifestation of so much anxiety.

"Why," he said, "it's a man—of course it's a man! I thought that you knew that. But, bless us and save us, what's amiss?"

A fervent "Thank Heaven!" burst from Dick Turpin's lips.

Then he was himself again.

The trouble that had weighed him down seemed to have rolled away as a mist suddenly rolls upon the sides of a mountain.

The reader has no doubt interpreted his terrible fear aright.

He was not unreasonably under the dread that the body was that of Mard.

He fancied in some way she must have met with her death—and what was more probable? for the reader knows already how near was the occurrence of that catastrophe—and that her body, having been found, was carried to to the inn, there to await a judicial inquisition.

But now that fear was completely dissipated.

The shock, however, was almost too much for endurance, for he flattered himself with the idea that he had prepared himself for the worst.

"What man?" asked Claude Duval, for the landlord, having spoken, stood stock still, gazing upon Dick, whose extreme emotion seemed to have raised a dim kind of suspicion in his breast.

Claude had to repeat his question before it was responded to.

Then, with a start, the landlord said:

"I beg your pardon, sir, ten thousand times—I do indeed; but really, what with one thing and the other, I really don't know, as the saying is, whether I stand upon my head or my heels, or whether I am myself or not."

The landlord did indeed seem greatly flustered, and it would have been a great wonder if he had been otherwise.

Wiping the perspiration from his forehead, he sank into a chair, and ejaculated:

"Gentlemen, if you will allow me I will try to give you an account of this affair from the beginning to the end. You will understand it better and so shall I, for I am so flabbergasted, in a manner of speaking, that I scarcely at present comprehend the rights of it myself."

"Sit down, then, and begin. Tell the tale after your own fashion."

The highwaymen felt that now their minds were so much relieved that they could endure any amount of prolixity upon the landlord's part.

"It appears, then," he began, "that early this morning, as a cowboy was going along a cross road not far from here, he saw what he thought was a man asleep under a tree. As he came nearer, however, he saw that the animal he was in search of was bending its head down on the prostrate form, while a dense swarm of flies and insects filled the surrounding air."

"So it was a dead man?"

"Yes, that was what it was found to be. The boy was frightened out of his wits almost, and ran along the road as if the devil was after him, nor did he stop until he met with some men who were on their way to work. To them he communicated his discovery, and they all went back in a body."

"And then the corpse was brought here?"

"Yes, sir," said the landlord, rather annoyed to find his narrative thus interrupted. "The constable was fetched, and so was the beadle. The body was examined and found to be that of a perfect stranger. Many looked at him, but none could remember having seen a man of his appearance in the neighbourhood."

"And what was the cause of death?"

"Ah, that is to come."

"Well, proceed."

"The beadle was the first who dared to have a good look at this man's face. I don't wonder that the others shrunk from it, for it is an awful sight, such as I hope I may never see again!"

The landlord shuddered while he spoke.

"Go on—go on!" cried Dick.

"It is most frightfully disfigured, so much so, that it is scarcely possible to distinguish one feature from another. They seem to be charred with fire. The plain fact is the man must have been struck by a thunderbolt in that fearful storm; the tree itself under which he was found is, I am told, terribly shattered."

"Then by that and your description," said Turpin, "there can be little doubt that he met with his death by a stroke of lightning."

"He has been brought here, I suppose, in order that an inquest might be held?" observed Tom King, who had hitherto listened in deep thought, and who now broke the silence which followed Dick's last words.

"Yes sir, that is it."

"Where is he now?"

"Upstairs."

"In the room over this, I think?"

"Yes."

"Is there anyone with him?"

"No, the door is locked."

"Where is the key?"

"In my pocket."

"Then," said Tom, bringing his series of questions to a close, "I have a very great desire to have one look upon this body."

"But—but——"

"What objection have you?"

"The sight is dreadful!"

"You said so."

"I dare not look upon it again!"

"You need not. Show us up. You need not so much as cross the threshold. We will leave you at the door."

"Yes," said Turpin, rising, for he fancied he knew what was passing in Tom King's mind, "I have this desire quite as strongly as my friend has—so, landlord, show us up at once."

"But I had particular orders from the beadle and the constable on no account to allow anyone to enter the room unless they were present, and if I disobey the injunction, why, I shall get myself into serious trouble."

"Nothing of the kind," said Dick. "Who is to learn anything about it, I should like to know? We shall never mention it, and surely you would not be fool enough to do so?"

CHAPTER MXXIV.

IN WHICH THE HIGHWAYMEN DETERMINE THE NATURE OF THEIR FUTURE PROCEEDINGS.

"WELL, I can't say that I should," answered the landlord, with a smile at Turpin's brusqueness.

"Then let us have no more words about it. Show the way upstairs."

The landlord did not like to refuse Dick anything, so great was the dread and respect he felt for the powers which he supposed him to possess.

Rising then from his seat, he advanced to the door, bidding our friends follow him.

They needed no second bidding.

Knowing what has happened, the reader, beyond all doubt, guesses accurately at the identity of the dead stranger.

A dim suspicion of who it might be was floating in the minds of all the highwaymen.

It was most important that this suspicion should be resolved.

Treading in the landlord's steps, they ascended the staircase and paused before a door.

A key was inserted into the lock.

"Enter, gentlemen," the landlord cried, "and be quick out again. As for myself, I have seen the horrid sight once too often already."

The highwaymen, of course, did not press him to accompany them.

Indeed, they were glad that he manifested a disinclination to be present, lest, in the event of their suspicions being correct, he should observe some alteration in their demeanour and so begin to suspect them.

The dead body had not been laid upon a bed, but upon a table formed by placing several planks upon some trestles.

A white sheet concealed the relics of humanity from view, but it had been cast over long enough to have settled down close to the form, so there would have been no difficulty in making out the nature of the object that lay there so calm and still.

It was Dick Turpin who took hold of one corner of the sheet and removed the covering from the face of the corpse.

A sensation of unutterable loathing came over him.

Conquering the feeling, however, he turned down the sheet still more.

The moment their eyes fell upon the apparel they recognised it.

It was well, indeed, that the landlord was [illegible] at hand to look upon Dick Turpin's countenance at this juncture.

It fully expressed the dreadful agitation of his mind.

Several minutes were passed, during which all continued to gaze at the stark and inanimate form before them, and so might some time more had they not been arous[illegible] by the voice of the landlord.

"Now, gentlemen," he said, "if you have seen enough, let us be going. I am afraid every moment that the beadle and constable will be here."

Without the utterance of a syllable, the sheet was replaced, and the little party betook themselves to the room below.

"Well, gentlemen, what think you of it?"

It was the landlord who asked the question.

"The sight is an awful one."

This was all they would say in reference to the subject.

So soon as ever they were alone they drew close together and waited for the captain to address them.

"I scarcely know what to make of this discovery," he said, in grave tones. "Let me hear what is your opinion of it?"

"I can give you my views in a very few words," said Tom King.

"Then do so."

"I consider that your belief about Maud's capture in the ruins is quite erroneous."

"You have entertained that opinion all along, have you not?"

"I have, and now it is an opinion no longer."

"What then?"

"A conviction."

"You think that——"

"Patience, and I will tell you. Depend upon it, Maud and Jack the Ostler were aware in good time of the approach of the officers. They then hastily made their retreat."

Dick was not convinced.

"Remember," Tom King continued, "I once had an excellent sample of Jack's cleverness in dealing with police officers, and that makes me fancy that he would neither be surprised easily nor yield readily. Let us suppose that he was aware of the presence of the officers in good time, then what would be the most likely thing for him to do?"

"Beat a retreat."

"Of course, and take Maud with him. They would immediately seek safety in flight, and would also leave the ruins, beyond doubt with the intention of meeting us and warning us of our danger."

The reader knows, of course, how very closely Tom's supposition approached the truth.

Dick could not fail to see the plausibility of it, and yet he was only half convinced.

"You think," he remarked, after a brief pause, "that they left together, took shelter under the tree together to escape the violence of the storm, and that Jack the Ostler perished?"

"I do, and that by great good fortune Maud escaped."

Dick shook his head.

"It is still as easy to believe, and quite as probable, that Jack escaped alone. If they had both been under the tree together one could scarcely have perished and the other escaped."

Tom could not gainsay this; but he observed:

"At any rate, this discovery will cause some alteration in our plans as heretofore decided upon. I think the first thing we ought to do is to find out the particular tree, and make a close search in its vicinity. Who knows but what we may light upon some trace of Maud?"

Dick smiled sadly.

"It may seem strange—nay, foolish to cling with such persistency to what is after all no more than an idea; still, I must confess that my original impression remains almost unshaken."

"At any rate," said Claude, "we will go first to this tree before we come to any absolute decision."

"Yes," said Turpin, "I think it would be best."

"Then let us call in our friend, the landlord!" cried Sixteen-String Jack; "he will be able to describe to us tolerably well whereabouts the tree is."

"Very good."

The landlord accordingly was summoned and questioned.

He was easily able to direct them.

"If you will go along this lane," he said, "instead of going out upon the high-road, and if you will keep on until you come to an inn, and then go past that inn almost as far as it is from here to it, you will see the tree on the right-hand side; it is a magnificent, wide-spreading oak. You cannot fail to find it, because I am told it is quite rifted by the lightning."

"Stop a bit," said Claude.

"What is it?" asked the landlord, turning to him.

"It appears from your account that there is an inn nearer to the scene of the catastrophe than this?"

"Yes, of course there is—the Jolly Tar."

"Then why was not the body carried in there, and the inquest held upon it in that place?"

"Ah!" said the landlord, in reply, "thereby hangs a tale, as I heard a man say in a play once."

"Be quick; let us have it, then."

"Well, I must begin by telling you that the Jolly Tar has had rather a queer name for a long time past. Persons have been heard of entering its doors, but never passing out of them again."

Dick nodded.

"Well, I have just heard that there was truth in these reports; a body of police have found out all about it. The place is a regular murder den, and the landlord and landlady are by this time safe in jail."

"So the place is shut up, I suppose?"

"Yes; and that was the reason why the body was not carried in there."

This was all the intelligence of any importance that they were able to obtain.

It did not interest them very much, for they little guessed how close a connection that closed-up inn had with Maud's fortunes, and how narrow was the escape she had of losing her life there.

Little did they imagine that they were so very close upon her track.

There was no chance, however, that they would be enlightened as to the true facts of the case.

Indeed, the probability was that in their unhappy mental blindness, they would recede from instead of approach the object they were so anxious to attain.

At length this long and weary day—for so it was to our friends, in spite of the strange incidents with which it was diversified—wore away.

The welcome shades of twilight came creeping over all things.

So soon as they deemed it prudent, they took their departure.

So far as they could, not the faintest suspicion as to their identity existed.

The landlord assisted them to prepare the horses for the road.

Just as he was on the point of riding away, Dick Turpin turned round, and said, solemnly:

"Remember our compact and the appointed hour. Do not fail; I shall be there."

Leaving these words to have their due effect upon the credulous landlord, Dick Turpin hurried off.

It was easy enough to find the road, they knew; but as soon as a turn of the lane concealed them from the landlord's view, Dick said:

"I am glad we obtained the information concerning this Jolly Tar Inn. Ten to one some police officers are still there, for in such cases the premises are rarely left, so that if we rode by we should stand a very good chance of being recognised."

"Right, captain," said Claude. "I was wondering whether you would think about that. I should propose that we take to the fields at once, and make a considerable detour—in fact, approach the tree from precisely the opposite direction to this."

A unanimous consent was given to this proposal, and the next moment they were all making their way at a rapid rate across the open meadows.

In this manner they were able to keep altogether out of sight of the Jolly Tar Inn, so that they avoided all possible danger of detection in that quarter.

At length Dick changed his course, for he saw before him something that looked like a human habitation.

Shortly afterwards he emerged into a lane—that very lane down which Maud had ridden at such a fearful speed in company with Hunch.

They looked about them, however, without for a moment suspecting anything of the sort.

All was calm and quiet, and accordingly they ventured to approach the tree.

They reached it undisturbed.

Now that the lightning had struck it, this tree was indeed a strange-looking object, and would for the future form an unmistakable and easily-recognised landmark.

Dismounting, they made a close search around, but the result of it did not prove at all successful.

There was no trace of Maud—

Nothing whatever to point, however distantly, to the fact that she had stood side by side with Jack the Ostler beneath its branches.

Tom King was the last to give up the search.

He was compelled to own that his expectations were not realised.

Dick, of course, was only the more confirmed in his opinion.

As the spot seemed silent and retired, the highwaymen chose it as their place of conference.

Long and anxious was the discussion which ensued.

Eventually, their future movements were decided upon.

It was agreed that a separation should take place.

Tom Davis, feeling how great a clog he was upon the movements of the highwaymen, was most anxious to be left behind.

But it was considered that the presence of police officers at the Jolly Tar, and, above all, the fact that an inquest was about to be held at the inn they had left, made it most unsafe and dangerous for him to linger in that neighbourhood.

"No," said Dick Turpin, "you shall, Tom, if you have no objection, come with me, and I will at the earliest moment either provide you with a place that holds out some slight prospect of safety, or else obtain you a horse."

"And I," said Tom King, "feeling sure that my opinion is the true one, will do my best to get upon Maud's track."

"And we," said Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack, "will work together to the same end."

"Agreed," said Turpin. "My course, as you know, lies in the direction of the ruined castle."

"Be careful, captain, for there is much danger there."

"Trust me—I will be careful."

"And now," said Claude Duval, "when we have decided upon our meeting place, I think we may venture to part company without any more discussion."

"Let this be the place," said Dick Turpin, "or somewhere near it."

"Agreed. And the time, when?"

"Between midnight and dawn."

"To-morrow night?"

"Yes."

"And if we can none of us keep the appointment, then it will hold good for the next night."

"Enough."

"We part, then. Farewell."

A few more words were exchanged, and then the highwaymen separated according to their arrangement.

Sixteen-String Jack and Claude Duval were the last to leave the spot.

The reason for this was, that they wished to allow Tom King to choose his own course.

As soon as they observed in what direction he rode off they departed in just the opposite.

There was chance alone to direct them, and it so happened that this led them far away from that water-mill where certainly some tidings of Maud would have been gained.

The country around was remarkably desolate.

There were few trees around, and no vestige whatever of human habitations.

Still Claude and Jack rode on for some distance, but at length, upon a word from the former, they arrested their horses' steps.

"I am afraid, Jack, that we, at least, are upon the wrong track."

"So do I. I should imagine Maud would not go very far on foot, and certainly would have no reason to persevere in this direction."

"I think not."

"Shall we turn back, then?"

"And try another way?"

"Yes."

"I don't know," was the reply. "Suppose, before giving a reply, we go on a few miles further?"

"Agreed."

"The nature of our surroundings may then be considerably altered."

"True."

"Forward, then."

Once more the highwaymen set their steeds in motion.

Ere they had advanced many steps, however, they were startled by hearing the sound of hasty footsteps.

The next moment a man came into view.

He was on foot, and running at the very top of his speed.

So excited did he seem, that he appeared altogether unconscious that horses were on the road before him, which happening to be narrow about that part, there was every probability that he would come into violent contact with them.

At the very last moment he beheld our friends, and stopped himself abruptly.

For a moment it seemed as though he was about to turn round and endeavour to force a hasty passage through the quick-set hedge with which the road was bounded.

But if this had been his intention it was immediately abandoned.

A great change came over him.

With one bound he placed himself in front of Claude and Jack, and then, in the accents of indescribable fear, he cried:

"Gentlemen—gentlemen, in the name of common humanity I call upon you to protect me! Save me—oh, save me! Gentlemen, save me—save me!"

There was something so extraordinary and withal so ludicrous in the appearance of this new-comer, that the two highwaymen, instead of responding to his appeal, sat stock still upon their horses, regarding him fixedly.

While they are thus engaged we will take the opportunity of describing in a few words the nature of this man's exterior.

He was about the middle age, and somewhat inclined to be corpulent.

His attire was that of a tolerably well-to-do London tradesman, but it was now in a terrible condition.

His coat had been split up the back, so that it hung behind him in two most extraordinary-looking tails.

The rest of his clothing was torn in many places and literally beplastered with mud, looking as though in his headlong race he had tumbled down, and then had rolled over and over in some mysterious way until he had rolled himself on to his feet again.

His hat and wig were both gone, and his bald, shining pate added not a little to the ridiculousness of his appearance.

"My good man," said Claude Duval at length, "what is the matter, and what do you want me to save you from? So far as I can tell, we are the only people near this spot."

The stranger was so exhausted, and so scant of breath, that he could not immediately make a reply.

Puffing and blowing like a grampus, he cast apprehensive glances around him.

"They are coming after me," he gasped at length—"I am pursued, but, luckily, I have out-distanced them a little. Hark! can you hear?"

Our friends listened intently, but no sound whatever came upon their ears.

"What is the meaning of all this?" asked Jack. "By whom are you pursued? I can hear no one."

"Ah, gentlemen," said the man, "you have no idea what I have gone through during these last two days and nights—no idea whatever! Ah me! and when I tell folks, I shall be disbelieved and laughed at, I know I shall. Ah!"

He wiped the perspiration from his brow while he spoke, and seated himself on a long stone that happened to be close to the hedge-bank on one side of the road.

"I do believe," he continued, "that I am in a fair way of making my escape. If I could only rest a little, gentlemen, and recover my wind and strength a little, I should doubtless get away altogether. But I dare not stop here unless you will be so kind as to remain and protect me if they come."

"They?" echoed Claude. "Who do you mean by they, and what have you done that you should be pursued?"

"Done?"

"Yes, done."

"Nothing, gentlemen—nothing at all!"

"Then why are you pursued?"

"That would take some time to tell; but while I am resting here for a few moments I will, if you like to listen, make you acquainted with the most extraordinary concurrence of circumstances you ever heard of! Ah!"

This interjection is to represent the peculiar kind of sigh with which this singular personage concluded every sentence.

The curiosity of Claude and Jack was greatly roused, and therefore they at once desired their singular companion to speak freely.

"I am glad of that," he ejaculated, immediately upon receiving their permission—"very glad indeed, for do you know that I am so perplexed and bewildered by the many events which have occurred, that a narration such as I am about to make will materially assist me to comprehend them."

"Be speedy, then," said Sixteen-String Jack, "for we are engaged upon business of importance and cannot afford to stay long."

"Ah, me! Well, I am a tradesman from London—a respectable tradesman. My shop is at the corner of Bucklersbury. Perhaps you may know it, gentlemen."

The highwaymen shook their heads.

"It don't matter," continued the stranger. "You will have to take my word for more than that. However, it is a fact. Mine is one of the largest establishments, and I deal only in the very best silks, velvets, and such like."

Some little impatience was manifested by the highwaymen at this detail.

The stranger, however, went on.

"Lately I have had a very constant, and as I believed, excellent customer—quite a lady she appeared to be, and she bought many of my things and paid a good price for them. Who she was I neither knew nor cared, but I learned that she kept a first-class house in a fashionable street, and lived in first-class style. Don't think I am going about the bush too much. I am not indeed. Oblige me by listening, gentlemen, for I assure you the strange part of my story is to come, and you will admit that you never heard anything so monstrous. Ah!"

CHAPTER MXXV.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK AND CLAUDE DUVAL FOLLOW UP THEIR ODD ADVENTURE.

Upon receiving this intimation, our friends prepared themselves to listen more attentively, and the stranger continued, in a rapid voice:

"Two days ago I received a letter from an unknown correspondent, warning me that a suspicious character had been frequenting my shop of late, and that she no doubt intended to make a victim of me.

"Unfortunately, the writer of the letter was not sufficiently explicit.

"I was thinking over this, and endeavouring to remember all the different people who had been in the shop lately, when the lady I have mentioned to you drove up to the door in her carriage.

"I went myself, opened the door, and assisted her to alight, and this completely drove out of my head all recollection of the letter.

"You will not wonder at this when I tell you that the lady was in a very gracious humour. She told me she wanted to make some very extensive purchases in silks and velvets. Nothing that I put before her was too good or too dear in price, and I began to think, as one roll after another was bought, that I was going to do a capital day's work."

"This lady, I presume," said Sixteen-String Jack, "was the cause of all your troubles?"

"She was. But you shall hear. Have the patience to listen to me for a few moments longer."

Jack promised, and the stranger continued his narrative:

"At last she told me she had bought all that she required. She asked for the bill. It was made out in due course. The amount was just over two hundred pounds.

"She put her hand into her pocket, and then exclaimed:

"'Oh, sir, I have not enough with me to pay you.'

"She looked awkward and confused for a moment, and I suppose so did I, for I did not like to offend such a good customer; and just then the recollection of the warning letter flashed with unpleasant vividness upon my mind. I resolved to be careful.

"After a moment's reflection, the lady seemed to recollect herself.

"'It is very annoying,' she exclaimed, with a smile, 'and I don't know how I could be so careless; however, I have been thinking that, after all, it will be for the best!'

"I expressed my satisfaction.

"'Yes,' she continued, 'I am now very glad I thought of it. You must know that I have an aunt staying with me at my house a little way out of town, and I am certain she wants to make some similar purchases to mine, though not to so great an extent. What I am going to propose to you is that you should get into the carriage and ride home with me. On our arrival, I will give you the money; and in order that your journey may not be lost, you can take some other things in the carriage with you for my aunt to select from.'

"Now, gentlemen, I appeal to you—did you ever hear anything more reasonable, or straightforward, or proper than that? I ask you before I go any further."

"Nothing," said Claude. "But what that has to do with your running away I really don't know."

"But you will see in a moment, sir. Delighted and overjoyed with the prospect of doing so large and excellent a stroke of business, I selected silks and velvets that I thought likely to suit to the value of between two and three hundred pounds more. The whole was placed inside the carriage, and the lady would insist upon my entering with her, though I refused for a long time, and declared my resolution of sitting beside the driver on the box.

"Eventually, however, she overruled me. The carriage was entered, and away we went.

"Now, I left the shop in such a hurry that I never went behind to speak to my wife and tell her where I was going; but just as I passed out I told the assistant in the shop that I should be back in three hours at the most.

"Ah, gentlemen, now for my misfortunes. You will ask why I have troubled you with all these trade details, but it is necessary that you should be made acquainted with them in order for you to understand what follows.

"I confess I never enjoyed a ride so much in my life, though now I shall look back to it with feelings of anything but pleasure. The lady proved herself to be a most entertaining companion, and laughed and chatted on the way in the most affable manner you can conceive.

"London was left behind, and the country gained. I looked about me with pleasure, for, like most inhabitants of cities, I was delighted with the sight of a green field.

"Well, we rode on and on a long way into the country; I knew that, although the time passed so agreeably and so quickly.

"At last we came to a very high and long red brick wall, such as may be often seen surrounding a gentleman's estate. This one appeared to be of unusual height and strength, for at frequent intervals it was supported on the outer side by stout buttresses.

"The carriage here sensibly slackened pace, and therefore I imagined we had reached our destination.

"I was about to ask the question, but was saved the trouble, for just then the carriage stopped before some large, massive wooden doors set in the wall, and corresponding well with it.

"The stoppage was only momentary, however.

"The gates were opened.

"The carriage rolled through them, and immediately afterwards I found that we were traversing a broad, well-kept avenue.

"I was now quite elate and quite satisfied of the rank and position of my customer.

"I was wondering what extra price I should put upon the goods, when the carriage stopped again.

"This time, it was in the front of the house.

"The carriage-door was opened, and I officiously jumped out in order to assist the lady to alight.

"She rewarded me with a smile.

"I was about to remove the piles of velvet and silk, but she said, sweetly:

"'Never mind, I will send for them. Please to enter with me.'

"Just then, the front door was opened.

"I followed the lady up the flight of steps and crossed the threshold.

"The door was immediately closed, and the first thing that struck me was the obscurity of the entrance.

"It struck me as being very great, for, having just come from the glare of sunshine without, I could scarcely see who was standing before me.

"But the voice and manner of my companion altered suddenly.

"So great was the change that I could scarcely believe the evidence of my ears, which were the only organs of sense I could make use of, my eyes being, as I told you, of very little service.

"The lady seemed to be weeping, and her voice was that of one enduring the utmost affliction, as she said:

"'Alas, sir, you see I am here.'

"'Yes, madam. Is this the person you spoke to me about yesterday?"

"'It is, sir. This is my truly unfortunate husband. Oh, sir, what shall I do?'

"Husband!

"Gentlemen, I can assure you my backbone opened and shut just then, for all the world like a great clasp-knife.

"Husband! I could scarcely believe I was in possession of my senses.

"'Pray, my dear madam,' said the same voice which had before spoken—'pray be calm; any agitation on your part may be productive of the worst consequences—the very worst.'

"What on earth were they talking about? I asked myself. What did it all mean?

"But I could not manage to pronounce a syllable aloud, I was so entirely flabbergasted.

"I stood there like a stock-fish.

"'Oh, his delusion is now most painful,' continued my strange companion. 'I had to get him here by pretext; but all the way he has declared I am not his wife—that he does not know me—that his wife is at home in the parlour behind the shop in Bucklersbury; and then he babbles about velvets and silks.'

"'Such hallucinations, my dear madam, I am sorry to say,' answered the soothing voice, 'are far from being uncommon. However, you may depend that all that lies in my power——'

"'Yes—yes, I know you will do everything you can; but, oh, it is so very, very dreadful!'

"Gentlemen, I can't describe to you what an actress she was.

"Even I felt in doubt once or twice.

"A little reflection soon brought me to myself.

"I had a dim idea of the nature of my situation.

"I resolved to be calm, and to give quietly an explanation.

"'Sir,' I said, addressing the man with the suasive voice, 'I beg to assure you that I have been brought here under false pretences. This is no wife of mine, I assure you, but——'

"At this point the lady fluttered her handkerchief and became deeply affected.

"'Yes, yes, my dear sir, we know all about it. Come, come, be calm and reasonable. Let me assure you this will be all for your good.'

"'Oh, oh,' sobbed the lady, 'I cannot bear this trying scene any longer! Good-bye, my dear husband, I hope you will soon be better—pray be calm, for my sake. Good-day, doctor!'

"'Good-day doctor the devil!' I roared, unable to restrain myself any longer. Stop her—stop that woman! Don't let her go. Murder! Stop her, I say. There's all my velvet and silk in the carriage; five hundred pounds' worth at the least. Oh—oh! I see it all now. It's a swindle—a swindle! I understand the letter now. Help—help! will none of you stop her?'

"At the first word I darted forward, and endeavoured to put a stop to her departure.

"But in a second, I felt many strong hands upon me.

"I was held quite powerless.

"What aggravated me most, however, was the soothing manner adopted by the doctor.

[TOM KING ENTERS THE JOLLY TAR INN.]

"'My dear—dear sir,' he said, most beseechingly, 'do pray be calm! You cannot imagine what injury you are doing your case by being thus violent. You will much retard your recovery if you persevere in such behaviour.'

"'Recovery!' I cried, my voice rising in spite of all my efforts to restrain it. 'Let me assure you there is nothing the matter with me. Feel my pulse—feel my pulse, I say, and you will find me as hale and as sane as any man in the kingdom.'

"The doctor carried the soothing system out perfectly.

"He did not for a moment refuse my request, but, with an appearance of interest and earnestness that raised fallacious hopes in my brain, pressed his fingers over my pulse.

"He waited a moment, then very gravely shook his head.

"'I am very sorry—very sorry to find your pulse so exalted. The danger is imminent. I would not have answered for the consequences if he had been allowed to remain one day more at large—I would not indeed.'

"These last words were spoken in a lower key, and not addressed to me, but to the vile wretch who had so speciously decoyed me to this place, but they reached my ears as well.

"'I suppose I can do nothing for him?'

"'Nothing whatever—leave all to me.'

"I will. I am most anxious to depart, for the scene is more than I can bear.'

"'Stop her!' I yelled again. 'Listen to me, all of you—listen, I say. My wife, I tell you, is at home, sitting in the parlour behind the shop. If you don't like to believe me, keep us both here while you send some one to see Can I say fairer than this?'

"The sympathetic but incredulous smile upon the doctor's countenance aggravated me to such a degree that I felt as though I should like to rush upon him and fell him to the earth.

"But I was too tightly held for that.

"'My dear—dear sir,' he said, smiling still. 'Let me entreat you—let me implore you to drive this unfortunate hallucination from your mind, for such it is. If you thus persist in it, you will be in great danger of becoming permanently insane.'

"'D—n you for a grinning, batter-brained fool!' I yelled, unable to control myself any longer. 'I tell you I am being robbed—robbed in the most barefaced manner ever heard of. It's a swindle—an awful swindle; I can see it all now! This is a private lunatic asylum, is it not?'

"The doctor assented with a bow and another of his d—nably aggravating smiles.

"'I know it—I know it; I comprehend the whole plan now. Seize her, I say—I give her in charge. Take her into custody. She is a swindler. Do you hear me?'

"I was heard, certainly, but no attention whatever was paid to my words.

"The viper appeared to be more and more affected every moment, and the doctor at length led her to the door.

"It was opened.

"I saw them both descend the steps that led down to the graveled avenue.

"I saw the doctor hand her into the carriage and close the door after her.

"A few more words were exchanged, the order given to the coachman to proceed, and away rolled the carriage, with the thief and my five hundred pounds' worth of property in it.

"My fury, then, I must admit was ungovernable.

"But, gentlemen, I appeal to you. Does it stand to reason that any man could stand quietly by and see his wealth carried away from him in such a fashion?

"So frantic were my struggles that I almost broke away from my captors, strong as they were.

"But the door was closed, more keepers were summoned, and I was finally overpowered, for my tremendous efforts greatly exhausted me.

"You will be surprised, perhaps, but, gentlemen, I can assure you I burst into tears.

"Five hundred pounds is a very serious loss to me, especially at the present time, when many of my most important ventures have turned out unfortunately.

"'There—there, he will be better now, poor man,' said the doctor. 'Carry him to one of the dark cells, and be sure you are sparing with his diet. I will send the barber to him before long.'

"These words acted upon me like the contact of fire with gunpowder.

"All my angry passions broke out afresh.

"Another furious struggle commenced.

"'I see—I see,' the doctor ejaculated, 'leniency will not do in this case—compassionateness is thrown away altogether! Drag him away; clap a strait waistcoat on him, and let him remain for twelve hours in the dark.'

"In spite of all my efforts to prevent it, this barbarous purpose was carried into effect.

"I was confined in that atrocious instrument of torture called a strait waistcoat, and in this helpless condition was carried through several passages and down various flights of stone steps.

"A door was opened, and I was roughly thrust into a kind of cellar that smelt for all the world like a grave.

"The door was closed again, and I found myself surrounded by the deepest darkness you can conceive—in fact, I never knew before what was expressed and meant by the word darkness.

"There I was allowed to remain, as I suppose, for the time specified. I had no means of noting the flight of time.

"No sound whatever penetrated to that dark and gloomy place

"How I passed those hours I can scarcely describe to you; certainly you can form no conception of them yourselves. I wept, prayed, raged all by turns until compelled to cease from sheer exhaustion.

"I now fully comprehended by what a clever and well-planned scheme I had been defrauded of my goods.

"Nothing more ingenious I had ever heard of.

"What puzzled me most was to know whether the people at this asylum were in league with the ad venturess.

"Such a thing was far from improbable; but then, on the other hand, I could see how very easy it would be for her to impose upon and make dupes of them.

"My property was gone—of that there was no doubt—and I endeavoured, with what philosophy I could command, to reconcile myself to my loss. This I found a difficult and almost impossible task.

"I was determined that I would in the morning be as calm and quiet as it was possible for any human being to be, for I could see that was the only chance I should have of regaining my freedom—unless, indeed, it was all a planned job to keep me there.

"I suffered a fever of apprehension on account of my wife, who would, I knew, be tormenting herself to death on my behalf.

"At last I heard the welcome sound caused by the removal of the fastenings of the door.

"I sat quite still.

"Several keepers entered.

"'He's quiet enough now,' said one, in a low tone. 'We'll venture to take the waistcoat off him. If he's obstreperous we can soon master him again.'

"While he spoke, this man very ostentatiously flourished and cracked a huge, heavy cart whip.

"A sympathetic shudder thrilled me.

"I sat as still as a statue while I was unbound.

CHAPTER MXXVI.

CLAUDE DUVAL AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK CONTINUE THEIR SEARCH FOR MAUD.

THE interest with which Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack listened to this interesting narrative was so great that they manifested great impatience while the poor man paused a moment or so for breath.

"I suffered myself to be led to an upper chamber," he continued, "and when there I was told to sit down in a chair that was placed near the centre of the flooring.

"I obeyed.

"No sooner did I seat myself, however, than, with great suddenness, several springs started forth and held me fast.

"One confined me across the chest, another clasped my legs, and so on, while two others held my head in such a manner that I could not move it in any direction in the least degree.

"I wondered what was coming next.

"I was not kept very long in suspense.

"The door opened, and in stalked the doctor, who was followed by another individual wearing a white cap and a white apron.

"I guessed their purpose at once, and a cold sweat burst out all over me.

"But I was as powerless as I should have been had I by some magical power been suddenly converted into stone.

"'How is the patient?' asked the doctor.

"'Uncommon quiet,' answered the keeper.

"The doctor shook his head, and again felt my pulse.

"Oh, how I wished that one limb was at liberty. What intense delight it would have given me to have felled him to the earth!

"But there I was, as I have described to you, unable to move a muscle.

"'His pulse is still very high,' said the doctor, with the utmost gravity, 'and therefore we may safely conclude that this present unusual calmness of demeanour is only assumed, and that immediately upon recovering his liberty he would resort to deeds of violence. This is a very severe case, and I shall have to use unremitting care to bring about a cure.'

"I cannot give you an idea, gentlemen, of how much these words galled me.

"My indignation was something I cannot describe, and I feel pretty sure that had I at that moment been released from my fastenings I should have perpetrated some rash act or other.

"But I was not allowed the opportunity.

"'He must be reduced,' said the doctor, 'and every means tried to get him really quiet. First of all, barber, we will cool his brain.'

"I knew very well what this meant.

"My tongue, which I had contrived to keep still all this time, would be restrained no longer.

"I broke out into a furious burst of angry invective—I reviled the doctor and his associates—declared what I would do to them if I only had the opportunity, and repeatedly averred that I was not mad.

"All listened with a pitying smile, which went far to increase my fury.

"However, there I was, more helpless even than a new-born babe—they could do with my person just whatever they thought fit.

"Gentlemen," continued the unfortunate tradesman, "you see my head—it was lately covered with hair, of which my wife was so fond that she would not let me wear a peruke, according to the fashion of the times. Well, while I sat there in that abominable chair, one of the keepers, with some huge bright scissors, snipped it off close to my head, and then the barber finished the horrid work with his razor; in less than a moment my head was as smooth as the back of my hand.

"I was so grieved over my loss that I positively wept.

"Here was an accumulation of one misfortune after another.

"I began to dread that the upshot of all this would be that I should go mad in reality.

"My fury again became ungovernable, for it required a greater amount of self-command than I possessed to think over such wrongs as mine unmoved.

"'Ah, well,' said the doctor, who had been watching me, 'I see it is a desperate case, and we may as well do all we can for him at once; it will be a saving of time and trouble in the long run.'

"While he spoke, he took a lancet from his pocket.

"I looked at the little glittering instrument with the utmost apprehension.

"My arms were tightly bound down to my sides by means of the strait waistcoat; but I discovered that there was an opening left in this by which my arms could be punctured without being removed from restraint.

"This the doctor at once proceeded to do. The incision was made, and I watched the outpour of the blood until I grew sick, faint, and giddy.

"'That will do,' I heard the doctor say at last, though his voice seemed to me to sound as though it came from miles and miles off. 'Release him, and carry him back to the dark room; you will find him tame when you visit him next time.'

"He was right, for when I aroused myself from the state of dreamy torpor into which the loss of blood had thrown me I was so fearfully weak that I could hardly raise my head from the hard mattress on which I had been thrown.

"How long I remained thus I know not, for in that dismal place it was, as I have told you, impossible to keep any note of time—not even the ordinary distinction of night from day could be observed.

"At length my tormentors made their appearance.

"One carried a small basin containing some delected nutriment; this was placed to my lips, and I swallowed it half unconsciously.

"I quickly experienced the benefit of it.

"I was pronounced to be by no means so dangerous as I was. The fellows declared that the mad light, as they called it, had gone out of my eyes.

"Then afterwards the doctor came.

"He, too, declared me better, and allowed the strait waistcoat to be removed, and also had me conveyed to another chamber.

"As soon as I was left alone here I began to give myself up to serious thought.

"An end must be put to the present state of things somehow—I felt that keenly; if not, I should, beyond all doubt, eventually become quite mad.

"I began to see that nothing but the greatest hypocrisy would save me.

"My loss I now began to bear with greater patience.

"It was severe certainly, but then it was not irretrievable.

"My anger always rose, however, when my thoughts dwelt upon the villanous woman who had so cruelly duped, robbed, and deceived me.

"I promised myself that when I recovered my freedom no effort should be wanting on my part to bring about her capture.

"I fancied, however, that if I humoured the doctor's notions, and no longer persisted in a denial of what he held to be facts, that I should be set at liberty.

"Therefore I resolved to dissemble.

"The next time the doctor saw me, I looked at him without any of that fierceness of aspect with which I had hitherto invariably regarded him.

"He noticed the change at once.

"'Ah!' he said, rubbing his hands briskly, 'how are we now?'

"'How am I?' I said, passing my hand over my forehead. 'Has there been anything the matter with me? I have been trying to make out where I am and how I came here until my brain is in a whirl.'

"'Hush—hush!' said the doctor. 'Be calm—pray be calm! In good time you will know all. At present you cannot keep yourself too quiet.'

"A few more words were exchanged between us, and then the doctor left, promising to send me a draught that would put me right, and assuring me that after I had partaken of it I should leave for my own home.

"'Yes,' I said, 'Bucklersbury, No. 97. Alas! what will not my wife have suffered during my inexplicable absence? That villanous wretch——'

"I stopped myself, for I saw the doctor's eye was upon me.

"I had forgotten my caution, and felt ready to bite the end of my tongue off.

"I could see then that the doctor did not believe in my restoration to sanity—that I was, with the cunning for which lunatics are celebrated, deceiving him by a false calmness in order to regain my liberty.

"He did not say a word of all this, but quietly backed out of the room.

"As soon as he was gone, I sprang to my feet, for I was no longer under any species of personal restraint, and was considered to be so far better as to have a light and cheerful apartment allotted to me.

"I felt that now or never was the time for me to make my escape; and if I did not succeed, there was no knowing how long my stay in that place might be protracted.

"It was already growing dusk, so I considered all things favourable for my design.

"I rushed to the window.

"This was protected by iron bars.

"Anxiety and excitement lent me a strength such as I had never dreamt of possessing.

"One bar was partially removed from its place, and I at once set to work to force myself through the narrow opening thus made.

"I received many injuries in the attempt, but I persevered, for I considered this to be my only chance of success.

"My hands were lacerated, my clothes torn, and my flesh terribly bruised, but, heedless of these minor evils, I persevered with my task.

"At last I got through, and dropped a considerable distance to the ground.

"Fortunately, I alighted upon some soft mould in a garden.

"I was stunned by the fall, but soon recovered myself.

"I found that, beyond a good shaking, I had not sustained any injury.

"Rushing along, I made my way to the boundary wall which I have before mentioned.

"My heart now sunk within me, for how was I to surmount such an obstacle?

"My spirits revived again directly afterwards, for at some little distance I perceived a man standing on a ladder that was leaning against the wall.

"I crouched down to observe his movements.

"I was not long before I found that he was engaged in studding the top of the wall with numberless pieces of broken glass, doubtless with a view to prevent such an escape as I was now contemplating.

"The question now arose of how I was to pass him on the ladder. I was afraid that I should be hurled to the ground—that an alarm would be raised and that I should be recaptured.

"Luckily, I recollected that he would be compelled ere long to descend for more materials, and just as I thought of it he began to come down.

"I now held my breath with anxious anticipation, for I was determined, at all risks, that as soon as his feet touched the ground I would bound forward, ascend the ladder, and drop myself from the opposite side.

"The man reached the ground.

"He stooped down to supply himself with more materials for his work.

"With a sudden dash I reached the foot of the ladder, and then ascended it with more speed than I felt convinced a ladder had ever been ascended with before.

"Ere the man could recover himself from his state of surprise, or even comprehend what had taken place, I had reached the top.

"He bawled frantically to me to stop.

"But I disregarded him, for just then I had fairly gained the wall.

"For a moment I sat astride it.

"I seized the ladder with both hands, and threw it down.

"The man had to step back to escape injury, and I felt certain that I had prevented him from following me so speedily as he would have done.

"But a general alarm had now been raised.

"My escape so far had been discovered, and they were organising a pursuit.

"I looked down on the outer side of the wall with a feeling of great misgiving.

"However, I could not hesitate, having succeeded so far.

"I lowered myself as well as I was able till I hung down at the extreme length of my arms, and let go.

"I reached the hard road with great force, but I was on my feet again in a moment.

"I knew at once which way would take me towards London, so I ran with all my might; but before I had gone far I could tell that the doctor and his crew were on my track.

"This circumstance, so far from causing me to despair, only made me double my speed, and when I found that I was actually distancing them I made increased exertions.

"Now, gentlemen, I have done, for it was soon after this that I was so fortunate as to meet with you. And let me thank you for having patience to listen to so long a narrative."

"But I hear nothing of your pursuers," said Claude Duval; "and besides, if they were so close after you as you describe, they must have reached this spot ere now."

"They must have abandoned the chase. Perhaps I have distressed myself with running without absolute occasion. At any rate, my best thanks are yours."

"You are welcome," said Claude. "And, what is more, should we encounter any of your pursuers, we will send them upon a wrong track."

"Thanks again! And if ever you call at 97, Bucklersbury, you will find Simon Pursall will make you welcome."

"It is the most extraordinary narrative I ever listened to," said Sixteen-String Jack.

"It is indeed, gentlemen. I knew you would say that."

"Farewell!" cried Claude. "We have stayed here too long already, for we have much important business to attend to."

They rode off as he spoke, scarcely giving the man time to utter the word farewell.

"What do you think of that adventure, Claude?" asked Sixteen-String Jack, when they had got to a little distance.

"Why, that it was about the oddest we have ever encountered."

"So I think; but my chief concern is to know whether the man has been insane or not."

"What is your opinion?"

"I can hardly give one. It may be all true; and if so, he has been badly used, though at the same time the cheat is of a more elaborate description than I have ever before heard of."

"There is a certain amount of probability about it, is there not?"

"Yes, there is; but then I have often heard that mad people are very cunning sometimes in concocting apparently coherent, but yet extraordinary, narratives, such as this we have just listened to."

"We may speculate upon it till doomsday, I expect, without coming much nearer to a conclusion."

"Yes, and therefore we may as well give it up at once and turn our attention to the business we have in hand."

They rode on for some distance in silence, but at length Jack said:

"We are getting too far away, Claude, I feel convinced we are. Let us retrace our steps and start off upon a fresh track."

"With all my heart."

"I have been trying to think what would become of Maud."

"So have I."

"With what success?"

"None. Have you?"

"I have not. If she was with Jack the Ostler under that tree when it was struck with lightning, I cannot conceive how he could perish and she escape."

"It baffles me completely, and I feel like one groping in the dark."

"So do I, and therefore I consider there is but one course open to us."

"And what is that?"

"To leave all to chance. We have nothing better to direct us; and—who knows?—we may by mere accident stumble upon the right track."

"It is possible."

"Come, then, we will get a little nearer to the blighted tree. I feel certain we are taking the wrong course now."

With these words they changed the direction in which they were going.

Scarcely had they turned round, however, and fairly got their horses in motion, before Sixteen-String Jack perceived in advance of him a faint and distant light.

Immediately upon making this discovery he directed the attention of his companion to it and pulled up.

No sooner were the horses at a standstill than Claude exclaimed:

"I can hear wheels now."

"So can I."

All doubt about the character of the light was now at an end.

A vehicle could be heard approaching, though what puzzled the highwaymen was to see only one light, as it was the custom for carriages of almost every description to carry two.

Our friends remained in the middle of the road where they had paused, undecided what to do.

"Come, Claude," said Jack, arousing himself, "what is to be done? If we wait here, the carriage will in a few moments be upon us."

"I think we had better not interfere with it, under the circumstances," said Claude, though he manifestly spoke with great reluctance. "Let us attend first of all to the task we have undertaken."

"Very good," replied Jack, who did not like to say anything in contravention to his companion's expressed decision.

As he spoke he backed his horse close under the shadow of the hedgerow.

"Why are you taking up that position?" asked Claude, in suspense.

"Simply in order that the carriage may pass freely. If you place yourself by my side, those approaching will pass on without having the least suspicion that we are on the road at all."

"Which may be important," said Claude, as he at once backed his steed close to his friend's.

By this time the approaching vehicle was very close at hand indeed—so close, that there was no reason to fear that their patience would be exhausted by much waiting

CHAPTER MXXVII.

IN WHICH CLAUDE DUVAL HAS QUITE A CHIVALRIC AND PLEASANT ADVENTURE.

Not another syllable was spoken, on account of the fear they had that the sound of their voices might be floated on the still night air to the ears of those who were so rapidly nearing them.

As may be expected, the highwaymen, despite their resolution not to attack the carriage, kept their eyes riveted upon it, for they could not help experiencing a considerable amount of curiosity and interest.

They were soon able to make out that the carriage was a closed one—something after the fashion of a post-chaise.

But it looked very odd to see a lamp burning at one side of it and not at the other.

The horses that were attached to it seemed of good quality, for they drew it along at a tolerable rate.

This was about all the highwaymen were able to make out.

In another moment, with a sudden rush, the vehicle swept past.

As soon as the rattle of the vehicle had died away a little, Claude exclaimed:

"Hang me, Jack, if I like to remain idle like this, and allow a carriage to go by in that fashion! Follow me! We will overtake and stop it at all hazards!"

Sixteen-String Jack was not very much surprised at this sudden change of his comrade's determination.

Without a single word of dissent—for the proposal exactly accorded with his feelings—he followed his friend.

Their weapons they knew were in perfect readiness.

They now put their horses to the utmost speed they were capable of making, and the manner in which they flew over the ground was something extraordinary.

As the pace they were going at was at the very least double to that made by the vehicle in front, it follows that they overtook it in a very short time indeed, despite the efforts which the driver made upon hearing some one powdering after him at such a rate.

"Hold!" cried Sixteen-String Jack, who happened to be first—"hold, I say! Pull up your horses! If you disobey, I will let daylight into you!"

A chorus of screams came from the interior of the vehicle immediately after the pronunciation of this threat.

The coachman, like a prudent man who places a due value upon his life, tightened the reins, and the panting horses very gladly came to a standstill.

Jack turned round and saw that Claude had made the best use of his time.

He had already gained the door of the carriage, and was looking into the interior.

Perceiving this, Sixteen-String Jack thought he could not be better occupied than by keeping guard over the driver; he resolved to remain in the position he had taken up, and leave the rest to his companion.

Leaving Jack to this piece of duty, we will return to the proceedings of Claude.

The moment he rode up to the window and looked in, he beheld a sight for which he was scarcely prepared.

The carriage contained half a dozen persons; and what was surprising was that they were, without exception, young girls whose ages might be taken at an average of seventeen or eighteen years.

By the manner in which they were attired it could be perceived at once that they belonged to the upper ranks of society.

They were, too, all beautiful, so that Claude was for a moment quite dazzled and overpowered by the sight of so much loveliness.

Our friend's appearance was greeted by a succession of faint screams.

The loudest was uttered by a young lady who held in one hand a lamp, evidently the one that should have been at the side of the carriage.

In her real or affected consternation, she suffered it to slip from her hand.

It would have fallen to the floor of the carriage but for the quickness with which Claude put out his hand and caught it.

This he was able to do easily, for immediately upon finding that he had nothing but ladies to deal with, he had consigned his pistol to the holster of his saddle.

The manner in which he now held the carriage lamp was such as to allow its beams not only to fall upon the bevy of fair ladies, but also upon himself, for he could perceive that, despite their real or pretended terror, they were stealing glances at him, and Claude was rather inclined to be vain of his personal appearance.

And, indeed, rarely had he appeared to greater advantage than he did at that very moment.

His countenance was one which even his detractors could not but admit was a most pleasing one, and his dark moustache—then quite an unusual appendage to the face—gave him a decidedly foreign and distinguished look.

Then his eyes were remarkably fine and bright, and as the light of the lamp fell upon them they seemed to glitter almost like diamonds.

Then there was his picturesque-looking hat.

His no less picturesque-looking costume, for his bright scarlet coat and white vest gave him quite a military appearance.

It did not require much penetration to discover that his exterior had made a very favourable impression upon the ladies.

With a smile which was really charming, and which seemed at once to dissipate any apprehension which the ladies may have experienced, he said, with a graceful inclination of the head and many gentle accents:

"Excuse me, fair ladies, for my seeming rudeness, but I little dreamt this road would be enriched with so much loveliness to-night. I cannot bow, I fear, for both my hands are occupied, and yet——"

Even as he spoke he, with a rapid movement, shifted the lamp from his right hand to the left, in which he held the reins.

He found it was able to do this double duty very well.

His right hand was now at liberty, and the first use he made of it was to remove his hat and make a very deep and respectful bow.

Now it is not a very easy thing to bow gracefully on horseback, but Claude managed it to perfection.

Then with a slight shake of his head he caused his dark mass of hair to fall into a profusion of natural curls.

At this time it was no less singular to see a gentleman wearing a moustache than it was to see him with his own hair, for barbarous fashion dictated that nothing but wigs should be worn.

The effect produced upon all the ladies by this was greater than before.

One was so overcome by it that she actually uttered a sigh, which had the effect of bringing Claude's eyes full upon her, and which, of course, threw her into a great deal of confusion.

A rather awkward pause now ensued.

It was broken by the young lady who had held the lamp, and who appeared to be of a more sprightly disposition than the rest.

The manner in which she glanced at Claude while she spoke clearly showed that our adventurer had made quite the reverse of a disagreeable impression upon her.

"Perhaps, sir," she said, with a saucy toss of the head and an air of assumed indifference, "you would be kind enough to let us know why you have interrupted our journey in this threatening manner?"

"Ladies," said Claude, resuming his hat and placing his hand upon his heart, "I beg you will not prove yourself so unkind as to turn a deaf ear to my supplicating apologies. I do indeed most heartily regret that I should have disturbed your journey; but can you wonder if I confess that now I feel rejoiced, for never before have my eyes rested upon such an effulgence of loveliness."

This speech was very favourably received by the ladies to whom it was addressed, and from whose features all appearance of fear had completely faded away.

"It seems very strange," said the one who had first spoken, "that you should stop us thus. May we inquire your motive for doing so?"

"Ahem!" said Claude. "I—I—am a wandering knight."

"A wandering knight?" echoed all the ladies in chorus, and with a manifest accession of interest.

"Yes."

"Oh, how delightful!" said the one who had first spoken, and who appeared to be the youngest of the party. "Why, do you know, I have been reading the most charming book. Here it is: 'Rosalba, or the Wandering Knight.' But then, it can't be you—your name is not Rosalba?"

"It is not," said Claude; "but yet I am a wandering knight, as I informed you."

By this time our friend had discovered that he had chanced to fall in with some very romantically-inclined young ladies, and he made a mental determination to bring the adventure to a pleasant termination.

The reason of the lamp being carried inside the carriage was now apparent.

The young ladies had beguiled the tedium of their journey by reading aloud one of those old romances of chivalry which were at that period so much in favour.

"Really a wandering knight?" pursued the lady, in accents of incredulity.

"Indeed and in truth."

"And in search of adventures?"

"Yes, though when I set out to-night I little thought that I was about to experience so much happiness, or, as I said before, that my eyes would be gladdened by such a galaxy of beauty."

The ladies fluttered their dresses and looked at each other, but they were so overcome at having encountered, as they imagined, one of their favourite heroes of romance, that they could say nothing.

"Ladies," said Claude, after the silence had continued a moment or so, "believe me, I could remain thus for ages feasting my eyes upon your beauteous features; but you, I doubt not, are all anxious to resume your interrupted journey, I should therefore esteem it a favour if you would answer me one question."

The ladies were at once filled with curiosity, and anxiously assured him that he was welcome to ask a hundred.

"Then, ladies," said Claude, with an air of affected embarrassment, "what I wish to know is, whether your favourite knight, of whom you have been reading——"

"Rosalba?"

"Yes. Well, I want to know whether he was poor?"

"Poor?"

"Yes—whether he was in want of money, or whether he possessed an ample share of that not-to-be-despised commodity?"

The ladies shook their heads.

"Then he was poor?"

"Oh, very!"

"Then I resemble your knight in more ways than one?"

"Are you poor, then?" they asked, with compassionate earnestness.

"Oh, very!"

Their looks bespoke their regret

"I am even now pressingly in need of a considerable sum of money; and if you, ladies, could help me to it, I should never fail to look back during the rest of my life to this adventure with the liveliest sensations of gratitude and joy."

"Oh, it's impossible!" said the young lady who had been reading the adventures of Rosalba. "We have nothing in the shape of money with us except——"

"Ah, there is an exception."

"Yes, we carry with us what all true knights would regard as a sacred depositum."

"Ahem! May I ask its nature?"

"Oh, certainly! You see this young lady here?"

She pointed to one who sat nearly opposite to her.

Claude bowed.

"Well, that is my dear friend, Angela, and she is going to be married."

"Then," said Claude, "I take the present opportunity of wishing her every possible happiness which she can enjoy in that state."

The confusion which Angela now witnessed only made her look more charming than ever.

She thanked Claude for his good wishes with a perfectly intelligible glance.

"And the depositum?" he asked.

"That is her dower—her marriage portion."

"And have you that in the carriage with you?"

"Yes, in three bags, each one containing a thousand pounds."

Claude looked amazed.

He was scarcely prepared for the exhibition towards himself of such an amount of confidence.

The bride elect looked as though she considered her friend somewhat indiscreet.

"I should think that is rather an unsafe way of carrying money."

"But who is to know of it?"

"Why, I do for one."

"But that does not matter."

"I am glad to hear that," answered Claude, with a smile. "But you remember what I told you about my wants?"

"Oh yes; but now we have explained this to you of course you will not think of touching it."

Claude was amused at the confident tone in which the young girl spoke.

"My wants are so very pressing," he said, "that——"

He was regarded with surprise and suspicion.

"Really," he continued, "if you only knew now many misfortunes I have experienced lately you would not be surprised at my importunacy. If there was time I would relate them to you at full; as it is, I must leave them to your imagination. Such a sum as you mention as having with you would relieve me of the whole of my troubles; and as for the bridegroom, surely he would be content to be united to so much personal beauty without wishing for the riches."

The words, and, above all, the manner in which they were spoken, awoke the girls from the illusion in which they had indulged.

They began to see their incaution in its proper light, and felt that the wedding portion was already as good as lost.

"I—I—am afraid," said the girl who had been reading, "that you have been deceiving us."

"I have not indeed."

"You cannot be a knight—I begin to fear that——"

"Nay—nay, be under no apprehension; I would not injure you for the world."

"I mean I begin to believe that so far from being a knight, you—you are only——"

"Only what?"

"A high——"

"Wayman?"

"Yes!"

"Surely you would not call me by so harsh a name?"

"That depends upon your demeanour, sir."

"Then I'm afraid you will have to think harshly of me. If I was not so much pressed I would allow you to pass free, but as it is——"

They were all pale now and trembling.

"I regret to say that I must have the dower; and you will always be able to have the satisfaction of reflecting that it will be of infinitely more service to me than it could possibly be to the intended bridegroom."

"Nay, nay—do not be so cruel!"

"The cruelty is on your side, fair ladies, to deny me thus."

"Must you have it?"

"I must."

The bride elect burst out into a passion of tears.

She sobbed as though her heart would break.

"Must you have all?" the other asked again.

Claude's heart was touched by the distress he witnessed—so much so that his heart seemed in danger of melting altogether, for he was one that could not bear to contemplate the spectacle of a fair and lovely being in tears, and know himself to be the cause.

"I will not take all," he said after a momentary pause; "and do not any longer accuse me of harshness or cruelty."

"How much do you demand, then?"

"One-third only of the whole amount. Surely you will consider that proposition a reasonable one. My urgent needs will be temporarily supplied, and the bride will suffer no great loss of fortune."

Every occupant of the carriage was by this time half fainting with terror,

The bride half dried her tears.

Then, stooping down, she pulled from beneath the seat a small valise.

So great was her agitation that she could scarcely insert the key into the lock.

At length she succeeded, and produced a bag, which was evidently very weighty.

It was handed to Claude, who lowered his eyes when he received it, for he could tell that all the ladies were gazing upon him with very different looks to those with which a short time before they had regarded him.

The bride's distress now much increased.

"Shall you really take it?" said the young lady who had carried on most of the conversation.

"I cannot leave it. What am I to do?"

As he spoke, Claude placed the heavy bag into his pocket, though his conscience smote him heavily as he did so.

The whole party was now in tears.

Claude half turned away.

But his heart failed him.

Looking once more into the carriage, he said:

"Believe me, ladies, I cannot depart and carry away with me the knowledge that I am leaving so much acute distress behind me—I cannot—indeed, I cannot, so I fear that, despite all the inconveniences to which I shall inevitably be exposed, I must leave this wealth behind me."

"Nay—nay," said the bride, speaking only by a very great effort. "Take it, sir—take it, and depart!"

"I cannot," said Claude. "And yet I cannot bring myself to depart altogether empty-handed. Ladies, I will tell you what I will do. Listen to my proposition."

The utmost curiosity was manifested.

"This wealth," said Claude, producing the bag, "can be recovered—that is, if you are willing to pay ransom for it."

"Ransom?"

"Yes."

"But what ransom can we pay?"

"One that I hope will not cost you so much reluctance and grief as this. What say you—do you consent?"

"That depends upon the nature of the ransom. What is it?"

Claude smiled a roguish smile, and said:

"That each of you fair ladies will come one by one and press your sweet and charming lips to mine. If that is done, you are welcome to your gold, for I should prize such a favour above a dukedom."

This audacious proposal was received with six separate and distinct screams of dismay.

"Are you in earnest?" said the lady who had held the lamp.

"I assure you I am."

"Then you are a most audacious wretch!"

"Just so."

"And very ugly."

"That is why I admire your beauty so much."

"But really, in order to get rid of such a disagreeable monster one ought to be prepared to do disagreeable things, so I will set an example to the rest. I feel that I am most to blame for making you acquainted with the fact of the money being with us, and that I ought to pay the penalty. Take off your hat, sir, and as I contributed to place that money in your possession, I will do my best to recover it."

With these words, she rose and shook her curls carelessly and yet saucily from her brow.

Claude, with a throbbing heart, removed his hat.

His veins tingled with anticipated pleasure.

The young girl drew back once or twice without having the courage to carry out her intention.

Her colour rose to her very temples, for she could observe what glances of intense admiration Claude bent upon her.

Suddenly she bent forward and just touched the high wayman's lips with hers.

So quickly and so lightly was the act performed, that a bystander might well have been in some doubt whether the salute was given or not.

But in spite of its transiency, Claude was in no doubt upon the subject.

The light, scarcely-perceptible pressure of her lips upon his own thrilled through every nerve and fibre of his body like an electric shock, only the feeling was one of the most intense and intoxicating pleasure that can by any possibility be conceived.

Claude was confused—overpowered.

He was recalled to himself by hearing her say:

"There, sir, your claim is paid. Now, then," she continued, "follow my example, and then we shall the sooner be rid of him."

But the manner in which she spoke clearly showed that she was by no means so displeased with Claude as her words would have led anyone to imagine.

The bride elect was the next who paid her share of the ransom, and the others, after many pretty delays, followed.

The last kiss was given, but none impressed Claude like the first.

"Here is the prize," he said, as he surrendered the bag of gold. "Take it; and my fervent wishes will always be for your happiness and welfare! Farewell!"

"Stay," said the young girl. "You have forgotten the lamp."

Claude in his excitement had forgotten it.

He gave it back with a smile, and as he did so his fingers came in contact with hers.

He would have given much to have pressed it in his own.

"Once more, ladies," he said, "farewell! I trust you will perform the remainder of your journey unmolested."

"We have very little further to go."

Claude once more raised his hat and bowed.

"Stay!" said the young girl again.

He stopped at once.

"Now and ever," he exclaimed, fervently, "I am at your commands."

"You will not leave us until we know who you are?"

"A wandering knight."

"Yes, I know—you said that!" she answered, half impatiently. "What I want to hear is your name."

"It—it is——"

"Yes, yes. What?"

"Claude Duval!"

The announcement was received with the utmost astonishment conceivable.

But Claude would not linger now

"Come, Jack," he cried, "away—away!"

He galloped off as he spoke, leaving his comrade to follow him.

They did not pull up until the next hill was reached

"Well, Claude, what luck?"

"Eh?" said Claude, with a start, for his thoughts were so busily engaged that he had not heard his companion's question.

"What luck, I say?"

"None, if you mean booty."

"How! did not I hear something about three thousand pounds?"

"Yes."

"Let me know."

Claude related the adventure.

"And you actually had a thousand pounds in your hands?" asked Jack.

"I believe so."

"And you gave it back?"

"I did. I could not find it in my heart to keep it."

"Ah, Claude, my friend, it is all very fine for you to say that, but it seems to me pretty clear that my turn ought to come next, for you had decidedly the best of that adventure."

CHAPTER MXXVIII.

TOM KING HEARS UNEXPECTED TIDINGS OF MAUD, AND SUCCEEDS IN EFFECTING AN ENTRANCE INTO THE JOLLY TAR INN.

LEAVING Sixteen-String Jack and Claude Duval for awhile, we now revert to the proceedings of Tom King, whose adventures on this particular night will be found to possess no ordinary amount of interest.

The route which he took was exactly that which Maud had followed.

Of this he was ignorant, though he knew he was making his way towards the Jolly Tar Inn, so that he was particularly careful in all his movements.

As he thus slowly rode down the lane, looking keenly in every direction, he fancied he saw some glittering object lying upon the ground.

It caught his eye only for a moment.

He stopped, however, and proceeded to search more closely.

The result was that he found, close to the edge of the ditch, a bracelet, which he recognised in a moment as having belonged to Maud.

Here, then, was something like proof positive that he had got upon the right track.

He remained gazing upon the jewel for some moments in deep thought.

He was more than half inclined to ride back after his comrades, and make them acquainted with his discovery.

Eventually, however, he decided to do nothing of the kind.

Much time would have been occupied by the adoption of this course, and then it was questionable whether the search could be so successfully conducted as it could be if he was left to his own resources.

This decided him, and, once more mounting his horse, he rode with still greater slowness and caution down the lane.

On one side of him there was quite a tall hedge, and just as he was passing by Tom was greatly startled to hear a strange voice pronounce the words:

"Good night!"

Tom King returned the salutation, and at once pulled up his horse, greatly wondering who it could be that had thus addressed him, and what was the object for doing so.

Some of the twigs of the hedge were then parted.

It was not so dark but that Tom could see through the leaves the head and face of an elderly gentleman, whose countenance was certainly expressive of good temper and benevolence.

"I think, my friend," he said, addressing Tom, "I saw you pick up something in the lane a few minutes ago?"

"It is quite possible you might, sir."

"May I ask what it was?"

"Certainly, if you can show me any good reason why I should tell you."

"Well, then, it is just in this way. I happen to be Lord of the Manor here, and I always consider I have the best claim to anything that may be found hereabouts."

"In a great way, my lord, perhaps you have, but you certainly have not in the present instance."

"Indeed—why not?"

"Because what I have found happens to belong to some one with whom I am well acquainted, and of whom I happen to be in search."

"In search?" echoed the old gentleman. "Are you a police officer, then?"

"I am not."

"I thought you did not look like one; but come, tell me who this is of whom you are in quest; perhaps I may be able to afford you some information, for in default of having something else to do I occupy myself in walking over my property and making myself acquainted with all that occurs."

Upon hearing this statement, Tom King immediately became deeply interested.

It flashed upon him that chance might so far have favoured him as to bring him face to face with the very man who would be able to furnish the information he so much required.

Without the slightest hesitation then, he gave a full description of Maud's personal appearance, stating that she was a dear friend of his, and that he was most anxious to discover her.

"Have you seen anyone answering to this description," was Tom King's earnest inquiry, as soon as he had finished, "or have you heard anything?"

"I have not."

Tom was deeply disappointed at this reply, for he had suffered his hopes to carry him away.

"Can you tell me whither this lane leads?" he asked, at length.

"Yes, on to the London Road."

"And are there any intermediate places where you think she might be likely to stay?" asked Tom.

"Only two inns: one a long way off—just at the junction of the London Road, in fact—the other is not so far away, being just beyond the boundary of my estate."

Tom knew this perfectly well.

"As for the last," continued the old gentleman, "I have heard that it is a fearful place, though no suspicion has existed until recently. I believe, however, it is one of those murder dens of which it is to be feared there are many throughout the land. If the young person you seek has sought shelter there, I fear her fate would be a sad one."

"The place is now in the occupation of police officers, is it not?"

"It is."

"Alas!" said Tom, with a sigh, "I fear I have a difficult task before me. Many thanks for the information you have been able to afford. Good-night, for time is precious, and I cannot linger."

The salute was returned, and Tom King resumed his progress down the lane.

His mind was now filled with many anxious thoughts.

That Maud had made her way down that very lane there could be little or no room to doubt.

The question was, what had become of her?

"Beyond all doubt," he said, "she was beneath that tree with Jack the Ostler. They would foolishly seek its dangerous shelter to escape the rain. Yes—yes, that must be so. Then when the awful catastrophe happened she would fly in horror. The rain and the storm would have no terror for her then."

As the reader is aware, Tom King came very closely indeed to the truth in these conjectures.

"Then," he resumed, "so great would be her alarm that she would run on at so violent a rate as rapidly to exhaust herself altogether. She would again look out for shelter, and if she happened to see this Jolly Tar, she would be likely to enter there and remain until the storm was over."

Still Tom felt that these were only conjectures, and it was quite possible that Maud had acted in entirely a different manner.

He was only judging by what he himself would have done under similar circumstances.

"If she entered there," he muttered, "I fear it is no use looking for her any further. She could scarcely escape the double danger. Still it would be satisfactory to ascertain her fate; and better me execute the task than Dick, for he would be carried away too much by his feelings, the enterprise would be doubly dangerous to him."

Tom was right enough here.

"I am afraid," he murmured, "that the police officers would arrive during her stay here. They could not fail to recognise her in a moment, and they would make her a prisoner, for she would not be able to do anything in her own defence. If so, they have had time enough to take her to London and lodge her in Newgate before now."

Tom was silent, but his mind was busily engaged in wondering by what means he could free himself from these suppositions—how he was to make certain whether they were right or wrong.

"There is only one course to pursue that I can think of," he said, at length, "and that is to go direct to the Jolly Tar Inn. There is danger in the adoption of such a course, but then I would gladly run ten times as much risk for her or Dick. Yes—yes, if she has visited the Jolly Tar I will take care to learn all about it."

When Tom had come to this decision his mind grew quite easy.

Many, however, would have wondered by what earthly means he was about to put his design into execution.

It seemed like a man running into the lion's mouth.

Our gallant friend, however, did not allow this portion of the affair to disturb him much.

His arrangements were soon made.

He rode on until he came to within quite a short distance of the place he wished to reach.

Then dismounting, he secured his horse to the branch of a tree that grew at some little distance from the roadside.

This much accomplished, he bestowed a careful examination upon his weapons.

Finding them all in perfect order, he crept forward cautiously on foot.

He made his way first of all towards the back part of the inn, for he believed that he stood a much better chance of gaining the rear of the premises unperceived by his foes.

Getting nearer, he found that all the windows at the back were plunged in profound darkness.

[TOM KING WATCHES THE MOVEMENTS OF THE POLICE OFFICERS.]

Indeed, so dark and so silent seemed the place, that he began to think that the police officers had deserted it altogether.

With a view of ascertaining this, he crept round with redoubled caution to the front.

Here, however, from one of the windows on the ground floor he discovered a faint light gleaming.

This was where the officers were watching, beyond all doubt.

Tom would have given much to know how many were engaged upon this important service, and what they were about at that precise moment of time.

This seemed to be impossible to ascertain.

Accordingly, he retraced his steps to the back.

The yard was reached without difficulty.

Drawing nearer to the house, he began to look about him very closely, in order to discover some means by which he could effect an entrance.

So far as he could tell, every precaution had been taken to fasten both doors and windows.

This was no more than he expected.

Still he kept perseveringly to his task.

He was rewarded by discovering a window which seemed to promise to answer his purpose.

It was a small latticed casement opening like a door—the modern sash window had not been invented then.

A great number of small, diamond-shaped panes were fitted into it, being held in position by means of a lattice of lead.

One of these panes Tom King had not much difficulty in removing, for the only tool he made use of was a clasp-knife, by means of which the lead was bent back.

With great care the piece of glass was lifted out and placed down.

"That much has been done without creating any alarm, I think," said Tom King to himself.

No. 219 will be Published next Monday.

However. In order to assure himself upon this head, he placed his ear close to the opening of the window, and listened intently for several minutes.

All was still, and certainly, but for the fact that he had seen a light shining from one of the front windows, Tom would have come to the conclusion that the house was empty.

Nevertheless, he had now every encouragement to prosecute his enterprise.

Replacing the clasp-knife in his pocket, he cautiously introduced his hand through the aperture he had made.

There was only just room—indeed, he found no little difficulty in turning the little button by means of which the window was secured.

At length, however, this important object was achieved.

The casement swung slowly open.

The way was now clear before Tom, if he thought fit to enter.

He bestowed another careful examination upon his weapons, listened intently once more, and then, with a nod of satisfaction, he stepped over the window-sill.

Having done this much, his first act was to refasten the window again.

He was plunged in the most profound darkness.

What kind of room it was into which he had penetrated, and what kind of furniture it contained, he had not the least idea.

To exhibit a light was something more than he dared do under such circumstances, for what would be more likely to bring about a discovery of him than that?

And yet he dreaded to advance even a single step, for fear that he should come into sudden and violent contact with some heavy object, and so cause such a noise as would infallibly reach the ears of the police officers.

To remain standing still was, however, quite useless and ridiculous.

Accordingly, Tom stooped down, and with his hands stretched out before him, groped his way along in this fashion

To his surprise he encountered nothing.

It almost seemed as though that chamber was destitute even of a single article of furniture.

Suddenly, however, in spite of all his precautions, some hard, cold object struck him a sharp blow on the forehead.

A slight exclamation involuntarily escaped him.

"D—n it!" he muttered, "what was that?"

He put up his hand to feel, and his grasp presently encountered what he found to be, after a little further examination, the handle of a pump.

There could now be no sort of doubt as to the nature of the chamber he was in, and its destitution of furniture was comprehensible.

Still groping on, Tom's hands at last encountered a door.

This he opened with a great deal of caution.

No sooner had he done so than the faint murmur of voices came upon his ears.

It was evident that either the speakers were a long way off, or else that a closed door intervened between them.

All was still profoundly dark—indeed, Tom was not able ocularly to distinguish one single object.

Adopting the same method of progression as before, however, he cautiously crept on, taking the sound of the voices for his guide.

He was now in a kind of passage, which was tolerably straight, and along which he was able to make his way with a certain amount of ease, for he had only to keep close to the wall upon one side of it.

Suddenly he encountered a door.

He paused at once, and carefully passed his hand over it until he found the fastening.

Before he ventured to raise the latch, however, he listened with an intensity that was almost painful

He could still hear the murmur of voices engaged in conversation, but finally he came to the conclusion that the speakers were not just on the other side of this door.

Cautiously, then, the door was opened.

He paused, and was half inclined to close it again, so very audible did the voices now become.

A peep which he ventured to take enabled him to comprehend the cause of this.

With renewed confidence he glided into the room with which this door communicated.

The apartment in which he now found himself was not altogether dark, but was pervaded by a kind of dubious twilight.

This proceeded from a door that was standing a little way open.

The clearness with which he could hear two men talking convinced Tom that the police officers were in the adjoining room.

Double caution was now requisite.

On tiptoe Tom crossed the room, nor did he pause until he reached this inner door.

He made his way towards the hinges of it, for owing to its position there was a chink here through which he hoped to be able to see his foes, and observe all their movements as well as listen to their words.

Scarcely had he taken up his station here, than he heard a voice say:

"Did you hear something then?"

"Of course I did. Didn't you?"

"Well, I might have heard a faint sort of a kind of a noise, but, as I said before, in a quiet old place like this you are sure to hear hundreds on 'em."

"But I tell you I heard something then."

"What was it like?"

"Why, like a door opening and shutting."

"Well, old fellow, if you pay attention to every trifle you hear like that you will have enough to do. Why you will be running about and a-worrying of yourself all night, to say nothing of me."

"But I am satisfied—I felt sure I heard somebody."

"Then you had better go and look."

"I will; and if I don't see anything this time, d—n me if I pay any attention to my ears again!"

A dark lantern—of that kind commonly carried by police officers—was on the table; but in order that they might obtain the benefit of a diffused light, the door was left standing open.

Taking this in his hand, the officer who had last spoken rose from the chair on which he had been sitting and advanced towards the door.

Tom King, hearing and seeing him, grasped his pistols tightly, so as to be in readiness to use them at a second's notice.

He was well aware that he was in most imminent danger of discovery.

Indeed, to escape being seen seemed next to an impossibility.

But Tom was prepared for the worst, and resolved not to yield himself a captive without a desperate struggle.

The police officer advanced about a couple of paces into the outer room.

He pushed the door open considerably wider.

The effect of this was that, owing to the position our friend had taken up, he was more completely concealed.

The officer held the light above his head and peered around him.

Tom held his breath, fearful that this slight sound should betray him.

It now became a very nice question as to what extent the officer would carry his investigations.

If he advanced far into the interior of the room he would scarcely fail to behold Tom King.

But his fellow-officer, who had been left inside in the dark, was beginning to grow impatient.

CHAPTER MXXIX.

THE EVENTS WHICH OCCUR AT THE JOLLY TAR MAY BECOME EXCITINGLY INTERESTING.

"Now then, mate," he cried, "what can you see?"

"Nothing yet."

"Then come back, can't you, what do you want to leave a fellow in the dark all this while for?"

These words caused the other officer to turn back at a moment when, if he had gone a couple of steps further, Tom must have been discovered.

But such chances are happening every day.

"D—d if I believe my ears again!" he growled as he retraced his steps. "I'll shut the door—I sha'n't be bothered with hearing every slight sound then."

Tom was in despair.

If the door was closed, all hopes of listening to any part of the officers' conversation was at an end.

But his good fortune again befriended him.

"Don't make such a fool of yourself, Moggs. Sit down, can't you, and let the door alone?"

"I will when I've shut it."

"Leave it a little way open, I say, and leave the listening to me. If it is shut, how are we to tell whether there's any disturbance or not? I tell you again—don't be a fool; don't go for to make a hass of yourself!"

Moggs, for such apparently was the cognomen in which this officer rejoiced, growled out something that was not very intelligible, and came back to his seat.

"Stir the fire," said his companion, just as he was about to resume his seat; "you may as well now you're up, and put another log on—I am as cold as a key."

Moggs complied with this request.

There was already an excellent fire burning on the hearth, and when the embers were stirred, the blaze that shot up into the chimney imparted to the whole of the chamber a highly comfortable look.

"That's something like, Moggs," said the officer, as he rubbed his hands briskly together. "I shall feel quite like myself in a little while."

"That's more than I shall," growled Moggs. "I hate the sight of this infernal place, and I wish from the very bottom of my heart that I was well out of it. Whenever I breathe, the air seems full of blood."

"Oh, stow that!" said the other, with an uncomfortable movement. "What do you want to be talking like that for?"

"You ain't frightened, Joel, I hope?"

"Frightened? No, but what the devil do you want to say such things as that for? If you can't find anything more pleasant to talk about, shut up!"

"Oh, you be blowed! You always was a houtragious fellow, Joel!"

After this there was a pause.

From his post of espial, Tom King could see very well into the inner room.

Moggs was sitting in a large arm-chair on one side of the fire, and Joel on the other.

Between them was an old rickety table, on which stood several bottles and a couple of partially-filled glasses.

Both men were engaged in smoking.

During the lull in the conversation which now ensued, each sat with his eyes fixed upon the blazing fire, and smoked.

The atmosphere was so laden with the reek of tobacco smoke that Tom King felt once or twice as though it would be utterly impossible for him to resist clearing his lungs by a slight cough.

The first movement was made by the police officer who had been called Joel.

He stretched out his hand and took hold of the bottle with the intention of filling up his glass.

"I told you how it would be, Moggs," he ejaculated. "We shall have to go poking about down in the cellar for some more gin, or else we shall have to sit the rest of the night without any."

"Is it all gone?"

"Not quite, but it will be by the time you have filled your glass. Come, pour up! Don't shirk the bottle!"

Moggs complied.

"I was thinking, Joel," he remarked, after having drank about half a glass of gin.

"Thinking what about?"

"Why, this here place, and what a rum start it was from the first."

"Very rum indeed! How was it that it got found out?"

"Don't you know?"

"Do you think I should have asked you if I did?"

"Well, you needn't be so sharp—I thought you did. But if you think it rum now, I'm blessed if I know what you'll think of it when you come to hear the pertik'lars."

"Let's hear 'em, then."

"Why, one day, as a cove was a-going down the lane, what should he see but a piece of paper."

"A piece of paper?"

"Yes, it came fluttering out of one of the top windows, you understand, and naturally dropped in the road."

"In course!" said Joel, with a grave nod.

"When the cove picks up this paper and reads it—which of course he did—what should he see in it but that the inn was a den of murder, where all travellers who entered with money were dropped down a deep well in the cellar and never heard on arterwards, and a requesting him to let the police know about it without delay, for the writer of this here precious note was kept a close prisoner upstairs, and that he had managed to write by dipping a stick in his own blood."

Joel at this point of the narrative removed the pipe from his mouth, and sat with his jaws fixed open, waiting for what was coming next.

"Well," said Moggs, "I don't say that there's anything very extraordinary so far, but what I look at is this—when we gets in here, we finds ouly a man and his wife and a dead body, but not no signs of the person wot had wrote that note. You know there wasn't."

"No—no, that's right."

"Well, then, I want to know who it was that wrote it."

"Mightn't it be the dead body."

"How could it be, you fool?"

"Why, I means before it was a dead body."

"Oh!"

"What do you think?"

Moggs very gravely shook his head several times.

"You don't think it?"

"I don't."

"Why not?"

"Because I've formed my own opinion."

"And what may that be?"

Moggs glanced around him with evident apprehension. Then sinking his voice to a very low key, he said,

"Why, Joel, it's my own private and particular opinion that the letter was wrote by the ghost of one of the persons wot have been murdered here."

Joel pushed his chair back several paces, as he gasped:

"No—no, Moggs, you don't mean that?"

"Indeed, but I do."

"Pooh—nonsense! I'll never believe it!"

"Nobody axed you to that I knows on. You needn't without you like."

"Then I won't."

"Perhaps, then, you will tell me how it was that the letter came to be wrote?"

Joel sat silent for some moments.

Then, very diffidently, he remarked:

"You seem to have forgotten all about those folks that ran away. How do you know but that it might be one of them?"

Moggs regarded his companion with the utmost contempt.

"Why, you ninny," he cried, "do you think they'd run away after writing like that? Why, we should be the very folks to take care of them, shouldn't we?"

"It's a mystery to me altogether."

The reader may perhaps be able to imagine with what intense eagerness Tom King listened to every word of this conversation.

Indeed, so absorbed was he by it, that he became unconscious of everything else.

He would have given much to have been able to ask one or two questions.

Most anxious was he to obtain some additional information about those who had ran away from the inn on the approach of the officers, but this information was not likely to be imparted, because one officer probably knew as much about the matter as the other.

Of course it was to the flight of Hunch and Maud that they were alluding.

A remark dropped by Joel, however, set Tom in a perfect fever of impatience.

"But don't they declare," he said, "that one of those who ran away was a woman?"

"Yes, they say so, but I don't know how true it is, for I was no more in the pursuit than you were. But they did not catch her, and, ten to one, would not have had the other but for the accident."

"You mean the hunchback?"

"Yes."

"What an odd-looking creature he is."

"Don't name it," said the other; "I can't get his horrible face out of my mind. Why they didn't leave him in the road, I don't know. Curse them for bringing such a thing under this roof, say I! There's horror enough already!"

Both shuddered, and again there was a pause.

Tom's excitement and anxiety now knew no bounds.

"If it was a woman," remarked Moggs, at length, "she must have been a regular out-and-outer. Why, she made no more account of a pistol bullet than nothing at all, and rode like the very devil himself."

"Yes," assented Joel; "and then I have heard of highwaymen slipping off their horses while going at full speed, and then hiding while the officers went by in pursuit of the riderless horse; but the idea of a woman. Oh, no, it's out of the question. It was no woman, I'll be bound."

"But they say it was."

"I know they do, but I don't believe it—no, not a bit; and now then, as all the gin is gone, let me ask you what is to be done for some more?"

"Go down in the cellar."

"It's very fine to say that; but who would relish the idea of doing that now? Why, it must be close upon midnight."

"Well, for my part," said Moggs, as he settled himself more comfortably in his chair, "I consider it would be nothing more nor less than flying in the face of providence to go down in the cellar where that well is at this time of night; and so I tell you, plump and plain, I don't intend to do anything of the sort!"

Joel grumbled and growled for some moments in an inarticulate voice.

Then he took up the bottle and carefully drained out of it the very last drop that it contained.

"A nice, pretty go," he muttered, "to sit here for six or eight hours and no more to drink than this!"

"Hold your row!" said Moggs.

"I shan't!"

"Then if you want some gin, why the devil don't you go down in the cellar and fetch it?"

"You come with me."

"I shan't!"

"What are you afraid of?"

"Never mind. In that cellar there's a well."

"D—n the well!"

"Oh, you can curse it if you like, but I wouldn't do such a thing, and I'm not very particular, as you know. There's nobody knows how many dead bodies are lying at the bottom of that well, and let me ask you whether the spirit belonging to any one of them could rest quiet in such a grave? In course not!"

"Shut up!"

"It don't stand to reason," continued Moggs, altogether ignoring his companion's injunction. "In course it don't stand to reason to think of any man coming here and going to bed, and then being murdered in his sleep and his body thrown down that well where——"

"Shut up!" yelled Joel, in such stentorian tones that the voice of his companion was completely drowned.

"Shut up, I say!"

"Who's afraid now?" sneered Moggs.

"Why you!"

"No I ain't, it's you!"

"Why——"

What more would have been said no one can possibly form the least idea, for it was just at this point that the two speakers were interrupted by a loud, heavy, and long-continued knocking.

CHAPTER MXXX.

CONTINUES TO RELATE TOM KING'S ADVENTURES WITH THE OFFICERS.

SIMULTANEOUSLY the two police officers sprang to their feet—

Simultaneously they made a rush—with what purpose is not clear—and both in one direction.

The consequence was that one came in contact with the other, and with so much violence that the breath was knocked out of both.

It was a wonder the table was not overturned.

Bang—bang—bang—bang! came the knocking again, and this time with so much violence that it echoed and re-echoed through the silent house like the clangour of ten thousand hammers.

The panic of the two officers increased.

Tom King was in no slight degree perturbed.

Once more his hands grasped his pistols.

This knocking, he thought, could not fail to presage danger to him.

It was mysterious and unexpected, or the officers would not be so disconcerted by it.

"Moggs," gasped Joel, at length, "who's that knocking?"

"How the devil do you think I should know, you fool? Let go, can't you! What do you want to claw me like a wild cat for?"

"I ain't!"

The officers separated.

"I'll tell you what it is," said Joel—"you're frightened—that's it!—so d—nably frightened that you don't know what you are about!"

"Bah! Go and see what the knocking is, and don't be a hass!"

"Go yourself!"

"I shan't!"

"Pick up the lantern, then, and come with me."

"Pick it up yourself!"

"Do you know who you're a speaking to, eh?"

"Yes; do you?"

"Yes, I——"

During this brief colloquy there had been a cessation of the furious knocking.

It almost seemed during the interim that the two officers would work themselves up to fighting point.

But then, with great suddenness, the knocking was renewed.

The sound appeared to cause all their valour to sink down into their shoes.

Their mutual recrimination ceased, and while the knocking lasted all they were capable of doing was to hold fast to the backs of the chairs on which they had been seated, and stand stock still with wide-open mouths.

"It's—it's," gasped Joel—"it's the ghostcses, Moggs! I feels sure of it—I knows it!"

"Gammon!" replied Moggs, though the incredulous word was uttered in anything but a decided tone.

"It—it must be!"

"No—no!" said Moggs, faintly.

"What is it, then?"

"Somebody at the door."

"Door?—what door?"

"Why, the front door."

"Who could be there at this time of night?"

"How should I know? Travellers, perhaps."

"And do you think travellers would knock like that? Just hark!"

The knocking was more furious than ever.

Moggs and Joel listened for some time in silence.

It is to be presumed that a little reflection came to their aid.

Certain, however, is it that after an interval it began to dawn upon their obtuse mental faculties that the knocking could only be caused by some one outside clamouring for admittance.

"You're a fool, Joel!" said Moggs, speaking in something like a reasonable voice.

"So are you!" retorted Joel.

"Come along!" cried Moggs, as he snatched up the light off the table—"come along, and let us see who is there. If we are not quick they will have the door down!"

Joel was not disposed to remain in the dark, so he followed closely in his companion's footsteps.

So rapidly did they make their way across the outer room that they never once glanced behind them, so Tom King remained in his place of concealment undetected.

But the question was, how long would he remain so?

Tom had come, as he believed, to a correct conclusion regarding the cause of the knocking.

He was quite under the impression that by some means or other a detachment of police officers had tracked him there.

If this was so, what was he to do?

He glanced rapidly around him, but he could see no outlet for escape.

That his present hiding-place would not be tenable much longer was certain.

Even if the knocking had a different origin to what he was persuaded it had, no one could possibly enter the outer room from the passage without seeing him.

Tom gave up all hope of making an escape—at least, just for the present.

He looked about for a fresh place of concealment.

This was no easy matter, for the room would have appeared to be quite dark to anyone who had not been in it so long as Tom had.

A dim kind of twilight came from a small unshuttered window, through which the dull night sky could be discerned.

Tom could only see one place that offered him the slightest chance of security, and that was behind a kind of screen or seat, furnished with a high wooden back, of a kind frequently to be seen at country inns to this day.

This was a very slight kind of hiding-place indeed—one that would not hold out against a moment's search.

But, then, it was what would suit Tom very well.

He had resolved that the moment he found his hiding-place was so much as guessed at he would sally forth and do battle with his foes as best he might.

Having come to this determination, then, he carefully made his way towards the screen, which happened to be only a few paces from him.

Less than a moment served to enable him to get behind it.

When standing up, he was able to see well over the back, and so command a view all around him.

This was the position which he first of all took up.

At the first approach of his foes he would be able to sink down silently; and so, with his head inclined forward, he stretched his hearing to the uttermost, in order to make out as much as possible of what was going on.

All these movements of Tom's were made very rapidly indeed, though the reverse might be suspected from the length of time which it has taken us to describe them.

Indeed, when he assumed the listening attitude just mentioned, the officers had done no more than reach the front door.

There was no longer any room for doubt about the cause and origin of the knocking.

Some one was outside most impatient for admission.

"Who's there?" bawled Moggs, speaking very loud, in order to conceal, if possible, the trepidation he was in.

"Let us in!" roared a voice, in authoritative tones. "Where the devil have you been all this time? A nice lot you must be to keep guard in a house, and not hear such a knocking as this!"

"Oh, stockings!" cried Moggs.

From this remarkable ejaculation, and from the fact that Moggs and Joel suddenly became as silent as the grave, Tom inferred that the voice which had just spoken was well known to them.

"Open the door, you dolts!" said the authoritative voice again—"open the door, I say! What the devil do you mean by keeping us here like this?"

"Is that you, Mr. Clarke?" said Moggs, but very humbly indeed.

"Yes, it is—of course you know it is! Open the door at once, and be d—d to you!"

The sound caused by the removal of bolts and bars now came quite clearly to Tom's ears.

Finally, a chain was flung down with considerable violence, and the door was opened.

Tom endeavoured to make out by the sounds how many people entered, but there was such a sudden rush of footsteps that he found this to be impossible.

"As we are here at last," said Mr. Clarke, "perhaps you will give us some account of your conduct!"

"Conduct?" asked Moggs and Joel both together.

"Yes. Didn't you hear me knock?"

"Yes," was the dogged answer.

"Then, why did you take no notice of it?"

"We did not know who it was," Moggs managed to stammer forth.

"Oh, didn't you? Well, it seems to me that the noise threw you into a devil of a fright. Why, you are as white as ghosts now! Yes, you must have been frightened to death, and afraid to move!"

There was a general laugh.

The approach of footsteps now warned Tom that it was time for him to sink down into his concealment.

He did so only just in time, for it was at this precise moment that the whole party entered the apartment.

Tom had the audacity to come quite to the end of the screen and peep round it.

He did so very carefully.

At the first glance he perceived that the number of the police officers had been increased to five.

There were Moggs and Joel, the one who had been called Mr. Clarke, and two others, who brought up the rear.

Without troubling themselves much to look about them, they passed through the doorway into the adjoining room.

"I'll be d—d," said Mr. Clarke, whose voice was so peculiar that Tom could easily recognise it—"I'll be d—d if this don't look like being comfortable! You won't care about being disturbed, I'll warrant."

"Sha'n't we!" said Moggs. "I only wish as how I was never going to see the blessed place again!"

"Why, what's the matter?"

"There's nothing to drink," was the reply—"at least, nothing without going down into the cellar to fetch it."

"And is that too much trouble?"

"Trouble? It ain't a question of trouble. I should like to see the man that could do it."

"Why, not go down?"

"Not at night."

"Why not?"

"Because of the well."

"What well?"

"The one with the dead bodies in it."

"Bah!"

Moggs was silent.

"You are frightened," said Clarke—"yes, that's it. You have sat here talking to one another until you have both got horribly afraid. Don't deny it; I can see it in your looks. I know as well as if I saw you that our knocking almost frightened you out of what little wits you have got. Perhaps you thought a whole troop of ghosts were coming down upon you at once. Ha, ha!"

The two officers who had arrived in company with Mr. Clarke laughed heartily.

But neither Moggs nor Joel could see the fun.

"You did not expect to be disturbed, I'll warrant," said Clarke, after a pause, during which he had been amusing himself by stirring the fire vigorously; "but you will have to change your quarters, let me tell you."

It was at this moment that Tom King, having the audacity to quit his place of concealment, reached the door and took another peep through the chink.

He saw Moggs and Joel looking considerably surprised upon hearing this last announcement made by their chief, Mr. Clarke, who continued speaking:

"Knight and Cunningham will take your places here," he said, "and you will return with me to London."

"Very glad to hear it," muttered Moggs, while Joel gave a sigh expressive of the relief which he experienced.

"Don't believe you," said Clarke. "It's a d—d sight colder outside than it is here, let me tell you; and what is more, it's beginning to rain."

"I don't care," said Moggs, resolutely.

"Nor I," answered Joel, with equal determination.

"You are a couple of chicken hearts," said Clarke—"that's what you are. I can see you are frightened almost to death now."

"We have been frightened," said Moggs, "and I don't go for to deny it."

"But upon what grounds?"

"Never mind; let those who are left here find out for themselves. I don't care how soon I am out in the cold and the wet."

"Well, you will be in a moment or so," said Clarke, who looked curious and somewhat uneasy. "I want to start at once."

"The sooner the better."

"You are wanted to give your evidence before the magistrate in the morning," Clarke continued. "The prisoners now are under remand, and as you were here at the time of capture, you are wanted, though what for exactly is more than I know. If I had thought there was the least likelihood of your being wanted I should not have left you here."

"And what am I wanted for?" asked Joel.

"I don't know," was the reply. "My instructions were to bring you both to London, and to leave two police officers here in your stead."

"I wish them joy of the job, then!" said Moggs, rubbing his hands slowly. "There's nothing to drink on the table, but there's plenty down in the cellar to be had for the fetching. Ha, ha!"

In the laugh Joel joined, though somewhat feebly.

"None of your larks, now," said Clarke. "I have told Knight and Cunningham all the particulars—every one. They are used to jobs of this sort, and have courage enough to face a thousand ghosts—haven't you?"

Both declared, with a great deal of bluster, that their courage had not been overrated.

"I'll warrant they won't be frightened to death and unable to move if they happen to hear a tap at the front door, but will come at once to see what is the matter."

To this neither Moggs nor Joel seemed able to make an effective reply, for they remained silent and looked very sheepish.

"But come," continued Clarke, "we must be moving—there is no time to lose. I am not surprised at your getting a little nervous remaining here so long by yourselves. Come along—let us be off at once!"

Moggs and Joel were both quite ready and willing to depart.

Upon hearing this, and perceiving that the words were followed by an immediate stir, Tom King once more returned to his hiding-place.

So light and so rapid were his movements that he succeeded in reaching it unseen.

Clark in the meanwhile busied himself by issuing his instructions to the two men about to be left in charge, though the low tone in which he spoke prevented Tom King from catching the import of his words.

The next moment the threshold was crossed.

"I suppose there will be no fear about our being able to prove the charge against them?" Tom heard Moggs say as he followed Clarke into the outer room.

"Against whom?"

"Why, the people who kept the house, to be sure."

"I should think not."

"I asked," continued Moggs, "because it almost seemed as though there was some proof wanting, and that we were sent for to supply it."

"Well, it may be so—I cannot take upon myself to say. But be careful—remember the conviction must follow."

"I know. But, Mr. Clarke."

"What now?"

"How about the girl?"

"What girl."

"The one you pursued."

"Along with the hunchback?"

"Yes."

"I should have called her a woman—she is more like one than a girl."

"Well, perhaps you are right. You have not heard anything of her since, I suppose?"

"Nothing."

"Well, as I said a little while ago, she's a regular out-and-outer. I have heard of highwaymen slipping off their horses while going at full gallop and then hiding in in the hedge, but for a female to do it—there, I can hardly believe it!"

"It is true, nevertheless," said Clarke, in a tone which testified to the existence of no slight annoyance concerning the matter. "We caught the horse."

"Did you get any clue from that as to the rider?"

"None; but I have had a close watch set all around the place where she must have disappeared and, if my men only do their duty, she cannot fail to be discovered ere long."

"And have you no suspicion as to who she is?" asked Moggs, whose curiosity and interest were evidently powerfully aroused.

"Well, I—a——," said Clarke, hesitatingly.

"Then you have a suspicion?" cried Moggs, eagerly.

"I don't mind saying that I have."

"Who is she, then?"

"Why, it is my belief—founded on a good many circumstances—that she is no other than——"

"Who—who?"

"Why, the girl Maud, for whose apprehension so large a reward is offered."

"Do you mean Dick Turpin's wife?"

"I do. I cannot think of any other woman who would act with so much resolution; and, if you will remember, we have had more than one specimen of what she can do."

"But what should bring her to this place, and separated from all her companions?"

"That's just what I should like to know. But come, we have stayed here long enough. We can chat the matter over further as we ride to London."

With these words the trio, who had paused during this brief conversation, left the room.

Can the reader imagine with what breathlessness Tom King listened to every word which had passed between them?

So strongly was he moved, that he was more than half inclined to follow them at all risks in the hope of hearing something more.

For a moment he hesitated and was undecided.

During that moment the opportunity was lost.

A sudden bang came upon his ears, proclaiming that the front door had been shut.

The officers had taken their departure.

After this, for a little while, Tom remained perfectly still.

He was thinking deeply.

The next sound he noticed was that produced by the concussion of horses' hoofs upon the road, and which showed that Clarke and his two subordinates had fairly started for London.

Tom had now only two officers to deal with.

But what he had heard was provocative of much reflection.

In his own mind he felt an inward presentiment, which amounted almost to a conviction, that Clarke's suspicions were perfectly well grounded and correct.

What had become of Maud was the question.

Clearly she was not a prisoner in the hands of the police.

Neither was she anywhere about the inn.

These two circumstances being taken for granted, it became clear that Tom was not likely to do much good by remaining in his present dangerous position.

Having obtained this clue, what he had to do was to follow it up with the least possible loss of time.

Yet as the reader may suppose, Tom was in a good deal of doubt and confusion.

Maud's flight from the inn seemed mysterious, for who could be the person with whom she was in company?

"Clearly not Jack the Ostler," he said to himself, "for he was dead."

He could scarcely understand her making a new friend so very soon after she had lost her other one.

Yet the more he thought the more did his belief strengthen that it was indeed Maud and no one else of whom the officers had been speaking.

Many things pointed to this conclusion.

First he had indisputable evidence of the fact that she had recently been very near to the inn.

There was the bracelet he had found in support of this.

Then from what Tom knew of Maud's character, he felt certain that the presence of danger would suffice to stimulate her to the doing of deeds from which at other times she would have shrunk in the utmost terror.

When the police officers arrived at the inn, he could well imagine what desperate steps she would take in order to effect her escape, especially at a time like the present, when she would be impressed with the belief that she had not only her own safety to look after, but that the lives of the rest rested entirely upon her ability to warn them of their danger.

Having reached this point in his reflections, Tom King determined to leave the inn without delay.

It was certain that Maud, not long ago, had been in the vicinity, and therefore he indulged in the hope that by making the utmost exertions he should be able to discover her.

But when he had arrived at this decision, he quickly became sensible that he should have some little difficulty in carrying it out.

The two officers who now occupied the adjoining room were of a very different type to those who had just left.

Tom had had ample opportunity to look closely into their countenances.

He was a little bit of a physiognomist, and the result of his examination was, that he felt they would by no means be easily deceived.

There was also a special and particular watchfulness about them, and he felt assured that if any slight noise of a suspicious character did strike upon their ears, they would not allow themselves any rest until they had used their best efforts to discover the origin of it.

Of course this alertness was no doubt mainly owing to the fact that they had only just entered upon their new duties, and there was a probability that after a time much of their vigilance would wear off.

But then Tom King could not afford to wait for this.

It was necessary that he should depart at once.

It therefore became a most anxious consideration for him as to whether he should be able to quit his place of concealment, cross the room, pass out at the door, and finally leave the premises without the watchers being aware of it.

Such a feat seemed like an impossibility.

But Tom King had great faith in his own powers, and therefore made no scruple of attempting to carry out his design.

Just, however, as he was about to quit his place of concealment, some words uttered by the police officers caused him to pause.

CHAPTER MXXXI.

EVENTS AT THE INN CONTINUE TO INCREASE IN INTEREST.

"I say, Knight."

"What now?"

"I have just been thinking that we ought not to have been so ready in sitting down like this."

"So have I."

"Confound it! I wish we had only thought of it a few minutes ago—now it's too late."

"What's too late?"

"Why, what we ought to have done upon entering upon this duty was to have gone all over the premises in every part, leaving no place unexamined, taking Clarke and those other two fools with us, so that we should have known what condition the place was in when we took to it."

"We most certainly ought," assented Knight. "As you say, truly, it is now too late, for they are all three a goodish way off by this time."

"I can't think how I could have been so incautious—so forgetful," said Knight, in a voice which showed the extent of his vexation.

"I can account for it, I think," said his comrade.

"How so?"

"Why, having to wait so long at the door was enough to drive thoughts out of anybody's head, and standing in the rain, too, all the while, after such a long ride; then, when we got in here, this fire looked so comfortable that I could think of nothing but enjoying it."

"That was it, no doubt; still, we deserve to suffer for our stupidity."

"I don't think it quite so serious."

"I do, though."

"Suppose now, as our clothes have got tolerably dry by this time, that we set out without any more regrets and delays, and examine the place ourselves?"

"What, alone?"

"Yes, there is no one to go with us, and I think we had better do it thus than leave it undone altogether."

"Yes, so do I."

"Come on, then, at once—there is nothing like time present."

"Right. But what cowardly fellows they must have been to be afraid of going down in the cellar for a drop of something good! Do you think we shall be so squeamish, eh, old boy?"

"Not exactly."

"I think not. Now come on!"

"Nay, I have a fresh thought."

"What is it?"

"Sit down a moment, and I will tell you. A few minutes one way or the other cannot make much difference, now, and the result may be important."

"What do you mean? Why don't you come to the point at once?"

"I will, never fear. First there are two dead bodies in the house, are there not?"

"Clarke said so."

"One a traveller, and the other a hunchback lad that nobody knows anything about."

"Yes."

"Well, we must have a look at them first; and now listen: These people have been carrying on their game for some time, have they not?"

"No doubt of it."

"Then their spoil must be immense."

"Not so much; I don't think Clarke found so very much value upon the premises considering."

"Nor do I, and that's what I have been thinking about. I feel pretty sure that there must be a great deal of swag hidden somewhere in this place."

"What makes you think so?"

"Why, the fact of Clarke having been able to find so little."

"And a good reason too."

"Then my proposition is, that we look most carefully around, and what we find belongs to ourselves—no one will know anything about that."

"Certainly not."

"I have a presentiment that this will turn out a capital night's work for us; and what is more, the occupation will serve to make the time pass quicker."

"It will, and we have searched houses before to-day."

"Rather."

"And you understand share and share alike is the understanding?"

"Of course!"

"Then that being settled, we will set about the business at once."

The sound which now reached Tom King's ears convinced him that the officers were about to sally forth upon their questionable errand.

Our friends' position was now most ticklish.

Very little penetration or attention would have quickly convinced anyone that these two men were sharp and astute, and not by any means to be thought of at the same time as Moggs and Joel.

What Tom was anxious to know was whether they would commence their search in that outer room.

Nothing was more likely, and if so, nothing could prevent his discovery.

That he should be a match for these two men our old friend did not doubt, but yet he might sustain such an injury as would disable him.

He was therefore desirous of avoiding a contest, if such a thing was possible.

Another moment would decide the matter.

Like prudent men, the two police officers had carefully examined their weapons, so as to be in readiness in case of any emergency.

This done, they took up the lantern which the others had left behind, and sallied forth.

When about half-way across the outer room they paused.

Knight lifted the lantern above his head and glanced around him.

"There seems nothing here," he said, after a short pause.

"Nothing, but we will look more closely upon our return. It is no good beginning to do a thing in the middle."

"None at all."

"Come on, then."

"But we have not settled about where we shall commence the search."

"What do you say?"

"Oh, I don't mind! It will come to much the same thing, I suppose, whether we begin at the top of the house and work our way down, or whether we begin in the cellar."

"No, no—the former is the best."

"As you like."

"We will go at once to the top of the house, and work our way gradually down. We shall pass over nothing, and we shall clear the way before us."

"Very good."

"You think that will be best?"

"I do."

"Then follow me—we will look for the stairs at once."

With these words, the two police officers quitted the room.

While they remained in it, Tom King had not ventured to draw his breath.

He had been crouched in the smallest possible compass behind the screen.

Now that his foes were gone, however, he noiselessly rose to his feet.

The sound of footsteps, the glimmer of the light, and the murmur of voices all grew fainter and fainter each second.

Still Tom listened.

At last the peculiar sound caused by the heavy riding-boots of the officers creaking upon the stairs reached Tom's ears.

Then he ventured to step out from his hiding-place.

The way of escape lay plain before him.

While the officers were at the top of the house, what would be easier than for Tom to slip out by the same means that he had employed to enter?

Fortune had favoured him indeed.

When the search was first talked about, the little window by which he had entered occurred to his mind, and, though he had taken the precaution to close it, yet the suspicions of the officers could not fail to be aroused by it.

Yet this danger was avoided.

With perfectly noiseless steps Tom crossed the room.

His intention was to make his way to the little window without a moment's delay.

But all at once he stopped.

A fresh thought had occurred to him, and he remained for about a moment in an attitude of deep reflection.

Then he seemed to come suddenly to a decision.

"I will do it!" he muttered to himself, with an air of great resolution. "It would be foolish to miss such a chance! I should ever repent if I missed it, and am glad I thought of it in time."

What Tom intended to do will quickly be seen.

He took one pistol in his hand, and held it in readiness for instant use.

Then he crept stealthily towards the staircase.

He had but little difficulty in making out where it was, for as yet Knight and Cunningham had not ascended so high as to prevent all beams from their light finding their way down below.

Cautiously, then, Tom began to ascend.

The reason for this sudden change in his proceedings was the intense anxiety and curiosity he experienced to have a peep at the body of the person who had accompanied Maud in her flight.

It cannot be wondered at that he should be anxious on this head.

He had overheard that he was a hunchback, that he had met with an accident, and that he had been brought back to the inn.

Now Tom not unreasonably thought that he should gain something if he could only take one peep at this hunchback's face.

Most people doubtless would have thought the risk by far too great.

Tom, however, considered the matter in quite a different light.

He believed that a special opportunity was afforded him, and that he should be much to blame if he neglected it.

Accordingly, he rapidly ascended the stairs.

The speed he made use of actually prevented any noise being made by his ascent, but yet when near the top he paused and listened somewhat anxiously.

Looking through the old oaken banisters, he could perceive a long kind of passage or corridor.

At the extremity of this could be perceived the gleam of light.

"I tell you there is no other way up!" he heard one say.

"Come on, then! I thought there was."

The officers now both approached Tom, who crouched down, scarcely comprehending what they were about.

Nearer and nearer they came, until they reached a kind of ladder which apparently formed a rude means of communication with an upper chamber.

This the officers ascended.

They were absent only for a moment, and then returned.

From their remarks, Tom understood that the ladder did not communicate with any upper room, but with the roof.

The officers did not trouble themselves about the staircase upon which Tom was hidden, for they did not so much as cast a glance towards it, so sure were they that no one could be there.

The first room they entered was the one nearest to the head of the staircase.

A moment only was required to enable them to examine this, and they came out, leaving the door ajar.

The next door was the one communicating with the room in which Maud had endured so much horror.

No sooner did they cross this threshold than Tom King, with the same noiseless step, bounded up the remaining stairs.

When at the top, one stride took him to the mat that lay just outside the door through which the police officers had passed, and which they had left half open.

Standing here, Tom was able to command a tolerably good view of the interior of the room, though he took care to keep in such a position as would prevent the officers from seeing him.

In this, however, he was almost unnecessarily cautious.

So intent and so absorbed were the police officers by what they beheld, that had Tom stood beside them they would scarcely at first have noticed his presence.

And no wonder at all was it that their faculties should be thus enwrapped.

Lying side by side upon the bed were two dead bodies.

At all times is death an unpleasant and uncomfortable spectacle, but on this occasion there was everything to aggravate its horror.

The first body was that of the traveller, whose corpse, as the reader will remember, Hunch had removed from the large chest and placed upon the bed.

The light from the officer's lantern fell full upon the face which Tom could tell belonged to one who might justly lay claim to the title of gentleman.

Upon his distorted features, however, there was an expression which seemed to convey the idea that at the moment of his dissolution he was conscious of the horrible and appalling fact that he was being secretly murdered, and that nothing more would be heard of him upon earth.

One glance, however, was all that Tom bestowed upon this unknown personage.

Lying by the side of him was Hunch.

The poor fellow presented a truly revolting sight.

His apparel had become soaked in blood, which had escaped from a wound in the breast, given him just as the inn was left.

Then his face was horribly battered, scratched, and disfigured, in consequence of the distance he had been dragged at the heels of his awe-struck horse.

His features were scarcely distinguishable.

Altogether, he was in a terrible plight, for the officers had carried him to the inn and placed him upon the bed in the same condition as they had found him.

"A nice piece of work!" said Cunningham, who was the first to speak. "It is not very comfortable to think you have got to keep guard over such things."

"Bah!" said the other. "Don't think of it except in the way of business; I never do, and I find it to be by far the best and wisest plan."

"If you can do so," replied the other, with a shudder. "Come on, I have had enough of this."

There was an immediate movement, and Tom at once beat a retreat

[TOM KING PURSUES THE FLYING FIGURE.]

His first thought had been to seek again the shelter of the staircase, but he feared that he should not be able to descend unseen.

A second thought told him that it would be much better for him to have the officers in front of him than at his back.

Accordingly, he just stepped to the door of the room the officers had lately visited, and which he reached with one stride.

To enter took him but an infinitesimal portion of time; and when once fairly in the chamber, he felt that he was about as safe as he well could be while beneath that roof.

The officers, having once satisfied themselves that there was no one there, would scarcely enter it again.

So thought Tom.

There was but one more bedchamber, and in that they remained so long that Tom was almost tempted to go and see what they were about.

His sense of hearing, however, enabled him to come to the conclusion that they were engaged in making a minute examination of the various articles it contained.

"I understand," said Tom, to himself, with a satisfied nod. "That must be the room generally occupied by the two wretches who kept this place. They are looking for booty."

This was no doubt the absolute fact of the case.

At length the officers came out again into the passage.

Tom just caught sight of their faces as they were about to descend the stairs.

It was easy to see that they had been baulked in their expectation of finding money.

"Depend upon it," said Knight, "they have chosen a good place to keep their ill-gotten wealth."

"But where is it?—that's the question."

"We must find out."

"I fancy that will give us some trouble."

"No doubt. But what does it matter—we have nothing else to do?"

"True; only it would be d—d annoying to work for nothing!"

By this time they had reached the bottom of the staircase.

Tom came from his hiding-place and looked down.

The officers were busy looking for the means of gaining admittance to the cellar—their impatience and the fact that they had made no discovery hitherto causing them to abandon their expressed intention of searching the house methodically.

The ground floor then was, by mutual consent, left unexamined for the present.

A door was found opening from under the staircase which apparently led down into the cellar.

"This is the way," said Knight. "Come on!"

He commenced the descent as he spoke.

His comrade followed without loss of time.

All now was dark.

As noiselessly as before, Tom King descended the stairs.

Once more was the way of escape open before him.

All he had to do was to make his way back to the little window by which he had entered, and so depart.

But again he hesitated to avail himself of this opportunity, though what he did seemed neither more nor less than daring danger to the uttermost.

An insatiable and uncontrollable curiosity, not only to see the cellar where the innkeeper and his wife had disposed of the evidences of their atrocities, but also to know what success the officers met with in their search for wealth, made him resolve still further to follow in their steps.

There can be no doubt this boldness was engendered by the success he had previously met with.

But other ideas were floating in Tom's mind—ideas which he hoped he should so elaborate as to cause them to turn out to his advantage.

What these ideas were will be quickly seen.

It did not take him more than a moment to decide upon his course.

By the time the two police officers had reached the bottom of the steps he was ready to follow them.

He did so, and discovered that now there was little fear that his footsteps would be overheard.

For some reason or other, the steps leading down into the cellar had been thickly covered with sawdust—

So thickly that, as Tom King descended, his feet sank deeply into it, so that he was absolutely able to make his way down with the noiselessness of a spectre.

CHAPTER MXXXII.

TOM KING TURNS HIS ADVENTURE TO GOOD ADVANTAGE, AND SUCCEEDS IN FRIGHTENING THE TWO OFFICERS.

When Tom reached the bottom of the steps, he found the officers before him in a cellar of considerable extent.

There were few barrels and bottles to be seen, however.

In the centre of the sawdust-covered floor was a large, dark object, the nature of which he could not at the first glance make out.

This, however, he soon after found was the well of which he had heard such a horrible account.

It was bricked round to a height of between three and four feet.

This was the most notable object the cellar contained.

The officers at once advanced to it.

Tom, concealed behind the brickwork, watched them eagerly.

The one with the light held it so that most of its beams were thrown down the terrible abyss.

"How deep!" said one.

"Hark! I can hear the water! It seems to be rushing at a fearful rate."

The other loosened a brick at the side of the well, and threw it down.

There was a succession of sharp blows, each one following its predecessor more swiftly, and then finally a heavy splash.

"Depend upon it," said Knight, as soon as the sound had died away, "that no one ever thrown down that well would be found again."

"It seems like it. The depth must be immense."

"Truly so. But we shall not find here what we seek, so let us set to work."

Hearing this, Tom King drew back.

The cellar was searched thoroughly, but with no result.

Tom King, however, was much interested in noticing the business-like manner in which they set about their work.

It was clear they had had plenty of experience.

"There's nothing here," said Knight; "but still, don't despair—there is the other cellar to search yet. Perhaps there we shall be rewarded."

"I fancy that is the likeliest place."

"So do I."

Tom King up to the present moment had not noticed that there was another cellar beyond the one in which the two officers stood, and which communicated with it by means of a low, arched doorway.

The officers passed through this in a moment, and the effect was that Tom King found himself again in darkness.

Determined not to miss seeing what they were about, he quickly crossed the floor of the cellar—which, like the steps, was covered with sawdust—and cautiously peeped in.

He saw before him a number of miscellaneous articles, chiefly, however, consisting of bottles and casks.

The latter the officers examined very particularly, as though they expected to find what they sought concealed in one of them.

If such was the case, their expectation was quickly realised, for Knight suddenly gave utterance to a loud cry, which was unmistakably one of triumph.

"Here we are," he said—"here we are! Hurrah!"

"Quietly—quietly," said his less-impressionable companion. "Don't make too sure."

"Let's settle it at once."

Knight held in his grasp a small cask, or rather keg—one of the kind used for small quantities of brandy.

This apparently was of great weight, and the contents were loose and rattled, so that there were reasonable grounds for conjecturing that this contained what they wanted.

But Knight, as he spoke, took speedy and effectual means of removing all doubts whatever.

Depositing the keg upon the ground, he glanced around him, as though in search of something.

His eye immediately fell upon a wooden mallet and a chisel.

Seizing upon these, he, by their aid, quickly broke open the cask.

The head fell out, and immediately there rolled upon the ground a quantity of glittering objects of all descriptions.

Tom distinguished watches, rings, brooches, guineas, silver coins, and, in fact, almost every article of personal adornment that was of value.

The contents of the keg could not be estimated as being worth less than several hundred pounds, so the officers might consider themselves as being well paid for the trouble they had taken, as of course they intended to keep this little find all to themselves.

"Cunningham, my boy," cried Knight, in a voice of great exultation, "this is something like, is it not?"

"Rather; but no more than I expected."

"Ha, ha! it's capital! Now you see what a thing it is to have a little courage! Why, lor' bless you, nine officers out of every ten would be frightened to death to come down into such a place as this."

"I can easily believe that, for I don't half like it myself."

"Bah!—nonsense!"

"But I tell you I don't! I fancy that well scents the whole place. To me it seems as though I kept on drinking blood instead of merely breathing the air."

"Hold your row, you fool! What do you want to talk like that for? If you go on so, you will end by being as frightened as the rest."

"I—I can't help it! I shudder now, and my back feels as though some one was pouring cold water down it."

"Ha—ha! Well, this is rich! But I'll tell you what, mate, is the best thing you can do."

"What—what?"

"Why, turn the whole of your attention to this nice little heap of treasure here. Just look at it—feast your eyes upon it, and you will soon get the better of all those ridiculous fancies."

"I—I can't do it!"

"Nonsense! Here, have something to drink."

"I could not touch it!"

"Yes, but, d—n it all, you are not going on like this, I hope! Come, bundle the things together again, and we will carry them upstairs."

"But—but——"

"What now?"

"Why, can't you see?"

"See what?"

"That they are all covered with—with blood! Yes, look, there is blood upon every one!"

"I'll be d—d if I should have thought this of you, old fellow; you are quite beside yourself."

The officer's teeth chattered together like castanets, and his eyes rolled in the most fearful manner around the vault, as though he expected every moment to encounter some horrible spectacle.

The alteration in his demeanour seemed at first to be surprising; but then, when the nature of the place is duly considered, it is not so much to be wondered at.

It is a well-known fact, however, that there is nothing more infectious than fear.

Now, Knight was about as free from all kinds of superstitious, or rather supernatural, impressions as any man well could be, yet this change in his comrade's demeanour produced a marked effect upon him.

Cunningham seemed every moment to grow more and more overcome.

Staggering slowly back, he paused at length with his back against the wall, his eyes rolling, his teeth chattering, and drawing his breath in short and fitful gasps.

Tom King watched all this with feelings of the greatest satisfaction.

It was just what he had been wishing for.

He now believed that he saw before him the means of accomplishing the purpose which had been hovering in his brain.

After a moment's reflection, he seemed to decide upon his course.

With hasty steps, he made his way to the staircase and ascended.

With the same rapidity, he entered the room where he had concealed himself, and where he recollected there was something which would be necessary to the carrying out of his intention.

This was nothing else than a large white table-cloth.

It was really astonishing to observe with what quickness Tom moved the different articles that stood upon the table, and then removed the cloth.

Rolling it up into a small compass, he again descended to the cellar.

Pausing at the bottom of the steps, he ascertained that the two officers were still standing where he had left them, the one endeavouring to inspire the other with courage, while he was conscious that his own firmness was fast giving way.

Silently, Tom glided to the well and took up his position in such a way that the brickwork around it was between himself and the entrance to the inner cellar, thus serving him with a slight and temporary hiding-place.

His first act was to spread out the table-cloth, and so on thoroughly to envelop himself in it.

The cloth was not long enough to cover the whole of the lower part of his person, but he considered that it would answer his purpose admirably.

One corner of the cloth he arranged to fall over his head and face, after the manner of a monk's cowl.

These preparations were made in much less time than it has taken us to describe them, and by the time they were completed there was a stir made by the officers.

Tom crouched down as low as ever he possibly could.

The brickwork of the well was quite sufficient to conceal him from the gaze of the two police officers when they emerged.

The reader will perceive that Tom's intention was to give them a terrible fright.

To what extent he succeeded will be quickly seen.

"D—n it all!" cried Knight, "don't stop here! Come on! Help me to carry the swag, and you may go on how you like upstairs."

"I—I cannot touch it!"

"If you don't help me you shall not have a shilling of it!"

"The curse of blood is on all!"

"The curse of a fiddlestick! Here—take the light! Are you afraid to carry that?"

There was no reply; but Tom concluded that the lantern was put into Cunningham's hands, for Knight said:

"There, there—hold it steady! Don't shake it about like that! D—d if I don't believe you will drop it, after all; if you do, we shall be in the dark, recollect!"

"No—no!" gasped Cunningham.

"But I say we shall!"

"I mean I shall not drop the lantern."

"All right then. Come on! That's the way. Pluck up your courage. What is there to be afraid of, I should like to know?"

Knight pronounced these words in a very defiant way, but yet it did not seem as though he was quite assured that there was nothing to be terrified about.

Stooping down, he picked up the keg of treasure, and, with heavy steps, advanced towards the doorway.

"You must go first," he said to his companion, "in order to show the way."

"D—d if I do, then!"

"How can I see?"

"I don't care. Put the treasure down."

"Don't you think you see me doing it, eh?"

"I do not want it."

"I do, though."

"Then carry it."

Thus disputing, the two officers passed from one cellar to the other.

Cunningham already was so frightened that he could scarcely move—indeed, it was only his strong desire to quit his present uncomfortable quarters that enabled him to make use of his legs at all.

Knight was just in that condition of mind which enabled him to preserve an outward semblance of boldness, but which would change into panic-stricken fear at the slightest unusual occurrence.

Just as the pair passed through the doorway, Tom King placed his lips close to the brickwork of the well, and uttered a low, deep groan.

The sound was most peculiar.

Tom himself was half startled by it.

The whole of the cellar seemed to ring with it, and to decide upon its source was assuredly a matter of impossibility.

It was echoed by a dismal yell from Cunningham, who gave so great a bound that it is ten thousand wonders the lantern did not fall

Knight stood motionless.

Silently, and without the least sound, Tom King rose to his feet.

It so happened that the eyes of both officers were turned towards the inner cellar, as though they were under the impression that the sound had come from thence.

Tom extended one hand in a warning, denunciatory manner.

Just then Knight and Cunningham caught sight of him, and both at the same moment.

The view of this ghastly-looking apparition standing as though it had just ascended from the well, made what little courage and fortitude they possessed abandon them.

They were at first struck dumb and motionless.

It would have been an ineffable relief to both could they but have given utterance to the yell of fear that was ready to burst from their lips, or if they could have fled from the spot.

But speech and motion were alike denied them, so they remained silent, rooted to the spot.

So hideous was the scene that Tom had much difficulty in repressing a smile.

But he saw how slight a thing would now suffice to put a finishing stroke to their alarm, and cause them to flee as though ten thousand demons were at their heels.

"Impious villains!" he said, in low and sepulchral tones. "Your doom——"

He had time to say no more.

The awful words, and the still more awful voice in which they were pronounced, dissolved the spell that had weighed upon the officers.

Simultaneously, awful yells came from their lips.

Then there was a crash and total darkness.

Knight had dropped the cask—

Cunningham the lantern.

The former fell to the ground with so much force that it burst, and the valuable contents were strewed in all directions.

But Knight was quite heedless of them now.

The lantern had slipped from Cunningham's trembling fingers, and after rolling over once upon the sawdust was extinguished.

Then there was an awful rush.

The officers were anxious to a degree to quit this horrible place, but that very anxiety defeated their intention.

So blinded were they by their terror, and so confounded by the darkness, that though the steps were within a few feet of them, they groped about vainly and fruitlessly.

Tom groaned again.

Their terror was redoubled, and the scuffling incredibly increased.

At last, however, the foot of the steps was reached, and up they went with greater speed than ever they had made use of before.

Tom was delighted to think his stratagem had been so successful.

So soon, however, as he was certain that the officers were fairly on their way to the upper regions of the house, Tom proceeded to put the remainder and by far the more important portion of his plan into execution.

This related to the valuables which the officers had been terrified into leaving behind them.

Hastily throwing off the table-cloth which had served him so well, Tom folded it and proceeded to put it to still further use.

The darkness was profound, but yet he was able to find his way without difficulty to the spot where the precious contents of the cask lay scattered upon the floor.

With great speed he gathered them together and placed them in the middle of the cloth.

No doubt, in his haste, many escaped him—indeed, Tom intended that some should remain in order that when a little calmness took possession of the officers, which would probably be towards daylight, they would be able to perceive that they had been tricked out of their spoil.

The anticipation of their state of aggravation gave Tom much delight.

By far the greater part of the valuables was placed in the cloth; and then hastily forming the whole into a large bundle, Tom threw it over his shoulder and hastened up the steps.

Upon gaining the top he stopped, in order that he might, if possible, form some conception of the whereabouts of his terrified foes.

But all was profoundly still.

So still that Tom began to think that they had actually quitted the premises.

Whether they had done so or not, however, or whether they had concealed themselves in some inner room, Tom took no steps to discover.

He felt that the best thing he could do now was to get from beneath that roof with all convenient speed, as at any moment the courage of the officers might return to them, and then an awkward encounter might ensue, as they would be in a state of absolute frenzy.

Accordingly, when he had satisfied himself that the coast was clear, our friend made his way as well as he could to the little window by which he had entered.

He succeeded in finding it without much difficulty, and gained the open air without hearing or seeing aught of his foes.

Altogether Tom had ample grounds upon which to congratulate himself respecting the whole affair, but most especially upon the conclusion of it.

The bundle upon his shoulder was both large and heavy, and he felt that it would not be over convenient for him to carry it with him to any distance.

He made his way with it to the spot where he had left his horse.

The animal he found safe enough, and very contentedly cropping the sweet grass that grew about its feet.

It was not until after some moments' consideration that Tom mounted, and then it was with the resolution to find as speedily as possible some retired nook where he could bury his booty.

CHAPTER MXXXIII.

IN WHICH TOM KING GETS VERY STRANGELY ON THE WRONG TRACK.

It was not long before just such a place as Tom King required presented itself to his notice.

At no great distance from the inn he came across a small pool of water, over which hung a remarkable-looking weeping willow tree.

Among the roots of this he determined the treasure should be deposited.

He had no other tool for the purpose of making an excavation except his sword.

With this weapon, however, he set to work in good earnest.

It was not the first time he had put a sword to a similar use, and so he worked rapidly.

Moreover, the ground was of a very soft nature, which assisted him materially.

As soon as the hole was deep enough for his purpose, he wrapped the cloth well round the valuables and deposited them in it.

The earth was quickly covered over and the place restored to its usual appearance—the superfluous earth being easily got rid of by being thrown into the water.

Tom hastened over these proceedings as much as he could, for he was well conscious that the night was wearing fast away.

He had set his mind upon discovering Maud's whereabouts, if possible, before morning came upon him.

Mounting his steed and looking well around him in order that he might be able to recognise the place easily again, he rode off in the direction mentioned by the two officers.

This was actually for some distance on the direct road to the old water-mill where Maud had had so narrow an escape from death.

Tom looked about him very cautiously, for he did not know how soon he might catch sight of his pursuers.

But for a long time his pains and trouble met with no reward.

All at once, on passing round a sharp curve in the cross-road, he believed he saw something like a female figure flit before him at some distance on in front, and immediately vanish round the next turn.

This was quite enough to stimulate him to the utmost.

Touching his horse lightly with the spur, he set forward at full gallop.

The next turn was rounded, and again the figure came in sight.

There was no room for doubts now.

It was unquestionably a female, though in the darkness the outlines of her form were dim and ill-defined.

It would seem as though at this moment that she became conscious some one was pursuing her, for she uttered a shrill cry, which was unmistakably one of terror, and bounded onward at a rate which intense terror could alone have enabled her to make.

Tom echoed her cry by another.

But his was one of encouragement.

He did not suffer his horse to abate his speed, and as he galloped on he shouted:

"Maud—Maud! Fear nothing! All is well! I have come to save you!"

But either his words failed to reach her ears altogether, or else her great alarm rendered her deaf to every sound for she continued to run with even greater swiftness than before.

But remarkably fleet as she was, it is not to be supposed that she could long keep ahead of Tom.

Yet although she must have known that to be overtaken was inevitable, she continued to strain every nerve.

Again and again Tom called after her, but with no more result than at first.

Once Tom's horse's head almost touched her shoulder.

At the same time she turned to look back, and the sight so startled her that she gave a tremendous bound, which at once carried her several feet ahead.

But it was a last effort.

With a wild, despairing cry, which thrilled strangely to Tom's heart, she sank down in front of him as though all at once struck down by lightning.

Tom uttered a shout.

He felt assured that nothing could save her from being run over.

He pulled the rein hard, and the horse, seeing something lying in its path, swerved aside, and with so much abruptness that Tom was almost unseated.

The effort he made to regain his proper position in the saddle increased the fright which the horse already felt, and he broke out into a terrific gallop.

It was some moments before Tom could bring him to a standstill, but having done so, he compelled him to retrace his steps.

On regaining the spot where she had fallen, Tom precipitately alighted.

He fancied she had lost all consciousness, but this was not the case, for on his appearance she endeavoured to rise to her feet and resume her headlong flight.

But her strength was gone, and she sunk down again with a moan.

Now Tom was never more certain of anything in his life than he was that this was Maud.

It never once occurred to him that there could be a possibility of its being anyone else.

What, then, was his surprise when he all at once discovered that he had been quite upon a wrong track.

Although not exactly morning, yet there was sufficient dim gray light to enable him to perceive that this was a young girl many years younger than Maud, and that her skin was so dark that she looked like an Indian.

Indeed, Tom came at once to the conclusion that she was not of European birth, there was something so foreign-looking in her countenance.

But for all that, the dusky features were truly beautiful.

No tiny bird fluttering beneath a hawk could have manifested greater terror than this young girl did when Tom bent over her.

Perceiving it, he endeavoured, by speaking in gentle tones, to reassure her.

"Fear nothing," he said—"do not be afraid. You have not, believe me, the least cause for alarm. I took you for another of whom I am in search."

Tom spoke without thinking whether his words would be understood.

Evidently, however, they were not only comprehended, but believed, for, raising her head, she clasped one of his hands in both her own, and sank down upon her knees.

"Help me—help me!" she said, faintly. "Help me and save me, for I am sorely in need of protection!"

"Be calm—be calm!" cried Tom, allowing her to continue her appeal; "such help as I can give you shall be afforded freely. Tell me what it is you fear."

The young girl glanced around her timorously.

She placed one of her tiny hands to her ear and listened intently.

Tom noted that the fingers were loaded with jewelled rings.

"I have escaped," she said—"escaped from a fate far worse than death itself. Yes—yes, I think I can now venture to say that I have escaped."

"No harm shall reach you while I am near," said Tom, resolutely, "so be under no more apprehension. Tell me what I can do to serve you?"

This was a question that seemed to cause the girl considerable perplexity.

Tom saw she was in deep thought, and waited patiently for her answer.

But instead of giving it, she burst into a flood of tears.

Tom allowed her grief to have full vent for some moments, for he knew how much her heart would be relieved.

Then, if possible, with greater deference, he repeated his question.

"Alas—alas, sir!" she replied; "I know not how to answer you—in fact, I feel myself unable to give you a reply."

"Can I assist you with my advice?"

"Would you have patience to listen to a few particulars of my life? If so, then——"

"Say on. Speak freely. Believe me, on my word, when I say that from this moment forth I am devoted to your service until I can place you in some safe position."

The young girl looked the thanks she was not able to express, and murmured:

"It is strange indeed to meet with so much sympathy. Believe me, I shall ever be your debtor."

Tom laughed.

"Think not of me in such a light," he said. "Indeed, the less you know of me the better."

His words caused a look of surprise to flit across her features, but observing that Tom stood waiting to hear the particulars of which she had spoken, she said:

"I must go so far back as to tell you that my mother was the only daughter of an English officer in India. She was his pet—his idol. But as she grew up, chance threw her in the way of one of the native Indian princes. He was young, chivalric, rich, and handsome. A mutual love ensued, which, however, upon discovering, her father sternly forbid.

"But his mandate was unheeded. The young Indian chief's tender entreaties, glowing pictures of the future, and assurances that in the end all would be well, proved of far greater power than her father's mandates.

"Flight followed. They were married, and a year afterwards I was born.

"It seems strange that I should tell you all this. Yet in a few moments you will perceive the necessity of it, for I am utterly friendless and helpless in a foreign land, where I have known little save unhappiness since my arrival in it."

"I am deeply interested," Tom observed; "and if I made any remark upon the subject, it would be to request you to enter fully into all particulars. Rely upon it I shall be a patient and observant listener."

"Thanks—many thanks! My reason for telling you so much of the past is that you may the better comprehend the present. My grandfather was bitterly wroth when he discovered my mother's flight, and his hatred now became as intense as his love had been.

"My father perished in a skirmish with his foes, and my mother after that endured many privations, all of which I shared, though I was then too young thoroughly to comprehend them.

"One day, however, the news came that my grandfather had died in England—that with his last breath he had forgiven his daughter and left her the whole of his vast wealth. At that time he was not certain whether she was alive or dead. If the former, then she was to make her way to England without loss of time; if the latter, then her children were to do so; and in case none survived, the property was to pass into the hands of a nephew of my grandfather's.

"This nephew was also appointed executor for the time being—I believe that is the proper word.

"My poor mother had lived so long without her father's pardon that she had ceased to hope for and expect it. The knowledge that his displeasure still continued, and the loss of her much-loved husband, weighed upon her spirits to such a degree that she pined away daily. I have heard it said that joy never kills, but it is certain that after this news my mother sank quickly into the grave.

"However, she started for Calcutta, in company with myself, her only child. We took passage on board a vessel, but ere we had gone a hundred miles my mother breathed her last.

"My position then was sad—sad indeed—sadder indeed, I think, than you would be able to form any conception of

"But I must not linger. In brief, we reached London, and then I met this nephew of whom I spoke, and who I now learned had, in consequence of my mother's death, become my guardian.

"When I saw him first I shuddered involuntarily. I knew not why, for there was nothing extraordinary or repulsive in his manner or appearance, and I felt ashamed of my sensations.

"He took me at once to a magnificent house a little way from London, and in a few days he began to make proposals of marriage to me.

"I felt assured that it was not love for me which prompted him to take this course.

"It was merely in order that he might not lose the money and estates.

"I at once replied firmly in the negative, and positively assured him that his suit was useless. But he took not the least notice of my denial, and urged upon me that it was my grandfather's last wish that we should be united.

"This consideration had not the least weight with me; indeed, as I had never heard of this before, I believed it to be neither more nor less than a fabrication made to answer his own ends and purposes.

"He little thought, perhaps, that I was one who would not be moved from a course resolved upon. Even had he prepossessed me favourably, instead of the reverse, his suit would have been equally in vain, for—for—there—there—was——"

"Another?" said Tom, perceiving her hesitation.

"Yes, one whom I had known from childhood—my constant playmate—one that I loved dearer than life—the only son of my father's dearest friend, and, like my father, a native Indian prince.

"We were affianced before my departure from the land of my birth, and he promised to follow me here with all speed."

"And has he done so?"

"Yes, and on his appearance my guardian grew furious. He called him a barbarian, and declared that his consent should never be given to such a union, and accordingly began by preventing all communication between us.

"At the same time he took prompt measures to coerce me into a marriage with himself. I resisted to the utmost of my ability; but it availed little, his power was so much greater than mine.

"At last, soon after sunset yesterday, I was suddenly surprised by the entrance of many persons into my chamber, which, though a luxuriously appointed one, was nevertheless to me nothing more than a dungeon, for I was not allowed on any pretext to leave it.

"I was amazed at what I saw, and for a little while was quite unable to comprehend it.

"But I soon discovered that every preparation had been made for the performance of the marriage ceremony.

"In spite of my entreaties, remonstrances, and resistance, a mockery of the solemn service was gone through. Those persons who were present were clearly mere tools of my villanous guardian's. In a few moments I was declared a wife, the ceremony being pronounced a legal and a binding one—indeed, all those present were willing to swear such was the case.

"This overwhelmed me quite, and I burst into a frantic passion of tears.

"My guardian approached me with an exultant smile upon his lips.

"'Fool!' he said. 'Did you for a moment think that I should suffer myself to be reduced to beggary by such a one as you are? No, no! Learn now, if you were ignorant of it before, that you are irrevocably mine!'

"His words rang in my ears like a death-knell. I was overcome, and in a faint voice murmured a request to the effect that I might be left alone.

"'Willingly,' he said. 'You need be under no fear that I shall trouble you much with my company. My end now is achieved, and I am content.'

"With these words, he left me.

"I sank down distracted.

"What was I to do?

"I felt that the time had not yet altogether passed away for me to make resistance, and, impressed with this conviction, I sprang to my feet.

"I darted at once to the door of my chamber.

"For the first time for a long while, it was unfastened. When I found it yield easily to my hand, I could scarcely believe in the reality of so much good fortune.

"Without pausing to consider, however, I passed out, wondering all the while whether in his excitement my guardian had forgotten his habitual caution, or whether he believed that I was now hopelessly and for ever in his power.

"Be this how it may, I descended the staircase with a fast-beating heart.

"I was so fortunate as to reach the foot of it unheard—unseen.

"There was a door close by opening into the garden; I gained it, passed out, and finally got quite clear of the premises.

"Before I had time to run far—for I fled with all the speed I was capable of making, though chance alone directed my footsteps—I became conscious that my flight had been discovered and a pursuit commenced.

"I had not time to think which way I should go—to me all roads were the same, so that they led me away from my hateful prison.

"My strength, however, quickly failed me, and I almost gave myself up for lost.

"My pursuers were coming on rapidly behind me.

"But in India I had had to fly more than once, and therefore knew what stratagem to put into execution.

"Observing a dark place in the road, I concealed myself behind the bushes that grew there, forcing myself among their roots, and lying so closely on the ground that I felt certain nothing but a rigid search could discover me.

"But my pursuers rode on without dreaming I should put any such stratagem into practice; and as soon as ever they were out of hearing, I rose again, and swiftly retraced my steps, for then I knew that I was getting away from them at a double speed.

"Ere long, I felt certain, they would guess what I had done; but before that I hoped to be on the road to a place of safety.

"Not to detain you longer, I can say that all this night I have been pursued, with difficulty keeping out of their hands. I was just congratulating myself that I had shaken them off at last when I perceived you, and, of course, at once took you for one of my foes."

"A very natural mistake," said Tom.

"Tell me," she continued, with greater earnestness than she had before employed—"tell me where I am to go—what I am to do!"

This was a matter not easily decided.

Tom looked thoughtful.

He began to feel that he had incurred a very serious responsibility.

The more he thought over his position, the more his embarrassment increased.

"Is there no friend under whose protection I can place you?" he asked, at length.

"None whatever. I am a total stranger in England."

Tom looked more perplexed still.

Just then he felt he had quite enough to do to look after his own safety without being burdened by anyone.

Still, his word having been given, he felt also that he could not run back from it.

What added to his embarrassment very considerably, however, was the fact that the Indian girl kept her full black lustrous eyes bent upon his face.

Suddenly, however, she started up.

A strange cry escaped her lips—a cry that echoed far and wide over the mist-covered meadows.

Then, in shrill tones of great excitement, she cried, clasping her hands together:

"Zariel—Zariel—Zariel!"

CHAPTER MXXXIV.

THE POLICE OFFICERS KEEP CLOSE UPON TOM'S TRACK.

It would be easy enough to say that Tom King was very much startled and surprised at this sudden change in the manner of the Indian girl, but then those words would be very far indeed from conveying a just conception of his amazement.

Her hands were clasped together, and her arms outstretched, while her eyes appeared to be fixed upon some distant object.

As soon as ever he recovered from the first shock of his astonishment, Tom turned round to look in the direction upon which his companion's gaze was riveted

He then saw, riding along at a rapid rate, a young man whose appearance was very extraordinary, for he was clad in Indian costume.

Nevertheless, he sat in the saddle with peculiar grace and the horse which he bestrode was one of the most magnificent-looking creatures that Tom had ever beheld.

His speed and action, too, were in accordance with his appearance.

By this time the day had fairly dawned, though it was not yet light enough for distant objects to be descried distinctly.

It was evident that the horseman had heard the words which had just been pronounced, for he reined-in his steed with great abruptness and looked eagerly about him.

The spot occupied by Tom King and the Indian girl happened to be in deep shadow, so at first, owing to the uncertain light, he failed to perceive them.

But she was determined not to let him remain long in ignorance of her whereabouts, for she cried:

"Zariel—Zariel! Come—come! I am here!"

The words evidently reached the horseman's ears, for he immediately galloped towards them.

As he came nearer, Tom saw that he was both young and handsome, though his beauty was of the Oriental type.

The unmistakable joy and delight visible upon the countenance of the young girl, and the ardour of the horseman, very quickly let our old friend know that this was the lover of whom mention had been made.

When he had reached to within a few yards of where they stood the girl bounded forward, again pronouncing the singular but yet musical name.

Zariel, seeing her approach, at once stopped his horse and slipped from the saddle and, altogether heedless of Tom's presence, clasped her tightly to his breast.

The manner in which the embrace was received was quite enough to let the highwayman know that they were on the best of terms with each other.

To tell the truth, he was heartily rejoiced at this encounter, which had taken place just at the moment when his perplexity was greatest.

He was conscious also that he was not wanted any longer, so he quickly mounted his steed and rode off.

But no sooner were the first transports of joy over between the lovers than the Indian girl poured out a rapid account of what Tom King had done in her behalf.

Consequently, before our friend had gone far, he heard a loud voice calling upon him to stop.

He obeyed with great willingness, for his eyes having been busily at work glancing around him, disclosed to his view a small party of police officers.

They would have been invisible but for the fact that the just-risen sun, towards which Tom's back was turned, poured his rosy rays full upon them.

Moreover, at this precise moment of time they happened to occupy a slightly-elevated piece of ground.

To have gone on any further in that direction would have been madness.

So far as he could tell, Tom believed that the police officers had not been sufficiently lynx-eyed to catch sight of him.

He turned round, therefore, in a moment, and the first thing he saw after having done so was Zariel waving his hand to him.

On reaching the spot where the lovers were, Tom bowed and paused.

"We cannot let you leave us thus, sir!" said Zariel, speaking English with some hesitation and difficulty, and with a peculiar foreign accent. "I have just heard of your sympathy and devotion, and cannot allow you to part without making you some recompense for it."

"I seek no recompense," replied Tom, somewhat haughtily. "What I have done has been of my own free will and without any expectations whatever. In a word, you are quite welcome."

"But we cannot allow you to part thus," said Zariel—"indeed we cannot! Surely your position cannot be such that it is impossible for me to do something for you in return?"

"There is one question to which I much wish an answer," said Tom; "and if you have been riding far to-night you may be able to answer. That will be quite a sufficient return for what I have done."

"Speak—speak!"

Tom then gave a close description of Maud's personal appearance, and asked if he had seen her.

The reply was a negative.

"That is enough!" he said. "Farewell!"

"Nay, nay," said Zariel; "surely you will not refuse to accept of some slight hospitality? I cannot entertain you as I could wish, but a short distance off there is a dwelling where I reside, and to which you are heartily welcome if you will only favour me so far as to come."

These words caused Tom to hesitate.

He was thinking busily.

It took him but a moment to decide.

He remembered the officers of whom he had caught sight.

He recollected that it was not until midnight that he should be able to meet with his companions.

All the day was before him—the very period when it was hardest to conceal himself from his foes, and when he could do least towards a discovery of Maud.

These considerations rapidly presenting themselves to him induced him to murmur a few words of thanks for the invitation which had been given, and to accept it.

There can be no doubt the young Indian was in earnest, for his face lighted up immediately.

"Come, sir," he said; "henceforth I hope we shall be to each other as friends and brothers. Follow me; you are heartily welcome to share all I have."

With these words he alighted, lifted the Indian girl to the saddle before him, and led the way.

Tom breathed freely, for the direction was such as to lead him right away from the spot where he had seen the officers standing.

After this no words of importance were exchanged, for Tom King purposely kept some distance in the rear, in order that the young couple might converse freely with each other.

In a few moments Tom perceived a large, stately-looking edifice surrounded by a high brick wall, and which he doubted not was destined to be his halting-place.

"I ought to deem myself lucky," he said, "for surely beneath this roof I shall be able to remain a few hours unmolested."

His conjecture respecting his destination proved correct.

The young Indian prince rode direct towards some fine massive-looking gates.

His approach must have been expected, or at least perceived, for immediately upon his arrival one half of the folding doors receded upon its hinges.

A broad, well-kept gravel path was then disclosed, along which they proceeded rapidly, and finally paused in front of the mansion itself.

Quite a troop of servants—but all of them Indians, doubtless devoted followers of the prince—came forth, and after many salaams assisted him to alight.

But Tom slipped from his horse before anyone had time to reach him.

"This way," said Zariel—"this way. Would that I could give you such a reception as I should wish—such as you shall have if ever you visit me in my own land!"

Tom murmured a few words of thanks and crossed the threshold.

He looked about him with great interest and curiosity, for all that he beheld possessed the charm of novelty.

The young prince had endeavoured to make the interior of the plainly-built mansion as much like one of his own palaces as possible, and the effect was in consequence rather incongruous, and yet by no means unpleasing.

An Oriental repast was quickly laid before them, to which Tom did ample justice.

He was able to discover, however, among the frequent pauses in the conversation that the young couple were far from being well at ease.

His presence could not fail to be a restraint upon them, and therefore he resolved to relieve them of it.

Accordingly he pleaded extreme fatigue, and requested that he might be shown into an apartment where he could refresh himself with a few hours' sleep.

His request was readily complied with.

Zariel, however, would insist upon accompanying him to this fresh chamber, for he was grateful for what Tom had done in his loved one's behalf, and he felt that he could not do him too much honour.

The apartment they entered was, like all the rest, fitted up in Indian fashion.

Tom never could tell what it was that prompted him to advance to the window and look out, but he did so in obedience to an impulse that he could not resist.

Perhaps in his mind lingered some remembrance of the officers he had seen, together with the fact that this window being on an upper floor would enable him to command a tolerably extensive view around.

Be it what it may, however, this was his first act.

He shrank back at once.

At the very first glance he had caught sight of the officers.

They were on foot, and walking up the broad, gravelled path leading to the house.

Although some little distance from the window, Tom was able to observe their movements, though, owing to this change of position, he felt certain that there was little danger of the officers catching sight of him.

How on earth they could have tracked him hither was a mystery, for, of course, by no other supposition than this could their presence be accounted for.

What was to be done?

Tom asked himself this important question with a slight amount of uneasiness.

He glanced towards the prince, who at that moment was busily occupied in giving some directions to an attendant.

The moment the highwaymen's eyes fell upon him he was struck by an idea.

"Prince," he said, "one moment! I wish you to look through this window."

The prince came forward at once.

But, to Tom's infinite chagrin, the officers were out of sight.

"I wished to call your attention to some men I saw approaching. They must be concealed by that clump of evergreens. Yes, look—look! here they come!"

At this moment the officers appeared in view again, their disappearance being merely owing to the fact that the path they were pursuing wound round a large mass of dark-leaved trees.

And if Tom had had any doubt about the intentions and destination of these officers it would have been completely dissipated by their actions.

One who was walking slightly in advance half turned round to those who were behind him, while at the same time he raised one arm and pointed towards the mansion.

That he said something was certain, though of course the distance was much too great for the words to be overheard where Tom stood.

Having pointed out the officers to the prince, he led him from the window, and said, in a low and impressive voice:

"Prince, there is no time now for explanation—let it suffice to tell you that those men you have just seen are my foes, and that they seek my life."

The prince at once carried his hand to the hilt of his jewelled sword, as if to show his readiness and willingness to do battle on his guest's behalf.

But Tom restrained him.

"They must be met by cunning, not violence."

"I do not understand you."

"I can soon explain."

"Do so—do so! Command me to the uttermost!"

The prince was so accustomed to sudden encounters of one sort or another in his native land that he would, if Tom had permitted him, have put the mansion instantly in a state of defence, and called upon his army of attendants to do battle.

But such a course as this Tom knew very well would eventually produce more harm than good.

Stratagem must be adopted.

"Prince," he said, "what I wish is to induce in the minds of these men a belief that I am not here."

The prince looked half puzzled.

"No hiding-place would be secure against them, and so what I want you to do is simply to disguise me in some apparel like your own, and, if questioned, merely say that I am a friend who has accompanied you from India."

The prince caught at the idea at once.

He clapped his hands.

The door opened, and he immediately poured out a torrent of words that Tom could not understand, but which he guessed were instructions what to do.

The servants rushed out, tumbling over each other in their eager haste.

But they made good speed.

Tom was attended by a wonderful retinue.

More hands than he could count were busy about his person.

He remained quite passive, for he thought he could not do better than resign himself totally to them.

Their dexterity was surprising.

Almost with the quickness of a magical transformation, Tom King's outward semblance was quite changed.

Last of all was brought some liquid in a vial, which was sparingly applied to his face and hands.

The effect was to impart to the skin of both that peculiar tint which so well became the prince himself.

This done, the troop of busy attendants stood on one side, and, for the first time since the commencement of these operations, Tom King caught a full-length view of himself in a large swinging mirror that hung opposite to him.

He started with surprise, as well he might.

He failed utterly to recognise himself.

At this moment there came one loud, heavy, blundering knock upon the front door of the mansion, thus making known the coming of the officers for the first time.

The fact that Tom's metamorphosis had been made complete while the officers were walking up the winding avenue will serve to convey a tolerable idea of how speedy it had been.

But our friend happened to be about the same height and build as the prince, so that the apparel fitted him admirably, and when thus costumed they looked like two twin brothers.

"Caution your attendants not to say a word about this, and to secrete my apparel," whispered Tom.

"It does not matter," answered Zariel, "there is not one that can speak or understand a single word of English; still it will be best to be on the safe side."

Some words of caution were then addressed to the servants, who quitted the chamber and separated.

In the meantime the officers were admitted.

"I think you can make yourself content now," said the prince, as he sank indolently upon a pile of cushions.

"Yes, thanks to you."

"Nay, do not mention it."

"I cannot forbear doing so."

"I am only too glad to think that an opportunity has so soon arisen of requiting you for the service you have rendered me."

"There is one thing——" said Tom, and then he checked himself.

"What—what? Say on."

"It would serve to blind the officers still more if we were to descend the staircase together, and go for a walk in the grounds. They would not be able to gaze at me so narrowly as they perhaps would if they found me in a room, nor would they be able to stay so long."

"Be it so," said Zariel—"the thought is good—come!"

With these words he arose.

Tom followed him quickly.

On passing round a bend in the staircase they caught sight of the officers down below in the hall.

They were endeavouring, though vainly, to make their errand known to the prince's retainers.

The latter, upon seeing their master approach, turned round and greeted him after the Oriental fashion, remaining with their heads hung down until after he should have passed.

Thus to walk right up to the officers was subjecting Tom's disguise to a very severe ordeal; but, then, he felt assured that the very boldness of this proceeding would go far towards causing success.

In spite of his boldness, he could not help feeling slightly uneasy at the consciousness that the eyes of so many of his foes were upon him.

But of this Tom admirably concealed all outward manifestation.

Watching the movements of the prince very closely, he imitated them as well as he was able.

He succeeded much better than he dared to flatter himself he did.

The foremost officer involuntarily made an awkward bow when he saw Zariel approach, and as he did so he said:

"Beg pardon, sir, I am sure—very sorry!—but we have traced a desperate character to the neighbourhood of your dwelling. We are most anxious to capture him, and wish for your permission to make a thorough search about these premises."

"You are welcome," said the prince— go where you choose."

He waved his hand as he spoke

The police officers mechanically stood aside to allow him to pass.

Tom accompanied. as before.

So close did he pass to his foes, however, that his ample dress almost touched them.

But no suspicion of his identity was entertained.

'T was easy enough to see that, and besides, had there been, those officers must have been gifted with an almost supernatural share of cleverness.

The prince and the highwayman passed out of the doorway together, descended the steps, and strolled into the grounds.

Tom had not been candid enough to give the prince his principal reason for wishing to be in the open air.

It was because he knew full well, in case of his disguise being penetrated, he should then have a ten times better chance of making his escape

No. 221 will be Published next Monday.

But that danger was to all appearances over.

Tom, however, was not one to suffer himself to be lulled into a state of false security, and therefore, although things seemed going on so well, he kept a vigilant look-out.

As soon as they had retired to a safe distance, the prince laughed lightly, and said:

"Excellent! No one could recognise you now, I feel convinced, so greatly are you altered. You are deserving of much credit."

"Nay—nay, the credit belongs to you. I shall ever be your debtor."

"No more of that. But it amuses me to think you should have walked before them in so barefaced a manner. I know not who you are, but that act convinces me that you are gifted with no ordinary share of courage. I should never have thought of so bold a thing."

Tom laughed.

In this manner a considerable time elapsed, during which the police officers were busily occupied with unnecessary labour.

By-and-by, however, they came into the grounds, and then the prince and Tom, without particularly appearing to avoid them, sought the shelter of the house.

Still it seemed as though the officers were by no means satisfied, but at length, after much lingering, they took their departure, to Tom's great content.

Again he betook himself to his chamber, but he did not venture yet to change his costume, lest he should be favoured by another visit.

All hope of getting a few hours' sleep, too, was at an end, for he felt that it was requisite for him to keep a sharp look-out from the window.

He maintained this position until nearly mid-day.

Up to that time all had gone well, and as he was overcome with fatigue, he flung himself upon the cushions and fell asleep.

It was not until dusk had fairly crept over the earth that he opened his eyes again.

Perceiving how late it was, he, after a little reconnoitring, resumed his own apparel, which he was very glad to do.

He had scarcely finished when the prince entered.

"With your leave," said Tom, "I will now take my departure. I have an important appointment to keep at some distance from this place, and so I must bid farewell to your hospitalities."

"I am glad you have spoken first," said the prince, "otherwise you might have thought that I was anxious for you to depart, and rather than that I would put up with any inconvenience."

"I do not understand."

"I will explain in a few words. During the day we have been holding an anxious consultation, and the result of it is that we have determined to quit England together with the least possible loss of time."

"And a very wise determination too," said Tom. "It was the very course of action I was about to recommend you to follow, for, by what I know, I fancy that the guardian has by far the better claim. The only difficulty is her wealth, to which he has no manner of right and title, and therefore he ought not to be permitted to enjoy it."

The prince snapped his fingers contemptuously.

"I care not that much for all the wealth—I have now all that I require."

"In that case, then," said Tom, "let me assure you that you cannot too soon take your departure from England, and, in order that no time be lost, let me now bid you farewell."

The prince seemed much affected at this separation, for short as had been the time during which they had been together, yet it was long enough to enable Tom to win his way to his heart.

It is only natural that the prince should like him, for from his earliest years he had been taught to look upon bravery as the most important of all personal qualifications, and Tom had shown that he possessed more than an ordinary share of that quality.

After the exchange of a few more words, the prince clapped his hands, and upon the appearance of the attendant gave orders for Tom's horse to be immediately got in readiness.

Our friend then descended with him and took his farewell of the Indian girl, who was no less affected than Zariel at the prospect of a separation.

His last words to the prince, who followed him to the door of the mansion, were:

"Do not fail to take my advice. I should be glad to know that the happiness of both of you was assured in the future, and it will, I feel confident, if you are left unmolested. Therefore, quit England without loss of time."

"I have made every preparation," was the reply, "and shall take my departure almost immediately. In order that we may travel with all speed, I shall leave nearly the whole of my attendants behind me."

"That is right. Let nothing occur to make you change your determination. If you do, I feel assured that you will rue it."

So saying, Tom descended the steps before the front door and mounted his steed, which was held by a swarthy attendant of the prince's.

Tom's eye sparkled when he saw how well cared for the animal had been.

Never had he seen it look to better advantage.

Never did it seem to manifest so much impatience to be off, and never did it seem more competent to outrun any others that might pursue it.

In a moment Tom was seated in the saddle.

All around him was very still—suspiciously still, he thought.

As he rode slowly away, and got behind the clump of evergreens which we have mentioned as having for a time concealed the approach of the officers, he thoroughly examined all his weapons.

After having satisfied himself that all were in perfect order and in readiness for instant use, he increased his speed.

The massive gate opened at his approach, and closed behind him again with a heavy clang, which seemed to Tom like a harsh note of separation between himself and his new-made friends.

But this fancy was quickly dispelled by the sound of footsteps and the cry of voices.

"There, now!" he heard some one say quite distinctly. "I told you so—didn't I? Quick—quick! We shall have him after all!"

Tom turned quickly, and caught sight of the police officers who had made so ineffectual a search about the mansion and grounds.

They had concealed themselves behind an abrupt angle formed by the high brick wall which we have already described.

There was a sudden rush while these words were spoken, and then the foremost officer rapidly raised a pistol and discharged it before Tom King was aware of his intention.

"My orders are, alive or dead," muttered the officer, as he pulled the trigger, "and I mean to make sure of you. I don't see why one need be so very particular about a d—d highwayman!"

Tom reeled in the saddle.

For a moment he fancied he should fall.

So did the officers, and with loud yells of triumph they came bounding on.

But Tom recovered himself.

Although believing that he was badly hit, yet he determined to show fight to the last.

Rapidly drawing one of his own pistols he turned round and fired, taking no particular aim except that he marked at the throng of officers.

Then, without waiting to see what, if any, effect was produced by this discharge, he faced his horse round and urged him onward at full speed.

The first thing he wondered at was that he should feel such slight effects from the bullet which had been discharged at him.

It was a mystery, and while galloping along at that terrific pace he resolved to do his best towards elucidating it.

The discovery was quickly made.

The bullet had actually struck against one of the large metal buttons on the front of his coat.

But it had struck obliquely, and had then glanced off, doing him no injury.

The force and suddenness of the blow, however, were such as to cause him to reel in the manner we have stated

This was a most agreeable discovery to make, and Tom heartily congratulated himself upon his good fortune.

Still, the narrow escape he had had from death did not fail to make him feel decidedly uncomfortable.

He was therefore very wise to make the resolution of banishing the thought altogether.

Under such exciting circumstances as the present it was likely enough that he would succeed.

Glancing back, he saw that the police officers had commenced a pursuit, and if the manner in which they whipped and spurred their horses could be taken as an indication of their intentions, then most assuredly did they intend to strain every nerve to attempt the accomplishment of their purpose.

But Tom only smiled while he observed their efforts.

He had got an excellent start already, and was well aware how important a thing that was in a race.

Then, his horse he felt certain could go at a speed which would utterly preclude all hope of any of the officers overtaking him, unless he should be so unfortunate as to meet with some accident.

Tom King accordingly took off his hat and made a very low bow with it, just as he would have done had he been wishing some one good night with an extra amount of politeness.

This act was thoroughly well understood by the officers, and the reader will not need to be told that it would have a most galling effect upon them.

It was well calculated to work up their aggravation to the highest pitch.

Tom King now turned his attention in good earnest to getting away.

Already the night was closing in, and although it wanted several hours of the time when he had appointed to meet his companions, yet he wished to have his actions unfettered without delay, in order that he might make one more attempt to discover the whereabouts of Maud.

Tom's horse galloped on in gallant style.

Indeed, it is no exaggeration whatever to say that for every three yards which the officers' horses made he went six.

Such being the case, it follows as a matter of course that they were ere long left quite behind.

When completely out of sight and hearing, Tom abruptly changed his course, for all this time he had been going in a direction almost opposite to that which he had made up his mind to take.

He did not very greatly relax his speed until he found himself once more in the vicinity of the Jolly Tar Inn.

But he was not so temerarious as to venture too near to it this time.

Working round this building in a circle, Tom sought everywhere for some trace of Maud.

But quite in vain.

Nothing at all could be seen of her.

Yet, despite his non-success, he continued his search perseveringly.

At length the hour of midnight drew near.

"I must give up," he said, "and yet it vexes me extremely to have to do so. I made sure that I was on the right track. I ought to have discovered her—I feel that I ought, and I shall ever blame myself for not having done so. My only hope is that some of my comrades may have been more fortunate than myself, but that, I feel, is a frail, frail hope indeed."

It was therefore in great depression of spirits that Tom slowly made his way to the place of rendezvous.

He reached the blasted tree somewhere about the appointed time.

On his arrival he found all dark and dreary.

He had arrived first.

The wind howled with a dismal sound among the branches of the trees around, and sounded in Tom's ears like a prognostication of coming evil.

Time passed.

Still, save and except for the melancholy wailing of the wind, the silence remained unbroken.

All the while Tom kept his sense of hearing on full stretch.

At last he was rewarded by hearing a welcome sound.

It was the clatter of horses' feet.

Clearer and clearer and more unmistakable became the sound, and he leaned forward eagerly in the saddle, in the hope of being able to see who it was approaching.

"Three riders," he muttered, as he detected the footfalls of three horses—"three riders. Who can they be? Am I doomed to a disappointment after all?"

As he asked himself the question, he shrank back as far as he was able into the concealing shadow cast by the gloomy trees.

CHAPTER MXXXV.

RETURNS TO MAUD IN THE MILLER'S COTTAGE.

It is necessary now that we should revert to the proceedings of Maud.

We feel assured that the reader will willingly follow us in a recital of her fortunes, especially as we have left her for so long a space.

We go back, then, to that poverty-stricken cottage, or rather hut, that adjoined the water-mill.

It will be remembered that when Maud learned from the lips of the miller's wife that the time had passed when she ought to have conveyed the warning, she, with a despairing cry, had sprung up from the bed, intending to set out then.

But she had miscalculated her strength, and at once fell down in a swoon.

When she recovered her consciousness, she found herself again upon the bed, and the woman occupied in sprinkling water upon her.

A copious flow of tears now came to her relief.

But sad indeed and full of anxiety was her heart, for she dreaded that Dick and his companions had perished.

Nothing else, save that utter bodily prostration to which she was a prey, could have kept her there inactive.

Anything would have been preferable and better than lying there so helplessly.

And yet after a time, when she grew calmer, she began to ask herself what she should do—where she should go, supposing the use of her limbs had not been denied her?

But she asked these questions vainly.

And so the weary, weary hours passed by.

Her heart ached when the dim gray moonlight found its way into the room, for she was suffering from the worst of all agonies—suspense.

During the day her strength partially returned to her, and beyond doubt her recovery would have been more rapid had the requisite things been at hand; but in that lonesome hut scarcely the bare necessaries of life could be obtained.

Still, when night came she was better—so much so that she rose and reapparelled herself with but little assistance.

At present she had said not a word to the woman respecting the payment she intended to make for these services; but the truth was, Maud's mind was by far too busily engaged in other matters to think of these, and so the hints and remarks which the woman threw out were passed over unregarded.

Neither did Maud observe on this night that the woman cast upon her threatening looks, and conversed in a low tone with her husband, who did nothing but crouch over the fire in an attitude of sullen indolence.

"John—John!" whispered the woman, for at least the twentieth time that evening.

"Well, well—what do you want?"

"You know what I want."

The man moved uneasily.

"Have you made up your mind?" continued his wife.

"Silence—still!"

"I tell you you are a fool and a coward, John Costard. So you have always been, and so you ever will be, I suppose."

"Hold your row!"

"I sha'n't! I shall talk if I like! I ask you again, have you made up your mind?"

"Hold your row, I say!"

"I sha'n't! You have the chance now, but who knows how long you may have it? Perhaps not more than half an hour. Look!—she seems half inclined to be off now."

The man turned his bloodshot eyes towards Maud with a wolfish gaze.

Not one word of this discourse had reached her ears—or, at any rate, none had penetrated to her understanding.

There could be no mistaking the meaning of that gaze.

It would have had the effect of warning Maud and putting her upon her guard; but she beheld it not.

The glance meant murder.

The word was expressed almost as unmistakably as it it had been uttered by the lips.

His wife's instigations had produced a partial effect.

The man had all the inclination to commit the hideous crime, but he lacked the courage to set about it.

But his wife, noticing his irresolution, and perceiving too that some impression had been made, continued with her urgings.

"What are you afraid of, John?" she hissed in his ear—"what do you dread?"

"Suppose she should get away?"

"We must prevent it."

"Why not do the deed yourself?"

"A fine idea, truly! You want the money, do you not? Wouldn't such a sum as that set you up in the world again? Look what rings she has on her fingers, too!"

"I cannot do it."

"But I say you can and shall! You must do it!"

He shook his head and shuddered.

"Who is to know?" urged his wife. "What have you to fear? Surely we can master her easily enough. Not a soul knows of her presence here—no one will know then. You saved her, didn't you?"

"I did."

"Then what difference will it make whether she goes in the old mill-pond now or then?"

"But—but——"

"What now?"

"If you—threw her in——"

"Well—well?"

"The—body—would—would be found."

"No."

"But it would?"

"I say no! We could put her into one of the sacks and tie a weight to it—then who would see her again, I should like to know?"

The man recoiled.

He was not quite so hardened in iniquity as his wife.

"Then—then, she would scream," he urged.

"Nothing of the kind—nothing of the kind! There—take this! Take it, I say! What are you frightened of? That will do the business!"

Not without considerable difficulty, the woman slipped something into her husband's hand.

She stole stealthy glances at Maud all the time, who still sat unconscious of what was going on.

The something thus stealthily conveyed was a knife.

A bright, sharp, cruel-looking weapon, well suited for such a deed as that which they had in contemplation.

The man's cheek blanched as he gazed upon it.

"Now, then," whispered his wife, "what could be more easy? Look where she sits like one in some deep sleep. One stride will take you to her side—one stroke with the knife will——"

"Hush—hush!"

Maud moved and looked up.

She had just then made up her mind that she would, in spite of all hazards, leave the hut and resume her search for Dick.

She fancied that her strength was now adequate to such a task.

But the man at once jumped to the conclusion that she had either overheard what had been passing between his wife and himself, or else that she suspected their design.

How very true it is that a guilty conscience stands in need of no accuser.

He trembled excessively, and it is a thousand wonders that the knife did not fall from his strengthless hand.

"I did not mean it, miss," he said, abjectly—"indeed—indeed I didn't!"

Maud regarded him with unmixed surprise.

"Mean what?" she asked.

"Silence, fool!" said the woman, in a low tone, which, however, reached Maud's ears—"silence, idiot! Do you want to spoil all?"

Maud wondered what was meant.

Some inward kind of presentiment came over her at this moment.

Without knowing exactly how, she became conscious that she was menaced by danger of some kind or other.

But of what precise nature she could form no accurate idea, so that she felt particularly uneasy.

The looks of the man and his wife by no means pleased her, but she scarcely thought of them, for she intended to leave the place without delay.

At this moment the woman came forward with a great affectation of hypocritical solicitude.

"Don't pay any attention to my husband, miss," she said, in sycophantic tones, which grated terribly on Maud's ears. "He is a good enough man in his way, but a little bit odd at times. Don't take any notice of him, but let me know what you may please to want."

"I want nothing further, thank you," said Maud, quietly. "I am about to take my departure now and I must again and again thank you for the attention you have paid me. It shall not go unrewarded."

Maud placed her hand in her pocket, intending to draw forth her purse.

Of course she would have liberally recompensed these people with its contents.

But the purse was gone.

The woman had taken good care to remove it.

Maud at once stepped back into the adjoining room, fancying she must have left the money there.

"Now, John Costard," hissed the bold, bad woman, "what are you going to do? We have got the money—you know we have. She will find out the robbery in a moment; and just tell me whether you feel ready to go to the gallows, when you have such an easy means of getting out of it? She will scream out, and all the neighbours will hear her. Then, when it is too late, you will wish you had taken my advice."

These last words seemed to work more upon the man than any which had previously been uttered.

His lips moved convulsively, while he grasped the handle of the murderous-looking knife with a savage grip.

"One stroke," cried his wife, urgently—"only one, and then all is over. Mind, there must be no second blow!"

The miller seemed to have made up his mind at last.

It appeared that he could no longer withstand the incitement of his wife.

With stealthy steps he made his way across the rough flooring to the doorway through which Maud had just passed.

But just as he reached it she appeared upon the threshold.

Maud started back, uttering a loud scream of terror.

There was no possibility of mistaking the purpose of those to whom she had been giving so much credit for kindness and charity.

"Too late!" groaned the man.

"No, no!" shrieked his wife. "Forward—forward! If she escapes now we are as good as hanged already! Stop her—stop her, I say!"

Worked up to the highest pitch, the man made a blundering rush forward with the full resolution of putting an end to the matter before he could have time for further reflection.

But Maud eluded him without much trouble, for his movements compared to his were those of a fawn to an elephant.

Nevertheless, she was almost half dead with terror.

In the extremity of her fear, however, she caught sight of an old rusty sword, which was hanging against one of the walls.

To rush towards this spot and to seize the weapon took her so little time that the man seemed stupified with amazement when he saw the sword in her hand.

Maud grasped it by the hilt, and held it before her in a posture of defence.

Her life was dear not only to herself but to others, and therefore she resolved not to resign it to these murderous wretches without a struggle.

She saw, too, what an arrant coward she had to deal with, and this inspired her with more courage than she could otherwise have called to her aid.

The threatening attitude which she assumed, and the expression of determination, made the miller shrink back.

Despite of all consequences, he would then and there have abandoned his purpose.

But his instigating wife was still behind him urging him on.

"Kill—kill," she cried—"kill her, or perish yourself!"

"Beware!" said Maud. "I know how to use this weapon, and shall have plenty of resolution to enable me to do so to advantage. Come nearer at your peril!"

Even while she spoke, Maud's heart sank within her, for she mentally asked herself what could she do against these two.

Her eyes just then fell upon the door, and she thought in a moment that if she was speedy in her movements she might gain the open air and escape unhurt.

No sooner did the idea occur to her than she proceeded to carry it out.

She made a sudden feint, as though her intention was to rush forward and commence the attack.

The ruse succeeded to perfection.

Uttering a loud yell of fear, the man dropped the knife and endeavoured to interpose his wife between himself and the threatened danger.

Maud flung the sword at the pair with all her strength, and then darted out of the cottage like a flash of light.

When she saw her thus suddenly disappear, the woman's fury knew no bounds.

She was maddened to think she had been deceived by such an artifice.

She soothed her mind a little by bestowing a heavy blow upon her husband.

Then snatching up the knife, she dashed out of the hut.

She just caught a sight of Maud bounding forward in the distance.

This was enough to urge her to the utmost.

The manner in which she now started off in pursuit was astounding.

Maud had fear as an incentive to speed—the woman angry passions.

Poor Maud heard this fury bounding on behind her, and looked back in affright.

Her terror was redoubled when she saw how close behind her her pursuer was.

No sooner did the miller's wife catch sight of her back-turned face than she uttered a frantic cry and brandished the knife above her head.

Faint and sick with dread, Maud endeavoured to increase her speed.

All objects seemed to swim before her, and she was only dimly conscious that she had gained what looked like a well-beaten road.

Her breath came panting from her breast.

She felt each moment as though she should sink.

Indeed, it was a truly wonderful circumstance that she should have been able to maintain such a rapid rate of speed for so long a time.

But her limbs now failed her.

She staggered and nearly fell.

By an almost superhuman effort she recovered herself and continued her headlong course.

But the woman had gained upon her wonderfully.

Maud could hear her heavy footsteps sounding, through the exaggeration of intense fear, like thunder.

She could hear her heavy, labouring breath, and every now and then a half-articulate summons to come to a standstill.

The summons was disregarded, but it was quite evident that Maud's strength would not hold out a moment longer.

What she then endured we are unable to convey an adequate conception of.

In imagination she could see the woman behind her with uplifted knife, only waiting for a favourable opportunity to strike.

So impressed was she by this dread that it rendered her oblivious of all things else.

A small twig—it could scarcely be called by any other name—lay directly in her path.

It would have been under ordinary circumstances the easiest thing in the world to have stepped over it, or gone a little to one side.

But Maud did neither.

She did not even see it; and consequently, before she was aware of it, her feet became entangled, and she fell, face foremost, to the ground.

Consciousness almost left her, but not quite.

The intense horror she had of what was to come prevented her from losing her senses entirely.

But she did not hear the clatter of a horse's hoofs, though the next instant a powerful yet pleasant voice struck upon her ears.

"What hellgame is this, you old witch?" the voice cried. "Be off, or I will be the death of you—be off, I say!"

Then all was still.

The next thing Maud became aware of was an unpleasant stinging sensation.

She opened her eyes and looked up, though she fancied she was about to take her last look of this world.

To her astonishment, and joy as well, she caught sight of some one bending over her with an air of tender interest.

The moon was shining clearly and brightly, lighting up everything with her magic lustre.

The clear, cold beams showed Maud that she was indebted to a stranger for the piece of good fortune she had just received.

Almost in doubt whether what she saw was real, Maud closed her eyes again, but only to open them the next moment.

CHAPTER MXXXVI.

IN WHICH MAUD MAKES A FRESH ACQUAINTANCE, AND ONE WHICH SHE IS DESTINED TO RENEW.

THE form of the stranger was still there.

It needed no more than one glance to show her that he was young and not without good pretentions to being considered handsome.

His face had upon it a pleasant though somewhat reckless expression—and this was more noticeable about the eyes.

He was well formed, and his somewhat picturesque-looking apparel showed off his figure to the utmost advantage.

"I am glad you have recovered," he said, in those peculiar accents which always distinguish those who are in the habit of moving in good society. Then observing that Maud glanced about her in terror, he added: "Be under no apprehensions now. The danger is over—the old hag is gone."

His words afforded wonderful relief to Maud's heart, and now for the first time the tears began to flow.

Young as the stranger was, he must have possessed some knowledge of what was best to be done in such a case, for instead of making the least attempt to check her weeping, he removed to a little distance, under the pretence of seeing whether his horse was properly secured to the branch of the tree to which he had attached the reins.

Thus left to herself, Maud rapidly recovered her composure.

The tears she shed wonderfully relieved her breast, and in a moment or so she made an attempt to rise.

The stranger at once hastened forward and assisted her.

"You are better now, I hope?"

"Yes—yes," answered Maud, with some slight hesitation, for she fancied the stranger had an admiring eye upon her. "My best thanks, sir, are your due, though I cannot express myself."

"Tush—tush!"

"It is in vain for you to attempt generously to underrate the service which you have rendered me. I am well aware that but for your most timely interposition I should before this have fallen a victim to that woman's fury."

Maud could not avoid shuddering and glancing around her while she spoke.

"She is gone now," the stranger hastened to remark, in reassuring tones. "But did she really mean murder?"

"I fear so."

The stranger looked at once curious and interested.

Maud briefly told him that circumstances had induced her to take up a temporary abode in Mill Cottage, and the result.

"You have had a fortunate escape," he said; "and I rejoice to think that chance should have led me in this direction."

"I am deeply grateful to you, I assure you, but——"

"No more—no more. Excuse me, but if I am any judge, I should say from your manner that you had some other cause for grief and trouble than even this."

Maud was silent.

"Don't think me intrusive," he continued, "but, if there is anything else I can do to save you, you have only to name it, and I am quite at your disposal."

"Thanks—many thanks," said Maud, speaking with difficulty through her tears. "It may sound ungrateful, and yet the only favour I can ask you is to leave."

"And it is the one that I should grant with the most difficulty. But, however, if you persist——"

"It must be so! Do not be offended, but—but——"

"Why do you pause? What would you say?"

"Simply leave me!"

"Enough."

The stranger took off his hat, and made a bow that was full of grace.

"Farewell, since you will have it so, but, take my word for it, these roads are by no means safe for a woman to travel alone and unprotected, so, if you are going far——"

"I am not afraid," Maud answered. "But do not press me further, I am distracted."

"I can see that you are much troubled, and that is why I urge you thus. Under other circumstances, rely upon it I should not do so."

"I appreciate your kind intent, and believe me when I say that I feel deeply grateful; but still I must renew my request."

"You are strangely persistent, and must have some strong reason for being so, I make no doubt. Since you will have it so, once more farewell."

This time he not only bowed, but went to the spot where he had left his horse, unfastened the noble animal from the bough, and with one bound vaulted clean into the saddle.

But he did not so readily take his departure.

"It is not yet too late," he said. "Forgive me for being thus urgent, but I feel that I ought not to leave you thus. Let that be my apology."

"No apology is needed, sir," answered Maud, who could not feel offended at the manifestation of so much interest in her behalf, for she was judge enough of human nature to feel certain that it was well-intentioned.

"And you are still resolved to go alone?"

"I am."

"Once more good night, then. Let me say, however, that I feel more than a common interest in this encounter. Why I should do so I know not. There is, too, a presentiment upon my mind to the effect that we shall meet again—that we are destined to become much better acquainted with each other. However, this will be proved by time."

While speaking these words, he turned his horse round and, reiterating the word "Farewell!" rode slowly away, as though in the expectation that at this, the last moment, Maud would call to him to come back.

Ere he had gone much more than a dozen paces he stopped again.

"I forgot to mention," he added, "that my name is Hawk—commonly known as Captain Hawk; and if ever you find yourself in any great distress, you can hear of me at the old inn about a mile further along the road—the Horns they call it. Speak to the landlord—he will tell you all about me, and if what you want lies within the power of mortal man to accomplish, I will do it. Now, for the last time, farewell!"

Having made this singular speech, the stranger—or Captain Hawk, as we may as well call him, since he had given himself that designation—struck spurs to his steed, and galloped off.

As may be supposed, his last words took Maud quite by surprise, and as she watched his retreating form she murmured to herself:

"Captain Hawk, and the old Horns Inn upon this road. I will not forget that. I like him, for he seems bold and generous. He has a face, too, which would command trust and confidence in any breast. I may require his aid—Heaven knows!—and I ought not to despise it, for where—where am I to look for a friend?"

This question brought Maud back to a full sense of her present wretched, desolate position.

Wringing her hands, she burst out into a violent fit of sobbing and weeping.

The paroxysm lasted for some time; but of course, eventually it expended itself, and she began to think a little more calmly about her position and prospects.

"Where am I now?" she asked herself, as she glanced around at all the objects about her now beautifully revealed by the moon's rays.

She had not, of course, the least idea of her whereabouts.

Everything she looked at was fresh and strange to her.

She wrung her hands again, and once more her tears poured forth.

She began to be sensible that she ought not so readily to have refused the stranger's offer of assistance, for at each moment she began to be more and more sensible of the difficulties by which she was environed, and from which she was not able to see the way to an extrication.

"What shall be my first step?" she murmured, half aloud. "Alas! I fear that all my efforts will be of no avail! Too late—too late! Dick and the rest are, beyond doubt, by this time either slain, or else prisoners in the hands of the police, and it is my fault—all my fault! I ought to have warned them, and failed to do so!"

Maud was scarcely right in thus taking all the blame to herself, and yet she did so.

"But it is suspense that I suffer now," she continued; "and what can be worse than that? Nothing—nothing! It would be better far if I was able to comprehend the full extent of my misfortunes, for how do I know whether Dick is alive or dead?"

Tears again choked her utterance, and this time she seemed to abandon herself to her grief more than she had done on any former occasion.

As before, however, the violence of her grief abated.

"I must and will know the worst! I will set about that at once! That shall be my course!"

As she made this resolution she dried her tears, and plucked up what resolution she was able.

But another difficulty presented itself to her, and the readiness with which it started into her mind only serves to show how thickly she was beset by them.

No matter which way she turned, one sprung up before her.

She had determined to discover what had befallen Dick and his comrades.

But how was she to do it?

In vain she endeavoured to frame some reply to this pertinent question.

She knew not which way to turn.

Once she thought of making her way towards London, where, as she knew full well, she should quickly learn what had happened.

But she had not the remotest notion of which way to take in order to reach the metropolis.

There was not one thing she knew to guide her.

Then she thought perhaps something could be learned at the ruined castle.

But here again the same difficulty confronted her.

She knew the way there no better than to London.

Upon consideration, however, she believed she could find her way back to this place, and then, if her inquiries here proved futile, she could but go on to the metropolis.

Scarcely, however, had she reached this point in her deliberations than she heard the sharp clatter of a horse's hoofs.

She was well enough experienced in such sounds to know that it was a single horseman who was approaching.

Not wishing to be seen, she drew back to one side of the road, where an umbrageous tree cast a deep shadow.

This position had not been occupied many seconds before Maud, to her great surprise, saw her protector come in view

"Why—why," she said, "surely that is Captain Hawk! What can bring him back this way?"

It would seem strange he should thus have altered his direction.

Maud looked again, fancying some accidental resemblance had misled her.

But no.

The moon, which was shining so brightly, poured her full light upon him as he advanced, and made anything like difficulty of identification impossible.

Maud's immediate thought now was that he might be able to direct her to the ruined castle.

Should she ask him?

There was no time to deliberate.

She made up her mind to do so, for it was hard to say how long it would be before she had another opportunity.

Acting upon this decision, she stepped out of the shadow on to a spot where the moon's rays fell undimmed.

Captain Hawk saw her immediately.

She knew it, for the ejaculation to which he gave utterance was carried to her ears.

He pulled up with great abruptness, and the manner in which his steed rose upon his haunches, in his endeavour to check his speed, told Maud how swiftly he had been coming on.

"One word," she said—"only one!"

He did not reply, but simply held up his hand as though he would have commanded silence.

At the same time he turned his ear in the direction from which he had just come, and listened intently for several seconds.

Seeing him do so thrilled Maud strangely.

It was an action she had seen Dick perform hundreds of times.

"I can spare a moment or so," he said, patting his panting steed; "but, you see, urgent business has compelled me to ride swiftly back to-night. However, as I said, I am now and ever at your service. Command me!"

"Many thanks," said Maud; "but the favour I require will scarcely detain you a second."

"Speak—speak!" he said. "Speak freely."

Then, in an altered tone, he exclaimed:

"Quiet, Satan—quiet, I say! Stand still, Satan! Woa, old boy!"

These last words were addressed to his horse, which Maud noticed now more particularly than she had yet done.

It was of a magnificent jetty black—truly, a beautiful creature—such a piece of horseflesh as one rarely sees in a whole lifetime.

No briefer or more fitting description could be found than that given by Shakspere of the steed of Adonis:—

"Round hoof'd, short jointed, fetlocks shag and long,
Broad breast, full eye, small head and nostril wide,
High crest, short ears, straight legs, and passing strong,
Thin mane, thick tail, broad buttock, tender hide,
And what a horse should have he did not lack."

As she gazed upon him, Maud's thought was, that if a match or mate for Black Bess was anywhere to be found it certainly stood before her.

But she had not then a very good opportunity of observing him closely, for she could tell, in spite of the rider's manner, that he was most anxious to be off.

What struck Maud most was the strange name which had been given to the steed, and under any less pressing circumstances she would certainly have asked what had led to his receiving so unusual a designation.

As it was, however, she contented herself merely with inquiring the way to the ruins.

"Comynge Castle?" repeated the stranger, slowly. "I have heard the name somewhere, but I cannot remember where."

He observed the look of disappointment which clouded Maud's face, and asked:

"Can you describe the place? I may know it well by sight if not by name."

As well as she was able, Maud gave a description of it.

"Yes—yes, I know now. And it puzzles me how I forgot. Why, you have but to keep straight on the way I have just come till you reach the top of a steep hill. Then, if you look over the fields to the left, you will see the gray walls plainly enough in the moonlight. Ha! I hear them now," he broke in, abruptly. "They still keep at me. If I am not quick," he added, addressing Maud, "my friends will overtake me. Good-night. We shall meet again."

Without waiting for her to utter a syllable, he let the reins fall upon his impatient courser's neck.

No other impulse forward was needful.

Away he flew almost with the speed of an arrow newly discharged from a bow.

A bend in the road quickly took both horse and rider from Maud's sight.

Strange thoughts were passing through her brain.

What to think of her new acquaintance she scarcely knew. It was evident, however, that he was no ordinary individual.

Further reflection was at this moment cut short, for the sound which now reached Maud's ears was such as to fill her mind with the liveliest apprehension.

It was that produced by the hoofbeats of a number of horses—a dozen at the least.

Maud, had she been asked, could not have told why she felt alarmed, nor why she felt impelled to break her way through a narrow gap in the hedge and crouch down, trembling, out of sight.

She had not taken up her quarters here very long before the horsemen whose approach she had heard came in sight.

Maud could see them plainly through the interstices near the roots of the hedgerow.

Upon catching sight of them, she had to compress her lips very tightly to suppress a scream.

Then she crouched down—lower—lower down, though this was needless, for there was scarcely a possibility that she could be seen.

The riders were police officers, every one of them.

They were all well mounted and well armed.

They were lashing and spurring their steeds most unmercifully, and dashed by Maud's place of concealment like a whirlwind.

There was a jingling of accoutrements—

A cloud of dust.

Then they swept round the corner we have already mentioned.

But it was not until long after the heavy clatter of their horses' feet had died away that Maud ventured to look up.

Even then she trembled so excessively that she was scarcely able to rise to her feet.

The danger, however, was over, and when once assured of it Maud thought of her determination, and forced her way into the high-road again.

It was not more certain that they were police officers who had dashed by than it was that they were in pursuit of the so-called Captain Hawk.

But why?

Maud, of course, was not in a position to return any definite answer to this question, and, moreover, her own affairs now pressed too much upon her mind to allow her to reflect upon any foreign subject.

At the same time, she could not help acknowledging to herself that she fully shared in the presentiment that they were destined to become much better acquainted with each other.

The dread she was in about the officers who had passed by lent great speed to her feet, so that she reached the summit of the hill Captain Hawk had mentioned in much less time than she would have done under ordinary circumstances.

Panting and tired, she stood upon this piece of elevated ground, and strained her eyes in the endeavour to catch sight of that well-known place, which almost seemed to her like a home from the length of time she had sojourned there.

The sight of it seemed to have the effect of restoring her failing energies.

Now that her destination was in sight, she seemed all at once to become possessed of the requisite vigour to reach it.

That she should be so near to the ruins seems very strange. Such, however, was the fact, and it only serves to show how much she must have doubled upon her course.

The descent of the hill was accomplished without much difficulty, and then Maud had the boldness to strike off across the meadows, keeping her eyes fixed upon the tall keep of the castle, which, from its great height, formed a conspicuous object in the landscape.

But as she wearily walked on, she found that the distance she had to go was much greater than it had appeared to be.

To her it seemed that as she advanced so did the ruins retreat, thus mocking all her efforts to reach them.

More than once she was glad enough to sink down and rest her weary limbs.

Nothing but the strong, all-powerful desire to ascertain if possible the fate of her husband and his companions could have kept her up.

But the longest and most tedious journey must come to an end at last.

After the lapse, then, of a long, long time—so long that Maud was unable to form a clear idea of its duration—the outer portion of the ruined castle was gained.

Maud's heart now beat so fast as almost to prevent her breathing.

Indeed, she believed nothing could save her from swooning.

Urged by that all-conquering desire, she feebly struggled on.

The old castle had a spectral, ghastly look, as the moon poured her flood of light upon its gray and crumbling walls.

Almost oppressive silence, too, reigned around—a silence which Maud thought was horribly suggestive of the tomb, and most disastrous to the hopes in which she had indulged.

It was when she had fathomed the very lowest depths of despair that she heard a voice give vent to a glad cry.

"Maud—Maud—Maud!" said a well-known voice. "It is I! I am here—I am here!"

CHAPTER MAAXVII.

DICK TURPIN AND MAUD ARE SURPRISED BY THE OFFICERS IN THE RUINS.

Had not these words been followed by the sound of rapid footsteps, and had she not caught sight of a well-known form hastening towards her, Maud would have concluded that she had been the victim of some cruel delusion.

Fortunately, she was spared this pang additional to those which she had already suffered.

But her joy had almost as great an effect upon her as a shock of grief or disappointment.

The next moment she found herself in the arms of the one she loved so truly and so well.

So exhausted was she bodily, and so completely overcome mentally, that for some time she could do nothing more than remain half passive in Dick's arms.

While remaining thus, and only in a state of semi-consciousness, the past, and all the horrors she had gone through, seemed by far more like some hideous dream than stern reality.

Was she waking then, she asked herself, or was she dreaming now?

The last question there was difficulty in making a reply to.

All—all was real.

But by what chance could it be, she again mentally inquired, that Dick was there, to all appearances safe and unhurt—just in the very place she had set out from in order expressly to warn him from approaching, and where—greatest mystery of all—he was, beyond all doubt, quite secure and safe?

Such interrogations as these thronging thickly in her mind might well confuse Maud's brain, and make her close her eyes in an attempt to think calmly and clearly.

"Rouse up—arouse yourself!" she heard Dick say, for he fancied, from her closed eyes and pallid cheeks, that she had fainted. "You are in no danger now, and—and you are not hurt, I trust?"

Dick pronounced these words with considerable diffidence.

The first tumult of joy which he experienced when he first caught sight of her had made him forgetful of such a contingency as this.

Now that the idea had occurred to him, however, he suffered a thousand apprehensions, for he sadly feared by Maud's manner that she had suffered some fearful accident.

"No—no," she murmured, feebly, "I shall be better soon. Water—water!"

"Tom," said Dick, in a loud voice—"Tom Davis!"

Tom Davis came forward.

"Here I am, captain. What's amiss?"

Some water, now, at once!"

Tom started off at full speed.

There was a plentiful supply of clear spring water in the ruins, which had been of the greatest service to the highwaymen during their sojourn there, and Davis made his way to it at once.

He quickly returned.

Maud drank a little of the water—but very little.

The remainder Dick sprinkled in her face.

After this, she was considerably revived.

"Is it possible," she asked—"can it be possible that you are here safe and unhurt?"

"Quite. And you?"

"Not much hurt. But never mind now—tell me about yourself?"

"Nay—nay! I must first be satisfied——"

"Take my word for it," she said; "all is well."

"But where have you been? and where is Jack?"

"Alas—alas!"

"Do not weep—but speak; tell me—relieve me from the terrible suspense which I now endure!"

"I discovered the presence of the officers here, and knew they intended to wait in ambush till you had descended——"

"Yes—yes—I know all that!"

"You know it?"

"Certainly."

"Then my curiosity is greater than yours. How have you escaped?"

"I will tell you, but I must hear about your proceedings first. No hesitation—your curiosity will be most speedily allayed by a prompt compliance, for in this case I will take no denial."

Maud knew very well that when Turpin had once expressed himself positively on any occasion it was quite futile to induce him to change his mind, so she at once began the recital of those events which are already well known to the reader.

It may perhaps be imagined with what amount of astonishment and dismay Dick listened to her narrative.

When she had concluded, he drew a long breath, and said:

"Thank Heaven that is over, and that I have heard the last of these perils! I had imagined, as I thought, the worst of evils, but never dreamt of such a succession of calamities as I have heard."

But Maud's impatience was so great that she could scarcely listen to these few remarks, but eagerly she sought him to let her know by what means he had managed to escape his foes.

Dick finished with these words:

"I felt convinced," he said, "but I know not why, that I should find you somewhere near the ruins, and hence my presence here to-night. My fear was, however, that you had fallen into the power of the officers."

"No—no, I should have warned you, had I been able."

"I find so! Tom King was nearly right in his guess, but a kind of fascination seemed to draw me to this place. There was peril and hazard in approaching here, but I was careful."

"Have the officers departed?"

"Yes, they have gone. I was in time to see the men depart who had been left in charge. It seems every part of the ruins has undergone a rigid scrutiny, and from what I overheard——"

"Overheard?"

"Yes; on first reaching here, upon finding the men were present, I crept as close to them as I could, in the hope of hearing something about you."

"I understand."

"I gathered from their conversation that a large amount of money had been discovered, buried near the spot where we remained so long."

[BLACK BESS LEAPS THE WALL.]

"The secret chamber."

"Yes, that was the spot. The amount is great. Upon hearing of it I could not help thinking of your long-expressed wish——"

"Yes—yes."

"Of leaving England."

Maud sighed deeply.

"That would have furnished us with sufficient to have lived on in some foreign land, for there are times when this wild life palls upon me, and most of all has it done so during your disappearance."

No words can tell what an amount of joy those words infused into Maud's breast.

She flattered herself with the idea that she could now see something like a prospect of the realisation of the dearest wish of her heart.

Oh, if she could only keep Dick in his present humour, she fancied there would soon be an end of all those perilous accidents which they had suffered!

To Maud, the prospect of a residence in some other land, where they would have nothing more to fear from the power of the law, was like the anticipation of a calm, safe harbour and the charms of home to some far-out-at-sea and storm-tossed mariner.

There was rest, peace, happiness, and safety, to look forward to.

"It would yet be possible, I think," she said, after a few moments' pause, for at first she was too much overcome to utter a syllable. "Believe me, it is my one wish, the great desire I wish to have gratified. Oh, if you only knew what happiness it would bring to my weary heart you would not deny me!"

"I feel that I ought not," said Dick. "You have already made by far too many sacrifices on my behalf. I will promise you to take into full consideration all you urge, and the next time we all meet together the subject shall be fully discussed. If it is practicable it can be done."

Maud was quite contented with this promise. She knew full well that it was not lightly made.

She wept plentifully.

"Dry your tears," said Dick, "or I shall change my mind. I want to see smiles, not tears."

"They are tears of joy, Dick," she sobbed. "I shall be calm soon."

At length Maud looked up, and said, quietly:

"Where was it that you appointed to meet the rest?"

"Not far from here; and as soon as you have recovered yourself we will set out, for the time now is overpast."

"I am ready."

"And what will be your next step?"

"That I scarcely know. For one thing, however, I shall propose that for the present we once more take up our quarters in the ruins."

"In the ruins?" asked Maud, scarcely able to believe that she had heard aright.

"Yes."

"But you forget the police officers."

"Indeed I do not, nor those who have been set here to guard the place; but I have certain knowledge that the guard will be no longer kept. The officers will never suspect we have had the audacity to come back, and in all probability the old castle will be more left to itself than it has ever been."

The moment Dick made this remark, Maud was much struck by the force of it.

What more unlikely place could there now be than this for them to be concealed in? She would never have guessed, and she felt certain the officers would not be cunning enough to do so.

"You are right," she said. "At first, the audacity of the proposal staggered me——"

"That is just what I rely upon for success," answered Turpin; "the bold course is always the best."

"And then what will be your next step?"

"We will reserve the consideration of that until we all meet again; we shall then have many important things to arrange and settle."

It was at this moment that Tom Davis came running towards them with the utmost consternation in his looks.

"Captain—captain!" he gasped.

"Well, what now?"

"Up—up! Be quick, or you will be too late! Follow me!"

"What is the matter?"

"We must have been watched to this place."

"Watched?"

"Yes, or else Maud, for a large troop of officers have crept cautiously up to the castle walls. I did not discover their presence until almost upon them. Quick—quick, or we shall be too late to escape, for they intend to surround the castle, and in such a manner as to prevent all possibility of exit from its walls, and we must be off before the circle is completed."

This was startling intelligence indeed, and it came upon both Maud and Dick with more than usual force, for they had only just reasoned themselves into the comfortable belief that they were perfectly safe in their present quarters.

Indeed, for at least a second Dick was quite incredulous.

"You needn't stare like that, captain," cried Davis—"it's true. Come, come, we must be into the saddle at once!"

Recovering himself from his shock of surprise, Dick hastened after his faithful ally.

Maud was greatly alarmed as this intelligence, and, what was more, she was much angered with herself.

She believed that the police officers must have tracked her to the ruins, and she much blamed herself for having approached with so little caution.

She well remembered that from the moment she commenced the descent of the hill, from the summit of which she had caught the first glimpse of the castle, she had never once turned her head to look behind her.

The fact was, the state of excitement under which she laboured was by far too great for her to think of any of these things!

Now she blamed herself for her remissness.

When the first shock of surprise was over with her she hastened to follow Dick, for she seemed in a moment to realise the importance of immediate flight.

The distance to the place where the horses had been left was not great, and the reader may rest assured that no time was lost in mounting.

Tom Davis had been so fortunate as to provide himself with a horse, and Turpin wished that another could have been found for Maud, as in that case all their future operations would have been rendered much easier and agreeable.

It was a deficiency which Dick, at the moment when he swung Maud on to the front of the saddle before him, determined should be supplied at the earliest moment.

There could now no longer be any doubt as to the correctness of the information which Tom Davis had given; and had there been any lingering spark of incredulity in Turpin's mind it must have been quenched by what he next beheld.

A number of well-armed police officers came into sight

No sooner did they catch sight of the little party of our friends than they gave utterance to a loud shout, which certainly seemed more like one of intense surprise than aught else.

But this surprise they rapidly recovered themselves from, and rushed forward intent upon an attack.

Dick, however, was in no humour for an encounter.

But he was in readiness to start.

He merely called out to Tom.

"Forward," he cried—"forward at your best speed!"

He set Black Bess in motion as he thus spoke.

The gallant animal then, as on many a previous occasion, made no account whatever of her double burden.

Tom Davis was well mounted, so he kept behind Dick without much trouble, for of course in that confined area Black Bess could not put out any extraordinary speed.

The officers immediately commenced a pursuit; but what troubled Dick more than this was the fact that one of them placed a small whistle to his lips, which he sounded so shrilly that all the ruins echoed and re-echoed, and most certainly no one but a boatswain could have piped better.

This was a signal which doubtless would be well understood by the other police officers at hand.

"Forward!" said Dick again. "The sharper we are in our movements the better it will be for us."

"Go on, captain," said Tom. "I will keep close enough behind you, never fear."

At this moment Dick turned the angle of a bastion, and the very instant that he did so he became conscious that he had just committed a very unfortunate action.

He had run full tilt upon another party of officers.

They joined at once in full cry.

But Dick dashed on.

In spite of being thus taken at unawares, he knew as if by intuition that the only chance he had lay in keeping on.

Straight in his path, however, was an old stone wall.

The height was enough to make every prudent horseman pause and consider well before he made the attempt to put his horse to overleap it.

The officers uttered shouts of triumph, and began to close round in a kind of circle, thinking, no doubt, that this wall would prove a barrier to the highwayman's further progress, especially as his steed carried a double burden.

But Dick held on steadily

"Over, Bess, old lass!" he cried, in an inspiriting voice, when within a short distance of the truly formidable obstacle.

That was the only incitement she required.

But it was observable that the noble creature gathered herself together, so to speak, and prepared to make a more than ordinary effort.

Up she rose in the air, almost as though without any muscular exertion on her part, or as though she had been suddenly raised by some supernatural and invisible power.

For a fleeting portion of time she was seen clearly above the obstacle, and then, in the twinkling of an eye afterwards, she alighted safely and gently on the other side.

This was a sight which could not fail to excite some emotions of admiration in every breast, but the feeling by which the officers were actuated was far more like aggravation than aught else.

One of those in command of the rest no sooner saw Black Bess rise from the ground than he made sure the wall would be cleared easily, in which he was proved to be right.

He gave vent to a cry of rage and disappointment.

At the same time he rushed forward.

He held a cocked and loaded pistol in his extended hand.

His cry seemed to be taken by some more of his followers as a signal to rush forward as well, but perhaps they were only influenced by mere example.

Be it how it may, they advanced, and had any immediate effect followed the shot which their leader now fired, they would have been in readiness to act.

The pistol which, without any note of warning, had been discharged at the fugitives just as they were clearing the wall was not to all appearances, of any good whatever.

The fury of the officer was on the increase rather than otherwise, for he flung the discharged pistol over the wall with the full fury of his arm.

But despite the vigour with which the missile was hurled, it fell harmlessly upon the long rank grass, for Dick was by this time far ahead.

Not once had he paused, but had kept all his energies bent upon the execution of one task—that of getting quite clear from the ruins of the castle in the shortest possible space of time.

CHAPTER MXXXVIII.

DICK TURPIN IS WITNESS OF A VERY EXCITING INCIDENT.

"Are you hurt, Maud?" was, however, Dick's first anxious question after the report of the pistol had died away.

"No. Are you?"

"I am whole and sound."

"And Bess?"

"Whole and sound too, to the very best of my belief. I heard the bullet whiz above me. We must have begun to descend just when he pulled the trigger."

Maud shuddered.

Such narrow escapes as these—escapes which might literally be called miraculous—were truly terrible.

The horse which Tom Davis bestrode displayed his qualities to good advantage on this occasion.

The wall was surmounted with tolerable ease, and he was able to keep at the heels of Black Bess without Dick having to keep much check upon the rein.

It became evident though that the officers did not intend to let them off any more easily than they could help, for they at once organised a pursuit which, in all fairness, must be said to have commenced with really military alertness.

But our friends had the start, and there was every probability that, provided no remarkable and unforeseen accident occurred, they would succeed in keeping it.

A chase, nevertheless, is proverbially a very doubtful matter.

Like a race, it is sometimes neither the swiftest nor the best that wins.

"Tom," said Dick, in a loud voice, so that there should be no fear about his words being misunderstood, "just let me see what speed you can make—push on to the best of your ability. Never fear that I shall be left behind."

Tom Davis immediately complied, and the advantage of this method of procedure soon made itself manifest, for it prevented Dick from unduly checking his own mare's speed in order to render it accordant with that of his companion's.

On came the officers, however, with remarkable vigour and spirit.

All at once there was a kind of consternation in the rear, and not one of our friends could resist the temptation of looking back in order to ascertain by what it was occasioned.

The moon still continued to shine with a brilliancy which enabled them to distinguish objects at a considerable distance.

Behind them, and distinctly visible in consequence of the position which it occupied, was the old castle.

Not far from the outer walls they immediately caught sight of what had certainly distracted the attention of the pursuing officers.

This was nothing more nor less than a man mounted upon a magnificent black steed, which seemed to fly over the ground with the speed and grace of an antelope.

The horseman sat in the saddle with the unmistakable ease of one who has perfectly mastered the by no means easy science of riding.

In fact as he bounded on at this tremendous pace it might be said of him that—

> "He grew unto his seat,
> And to such wondrous doing brought his horse,
> As he had been incorpsed and demi-natured
> With the brave beast."

Almost immediately afterwards a small troop of police officers emerged from behind a clump of trees.

They were most certainly in full pursuit.

On they went with full hue and cry.

So excited was Dick by this singular spectacle that he totally forgot all about the peril in which he himself stood.

His curiosity was raised to the utmost pitch.

The rider was a total stranger to him, and Dick was confident he could never have so much as glanced at that magnificent horse and have forgotten him.

The course taken by this flying horseman served to bring him each moment more distinctly to the view of our friends.

From the first Maud had watched him with the closest attention, and now she exclaimed:

"Yes, yes—I am certain I am right—it can be no other."

These words served to bring Dick back to a recollection of what was passing around him at the present moment.

"Who—who?" he asked, quickly. "What do you mean?"

"Why, I am certain that is the stranger of whom I spoke."

"That flying horseman?"

"Yes—Captain Hawk."

"Captain Hawk!" repeated Dick, musingly, as though he had a kind of half recollection that he had somewhere heard that name before.

"Yes. Look now! Did you ever see such a noble steed?"

"Never but one," answered Dick.

He patted Black Bess upon the neck while he spoke.

The pace at which Captain Hawk was going was something extraordinary.

And now a rather singular event took place.

That small knot of police officers who were in pursuit of Captain Hawk stood not the remotest chance of overtaking him.

He went two steps to their one.

The distance between them, therefore, could be seen to increase visibly every moment.

By the manner in which the captain pushed on it would seem as though he had decided upon the policy of having a sharp push and getting the pursuit over with as little delay as possible.

The course he took, however, was such as to cause him to approach in a diagonal direction on the large troop of officers who were in pursuit of Turpin.

Of this the captain must have been ignorant.

It would never occur to him that two parties of officers were out, and owing to the nature of his position it was scarcely possible that he could perceive them.

The troop of police officers seemed aware of this, and also to arrive at the conclusion that the capture of Dick was a very doubtful matter, while that of Captain Hawk seemed certain, for if he held on he would dash right into them.

On came Satan in that tremendous style which could not fail to rivet the attention of every beholder.

The officers came to a halt.

No doubt it was galling to give Dick up in this manner, but they were resolved to make a prisoner somehow.

It may seem strange that they did not divide their force, but then it must be considered that if they had lone this Captain Hawk would have seen them in time.

Dick was not a little surprised at this sudden change in the behaviour of the officers, but he was not long in comprehending their tactics.

What greatly astonished him was that they should abandon a pursuit of him in favour of somebody else.

Previously to that moment he had the vanity to suppose that he was of more importance to them than anyone else.

Their conduct on the present occasion served to show, however, that this was a mistake.

As may be supposed, Dick's curiosity respecting this Captain Hawk greatly increased.

Who could he be?

What had he done that the police officers should be so exceedingly solicitous about his capture?

These were the questions which Dick asked himself, but without being able to give an answer, though he was vaguely conscious of having heard his name mentioned by some one.

Beyond this his memory did not serve him.

"Dick—Dick!" cried Maud, who was attentively watching all that was going on—"Dick, he does not see them. He is riding to his death."

"He is indeed!"

Dick had also brought his mare to a standstill, and so had Tom, now that the officers were no longer in pursuit.

Clearly, however, so far as their own safety was concerned, they ought to have made the best of their speed away.

Dick could not tear himself from the spot, so extreme was his interest.

"Can you not save him?" asked Maud, with deep anxiety.

"I have every wish to do so, but I fear it is an impossibility."

"But you cannot see him perish before our eyes! Remember, he was kind and generous enough to render me a service!"

"Do not fear I should forget it. But what can I do against so many?"

Maud sighed.

"I'll tell you what you might do," said Tom. "You might attract his attention to us, and then perhaps we could by signals apprise him of the danger with which he was threatened."

"A very good suggestion, Tom. A pistol will do it, I fancy."

"Beyond a doubt it will."

"Here goes, then."

Suiting the action to the word, Dick drew forth one of his pistols.

He pointed it upwards and pulled the trigger.

The sharp discharge which followed rang out clearly over hill and dale.

It attracted the immediate attention of Captain Hawk, for to him such a sound could bode nothing but danger.

When once the captain looked towards our friends they came forward and took up such positions as would render them more easily to be seen.

When this was done, they waved their arms and pointed to the spot where the officers had—if we may be allowed the term—ambushed themselves.

Captain Hawk was indisputably quick of apprehension.

He might not have known just why Dick and Tom Davis pointed, but he guessed that danger lay in that direction, and abruptly changed his course to one that lay nearly at right angles to it.

With a politeness that seemed to form part of his nature, he did not thus turn aside until he had acknowledged, by a graceful wave of his hat, the good service Dick had rendered him.

Not for long, however, was he in ignorance of what kind of danger he had been threatened with.

The discovery that their intended prey had been warned, filled the officers with ungovernable fury.

They could restrain themselves no longer.

Uttering loud yells and shouts, they rushed forth from their concealment.

"Divide—divide!" cried the leader. "Divide, I say!"

This vague order was productive of a little confusion, and yet in a short space of time the officers, now forming two parties, were in full chase.

It would have been a very great satisfaction to Dick could he but have seen how the captain further fared.

It was important, however, that he should see to his own safety.

In less than a moment various intervening objects hid him from view.

The brief pause that had so strangely taken place was productive of one good effect.

It had enabled Black Bess thoroughly to recover her wind and strength, for, of course, it was a very different thing for her to carry a double burden at such a rapid rate instead of a single one.

It was, therefore, with renewed vigour and spirit that she set forward for the second time.

The same arrangement was adopted as before—that is to say, Tom Davis rode on first at the best speed his horse could make, while Dick followed at his heels.

From time to time, however, Maud looked across the country whenever she had the opportunity, in the hope of again catching sight of Captain Hawk, but all trace of him appeared now to be lost.

With uniform steadiness Dick found that he was increasing his distance from the officers, so that unless they were reinforced by fresh horses, or in case an accident occurred to our friends, it was almost impossible a capture should be effected.

It was just about half an hour after this that Dick called out to Tom Davis to come to a halt, and at the same time tightened his rein.

He chose an elevated piece of ground for doing this.

Some time had elapsed since he had seen or even heard anything of the police officers, and he was anxious to ascertain if he could whether or not they had abandoned the chase.

Having pulled up, then, he looked back.

He was agreeably surprised to find that his position commanded a much more extensive view of the surrounding scenery than he had expected, though the moon, having now declined towards the west, no longer poured forth her light with such effulgence as hitherto.

Still he could see tolerably well.

He continued his scrutiny for some moments, but without being able to catch a glimpse of his foes.

"I believe I may venture to say all is well. I can see nothing of them."

"Nor I," answered Tom, "nor hear either."

"Then in that case I think we may venture to direct our course to our destination, which I had hoped to reach long ere this."

He was about to urge Black Bess forward, when Tom cried, somewhat suddenly:

"I can hear something now, captain."

"Hear what?"

"Listen!"

Dick did so.

"A single horseman?" he said, interrogatively.

"Yes."

"Well, he cannot concern us. Forward once more!"

Tom did not offer to show the least hesitation, but set his horse in motion at once.

Now, it is rather singular that both should have fallen into an error concerning the sound they heard.

As to its character there could be no mistake—most certainly a single horseman was approaching.

But without saying so to each other, and without pausing to consider carefully, both Turpin and Tom Davis came to the conclusion that this horseman was on the road behind them.

They had not gone very far before they became aware that just the opposite was the case.

The horseman was on the road before them, and, what was more, he was approaching them, and that, too, at no common rate of speed.

They all became conscious of this at the same instant, but Maud was the first to remark upon it.

"It is some one approaching us," she said.

"Yes, clearly so," answered Dick, "though I thought otherwise."

"What shall we do, captain?" asked Davis.

"Ride on," replied Turpin. "I see no reason why we should trouble ourselves to go out of our way for any chance passenger, and we are late enough already."

"He may pass without taking any notice of us, captain."

"He is most likely to do so."

"Push on, then—we will pass him rapidly."

Just at this moment they reached a spot where the road bent round at a somewhat acute angle, and afterwards stretched out for a great distance in a perfectly straight line.

They then caught sight of the horseman, and Maud uttered a sharp cry.

"What is the matter?" Dick asked, anxiously.

"Nothing—nothing—but—but—yes—yes—I am sure it must be!"

"What—what?"

"Captain Hawk!"

Maud pointed at the horseman as she pronounced the name.

He seemed to be coming on more swiftly than ever.

"I do believe it is," said Dick.

"I am certain of it," answered Maud.

"But by what means short of magic can he have got here?"

"I know not, but he seems to haunt us like a shadow."

"He does indeed. Who he can be puzzles me, and why he should be so fond of riding into the very mouth of danger is something which passes my comprehension."

"How furiously he comes now!"

"Yes; we will stand aside and allow him free passage, otherwise he may do us a mischief."

Considering the undiminished rate at which this eccentric being was coming on, it certainly seemed no more than wise to adopt this precaution.

Very much to the astonishment of all three of our friends, however, they had no sooner made this change than they perceived him slacken speed.

He was drawing the rein very tightly.

The horse was such a powerful-looking creature that it seemed strange for a slim, slight figure like that of Captain Hawk to possess such absolute control over him.

The noble animal, however, despite his tricksiness, was perfectly obedient to the rein.

"What on earth can he be pulling up for?" asked Dick.

This proceeding was quite as singular as any of his others, and only in accordance with that eccentricity which seemed to govern all his actions.

Dick wondered whether he had caught sight of Maud and himself.

This was a point about which they were destined not to wait for a very long time in doubt.

The captain halted within half a dozen paces of where they stood.

"Excuse me," he said, as he removed his hat from his head and made a bow. "It is odd to introduce oneself thus, but I am not altogether a stranger, since I had the pleasure of rendering that young lady a service a little while ago."

"I am very glad to see you," said Dick, "for I feel deeply indebted to——"

"Now, no more of that! I am indebted to you. Thanks for arresting my attention, or I should have dashed headlong into those fellows. You seem surprised to see me riding back, but I thought I would, if possible, embrace the opportunity of thanking you for the warning that you gave."

CHAPTER MXXXIX.

DICK TURPIN TAKES QUITE A FANCY TO CAPTAIN HAWK.

THERE was something verging very closely upon the ludicrous in the coolness and carelessness with which Captain Hawk pronounced these words.

The idea that a man, instead of getting as far away from his foes as he could, should actually turn round again and gallop back, with no other object than that which he had expressed, was certainly out of all character.

Dick Turpin thought so, and said:

"You are very welcome, and I am glad you got off so easily; still, I should scarcely have expected that you should take the trouble, and also run the risk of——"

"Galloping back again, I suppose you were going to say," interrupted the captain, with a merry laugh. "Bless you! I think nothing of it, for, thanks to Satan——"

"To Satan?" echoed Dick.

"Not his infernal majesty, by any means," answered the captain, "but to my horse here, whose equal never did and never can exist. He is matchless in every attribute that a horse should possess."

Dick gave a peculiar smile.

"You think so," he said.

"I am certain of it."

"Then I beg to differ."

"Differ?"

"Yes, and, without offence, I hope you will permit me to say that, while admitting yours is a noble creature, and one which you ought to prize as you do your own life, yet I have one in my possession that I cannot allow to be inferior to him in any respect whatever."

"Indeed!" said the stranger, somewhat stiffly. "You are welcome to your own opinion, but you must not expect me to subscribe to it."

"Just so, and allow me to make the same remark."

"Certainly. There is but one steed in the whole world to which I can believe my Satan to be inferior, and that steed I would give much to see. I have heard much of it by report, but I am not disposed to credit more than half of the wonderful stories that I hear. But even if I ever am so fortunate as to see it, I shall not be very ready to yield the palm."

"Indeed," said Dick, with the same peculiar smile upon his countenance—"and may I ask you what steed it is of which you have heard so much?"

"The one in the possession of Turpin, the highwayman, and I believe commonly known as Black Bess. But what are you laughing at?"

"Excuse me, at you."

"At me! What for?"

"Merely for thinking that your steed, however good his qualities may be, could for a moment compare with Black Bess."

"You don't think so?"

"I am certain."

"Well, as I told you, I would give much to see this wonderful mare, and scarcely any less to see her rider."

"Then," said Dick, quietly, "you can do so without further trouble."

The captain stared at him incredulously.

"You don't mean to say that——"

"Well, I do mean to say that this is Bonny Black Bess, and I am Dick Turpin, very much at your service, and very much obliged to you for your kind behaviour to my wife here."

"That your wife?"

"It is, I assure you."

The captain was so amazed that he could not utter another word.

He sat on his steed like a statue of astonishment.

"You seem incredulous!" said Dick, after a pause.

"No, surprised, that's all," cried Captain Hawk, with something like a return to his former gaiety of manner. "Dick Turpin," he said, extending his hand, "I am heartily glad to see you! I have longed, wished to do so, and let me say if you want a friend that will stand to you back and edge, you have such a friend in me."

Dick cordially grasped the hand so warmly extended to him.

"Beyond being aware that you are called by the name of Captain Hawk, I know nothing of you. Still, be you whom you may, I rejoice to make your acquaintance, and accept your offer as freely as it is made."

"That's just it!" said the captain. "And if you don't mind listening I will give you a very brief account of myself. That formality may well be dispensed with in your case, as your reputation is by this time tolerably established."

Dick bowed.

"I should feel very much favoured," he said, "for I have some dim recollection of having heard of you."

"But there is no reason why you should be detained the while. If you have no objection I will ride for a little way by the side of you, and if we do not go very fast we shall be able to converse at our ease."

"Will it be taking you out of your way?"

"No, not at all. I am bound for nowhere to-night, so that it matters little which direction I take."

"In that case, then, I shall be glad to adopt the arrangement, for I have an appointment I do not wish to miss."

"Exactly so," said Captain Hawk, with a smile, and at the same time he turned his horse round and urged him gently forward.

This, however, was by no means so easy a matter as it might appear, for Satan was impatient at the least restraint.

As for Black Bess, so well did she understand her master's manner, and so thoroughly was she under subjection to him, that he had no difficulty in making her go at just what pace he desired.

"I daresay you wonder what brought the police officers to the ruins," the captain began, "but I am to blame for that; though as things have turned out all right, I hope you will forgive me."

"But I do not understand."

"I will soon explain myself, however. I daresay you have heard of the particulars of our meeting in the lane?"

"You mean between yourself Maud?"

"Yes, if that is her name. Well, after she had asked me which was the way to the ruined castle I began wondering whatever she could want there at such a lonely hour. The longer I thought the more did my wonderment increase, and at last I resolved to shake off the officers as well and as soon as I could, double upon my course, and make my way to the ruins myself, in order to find out if I could what she wanted there, and also, believe me, I was animated with the idea that I might be able, perchance, to be of some assistance to her."

"You are thoughtful," said Dick, "and I appreciate your intention just as I should if it had been carried into effect."

"Well, now, I should rather think you would have wished me a thousand miles away, for, but for my interference, you would not have been interrupted by the officers."

"It does not matter, as it has turned out."

"No. For my part, I am glad, since it has procured me what I have wished for for so long—an introduction to yourself. But, leaving that, let me tell you I rode rather carelessly into the ruins, and must have been seen doing so by the grabs, for they were upon me in a moment."

"I had wondered what brought them there," said Dick. "It was a mystery to me, quite; but now all is explained."

"Yes; and I hope to your satisfaction."

"Quite so. And yet was it merely upon the chance that you might meet with us and thank us for warning you that you ran the great risk of galloping back?"

"It was indeed."

"Then you are one of two things."

"May I ask which and what?"

"I cannot well answer the first part of your question, but what I was about to say was that you were either very brave or very reckless."

"Just whichever you like—perhaps a little of both," responded the captain, with a light laugh.

"It may be so; but still——"

"You would have hesitated, I suppose?"

"I should."

"Well, you see, I place so much confidence in Satan's powers. He has carried me out of so many scrapes that I begin to have absolute belief in his powers of speed."

"Mind you do not put trust in him once too often," said Dick, seriously. "It is a pity to try a horse too much."

"Does Satan look the worse?"

"No; he does not, I confess."

"But stay! I am running on in this fashion, and yet I have not told you who I am—or, rather, I have not made you acquainted with my profession. I daresay, however, you can guess it."

"A highwayman?"

"Well, yes, I suppose that is what people will call me, and yet when I think of—— But no matter—no matter!"

Some reminiscence of somewhat a sad character evidently came over the captain's face at this moment, but by an effort he banished it, and was again smiling and light-hearted as before.

"Perhaps," he said, "the time may come when we shall be better acquainted, and if so, I may relate to you something of my early life. You will find much that is strange in it."

"Very likely; and at the same time I may be able to convince you that your Satan is inferior to my own Black Bess. We will have a trial of speed some day—of course, now it is impossible, as she carries a double burden."

"Certainly!"

The captain seemed as though he was about to say farewell to Dick, and yet for some reason or other he appeared to shrink from doing so.

"I have a further favour to ask of you," he said, "though I fancy you will consider me too importunate."

"Not at all. Pray speak freely."

"Well, then, above all other things, I should desire to be made known to your comrades. I have heard so much of them by common rumour, that I am most impatient to do so."

"I see no reason why that request should not be granted," answered Dick, "for I am now within a very short distance of a place where we had agreed to meet, and where they are doubtless impatiently awaiting our arrival."

"I will take you at your word," said Captain Hawk, "for such a chance may not occur again."

"I intended you to take me at my word. Let us make better speed. We shall soon reach our destination."

This was quickly verified, for at that time Dick was not very far from the blighted tree.

Owing to the increase in the rate of speed, but few words were exchanged.

Captain Hawk was one of those individuals that few can help liking.

As for Dick Turpin, he took a strong fancy to him from the first, there was something in his manner so very jovial and free.

Tom Davis, however, did not look exactly pleased, and by his manner it would seem as though he was exceedingly desirous of saying a few words to Dick in private.

For this, however, there was of course no opportunity, so he fidgeted about very uneasily indeed.

Tom was by nature rather distrustful of new-comers, and he by no means shared in Dick's prepossession in favour of Captain Hawk.

Without knowing why, Tom felt dubious about him, and he felt positive Dick had been indiscreet to give so ready a compliance to his last-made request.

All Tom Davis could do was to keep a sharp look-out on all the movements of the captain, and as his action was limited to so little, he resolved to perform that little well.

The old tree was reached, however, without the occurrence of any incident whatever.

But Tom Davis was not inclined to abate any of his caution on that account.

No sooner had they all come to a halt, than Dick exclaimed:

"I scarcely expected to be first upon the ground. What can have detained the others so long, I wonder?"

The reader will remember that Tom King was the first to arrive at the place of rendezvous, but upon hearing the horseman approach, had carefully concealed himself.

The very moment, however, that the sound of Dick's well-known voice reached his ears he came forth.

"I am here," he said.

"And Claud and Jack?"

"I have seen nor heard nothing of them since we parted."

"Hush!" said Maud. "I hear some one now."

The sound of horses' hoofs could now be distinguished plainly.

"Here they are. I'll be bound!" cried Dick.

"It would be wisest to draw aside and make sure, would it not, captain?" said Tom Davis.

"Certainly it would."

Without the utterance of another syllable, this proposal was carried into execution.

They had barely time to take up their positions before the horsemen made their appearance.

They were recognised at a glance.

"Safe and sound?" asked Dick, riding forward.

"Wind and limb, captain," was the reply; "but we have met with no success, and so our only hope is that you have been more fortunate."

"I have. I have recovered Maud, who has sustained no serious injury. She has been aided and succoured by one I have great pleasure in making known to you. His name is, I believe, Captain Hawk."

"Quite at your service, gentlemen, and very happy indeed to make your acquaintance."

Tom King, as well as Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack, were much taken by surprise.

It was one of the rarest things in the world for them to make a new friend.

The darkness that reigned about this place prevented them from seeing the captain very distinctly.

The latter, fancying he observed some reserve on their part, said:

"Do not distrust me. I shall always be glad to aid you in any way I am able; and what is more, you will be pleased to understand that I am of the same fraternity as yourselves."

The announcement was by no means expected, and the effect of it was to cause a greater appearance of friendliness on the part of the three highwaymen.

Captain Hawk, however, was gifted with a full share of penetration.

He could see very well that the friends had some topics they wished to discuss, and to which they did not exactly feel inclined to make him party.

"It will not be long, I trust, before we meet again, but for the present we must part, as I have made arrangements I do not wish to break. To make any treason place of appointment with you would, I know full well, be useless; but I shall trust to chance to throw us together again ere long. Good-bye to all!"

He bowed as he spoke.

"Remember, you have to be convinced about your steed!" Dick said, as he was departing.

The captain waved his hand, but made no other reply.

The next moment he had vanished in the darkness.

"Captain," said Tom Davis, urgently, though he scarcely raised his voice above a whisper—"captain!"

"What is it?"

"Do you think we ought to have let him go like that?"

"Let him go! What do you mean?"

"Why, captain, I distrust him, and that's the truth! What guarantee have you that he will not go at once and betray us to the officers?"

"No guarantee, certainly; but still, I consider it most unlikely that he should do so."

"I am of another opinion, captain."

"But what grounds have you?"

Here Tom Davis became mute.

He could only admit that he had been swayed by prejudice.

"It cannot matter either," added Turpin. "We do not intend to remain in this place many moments."

"No, decidedly not," said Claude Duval, with a shudder; "and the question we have first to decide is where we shall next take up our quarters."

"And it is a question deserving of much consideration," said Dick. "I had fancied that there would be no difficulty about this, but now I am quite at a loss for the moment what to advise."

This remark elicited some questions from his comrades, and Dick at once stated his former intention of returning to the ruins, but how the officers had seen them there.

He also made them aware of the manner in which he had become acquainted with Captain Hawk.

"But for that unlucky incident," said Sixteen-String Jack, "you may depend that no better or safer place for us could have been found for the present, and if one only half as good is now proposed I shall think we are extremely fortunate."

"Then just listen to me for a few moments," said Tom King. "I have been here waiting for you for some time, and have all the while occupied my mind by thinking upon this very subject."

"And you think you can get us out of our difficulty?" said Turpin.

"I think I can."

"Proceed, then; there is no time to lose."

"First of all," said Tom, "it will be necessary for me to give you a brief account of my doings since our parting; without this explanation you will not be able to comprehend what I have to propose."

"Go on, then, only be careful to put your narrative into as few words as you can."

"You may depend I shall do that. Listen!"

Amid a profound silence, then, Tom King proceeded to make his comrades acquainted with those facts which have been already detailed to the reader.

In the intense interest which this narrative awakened they became forgetful of everything else.

When Tom brought his adventures to a conclusion, all declared that nothing could surpass them.

"But now, Tom," said Dick, "what is it you have to propose? I confess I am no nearer to forming any conception of it than I was before."

"Is it so indeed?"

"It is."

"Then prepare yourselves for a startler, for what I have to say will, I feel pretty certain, take you completely by surprise."

CHAPTER MXL.

RELATES WHAT BEFEL DICK TURPIN AND HIS COMRADES BENEATH THE ROOF OF THE JOLLY TAR INN.

THE strongest curiosity was evinced, but what words can express the astonishment of all when Tom King said, as coolly as though it was the simplest and most trifling matter in the world:

"I propose, then, comrades, that for the present we take up our quarters beneath the roof of the Jolly Tar Inn."

"Where?" cried Dick, in utter amazement.

"I told you to prepare for a startler."

"But you are not in earnest?"

"I assure you I was never more so in my life."

"Then you are mad."

"I think not, captain."

"But the thing is impossible."

"Not at all."

"How so?"

"Where is the difficulty?"

"Why, how shall you get rid of Knight and Cunningham?"

"Get rid of them?"

"Yes."

"Why they are got rid of already."

"By whom?"

"By me. Depend upon it, they were so horribly frightened that no earthly consideration would ever induce them to cross that threshold again."

"But, then, there are the others."

"What others?"

"The officers."

"I doubt there are any there now."

"Why not?"

"The inquest was to have been held as yesterday—for it is nearly morning now—and when this formality is over, the bodies would be removed, the inn shut up and doubtless left to itself."

"It is worth trying, I think," said Turpin, after several moments' deliberation, "though to me it still looks like running our heads into the lion's mouth. However, should the officers find we have had the audacity to do this, we shall never be able to astonish them again."

"No matter for that," urged Tom. "I still consider the scheme practicable in every way, and I do not believe that either of you could propose a place where we should be safer."

"Perhaps not," said Dick; "and if the officers have really left the premises for good, I quite agree with you; I would give much to be satisfied on that point."

"You must be content to run the risk of that."

"The advantage which weighs principally with me," said Turpin, "is that we are now so near the spot proposed for our abiding-place. It will be very soon quite daylight, and we ought to be under cover by then."

To this all assented unanimously.

"What do you say, then, comrades," asked Dick, "are you willing to say it shall be so?"

"Nay, you are our captain, and with whatever decision you may come to we shall be content; we know you would intend it for the best."

"Yes, and for all that my judgment might lead you astray; I do not desire that you should look upon it as infallible—that would be undertaking too great a responsibility."

"Well, captain, we are willing if you are."

"Can you suggest any other place?"

"No—not any."

"Then in that case I consider we have no alternative left us."

"You have decided, then?"

"Yes, in this way: we will try the inn for a few hours, at all events, and then we can come to any decision afterwards we may think proper."

This was agreeable to everyone.

Tom was pleased to find his proposal assented to.

It was really wonderful to see how they became reconciled and accustomed to the idea which had so startled them at first.

Already they began to look at it quite as an ordinary proceeding, their only concern being whether the officers had really left the premises or not.

They went the right way to ascertain this, for, without any more discussion, they turned their horses' heads in the requisite direction.

The distance could not be considered otherwise than trifling.

A short space of time brought them in its vicinity, and then Tom recommended a halt.

His recommendation was unhesitatingly complied with.

"I have been thinking," he said, "that it would be much the best to reconnoitre before venturing to approach too near; so if you will remain where you are and take care of my horse, I will soon let you know the existence of the present state of affairs."

"But shall you go quite alone?"

"Yes, I think it will be best, and I flatter myself I can execute the task better than either of you, because of my familiarity with the premises."

"Yes, that is an advantage."

"I am off, then. Above all things do not move one step from this spot until my return."

While these few words were being exchanged, Tom King had slipped off his horse and given the reins to Claude Duval.

"Are your pistols ready for use?" asked the latter, as he received the charge.

"Yes."

"Are you quite sure?"

"Quite."

"Be off, then, and good luck to you!"

Tom knew the value of time, so he did not wait for any more to be said, but glided off into the semi-darkness at once.

His comrades were able to observe his progress for some time, but at last he disappeared.

Tom grew more and more cautious as he approached the building.

The silence which prevailed was in the highest degree assuring.

By slow degrees he made his way round to the front of the inn.

To his great joy, not a single gleam of light appeared.

"They have gone," he muttered to himself. "I was certain they would not stay after such a horrible adventure as that."

However, neither the silence nor the darkness could be taken as proof that the inn was empty.

The question was, how was this very important and necessary fact to be ascertained?

Tom was a very little while in hitting upon an expedient.

It was one, however, that involved some degree of risk of discovery.

Nevertheless, he determined to put it into practice.

It was to hurl a small stone through one of the windows, and with sufficient force to cause considerable noise.

A moment's search enabled Tom to find just the kind of missile which he required.

This was a smooth round pebble.

Aiming it at one of the upper windows, he threw it with the full strength of his arm.

The crashing of glass sounded with alarming distinctness in the profound silence which prevailed.

Tom crouched down and anxiously awaited the result.

One, two, three, four minutes passed.

At the expiration of that interval there was no more indication that there were any human being in the house than there was at first.

"I knew I was right!" Tom muttered. "Everything falls just as I expected."

However, to make doubly sure, Tom once again made a tour of the premises.

The result was the same.

He now considered he was warranted in returning to his companions.

He found them all waiting for him in great suspense.

They had heard the crash of glass even where they stood, and had indulged in many vague speculations as to the cause of it.

Tom King soon resolved them.

The intelligence was received by all with the greatest satisfaction, Maud, however, alone excepted.

The fact of no notice having been taken of the stone was looked upon as sufficient proof that the house was empty.

But although she had not ventured to make any observation whatever, Maud shrunk back, appalled and terrified at the idea of taking up a residence in a place which had witnessed the perpetration of so many awful crimes.

Of one thing she was certain.

By no possibility could she ever summon up her courage to remain alone in that dwelling.

But where Dick Turpin was she felt herself tolerably safe, though now she trembled from head to foot.

She thought it rather strange that Dick did not observe this circumstance, but the fact was, the whole of his energies just then were centred upon the task they had before them.

The nearer Maud drew to the hateful place, however, the more did her alarm increase.

The next words spoken by Tom King, however, gave her a fleeting satisfaction.

"Stop," he said—"there is one thing we have omitted now."

"What is that?"

"How are we to dispose of our horses?"

"True," answered Dick. "I don't know how we came to forget that."

"Are there no stables at the back?" asked Claude.

"I think so; but would it be safe for us to put our cattle there?"

"As safe as anywhere else, I imagine."

The matter was, as usual, left for Dick's decision.

"We will go a little closer," he said, "and then we shall be able to judge better."

Again they advanced towards the ill-omened dwelling, dispelling Maud's hope that something had been thought of which would result in an alteration of their arrangements.

They were careful to approach the inn with all due caution.

The first glance showed them that the outbuildings were of a spacious description.

"No fear of not finding accommodation here," said Claude.

He was right, for stable room was to be had in plenty, and, what was more, our friends found, after a brief search, that the place was by no means ill supplied with provender,

In order to be prepared for any sudden surprise, none of the trappings were removed from the horses.

The girths were loosened and the bits removed, but the bridles were not taken off.

Having seen thoroughly well to the comfort of their steeds, the highwaymen proceeded to look after their own accommodation.

[TOM KING PREVENTS THE ENTRANCE OF THE OFFICERS.]

By common consent, Tom King was allowed to take precedence of the rest.

He led the way at once to the little window through which he had previously effected an entrance.

Maud now clung so closely to Dick that he could not help noticing her excessive agitation.

"What ails you?" he said, in a whisper. "What do you fear?"

"To enter that fearful place."

"It has no doubt terrible reminiscences for you, but let me implore you to shake off all these timid feelings—they are unworthy of you, quite."

"I cannot help it."

"But, consider that I am with you, and while I am, ought you not to feel secure?"

"I ought, I confess, but yet——"

"Tut, tut! Banish these fears. You ought to consider the probabilities there are that this place will prove for us a safe asylum, since it will doubtless be shunned by all other living creatures."

"And we are forced to take up our habitation where no other human beings would venture to come."

"What of that?"

"Think of the awful deeds committed."

"What if we do? We are not guilty of them, so why should we fear?"

"Yes, but think of the poor creatures——"

"Nay, you had better not think at all, unless you will think as I do."

"How is that?"

"Why, all these people who may have perished here could, when alive, have done me but little harm had they chosen to combine against me; and such being the case, how unreasonable it would be to dread them now they are dead and past all power of interference in human affairs!"

No. 223 will be Published next Monday.

Dick's certainly was a bold manner of thinking, and as certainly was it full of sound philosophy.

What farther might have been said just then upon this topic we know not, for it was just at this moment that Tom King reached the little window.

He found it in precisely the same condition as he had left it, and this he and all the rest looked upon as a most favourable omen.

Before entering, however, they listened at the open window for the space of several moments.

The same silence continued to reign.

Encouraged by this, Tom King made his way in.

Dick Turpin came next, and assisted Maud to follow.

The others quickly entered too, and then the window was closed.

The darkness was intense.

"I think we might venture to risk a light," said Dick.

"We shall never grope our way if we do not, I am thinking," said Claude, who at once busied himself in producing the necessary materials.

A small lantern was quickly lighted, which did not give a very brilliant illumination, but yet quite sufficient to enable them to find their way across the room, which, it will be remembered, was the kitchen of the inn.

On gaining the passage beyond, greater caution than ever was made use of, though it was almost beyond doubt that no officers were in the place, or they must have heard the noise made by the entrance of so many people.

At length the room was gained where Tom had had so narrow an escape of discovery.

Here all was dark and silent too.

"I think we may venture to make ourselves contented now," said Tom. "I told you I was convinced that nothing would induce the officers to remain."

"You were right," said Dick, as he pushed open the door and entered the apartment which had been made the head quarters of the officers.

There were plenty of evidences of their presence to be seen, and from various indications the highwaymen concluded that their foes could not have taken their departure very long before.

For instance, the wood-ashes on the hearth were by no means cold, and dim wreaths of tobacco smoke hung about here and there.

"I hope we shall be safe for an hour or two, at all events," said Dick.

"So do I," responded Tom. "Our first care ought to be to go thoroughly over the premises, and see that every door and window is secured; we should then have nothing to fear from being suddenly taken by surprise."

All saw in a moment the absolute necessity of the adoption of this course, so it was set about being carried out without any more discussion.

But Claude was especially careful to carry the lantern in such a manner as to preclude, as far as possible, the chance of any of its beams being seen by any chance passer-by outside.

They came first to the front door.

This was fastened, but only by means of the lock, the key of which was absent.

"They would be able to enter readily enough, would they not?" said Tom. "But this will rather interfere with their arrangements."

While he made the last remark he put up a heavy iron bar, and pushed two heavy bolts into their sockets.

"Yes," said Claude, "they cannot enter that way without making a little noise—that is certain."

"They are excellent bolts and bars," remarked Dick; "and so far as this means of entrance is concerned I shall not feel in the least degree alarmed."

The remainder of the inn was then carefully gone over, and every available fastening was made use of.

When on the upper storey, the chamber of death was peeped into.

The result was that Tom's conjecture was proved to be quite correct.

The two dead bodies had been removed.

When this fact was made known to all the rest, a feeling of increased security took possession of their breasts.

So far as they could tell, there was nothing to induce the officers to make a return to the premises, unless they should suspect that our friends had taken up their quarters there, and this suspicion it was almost impossible that they should entertain.

On the present occasion, then, Dick Turpin and his associates may very fairly be excused for giving themselves over to the belief that for a time they were perfectly secure.

After some little deliberation, it was determined that they would make the apartment which the officers had occupied their head quarters.

Their feeling of security, however, was not so great as to cause them to omit the precautions which they usually took.

It was unanimously agreed upon that one should keep good watch and ward while the others slept, with the express understanding that the alarm should be given in case of the occurrence of the slightest circumstance of an unusual nature.

If the reader will think over the events which we have recently related he will discover that our friends had but few opportunities of enjoying rest.

As they had all been very busily engaged, they were now consequently terribly fatigued, and the feeling grew upon them now that there was no immediate need for active exertion.

On this account it was determined that all discussion as to their future movement should be postponed for a few hours.

In the meantime, they would all do their best to recuperate their wasted energies by sleep.

Dick Turpin kept watch for the first hour, and then he was relieved by Tom King.

CHAPTER MXLI.

IN WHICH THE HIGHWAYMEN HOLD A CONFERENCE AND ARRIVE AT SOME HIGHLY-IMPORTANT CONCLUSIONS.

Alternating in this manner, many hours were passed.

The place chose for keeping guard was the small attic at the top of the house, and this, with a little trouble, was made to answer the purpose required of it as well as though it had been especially constructed and designed to answer the end in view.

As it stood, this attic had but one window, and this was situated in the front of the inn.

But the roof of the attic was composed of nothing but thatch, and in the highest place was not much above six feet from the floor.

It came sloping down equally on both sides from a point in the centre.

What our friends did then was to remove just as much of the thatch as was necessary to make a hole large enough for them to look through.

This was done on both sides, and opposite to the window as well.

The consequence of this arrangement was that, provided a good look-out was continually kept, it was not possible for anyone to approach unseen.

Here then, turn by turn, the highwaymen and Tom Davis kept watch.

A large expanse of country was presented to their view.

Night approached, however, without anything having been seen to give rise to the least alarm.

When darkness fairly closed in, of course this look-out from above became impossible.

All assembled, therefore, in the room below, which they had made as comfortable as the means at their disposal would admit of.

Without exception, everyone was in excellent spirits, for they, reasonably enough, looked upon their freedom from molestation so far as an earnest that they would continue to remain so.

The rest which they all enjoyed enabled them to think clearly upon the different matters about to be discussed, and assist them in coming to satisfactory conclusions.

All noticed what a look of intense expectation the countenance of Tom Davis wore.

They were not ignorant of the cause.

As for Davis himself, however, he did not give utterance to a word, but merely looked on anxiously.

"It seems to me," exclaimed Dick, after some preliminary but not very important observations had been exchanged—"it seems to me that the first thing to be considered is as regards our sojourn in this place."

"In what way, captain?" asked Tom King.

"Why, I want to know whether you are all inclined and determined to remain here so long as the officers will allow us to do so?".

"Decidedly," replied a chorus of voices, in which, however, Maud's was not heard.

"That being resolved upon," continued Dick, "the next thing is with regard to Tom Davis's wife and Ellen. I need not say anything to remind you that we had resolved to allow them both to undergo their term of imprisonment. Not only were we at that time unable to offer them any assistance, but it was thought best that, as the term was so short, it had better be passed, and then they would be free from the officers so far as that offence was concerned."

"Exactly," said Claude Duval, "and if I am not greatly out of my reckoning, the time has nearly expired."

"It has, Davis, has it not?" asked Turpin

"Three more days, captain," was the murmured reply.

"Then it is time we came to a decision. For my part, I have been considering the subject carefully, and the result is that several things have presented themselves to me of which I had not previously taken any account."

An immediate desire was expressed for an explanation.

"These things are of more moment to us than you may perhaps imagine. But to commence: in the first place, of course, at the appointed time they will both be set at liberty."

"Just so."

"Well, it will then be necessary that they should join us. But how is this to be done?"

"We might contrive to let them know," said Sixteen-String Jack.

"Yes, so we might," assented Dick, "it is not there that I see any particular difficulty."

"Where then?"

"Why, you must bear in mind how anxious the officers are to capture us."

"Don't be afraid we shall forget it, captain."

Dick laughed as he added:

"And do not forget that Tom Davis has been extracted from their clutches. This, however, is the point I wish to arrive at: the officers will know very well at what time Ellen and Mrs. Davis will be set at liberty, and you may depend that they will take all the advantage they can of the circumstance."

"But in what way, captain?"

"Why, they will think, of course, that the first thing the released persons will set about doing will be to regain their friends. Now do you understand me?"

"I think so," answered Tom King. "But go on—let us have it clearly understood."

"It is important enough."

"Clearly so."

"Well, then, the officers, depend upon it—or if not them, some of their agents—will be on the watch outside the prison, and as soon as Ellen and Mrs. Davis come forth they will fix their eyes upon them, and keep the closest watch upon every movement they may make."

Tom Davis covered his face with his hands, so that the expression of it might not be observed during the further progress of this, to him, important discussion.

"Depend upon it," said Claude Duval, "that is what they will do; but till it was mentioned, I never once thought of such a thing."

"It is well," said Dick, "that it has been thought of in time."

"Yes, thanks to you, captain."

Turpin passed over this compliment without remark, and went on to say:

"What we have now to consider is, how we can continue to prevent the officers from carrying out this plan. Rely upon it, they will try hard to get upon our track by this means; and if they do they will take care to be in such force as to make resistance difficult."

This prospect alarmed Maud greatly, and she crept more closely to Turpin's side, as she always did upon the approach of danger.

"Captain," said Tom Davis, "I can see very plainly how dangerous this will be to you, and therefore you must leave us to shift for ourselves; I will not consent that you should all be drawn into so much extra peril—it is not rightful, and it shall not be!"

"Tom Davis!"

"Yes, captain."

"If you make another such a speech as that you shall be turned out of the room and not be allowed either to listen or to take part in the discussion."

"But——"

"Not another word. You must leave us to be the judges of what we think best and expedient, and what we intend to do."

"Certainly," cried Sixteen-String Jack. "Do you think we are going to make you such a return as that for all that you have done for us in time past?"

"But you have requited that obligation times and times over," said Tom Davis, still with his face hidden, and speaking in a broken, husky voice.

"Nothing of the kind. But it is like you to forget all about the past. Let there be no more of this, for the way out of the difficulty I have laid before you is not so very perilous after all."

"Indeed, captain!" ejaculated the poor fellow, looking up with brightening eyes. "You must know this is the longest separation there has ever been between my wife and myself and Ellen. We have known good and evil fortune, but we have always been together. And as for Nell—bless her!—I love her as though she was my own child. It drives me mad when I think what I have brought her to."

"Rather remember what you saved her from; but that is like you again—never to remember the benefits you confer."

"But what was the way out of the difficulty that you spoke of?" interrupted Tom King, who spoke with considerable impatience.

"You shall hear."

"Go on then—we are listening."

"In the first place we must communicate with old Matthew."

"That sounds like getting into one difficulty to get out of another."

"It may be so; but listen."

"We will."

"I say we must communicate with old Matthew—and the sooner the better. This is in order that he may see Mrs. Davis and Ellen—if possible before their liberation—and make them acquainted with the nature of our plans."

"Just so. But——"

"Wait a moment, and you shall hear. What I suggest in order to baffle the officers is, that they shall both take up their quarters at some decent lodging in or near London——"

"London!" ejaculated all, in tones of surprise.

"Yes, and there they are to remain, say, for about a fortnight—or longer, if necessary. By the end of that time the ardour of the officers in watching them will have abated; then they must embrace an opportunity to slip off unperceived and make their way to us."

"But where will that be?"

"That we must determine."

"And it will be no easy matter, I fancy," said Claude Duval.

"So do I," responded Sixteen-String Jack. "I should like to know very much where we shall be to-morrow let alone a fortnight hence."

"You seem amused," said Dick, with a smile; "but let me assure you that I can see my way quite clearly."

"You can?"

"Certainly."

"Then where shall we be?"

"Without directly answering that question, I think I can satisfy you. Suppose we fix upon a certain future time—say three weeks or a month hence—on one particular day, and at a certain hour we can arrange to be at a specified place—that is, if we are alive and it lies in the power of human beings."

"I begin to understand," said Tom King. "You would appoint a place and arrange for us all to meet there?"

"Certainly; and I cannot see any remarkable obstacle."

"Where shall we say?"

"Can you name a place?"

"I could, certainly; but before doing so, would it not be better to talk over our own proceedings in the meantime?"

"It would. That is well thought of."

"You have thought of this as well, captain?"

"I confess I have."

"Then let us hear all you have to say."

"I propose, then, that between now and the time of meeting we all occupy ourselves to the best of our ability, so as to get together a good round sum."

"For what purpose?"

"In order to place in the hands of Tom Davis for him to use as he may think fit, which will, I hope, in some measure recompense him for his losses."

"Now, captain, none of that."

"Tom Davis!"

"Yes, captain."

"Be good enough to understand that the only terms upon which you may be allowed to listen to our conference are, that you preserve a profound silence."

"But, cap——"

"If you interrupt again, out you go, and you hear no more."

After this, Tom Davis was obliged to be quiet, though he was burning to give utterance to his expostulations.

"Very good," said Tom King, approvingly. "I for one will do my best to make the sum as round as possible."

"So will we," cried Claude and Jack. "We will show him what we think about him."

"As to the manner in which this money is to be employed, I have my own ideas, and if you, my comrades, think them good, they will be carried out, I hope."

"Cap——!" began Tom Davis.

"Silence, will you!"

Thus admonished, the highwayman's faithful ally held his tongue.

"My proposition is, that as soon as we place the money in his hands he shall, with all speed possible, make his way out of England. The amount, I hope, will be such as will enable him to live out a long life in comfort in some other clime."

This proposal was received with universal acclamation.

"Captain," broke in Tom Davis, the tears rolling down his cheeks, "I shall never be able to utter my thanks; and rest assured I shall never be able to forget this generous mark of your favour."

"So far, then," Dick went on, "we may say all is settled, and all that there is for our consideration is one or two minor points."

"But yet unfortunate ones."

"Yes, decidedly. In the first place, as to the rendezvous."

"It ought surely to be near to the sea-side."

"Yes, bearing in mind the end we have in view, it ought."

"And as solitary and retired as possible."

"It cannot be too much so."

"Then where is that place to be found?"

"Can you tell?"

"Not straight off at once. Can you?"

"I have had a place in my mind, but perhaps some better one may be suggested."

"Nay, let us hear it."

"I would rather not at present."

"Yes—yes——"

"Well, then, since you will have it—Stonehenge."

"Stonehenge?" all repeated.

"Yes; you know it, do you not?"

"We have heard of it."

"That, then, is all that I can say."

"But what made you fix upon that place?"

"I have always been led to believe that it is far away from every human habitation, and that no one is seen there except some occasional wanderer brought thither by curiosity. Not only that, however, it is a place that can so easily be found, and the way to which may be asked without the creation of much suspicion."

"You must have considered this subject well, captain," said Sixteen-String Jack.

"Do you think so?"

"I do, or else you could not possibly have been so well prepared at all points as you are. You have actually left us nothing to do but to give our consent to whatever you have advanced."

"But I did not intend such to be the case. I wanted to hear your opinions."

"But we could think of nothing so good as that which you appeared to propose offhand."

"Well—well. If you are satisfied, that is all."

"We are perfectly. There is only one thing, though."

"What is that?"

"We have not come to a conclusion about the communication with old Matthew."

"No, true."

There was a peculiar smile upon Dick Turpin's lips, and a peculiar intonation of his voice as he thus spoke, which made Maud creep closer still to him.

"Let us decide it, then."

"With all my heart; and as you all say you have done nothing hitherto but give consent, let me now hear one of your proposals."

There was immediately such a sudden inclination for all to speak, that nothing save a confused Babel of sounds arose.

"One at a time," said Dick—"one at a time!"

"Will you hear me first, captain?" cried Tom King.

"Yes."

"Well, then, I will resolve the difficulty in a moment; I will just ride over to old Matthew to-morrow night and put matters square."

The cool manner in which Tom spoke forced every one to smile.

"It is too much risk," interposed Tom Davis, but he was silenced and cautioned before he could say any more.

"You have soon settled it, Tom," said Dick, "and in the same manner as myself, but with this difference, that——"

"You intended to go yourself, I suppose you would say?"

"Just so."

"No, no," cried Maud, clinging tightly to him, "for my sake let me implore you to abandon this idea! Banish it at once! I could not survive the time that would elapse during which you would be absent!"

"Come, Maud—Maud!"

"It is in vain to appeal to me! It is not often that I ask you a favour; do not let me this time beg in vain!"

"But you must consider——"

Maud shuddered, and then burst into tears.

Against this last Dick was not proof for a single moment.

He could bear all things but Maud's tears, and they conquered him at once.

The sight of her distress was more than he could bear.

"Dry your eyes," he said. "Do not weep. Your request is granted."

"And you really will not go?"

"I will not, since such is your wish."

The smile that overspread Maud's countenance at this moment was sufficient recompense to Dick for anything, though for all that he felt that it would have afforded him no ordinary satisfaction could he but once more have grasped old Matthew's hand and gazed upon his jovial face.

CHAPTER MXLII.

TOM KING IS RECOGNISED ON REACHING LONDON.

"Is it determined, then," asked Tom King, briskly "that I shall go?"

"Well, you spoke first."

"I did."

"But what say Claude and Jack?"

"Well," responded the pair alluded to, "we will resign our claims in favour of him. It would be too bad to disappoint him—he seems quite to have set his heart upon it."

"I have," said Tom—"you are perfectly right there."

"When would you start?"

"I am ready now."

"I think the enterprise had better be postponed until to-morrow night," said Dick. "If you were to start now, you would have scarcely time to get there before daybreak."

"You are right; and not only that—some cunning scheme must be devised, for I daresay the officers keep as sharp a look-out as ever upon Old Matthew's premises."

"You may depend they do."

"I have no wish to run any extra risk of capture if I can help it."

"Of course not."

"And now I shall have good time to think."

"And your horse to rest."

"Just so."

This concluded the settlement of every arrangement.

The rest of the night was passed in conversation, which, though interesting enough to those who took part in it, is scarcely worth reproducing to the reader.

No disturbance whatever took place, and Tom King was over and over again congratulated upon his wisdom in choosing out such a place of refuge.

There was indeed little fear that the officers would visit it again, and then it was still more improbable that any persons would come forward who were desirous of occupying a place with so evil a name.

The hours of the following day lagged by somewhat tediously.

All were anxious for night to come.

Maud, however, was filled with a strange dread.

She was afraid that when the hour arrived for Tom King to set forth, Dick would want to set out upon an adventure too.

How far she was correct in her surmise will shortly be seen.

Long before the approach of twilight, Tom King had completed every preparation he had resolved to make.

It is not necessary here to state just what precise steps he had determined to take, because we shall follow him, and then his actions will speak for themselves.

Moreover, it was a case in which it was not possible to arrange much beforehand, as the least chance circumstance might have the effect of altering everything.

Of one thing there could be no doubt.

Despite the cool, offhand manner in which he treated the enterprise, it was one of very great risk and danger.

So soon as ever the obscurity of twilight had deepened sufficiently to make it prudent for him to begin his journey, he led his horse out of the stable and mounted him.

His companions watched him until the trees hid him from their view.

"Now, captain," said Claude, "have you any arrangements for us to-night?"

"None that I know of."

"In that case, then," continued Sixteen-String Jack, "we had made up our minds for an adventure or two together."

"Of course tending to the end we have in view."

"Yes, certainly. None so profitless and unsatisfactory to others as Claude's adventure with the ladies."

Dick laughed, for he had been much amused when the incident was related to him.

"If so," he replied, "Tom Davis will come but poorly off."

Claude and Jack were quite ready for the road, with the exception of mounting their steeds, so that before many seconds had elapsed they had taken their departure.

"And now, Maud," said Dick, "do not seek to dissuade me from what I purpose, and then you will be spared the mortification of finding your appeal disregarded."

"No, no, Dick!" she cried, imploringly. "You—you must not go!"

"I cannot stay here; and bear in mind, I do not ask you to remain alone—Tom Davis will be with you, so that I shall be under no apprehensions whatever as regards your safety, because I know how well qualified he is to keep guard over you, and because I know he would lay down his life in your defence."

"Yes, captain," said Tom Davis—"you are no more than right there."

"Still—still, you must not go!" sobbed Maud. "The bare thought of having to remain in this dreadful place without you almost kills me!"

"Maud, I have spoken," said Dick, endeavouring to display an amount of firmness and resolution he was far from feeling.

"And I have spoken too. If my entreaties are of no avail, I will cling to you thus, and nothing but actual violence shall cause me to release you!"

"And that you know I shall not offer."

"I hope not, and so abandon this project at once or if you must go, take me with you."

"Take you with me?"

"Yes—why not?"

"Do you know the nature of the enterprise?"

"That signifies not, so long as I am with you."

"But in the moment of danger what could I do if I had you? The consciousness of your presence would paralyse my arm."

"Then why has it not done so on many an occasion when you have freed me from great peril? Dick—Dick, that is nothing but a pretext—an excuse!"

"Nay—nay."

"It is so. It is the inclination that is wanting; and when that is the case it is the easiest thing in the world to frame excuses."

"Maud, I——"

"You no longer wish me to be with you—that is it! But go—go!—you are welcome now. I have tested you, and am satisfied."

But Maud's satisfaction was of a very singular character indeed, for she immediately turned round and wept bitterly.

Dick displayed a momentary hesitation.

Then coming suddenly to a decision, he said:

"Come, Maud, for once you shall have your way. I could not pass the night in inaction beneath that roof, so I will take you with me; but you must promise to obey all the instructions I shall give you that shall tend to a preservation of your safety."

"Yes, yes—I promise all gladly—I will promise anything!" exclaimed Maud, for, to tell the truth, she was delighted at the prospect of quitting the inn during the long, silent hours of the night.

It was then agreed that the place was to be given into the charge of Tom Davis, upon whose horse Maud was to ride.

A few moments enabled them to get in readiness to set forth.

"It is a long time since we had an adventure together, Bess," said Dick, as he sprang on to the back of his bonny mare; "but I hope fortune will favour us this time."

Maud was in the best possible spirits; and as the horse upon which she sat was a very good one, she was able to keep pace well with Black Bess.

Her breath came and went quickly, and her cheeks were vivid red, for she could not control the agitation and excitement which the prospect of a night of adventure occasioned.

We shall leave them together setting out from the inn, however, as we shall also leave Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack.

We feel that Tom King has the first and strongest claim upon our attention.

For this reason we shall follow closely in his footsteps, and it will be found that his adventures on this occasion were truly of unparalleled description.

Our old friend, then, rode on for some distance in deep thought.

He knew very well that this part of the country was of a very lonely character, and that his chances were quite against his meeting with anybody.

Swayed by this conviction, he did not look about him with that keenness and closeness which he usually made use of.

The only disguise he had was in the shape of a voluminous riding cloak, in which, when on foot, he could, if he chose, envelop his whole form.

This seemed rather inefficient, considering the nature of the place in which he proposed to venture.

"I must ride fast," muttered Tom, "to get all done in time, and therefore, no matter how tempting an adventure may present itself, I must pass it by, or else relinquish what I have in hand, and that can never be."

Tom increased the speed of his horse as he spoke.

It so happened on this occasion that he was not subjected to any temptation; and this will appear the less surprising when the reader is informed that, in accordance with his usual custom, Tom altogether forsook the high-road and lanes, bending his way in as straight a line as possible across the open country.

By adopting this means he reached the environs of London in a much shorter time than he would have done otherwise.

"I will put a bold face upon it," was Tom's thought as he rode into the metropolis. "It is more likely to command success than any elaborate scheme. At any rate, I will make the trial to-night of how much can be accomplished by the sheer force of impudence alone."

It was scarcely likely, however, that Tom would be insane enough to think of riding up to old Matthew's door, and yet he held on his course as though such was his intention.

On nearing Covent Garden—then strikingly a different place to what it is at present—he came to a halt.

So far had he proceeded, to all appearances, in perfect safety.

The hour would not now be considered at all a late one, and yet Tom had found but few people abroad.

But in those days, when the only illumination the streets boasted of only served to render darkness visible—necessitating late travellers to engage the services of a link-boy, who would run before them with a lighted torch—few people ventured out after dark, unless upon some particular occasion.

Tom King drew rein close to the entrance of a dark and gloomy archway.

At first he did not alight, but, shrouded by the darkness, sat in the saddle, straining his eyes and endeavouring to make out whether the coast was clear.

"Hullo, my noble captain!" said a voice. "Air you a looking for some cove for to mind yer horse, because if so, d'yo see, I'se here."

Tom King was not able at first to make out from whence the voice proceeded.

Upon looking down more closely, however, and having also the sound to guide him, he caught sight of an attenuated form, clad in tattered clothes, which was holding the stirrup, in order to assist him to alight.

The face turned up to the highwayman's gaze was pinched and thin with hunger, the cheeks white and sunken, and the eyes large, staring, and preternaturally white.

"Can I trust you to take care of him?" asked Tom King, endeavouring while he spoke to obtain a better view of the hunger-starved face.

"Rather," was the reply. "You don't come here very often, or you'd a knowed me. I'se always here."

"Well," said Tom, slipping quickly from the saddle, "I'll put faith in you. I am not going far, and do not expect to be detained many minutes."

"I'll take care of him, captain, no matter how long you may be."

"Above everything," said Tom, "don't stir from this place. Whatever the time may be when I return, let me find you in this exact spot, because I shall be in a hurry."

"All right—you can depend upon me."

"Take that, then, as an earnest of what I shall give you."

Tom slipped a shilling into the boy's hand.

"Oh, my eye!" he exclaimed; then, as if suddenly smitten with a doubt as to the genuineness of the coin, he slipped it between his teeth and endeavoured to bend it.

"It's good," he said, in a satisfied voice, and immediately thereafter the shilling disappeared.

"You will be sure to comply with my instructions?"

"Certain."

"That's enough. I shall not be more than half an hour at the——"

At this instant there was the sound of footsteps, and the flashing of a light.

"Hullo, there!" said a gruff voice. "What are you about there? Is it murder, or treason, or what?"

"Or what," answered the boy. "Don't make a tool of yourself, Moses. Don't you see it's me? It's all right."

Tom, turning round, saw that this new-comer was clad in the garb of a watchman.

He was closely muffled up in order to protect himself from the cold, and in one hand he carried a lantern, and in the other a stout cudgel.

Tom was annoyed at the light being brought, but dared not show his annoyance.

He kept himself closely shrouded in his cloak, however; and as if to prevent it from being blown off by the wind, drew his hat down further over his face.

"Take this, my friend," said Tom, giving the watchman a shilling, "and buy something to keep the cold out; and at the same time, if you would have an eye on my mare here I would be obliged to you."

"Your honour's honour is a perfect gentleman. Good luck go with you for the rest of your days!"

Tom merely waved his hand.

Then hurried off.

All things considered, he believed he had managed matters so far with a tolerable amount of success.

A very few minutes, he knew, would enable him to walk as far as old Matthew's, and he determined not to stay here any longer than was just necessary to enable him to communicate Dick's wishes.

Had he lingered a little while, however, or could he have heard what took place immediately after his departure, his satisfaction would have suffered a considerable abatement.

The boy, with his dark, gleaming eyes, watched Tom for some distance.

Then turning round, he placed his hand to his mouth and said, in a hoarse voice, which scarcely rose above a whisper:

"Moses—Moses!"

The watchman, with a laudable desire to act upon the good advice given him by Tom, was already on the way to a house where he knew he could obtain a cordial that would comfort him greatly.

Upon hearing his name pronounced, however, he looked back.

"Well, young villain!" he ejaculated. "What now?"

"Here—here!"

"What do you want?"

"Come here, and I'll tell you."

"Don't you wish you may get it! I'm off."

"But, Moses—Moses!"

"Oh, bother!"

"Come here."

"I sha'n't!"

"Who stole the church can——"

The watchman uttered a howl which drowned the concluding syllables of the word which the boy had begun to utter.

At the same time Moses turned round and rushed towards the boy, brandishing his cudgel in a manner well calculated to inspire fear.

The boy dodged behind the horse with the agility of a monkey.

"You young demon!" snarled the watchman—"I'll be the death of you, I will! I'll beat your bones to batter! Take that!"

He aimed a desperate blow with his heavy cudgel as he spoke, but it was easily avoided.

"Don't be a fool, Moses!" said the boy. "I've got something more important to tell you than ever you heard in your life. What do you think of that, now?"

"Bah!"

"It's true!"

"What did you mean by yelling out like that?"

"Because I wanted you to turn back."

"Yes, curse you!"

"And I knew well enough that would make you. But listen, Moses—there's no joking about the matter, none at all—not a little bit, I assure you."

"Come, then, be quick—tell me now at once; and if ever you allude again——"

"Oh, never mind that!"

"I say if I ever hear you allude again——"

"To your stealing the church can——"

"I'll be the death of you, I will, and I'll sell your body to the doctors. What do you think of that?"

"Why, I think you are a fool for not listening to what I have to say."

"Speak quick, then!"

"I will. I should have told you before this, only you would not listen."

There was something in the tones of the boy's voice, and something in the manner in which he bent forward, his breast panting fearfully, that made the obtuse-perceptioned watchman conscious that the disclosure about to be made was of no ordinary or slight importance.

"Speak," he said—"speak—I am listening!"

"Then you saw that swell cove that was with me?"

"The one belonging to this horse?"

"Yes. Do you know him?"

"No—never saw him before."

"Ah!"

"Do you?"

"What?"

"Know him?"

"Yes."

"Who is he?"

The boy bent closer still to the old watchman.

He caught hold of the collar of his white duffel coat, and pulled him down by it until his lips were close to his ear.

Then he whispered something.

The watchman gave a great start.

"That Tom King the highwayman?" he ejaculated.

"Hold your row, you fool!" growled the boy, savagely. "Do you want all Covent Garden to hear you?"

"But it ain't true."

"I tell you it is!"

"Are you certain?"

"As certain as I am this is a horse."

"How came you to know him?"

"I've seen him afore. I thought I knew him afore you came up, but when the light of your lantern fell on his face I was quite certain—I would swear to his 'dentity out of ten thousand."

"Then we will call the police and follow him. No, stop—I'll spring my rattle. That's the ticket!"

With more agility than he had displayed for many a day, the watchman dropped his cudgel and drew his ponderous rattle from his belt.

But the boy, with a cry of suppressed anger, snatched it from his hand and threw it with all his might down the gateway.

"You infernal old fool!" he exclaimed, almost choked with passion. "You idiot! Do you know what you are after?"

"Yes—do you?"

The watchman quickly repossessed himself of his cudgel, and aimed another blow at his companion with it.

But, as before, it was evaded.

"Moses, if you don't listen quietly," he said, "and do what I tell you, I'll peach about the——"

"Go on. I'm quiet."

"Well, then, now pay attention, and I will let you know how to go to work to get the most of the reward."

"That's it—that's it."

"Then, if you had gone on we should have had none."

"What must I do, then?"

"Why, he's got so far off by this time that you could not overtake him now, but you might make him aware that we know who he is, and then what should we have for our pains?"

"His horse."

"True; we should have that in any case; but I want something more."

"The reward?"

"Yes, to be sure."

"But why don't you tell me what to do at once?"

"There is no violent hurry, and I want a little time to reflect. Ah! I have it."

"Where?"

"Here, in my brain box. He will be sure to come back for his horse, won't he, because he will think all is right?"

"Yes, I should say he is sure to come back."

"Well, then, you must go over to the station in Bow Street—— Or, stop a moment. You mind the horse."

"I sha'n't!"

"Then I peach!"

"Come on!"

The watchman took hold of the rein of Tom's horse, though somewhat reluctantly.

The boy was evidently in possession of a secret that gave him the mastery whenever he threatened to divulge it.

"Now don't you stir, Moses," he said. "If you do, you know the result. I have threatened you many a time, but that would be the last. Mind you are here when I come back."

"Never fear me."

"That's enough; I am off."

"Where to?"

"Why, to Bow Street, to be sure."

"What to do?"

"Fetch some police officers. But don't be alarmed, I sha'n't tell them anything about you unless you force me to do so by neglecting my injunctions."

With these words upon his lips, this singular being turned round and bounded off into the darkness.

The watchman felt far from comfortable, and more than once he was tempted to let go the horse and be off, leaving his companion to finish the adventure how he liked.

But the dread of his wrath prevailed, and perhaps, too the prospect of a share in the reward offered for the apprehension of the highwayman had some weight with him.

The boy was only absent a few minutes.

Each second, however, seemed to the watchman almost an hour in duration, so great was the excitement of mind under which he laboured.

At length, to his mingled satisfaction and alarm, he heard the sounds of many footsteps.

The next moment the well-known voice of the boy reached his ears.

"This is the place," he heard him say, "and here is his horse just as I told you. Do you believe me now?"

The six officers who accompanied the boy seemed incredulous.

Some questioned the watchman.

Some particularly examined the horse.

The result of this was, that after a brief conversation they came unanimously to the conclusion that fortune had at length placed the highwayman in their hands.

"Now," said the boy, with that sharpness which seemed natural to him—"now that you are perfectly satisfied that all is right, just let us frame a bargain."

"A bargain?" repeated one of the officers.

"Yes, a bargain," mimicked the boy, though he spoke with great resolution. "I know you all of old, and don't intend to be fobbed off as you have many I have heard of."

"Oh, indeed!"

"Yes, and in fact too. You needn't sneer!"

"What terms do you propose?"

"Why, there are eight of us altogether, and the reward must be equally divided."

"Oh, must it?"

"It must."

"But suppose we don't agree?"

"Then you don't take your prisoner!"

"You can't prevent it."

"Can't I?"

"No."

"Well, you'll see! If I have any bother with you I shall just shout out to him when I see him coming, and make him aware of his danger, and I should not care what you did with me afterwards!"

"Well, my lad, you seem quite a sharp chap—certainly a credit to your mother, I should say."

"Never mind that. Do you consent—yes or no?"

"Why, yes, of course. We never thought of anything else, only you would put yourself out about nothing."

"Never mind, I am determined to have my equal share of the reward; and if you attempt to do me out of it you will suffer for it; and you can ask Moses here whether I shall not be as good as my word."

"He's a little demon," said Moses, though in an admiring way rather than otherwise.

"Well," said the officer who had all along spoken, and who happened to be a newly-made sergeant, and consequently very proud of his new dignity, "as we have settled all that, let us hear what comes next?"

"Why," said the boy, "you must all hide yourselves carefully in that gateway, taking the utmost care to keep out of sight. It's a cute fellow you have to do with, bear in mind—one that can smell danger a long way off, as they say a rook can smell powder."

"We could have told you that, sharpshins."

"Then let me advise you to hide at once, and say no more, for I expect him to come every moment, and the sound of voices would put him on the alert at once."

The officers were much annoyed at the commanding tone of this boy, and if they could possibly have acted in opposition to his injunctions they would have done so.

But they were quick-witted enough to see that what he proposed was the best course of action that could be pursued.

Without exchanging any more remarks, then, they took up their positions in the gateway as directed.

This was so large and so profoundly dark, that they experienced no difficulty whatever in concealing themselves effectually.

The whole of the party was in high spirits.

The police officers saw the immense advantage they possessed.

The highwayman would be sure to return for his horse, and then, if they kept still, how could he suspect anything of their presence?

Then, if they waited until he was in the act of mounting, how easy it would be for them to spring forth and overpower him?

There was little fear, either, that he would escape from them after capture as he had escaped from others

They were within almost a stone's throw of Bow Street police station, so that they could deposit him there in the space of a few moments.

So far as the officers themselves were concerned, it was impossible that things could wear a more encouraging aspect.

There was not one of them who did not look upon the affair as completely settled.

The boy was so excited that he could scarcely breathe.

He endeavoured to reckon up what would be his exact share of the reward, but this arithmetical feat was far beyond his capacity in his present perturbation of spirits.

Truly now was the peril that threatened our old friend great indeed.

Of all this he was as profoundly ignorant as it was possible for a human being to be of anything.

The street, too, had a deceitful air of calmness and repose about it.

A chance passer-by would never for a moment suspect that half a dozen well-armed, determined men were hiding in the gateway.

Time passed on.

Not more than an hour certainly; but this space of time seems of endless duration to those who are each moment in the expectation of the occurrence of some particular event.

The officers began to grow uneasy.

The boy, too, began to lose some of that confidence which he had hitherto felt.

Could it be possible that by some means or other—means both mysterious and incomprehensible—Tom King had become acquainted with this design upon his life and liberty?

The thought was a maddening one.

But the time had not yet arrived for despair.

Upon a reconsideration of the whole matter, the boy could scarcely bring himself to believe that it was possible for Tom King to suspect anything.

While in the gateway, the officers had held a long, whispered conversation with Moses, the watchman.

He assured them positively that the boy spoke the truth, for, not altogether unreasonably, the officers had their doubts.

These, however, were completely dispelled after the watchman had answered their interrogations respecting the outward appearance of the traveller.

These answers made them certain that it could be no other than Tom King.

It was scarcely credible that the same description could apply so closely to another person.

More time passed.

All were too anxious for the result now to utter a single word.

The silence became irksome.

The boy strained his hearing to the utmost.

At length he caught the sound of a rapid footstep.

"Hush—hush!" he said, in a whisper, to the officers behind him. "Be in readiness to act, but do not be too precipitate, and so lose him. Not one word! He is coming now! Can you hear him? Hark—hark!—he is coming!"

CHAPTER MXLIII.

TOM KING FALLS BLINDLY AND HELPLESSLY INTO THE SNARE SO CUNNINGLY LAID FOR HIM.

WHETHER or not it was really Tom King who was approaching the spot where the officers were so cleverly concealed we must now proceed to ascertain.

In order to do this, we must follow in our old friend's footsteps.

Having left his horse in the joint care of the boy and the watchman, in the manner we have described, Tom felt tolerably satisfied so far as that point was concerned.

It is not surprising that it should be banished almost entirely from his thoughts before he had well quitted the precincts of Covent Garden when we bear in mind what other weighty matters were pressing on his mind, all of which required particular consideration.

He glanced about him keenly as he drew nearer to the place of his destination, for it was here that he looked for and expected danger.

But on this particular night an unusual quiet reigned in the streets—a quiet which, had Tom been fancifully disposed, he might have looked upon as of ill omen.

Strangely enough, however, he never felt more at his ease or more confident of his own powers.

There was no inner intangible sense to warn him that he was in so great peril.

Drury Lane looked strangely dark and drear.

Tom made his way into it by means of a court leading out of Brydges Street, and which brought him out almost directly opposite the White Horse Inn.

Under the concealing shadow of the entrance to this court, Tom paused a second to reconnoitre.

He could see no one about.

He could not even detect the sound of a distant footstep.

As usual, a light was shining forth from the ground-floor windows of the inn, and where he stood he could hear the sound of noisy, boisterous merriment.

Now was the opportunity.

It might be that such a one would never occur again.

Tom thought so, and darted across the street like a quickly-flitting shadow.

He drew a long breath upon finding himself fairly over the threshold.

Without hesitating an instant, he pushed open that inner half-glass door which in the course of this history we have so frequently had occasion to make mention of.

The bar window was now before him.

He reached it in half a dozen steps.

Matthew was there alone.

He seemed to be half dozing over a newspaper.

But he looked up upon hearing a footstep.

Tom did not speak.

He merely made a sign with his hand.

Matthew comprehended it, though his face turned a shade paler as he hastened to open the door and admit his visitor.

As Tom entered, Matthew hastily pressed his hand, and then pointed to the door leading into the private room.

"I cannot stay above five minutes, Matthew," said Tom, as soon as this door was closed behind them.

"Is it really you or your ghost?"

"Myself."

"Then sit down by the fire. You are most welcome, though it spoils the pleasure I should feel in entertaining you when I think of the risk you run."

"Never mind it. I have got in unseen."

"Do you think so?" asked Matthew, eagerly.

"I am almost certain of it—I might say I am quite certain."

"Then that is good news, for I believe you can reckon yourself safe. It would be a strange and unlucky chance if we were interrupted now."

"Have the officers discontinued their attentions?"

"I have not seen one in the place for a longer period than I can remember to have passed without doing so, and yet when, hitherto, I have felt a sensation of security on this account I have invariably been disturbed soon afterwards."

"Then I hope that this instance will prove an exception."

"So do I, Tom. But tell me what urgent business it is that brings you here to-night. Have something to drink, however, before you begin to speak."

[TOM KING IS CAPTURED BY THE POLICE OFFICERS.]

Old Matthew bustled about quickly, and soon placed some tempting refreshments before his guest, to whom, in good truth, they were most welcome.

"And you are sure you left them all sound and well?" he asked, referring to Dick Turpin and his associates.

"Quite sure."

"That, then, is good news. But come, you have not yet told me what brings you here to-night. It is something out of the common, I feel certain."

Tom King, in a very few words, explained his errand.

When he had finished, old Matthew nodded his head approvingly.

"I was thinking about them," he said, "and wondering what you would do."

"What think you of the plan?"

"It is excellent."

"And you will see to the carrying out of your part of it?"

"I will, depend upon it. And what is more, I think I know a place where they can both get comfortable lodgings, and no questions asked. And in order that the suspicions of the police may be the better allayed, I will seem to hold no communication with them whatever."

"It will perhaps be quite as well."

"I am sure of it; and if Tom Davis and his wife and Ellen can get clear out of the country, I am sure it will be the best thing in the world for them."

"We are unanimous in our opinion in that respect. And now, Matthew, I will be off."

"What, so soon?"

"Yes. This is an atmosphere of danger for me to breathe, and I neither wish to bring you into trouble nor myself; besides——"

"Besides what?"

No. 224 will be Published next Thursday.

"I have left my horse outside in charge of a lad, and I told him that I should not be away many minutes."

"Outside?" ejaculated Matthew.

"Well, some little distance off, of course."

"Then I will send——"

"Nay—nay, it is not worth while."

"But I think it is. It will be safer."

"I don't know about that. I shall be back quickly; and what is more, I don't suppose the boy would surrender the horse to anyone but myself."

Old Matthew still hesitated.

How strange it was that Tom should decline this service!

If he had accepted it instead, the treachery of the boy and watchman would have been made apparent.

But it was not destined so to be.

Tom pressed the hand of his old and staunch friend very tightly; and, recommending him to do his best for Mrs. Davis and Ellen, he said farewell.

Old Matthew, however, would not allow him to depart until he had satisfied himself that there was no police officer on the watch outside.

He was absent some time; and when he returned, Tom said:

"Is all well?"

"I believe so. I can see no one."

"That is right. I will be off now. Once more, farewell!"

"Stay a bit," said Matthew.

"What for?"

"I will come a little way with you."

"Let me thank you all the same," answered Tom; "but, believe me, I feel that it would be best not to do so."

"Why so?"

"You might be observed; and I have no wish to bring danger upon you, as would be the case if you were found with me."

"Well, well, I feel you are right; and yet I have a strong desire to do something to serve you—to render you assistance; it is a feeling which I cannot at all comprehend."

Tom's only reply was a light and careless laugh, and the next moment he had passed through the doorway into the dark and silent street.

After his departure, Matthew's vague, uncomfortable sensation that something was going wrong grew stronger and stronger.

Still, the feeling was too vague for any decisive course of action to be produced from it, and so, in a state of mind the very reverse to pleasant, he resumed the perusal of the newspaper which the arrival of his unexpected guest had interrupted.

In the meantime, Tom King was rapidly making his way towards his destination.

Strange to say, his mind was filled with a sensation of security, much greater than that which he usually experienced.

Never for a moment did he believe that the boy had played him false.

In the first place, Tom felt almost certain that he had so well enwrapped his form that recognition was impossible; and in the second, he considered that, as the boy would be expecting him to return every moment, he would not venture to quit the spot where he had been left.

And so Tom hurriedly walked on.

He glanced perpetually from side to side, but without seeing anyone.

It almost seemed as though he was the sole pedestrian abroad that night.

What a pity it was, however, that there was no kind spirit to whisper in his ear some warning of his hidden danger!

But no.

He walked on, if possible, with a more confident step towards the fatal spot.

The footstep which the treacherous boy had heard approaching was indeed that of our old friend—now menaced by a more terrible danger than any which had threatened him during the entire course of his career, for now he was totally unprepared.

The officers at once placed themselves in readiness for instantaneous action.

Then they remained immovable, but listening with the utmost intensity to the approach of the rapid footfall.

Nearer, nearer came the victim to the trap.

"Are you there?" they heard Tom say, as he drew closer, for so dark were the shadows round about the old gateway that he was unable to discern the form of his horse at any distance.

"Yes—yes!" answered the boy, striving hard to conceal the impatience which struggled to manifest itself in any way.

"Come this way then."

The boy made a show of leading the horse towards where Tom stood.

But the highwayman was too impatient and too anxious to wait for this, so he advanced to his horse himself.

The boy held the reins tightly.

It almost seemed as though he grasped them on purpose to support himself, for he trembled so excessively that he seemed in imminent danger of falling to the ground.

But Tom was too busy to notice this.

Besides, the darkness of the night, to a great extent, prevented him from doing so.

His hand was on the saddle.

One foot was in the stirrup.

Another second, and he would have been mounted.

But before this second could elapse, the officers bounded forward.

In their excitement, all gave utterance to a suppressed cry of triumph and relief, which, forming one aggregate sound, came very strangely upon the ear indeed.

Before Tom knew where he was—

Before he could form the least idea of what had happened, he found himself grasped tightly in several places by many powerful hands.

Where his assailants had come from he could not guess.

Had they been dropped upon him from the clouds their appearance could not have been more sudden or more startling.

He had not even time to utter a cry, much more to raise a hand in his own defence.

It was just as the first shock of the surprise passed away, however, that he heard a voice cry:

"Tom King, you are our prisoner! You are safe—caught—nabbed! Keep yourself quiet, for resistance will only have the effect of bringing down ill treatment against you! However, you can please yourself! Our orders are to take you to Newgate dead or alive; and in one state or other we'll do it, mind that! So you had better give in at once, and not be fool enough to make any fuss! Why don't you speak? Just let us know whether you are open to reason or not!"

CHAPTER MXLIV.

TOM KING IS TAKEN PRISONER BY THE POLICE OFFICERS.

From the moment the police officer had begun to speak, Tom King had remained profoundly still.

He had not attempted to make the least movement.

To all appearances, he was paying the utmost attention to what the officer said

But Tom was quite willing that he should have gone on gabbling for some time longer, as during this period Tom was collecting his shattered thoughts.

This, under such circumstances as we have just related, was very far from being an easy task.

But Tom was used to surprises.

Great, therefore, as this one was, he rapidly recovered from it.

This much done, the next thought was to busy his brain as to the course of action he should take.

Here was subject for long and anxious deliberation indeed; but Tom had no more than a few fleeting seconds allowed him.

Nevertheless, even in that brief period he came to some kind of conclusion as to what he should do.

Already there was hovering in his mind the dull, dim outlines of a scheme which, if prosecuted, would release him from his foes.

He still remained silent, thinking deeply.

Resistance was out the question; and, moreover, it was certain that if there seemed to be any chance of his getting away, they would not hesitate to fire a volley after him; and this, coming from so many weapons, and from so short a distance, could not fail to be fatal.

Tom knew the officers too well to believe that they would hesitate a moment about doing this.

The one who had spoken waited thus long for some kind of reply.

But finding none came, he said:

"Tom King, I see you surrender handsomely. Well, it is no more than I expected of you, so come along. It will be all over in a moment."

Tom King affected to be much cast down and overcome.

"Nay—nay," said the officers, "never be downhearted! Keep up your courage! You must have known that, some day or other, it would come to this, so be game—be game to the last!"

Tom sighed, and appeared to be more dejected than before.

"Don't be down, I say! You have set us at defiance a long time, and now our turn has come."

"I feel it."

"No doubt you do; but it cannot be helped."

"You misapprehend me."

"Do I?"

"You do indeed."

"What do you mean, then?"

"Why, I feel that your turn has come to triumph, and that it will be all over with us now in a very little while."

"Very likely."

Tom was again silent.

"Now, then," cried the officer who had before spoken, "out with the darbies, and clap them on! Would you like a hackney-coach? I am willing to do the thing decent."

Tom really seemed as though this sudden blow of misfortune had paralysed him.

No one could have displayed more dejection.

But when the officers, in obedience to the injunctions of their leader, set about handcuffing him, he aroused himself.

"No—no," he said—"not that! There's no need for that! Have I not given into you quietly enough?"

"Very true, you have; but, then, you know, you are such a slippery customer that we should be greatly blamed if we omitted to take any one precaution."

"There's no need for it," said Tom—"no need at all. But I wish you would let me say a few words to you in private."

"What, now?"

"Yes; no other time will suit."

"Impossible!"

"I will give you my word not to try to get away. And if you refuse this request you will repent having done so to the longest day of your existence."

There was a peculiar earnestness, not to say solemnity, about the manner in which Tom King spoke, and the officer, in spite of himself, was greatly moved.

He at once became filled with curiosity to know what it was the celebrated highwayman had to communicate to him.

But he hesitated about giving his consent.

Curiosity, however, at length obtained the victory.

"I will take your word," he said.

"You have chosen wisely," answered Tom. "I just want to whisper something in your ear—that is all."

At a word from the one in command, the officers who held Tom released him.

But the chief held him by the arm, apparently only in the manner that one friend might hold another, but in reality, his grasp was one that could not have been shaken off very easily.

Moreover, the other police officers held their pistols in readiness for instant use, so that, had the highwayman contemplated the perpetration of any treachery, he was denied the opportunity, for before he could get free such a volley would be fired after him as could not fail to cause his death, or at least inflict such serious hurts upon him as to render him incapable of motion.

But Tom's plan, as will be seen, was by far too elaborate and skilfully laid to have in it any such clumsiness as this.

Besides, he had given his word.

"Now, then," cried the officer to him, "what is it? Speak quickly!"

"I will. Listen."

"I am paying every attention."

"Well, I quite give into my fate—you understand that. But I am afraid it will go very hard with me."

"I'm afraid it will; I won't misrepresent matters."

"I am glad to hear you say so."

"Well, go on."

"What I want to know is, whether it would be possible for me to do anything that would make things better?"

The officer shook his head.

"Don't you think I can?" Tom asked, in a most anxious tone.

"Well, you see, you have been so out-and-out. Nothing can save you from Tyburn, I fear."

Tom looked disappointed.

"You had got something to propose, hadn't you?" asked the officer, who fancied already that he could scent out something that would eventuate to his advantage.

"I had."

"Then let me hear it."

"What's the good? Come on; I am ready to go with you."

"You may as well let me know," continued the officer, with an eagerness which Tom had artfully elicited. "It can do no harm, you know."

"Nor good to me."

"Perhaps—who knows? At any rate, I could tell better if I heard your proposition."

Tom seemed undecided.

The officer repeated his request with additional eagerness.

"Well," said Tom, "the officers and the other authorities are very anxious to capture Dick Turpin, are they not?"

"I believe you."

"And Claude Duval?"

"Rather!"

"And Sixteen-String Jack?"

"Of course!"

"And there's Maud."

"Certainly."

"You are very anxious to capture them as well as myself?"

"Of course we are, though we can't manage to do it."

"You have failed hitherto," said Tom, with great gravity. "But now that you have nabbed me, I feel assured that the others will fall into your hands ere long."

"I hope so!"

"Now," said Tom, slightly sinking his voice, "do you think if I was to deliver them all into your hands, so that you could capture them without any trouble, that such a service would do anything towards getting me off lightly?"

"Are you in earnest?"

"Answer my question first."

"Then I should say it most certainly would."

"You really believe that it would influence the authorities and make them inclined to act leniently to me?"

"There can be no doubt of it."

"What difference would it make?"

"Why, you would get off with transportation."

"Then, if you are agreeable, it shall be done."

"But I can't believe you are in earnest."

"Why not?"

"Because I have always been told that nothing would induce you highwaymen to prove false to one another—that you would die rather than betray."

"Yes, that has always been our rule; but, then, I can see very plainly now that they cannot escape much longer, so I think I might just as well reap some benefit by their capture as not."

"That is certainly a most sensible and businesslike way of looking at the matter," replied the officer; "and I should be the very last in the world to blame you for adopting such a course."

"I think no sensible person would blame me."

"Then, have you made up your mind?"

"I have. And now I want you to tell me how to proceed in the matter."

"Where are they all?"

"Lying in concealment, and waiting for my return. They will not move till I go back."

"Could we take them at unawares?"

"Easily."

"Have we sufficient force here?"

"I should think so. You would be able to take them by surprise as you did me."

The officer drew a long breath.

The prospect of taking prisoners Dick Turpin and all his companions in this manner was certainly dazzling, and no one could be surprised at the officer being considerably thrown off his guard by it.

He knew well how great was the aggregate reward, and thought what a first-rate thing it would be if it only had to be shared between him and his companions.

It must have been noticed more than once that the very magnitude of the reward offered for the apprehension of the highwaymen defeated its own object, as all officers were anxious to get as great a share as they could.

The leader of the present troop was not, however, altogether blind to caution, for he asked:

"But what guarantee have I that you will not play me false?"

Tom pretended to consider.

"I don't know what guarantee you can have; but I will tell you what I have been thinking, if you like."

"Very well."

"You will then see that the affair is left entirely in you own hands.

"All right, then," answered the officer, with a sigh of relief, "let me hear what you have to propose."

"Very well. In the first place, I should recommend you to obtain horses for yourself and your comrades. I can ride on my own; and I will take you all to the place where they are concealed, and where you can capture them with less trouble than you did me."

"That's the ticket! But I say."

"What?"

"If I trusted you to get on your horse again, how do I know but what you would take the first opportunity to bolt off?"

"You would be greatly to blame if you allowed me any such opportunity."

"I suppose I should. But then you are as slippery as an eel, and as cunning as a fox."

"You are complimentary."

"I am, if you choose to think so."

"But this is not the point."

"No, truly."

"First of all, do you consent—yes or no?"

The officer reflected for some moments, and then said:

"I will consult my companions."

"Do so. But shall you make the boy and the watchman party to it? They would be no good, and would only make two more to divide the reward amongst."

Tom could not have employed a more cogent argument than this.

"Leave them to me," said the officer. "I'll see to them, never fear."

Having spoken these words in a very confident tone, he moved off a step or two in order to consult with his companions, who were not a little curious and anxious to know what had passed between the prisoner and their chief.

They were not long left in ignorance.

Tom watched them with a keen eye.

Upon the decision arrived at depended his liberty and his life.

No prisoner standing in the dock waiting for the verdict of the jury could have suffered greater anxiety than he did.

And yet to have gazed upon him no one would have thought that he was even moved.

He was sorely tempted to try to make a run for it, but the recollection of the pistols held so handily by his foes, and the thought that they would in all probability assent to his proposal, induced him to remain firm.

Whether this was a chance he ought to have embraced or not would be hard indeed to say.

At any rate, be the case how it might, the chance was lost, for the chief officer came to him and said:

"My fellows are all inclined to agree to your proposal, though they could hardly believe at first that you were in earnest in intending to betray your companions, it was so foreign to your nature."

"It may be so," answered Tom, grimly, "but then you should always bear in mind that circumstances alter cases."

"That is very true."

"But do they consent?"

"With one condition they do."

"What is it?"

"That you suffer yourself to be bound upon your horse in a secure manner, and ride in the midst of us."

This was a difficulty.

Tom hardly saw his way out of it, though, for all that, he said, offhand:

"I think it a pity you lot cannot mind me without putting me to so much pain and inconvenience."

"They have such an opinion of your abilities."

"Suppose I refuse?"

"Why, then, they recommend that we take you direct to Newgate, and so make sure of you, at all events. And this is what I should do, for I am one of those who firmly believe that a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush."

Now the reader must know already that, in spite of all he had said, Tom's ultimate idea and intention was escape.

The mere fact of his being bound on his horse's back would materially impede the carrying out of this project, and yet, how was he to avoid it?

He might have given his solemn word not to attempt to get free, and doubtless, had he done so, the officers would have been satisfied; but that would by no means have agreed with Tom's intentions, for he placed too high a value upon his word ever to break the pledge, no matter what the circumstances might be.

Clearly, however, it was better to consent to any terms, no matter how hard, so long as he got further away from London, than it would be voluntarily to consign himself to a cell in Newgate, from whence there would be scarcely the faintest shadow of a hope of effecting his liberation.

"We sha'n't put you to any pain, that I know of," continued the officer, "and not to any more inconvenience than we can help. We shall just secure you with a rope to prevent you from giving us the slip, and no more."

"Well," said Tom, "if you won't trust me, why, of course I must submit, and I hope that will go a little way towards convincing you that I am quite in earnest."

"It will certainly."

"Then send for some horses, and we will be off at once. But for your own sakes keep the matter quiet."

"You trust me."

Immediately after this, one of the officers was, after many injunctions, despatched to fetch the requisite number of horses to accommodate the troop.

The watchman and the boy were aware something of a peculiar character was going on, but the officers took particularly good care that they should not find out what.

The chief took advantage of the absence of his subordinate to address a few words to them.

As for the watchman, he was soon disposed of.

No sort of stipulation or agreement had been entered into with him whatever, and therefore he was abundantly satisfied upon receiving half-a-crown in return for his trouble.

But with the boy it was different.

His eyes looked brighter—

His face more hungry-like than ever, owing to the expression of preternatural acuteness which rested upon it.

"Now, my lad," said the officer, "will you take a certain sum down for your share in this affair, and be off about your business?"

"Eh?"

"You know very well what I said; and if you don't, I ain't going to repeat it."

"Well, then, I will take one-seventh part of the amount of the reward offered."

"Oh, will you, indeed?"

"Yes, certainly. That was what we agreed upon.

"Very well. You mean to say you will be quite content with that?"

"Yes, I shall."

"Then come to me at the police office in the morning and you shall have the amount."

"But I shall go with you to Newgate and see him safely lodged."

"Well, that you can please yourself about; but we are going out on some business that does not concern you in any degree."

The boy opened his eyes a trifle wider as he said, with remarkable determination:

"I'm going with you!"

"Are you?"

"I am!"

"Then you will have to do so in the best way you are able. I don't intend to find accommodation for you; and, what is more, you had better be civil if you are wise, for, remember, you have not got the money yet, and I shall have a share in the paying of it."

At this moment the clatter of horses' hoofs became audible, importing that the officer was returning.

CHAPTER MXLV.

RELATES THE SURPRISING ADVENTURES OF TOM KING AND THE OFFICERS.

This last speech of the officer's seemed to furnish the boy with food for reflection, for he remained perfectly silent.

Tom was busily engaged in thought.

The horses were soon opposite the gateway, and the one who had been despatched to fetch them showed a piece of long, strong rope that he had brought as well.

"That's the ticket!" said one of his companions, seizing upon this article with evident satisfaction.

There was now a scene of great bustle and excitement.

The horses were soon ready.

The officer with the rope advanced, and, having formed a running noose in the middle of it, he put it over Tom's head and brought it down to his waist.

He was about to draw it tight, in such a manner that Tom's arms would be confined to his sides at the elbow.

This he strongly protested against, and after some discussion the rope was merely secured round his waist, and his arms were not confined at all.

This much having been done, he was requested to mount his steed.

He did this with an alacrity that was unfeigned.

Two officers then took hold of the ends of the rope and mounted their steeds also.

Then placing themselves abreast with Tom, they took firm hold of the rope.

"I hope now you have me secure," said Tom, with a forced laugh. "At any rate, if I go anywhere I shall have to take the pair of you with me."

The officers echoed his laugh with great spirit, for they were much delighted at their extraordinary cleverness.

The others now mounted, two going in front and two following in the rear.

Thus hemmed in, it certainly did not seem possible for any human being to escape.

Tom thought so too, and wondered in what way and to what extent Fortune intended to favour him.

How he was to get free he was still unable to make out.

During the ride which was about to ensue, however, he considered he should have some opportunities for reflection, and he trusted that his brain would furnish him with an expedient that would enable him to achieve his purpose.

To start with, however, there was one palpable fact.

This was, that while he retained his present position, to get away was impossible, except by the intervention of some miracle, and Tom was not foolish enough to believe that any miracle would be wrought in his behalf.

"Now," said the chief officer, "are you all ready to start?"

"Yes," was the unanimous answer.

"Forward, then, and let us go as fast as we can just at first, so as to get rid of that boy in case he should try to follow us."

"Keep the Oxford Road," said Tom King—"ride along it till I tell you to turn off."

This direction was clear and easy to be carried out.

The boy, seeing them all start, started too.

No doubt he had great faith in his power of wind and rapidity of motion.

But his vanity, if so we may term it, received a check.

The officers started off at full gallop; and after running for some distance, the boy, with a howl of vexation and despair, was forced to confess himself beaten.

It was hard indeed that he should see the highwayman go out of his sight.

But what could he do?

He was unable to prevent it.

He was panting and exhausted, and so he sat down to think.

Leaving him thus engaged, we will follow in the steps of the police officers and Tom King.

They did not long maintain the rate of speed with which they had commenced their journey.

When they slackened, however, they took good care that they should surround Tom as closely as ever.

The officer who had thought of the device of the rope did nothing but chuckle about it; and Tom wished that so clever a personage was at the bottom of the sea, as perhaps but for this he could have given them the slip.

Still, as he rode along in company with his captors, Tom could not help feeling a very great degree of satisfaction.

Looking back, it seemed scarcely credible that the officers should have brought him right away from London, when they had him so near to a place of detention.

There can be no doubt, however, that the officers were firmly persuaded that, let what would happen, they were on the safe side.

Even supposing they should fail to capture the others, they knew they should have Tom safe, and they trusted to their own ingenuity and sagacity to keep him secure.

And certainly, looking calmly at the matter, it did seem much easier for them to do this than for Tom to escape.

However, we shall soon see how all fared by watching the progress of events.

They had now performed a considerable distance, London being so far behind that they might with justice call themselves quite in the country.

The leader of the troop began to grow impatient.

"Is it much further?" he asked.

"Not very far," answered Tom, who up to this moment had by no means made up his mind where he was to take them.

At any rate, it would not be anywhere in the vicinity of the Jolly Tar Inn, for Tom was resolved if he could not get free himself he would not be the cause of bringing trouble and danger upon his comrades.

"What kind of a place is it?" persisted the officer. "Surely you can give us some description of it?"

Tom could not very well get out of this, and, simple as it seemed, this was a great danger, and one that he had altogether omitted to take into account.

To be sure, it would be easy enough to draw upon his imagination for the description of some unexisting place, but then there was the difficulty of finding a place that would accord with his description.

"Can't you wait?" he asked, pretending to laugh. "You will know when you see it."

"But why not tell us?"

"Why should I?"

"Is it in a wood?"

"Yes."

"A cave?"

"Well, not exactly a cave; but do wait a few minutes longer, and I will show you."

The officer was silent, and Tom rejoiced to think he had got off so easily, for, as will be seen, he had not pledged himself to anything definite.

He racked his brain more than ever in order to decide upon some course of action, but in vain.

Morning, too, was coming on, and he was conscious that by daylight his chance of effecting his liberation would be materially lessened.

It seemed advisable, then, to take some speedy and decisive step, could he but resolve upon its nature.

Gazing before him, he saw in the distance a great mass of trees.

In his excursions he had noticed them many a time, but he had never been very near to them.

From their appearance, however, it was tolerably clear that they formed a portion of a wood of considerable extent.

The conclusion which our friend now came to was that while he remained on horseback he stood no chance whatever of effecting his purpose.

But how was he to alight and to induce his companions to do likewise?

The wood seemed to promise to answer this purpose, and so desperate had Tom King by this time become that he was resolved to dally no longer.

Accordingly, looking towards the trees, he asked:

"Do you see that wood yonder?"

"Yes. Is that the place?"

"It is."

"Then it is time to quit the high-road?"

"Yes; you will find the road easy enough across the meadows."

Just then the officers happened to be opposite a gate leading into the fields.

This gate one of the officers, having dismounted, threw open.

A succession of green, undulating meadows alone divided them from the wood to which Tom had pointed.

To ride across these was, of course, no harder than to journey along the high-road.

The excitement of the officers was now wound up to too great a pitch to allow them to speak.

For this Tom was thankful, for a succession of inquisitive questions could not have failed to embarrass him.

The border of the wood was quickly reached.

The trees did not grow here so closely together as to make it necessary for the party to dismount.

But Tom led the way to the thickest place he could find.

The officers seemed unwilling to quit their steeds, and so forced a way as far as they were able, but at length the extreme density of the vegetation compelled them to come to a halt.

"What are we to do now?" asked the leader.

"Dismount," answered Tom, laconically.

"But our horses?"

"You must leave them here with some one to mind them."

"But is there no means of getting to this place without quitting our saddles?"

"None whatever. Do you think Dick Turpin would take up his quarters at a place that you could drive a carriage and four into?"

This was not deemed at all likely, so, after the expression of much disapproval, the officers dismounted.

They were most careful to keep a sharp look-out upon Tom, whom they surrounded even more closely than ever.

"You seem greatly afraid of me," he said.

"So we ought to be, considering who you are and where we are. Rely upon it, we are not going to let you slip through our fingers as others have done."

"But you are not going to keep this rope round me, surely?"

"Indeed but we are!"

"It will be most awkward to get through the trees in this fashion."

"It cannot be helped, for we do not intend to proceed in any other manner."

"Well, as you will," replied Tom, resignedly. "I can perform my part of the affair."

The two officers who held the ends of the rope that was fastened round Tom's waist seemed to fix their hands for even a firmer grasp than they had yet maintained.

Hemmed in, then, by his foes even more closely than when on horseback, the little strangely-assorted party forced their way among the tangled brushwood.

At every step they took it became darker and darker, for the tall trees cast deep shadows about their roots.

Still, Tom could not help admitting to himself the disagreeable fact that he was about as far from the accomplishment of his design as ever.

He fancied, too, that the officers regarded him suspiciously, as though they had an idea that he was not acting in good faith towards them.

Perhaps it was Tom's own conscience—which is ever its own accuser—made him fancy this.

The crisis had arrived, however.

The next few moments would either show him a free man or else the officers would discover the deception that had been practised upon them.

The latter seemed to be more probable than the former.

Tom pressed his teeth together hard, and, looking keenly round him, resolved to embrace the first opportunity that presented itself.

But he watched in vain.

All at once, to his disappointment and dismay, they emerged into a considerable space that was quite bare of trees.

The officers gave vent to exclamations of surprise.

Tom was no less astonished, but he concealed the state of his feelings tolerably well.

He continued to advance with a confident step across the clearing.

The ground around now partook of quite a rocky character.

Ere they had gone many yards, they found themselves on the brink of what could not be termed anything but a precipice.

They came upon it suddenly, owing to the manner in which the ground sloped upwards, thus preventing them from knowing what laid in their path until they were within a few steps of the verge of the abyss.

"Hullo!" cried the chief officer. "D—n me if this isn't a rum place you have brought us to! Where are we to go now?"

Tom could not tell himself.

But he retained his confidence admirably.

"This way," he said, and he approached a little closer to the brink of the chasm.

He took in at one glance the features of the scene around him, and at the same time resolved upon the course he should adopt.

But before relating it we must give a brief description of the spot.

At the foot of the abyss we have mentioned flowed a current of water—too wide to be called a brook, and yet scarcely important-looking enough to be designated a river.

It was probably a woodland stream which was greatly swollen by rains, for it rushed along almost with the violence and rapidity of a torrent.

Where this stream came from could not be discerned; but it flowed beneath a rude kind of archway in some rocks.

The depth to the surface of this water from where Tom and the officers stood was close upon twenty feet.

"Which is the way?" asked the officers again.

"This," was Tom's reply.

At the moment he spoke, he summoned up all his energies, and gave a tremendous bound forward.

He had observed that the rope was held scarcely so tightly as it had been, for the officers seemed disinclined to stand too near to the brink, and doubtless they thought Tom would not venture to go closer.

But his sudden movement took them completely by surprise.

They had the chance either of releasing their hold or plunging over the abyss with their prisoner.

They chose the former course.

The rope slipped through their fingers, and the highwayman disappeared.

There was a general shout, and then the one in command came as close to the edge of the precipice as he dared, and looked down.

He caught sight of Tom in the water.

He was either swimming or else being carried along by the current.

It was scarcely light enough to distinguish which.

"We have not lost him yet," he screamed—"not yet! Follow me! We shall have him after all! It is impossible for him to escape!"

CHAPTER MXLVI.

CONTINUES TO RELATE THE UNPARALLELED ADVENTURES OF TOM KING.

NOTHING but the knowledge of the fact that his life was at stake, and that this was his only chance of escape, could have induced Tom King to adopt so perilous an expedient as the one we have described.

He was, in fact, just then rendered desperate, as he greatly feared that the officers would suspect he was only playing with them.

He trusted that the depth of the stream would be sufficient to preserve him from any injury, and certainly the tremendous rapidity with which the water rushed along would serve to keep him from reaching the bottom very easily.

He scarcely hoped, however, that he should be able to snatch the rope from the hands of the officers.

Still, he had no doubt that if he carried them over the abyss he should have little difficulty in disentangling himself as soon as he reached the water.

This trouble, as it happened, was saved him.

The rapid descent through the air deprived Tom of breath, and upon plunging into the stream he was partially deprived of consciousness.

Still, he was sensible of a sharp shock of pain, and instantly afterwards, actuated by instinct, he was battling with his arms.

The great force of the current carried him rapidly along without any effort on his part.

The only exertion he had to make was that requisite to keep his head above the surface of the water.

This was a comparatively easy matter.

The intense coldness of the water seemed to have a reviving and stimulating effect upon him.

His brain grew clearer each second.

He could hear the cries of his pursuers.

Whereabouts they were situated he could not tell, nor did he make any particular endeavour to inquire.

They were in his rear, and that sufficed.

Then a shadow seemed to fall upon him.

Looking up, he perceived a huge, ragged mass of rock.

Before him was the rudely-formed arch to which we have already adverted.

The force of the stream was drawing swiftly to it, and at the prospect he could not repress a shudder—

It seemed to him that if he once passed under, he should be hurried into the very bowels of the earth.

He tried to arrest his course.

But the effort was a vain one.

He had not the strength to cope with so large a body of water.

He drifted beneath the arch.

The effect was as though he had plunged from day into the darkest night.

But just as he passed under he heard a loud cry behind which he felt assured was given utterance to by the officers upon seeing him disappear.

The loudness of the cry convinced him that they could not be far off, so that had he succeeded in arresting his course at the moment he wished to do so, he would have fallen again into the hands of his foes; for in his present condition, it was next to impossible that he would be able to cope successfully with so many.

Of the two, then, he infinitely preferred drifting beneath the rocks to becoming again a prisoner.

Whether or not he should ever again see the light of day was a question which he could not answer.

He had often heard of streams which had thus rushed under mountains and which have never been known to emerge again

To what point those waters might flow was a thing unknown to man—perhaps they went to feed some huge reservoir in the centre of the earth.

These and other strange speculations flitted across Tom's brain in a space of time that would have appeared incredibly brief had the rapidity of thought not been well-known.

How long it was after entering this subterranean passage that he became aware pieces of rock were hanging pendent from the roof he could not tell.

It must have been only a few moments, however.

The thought at once occurred to him that if he could manage in his rapid course to seize upon one of these stalactites, he might be able to arrest his further progress, and remain there until the officers had taken their departure from the vicinity.

No sooner did this thought strike him than he endeavoured to carry it into effect.

The first he attempted to catch hold of eluded his grasp, for the water dashing continually against the rockwork rendered it as smooth as ice.

But it seemed, nevertheless, to check the tremendous speed at which, up to that moment, he had been going.

For this reason he had all the better chance of seizing the next.

He did so, and, to his extreme satisfaction, succeeded in achieving his purpose.

Clinging tightly to the slippery object, he, after many struggles, succeeded in getting upon his feet.

Even then it required no trifling amount of exertion to maintain an upright posture.

But it was a great relief thus to be freed from the rude buffetings of the water, for now that he stood up the water did not reach up so high as his waist.

The officers, to whose proceedings we now for a moment or two return, instantly followed their leader, who took his course in the direction of the very archway of which we have had occasion so many times to make mention.

His quick eye had descried a path by means of which he would be able to descend to this point.

He had, however, to take a very circuitous route, so that before he could reach this point, Tom King drifted out of sight.

It was then that they set up the cry which floated along the surface of the water to the ears of our old friend.

They crowded as closely as they could round the mouth of the arch, and, stooping down, they endeavoured to see what lay beyond.

But they could see nothing but darkness.

"This is a rum job," said one—"blow me if it ain't! I should think he must be mad, or he would never have taken such a jump as that—and to go under there too! Why it seems to go into the very middle of the earth!"

"I believe," said another, "that he was insensible from the fall, and drifted under here without knowing where he was going."

"At any rate," said the chief, "I will find out whether he is hiding just a little way under in the dark."

"Do you think he is?" asked one of his companions.

"I do—he would scarcely venture to follow the stream. Stand aside!"

With these words, he came nearer to the arch.

"Tom King," he said, "I believe you are hiding close at hand. If you are, come forth, for if you don't show yourself we will fire a volley upon you, and we shall have the reward all the same, you know."

No answer whatever was vouchsafed to this speech, though the officer waited for one for several seconds.

"Now, boys," he said, "make ready, and give it him all together!"

The officers had their pistols ready, and at once levelled them in obedience to this command.

"Keep your barrels low," said the chief. "Now fire!"

A scattering discharge followed, for the police officers were not well enough practised to fire off a volley with military exactness.

The smoke obscured everything for a short time, but when it had dispersed, and when the many rattling echoes which the discharge of the firearms had called forth had died away, there was no change visible in the aspect of affairs.

"I'll follow him," said the chief, in tones of determination—"yes, if you have to ride a hundred miles to fetch a boat! Go, three of you, at once upon this errand, and I will wait here with the rest till you come back."

We now return to Tom.

He heard distinctly the orders given by the chief of the police officers, and as soon as ever he found they were about to fire a volley he at once took what he thought would be effectual means to secure his safety.

He had all at once recollected the rope which was secured to his waist, which of course would assist him in retaining his hold.

He thought he should be able to lash himself tightly to the pendent piece of rock, and in such a manner that he could stoop down altogether under the water, which would of course shield him from all injury.

This manœuvre he proceeded at once to carry into execution.

The volley was fired.

Just at that moment, however, from some cause he could not discover, the rope gave way, and he found himself whirled round and then carried along the stream with additional velocity.

Whether it was that he had failed to secure the rope properly, or whether the rock was of too slippery a character to afford a hold, he could not tell.

It might be, too, that the concussion of the atmosphere in so confined a space, consequent upon the discharge of so many firearms, had had the effect of loosening the stalactite in its setting.

No matter from what cause, however, Tom found himself being whirled along in the manner we have mentioned.

The consequence of this was that he failed to overhear what the officer in command said about a boat.

Louder and louder roared the water.

Faster and faster, too, it flowed, for its channel kept continually getting more and more constricted.

Tom made continual frantic efforts to seize upon the rocks as he rushed by them.

He broke his nails and lacerated his fingers in the attempt, but without succeeding.

Then suddenly he experienced a sharp, heavy blow upon the head, and then after that all was a blank.

The blow had been given by a mass of down-hanging rock against which his head, being raised in his endeavour to check his course, came into violent contact.

Not more than a second, however, appeared to elapse before he opened his eyes again.

How long he had remained unconscious was, however, a thing about which he could form no sort of idea whatever.

He looked about him at first vacantly and dreamily.

Then a voice—yes, surely a human voice—sounded in his ears.

That did more towards bringing Tom to his senses than anything else could.

A voice meant danger.

Accordingly, he made a tremendous effort to regain his footing, for he was aware that he was no longer in the water.

In this attempt it is not likely he would have been successful, however, had not some one's hands grasped him tightly and assisted him to rise.

By the time he was in an erect posture, Tom had recovered the use of his senses, and was able to take full cognizance of all that was going on around him.

At first he was so amazed at the strange character of the objects he beheld that he was at a loss to know whether he was really awake or dreaming.

Looking around, he first of all made the discovery that he was standing in the midst of a huge, almost circular, dome-like chamber.

The sides were composed of masses of rugged rock, which in some places glittered and shone resplendently, as though some one had been busy covering them with gems and burnished gold.

But the glittering, as Tom perceived, had its origin in the light falling upon certain places where the rockwork was prismatic.

How high this cavern was he could form no accurate conception, for a kind of luminous misty cloud concealed the topmost portion of the dome altogether.

There was also a strange vibration of the earth and a deafening, rushing noise.

This he quickly found to be caused by the impetuous current of the stream, which rushed into the cavern with great violence.

Then there was a kind of mimic waterfall, close to the base of which was a sheet of nearly placid water of considerable extent, and finally there was another rude arch, beneath which the turbulent water once more escaped.

These were the most striking features of the place in which Tom thus strangely and unexpectedly found himself, and such as he was able to take in and comprehend by giving one glance around him.

But the being in whose grasp he still was?

Who was that?

Tom wrenched himself round with considerable violence—with much more, indeed, than there was any necessity for him to make use of, and consequently he staggered and nearly fell again.

Then his eyes encountered one of the most singular beings in human shape that he had ever looked upon.

It was a man whose age would be the most difficult thing to guess at, for the whole of his face was thickly covered with grizzly, bristly hair, which had the appearance of being totally neglected.

The same thing, too, might have been said of his head, for the hair upon it was inextricably matted together, and hung down in tangled masses upon his back and shoulders.

His clothing was torn and tattered in a thousand places, and so faded and so worn that scarcely a guess could have been hazarded as to its original condition.

He regarded Tom with a look by no means unfriendly, though he seemed not a little surprised at the rough treatment to which he had been subjected.

Observing with what astonishment Tom gazed upon him, the singular figure spoke.

"You are amazed to see me here, no doubt," he said, in a low, constrained, sad voice; "but not more so than I am to behold you in this place, for I believe that since the creation of the world we are the only human beings who have ever stood beneath this roof."

"You speak truly," said Tom, "I am amazed indeed. But how chances it that you are here?"

The stranger smiled sadly.

"You shall know," he said. "We shall have ample time for explanation and communication with each other. We are destined to become better acquainted than we are now."

"How so? Your words must be, I think, needlessly enigmatical."

"They shall be so, then, no longer. Let me ask you whether you did not by an accident find yourself in the power of the current, and whether you were not helplessly carried beneath a rude natural archway at the base of a mass of rock?"

"Such was the case," answered Tom. "But why do you ask? How did you surmise it?"

"Because that is just how I, long, long ago, was carried into this place."

Tom started, for a fearful, horrible supposition began to force itself upon his mind.

"And why have you remained?" said Tom, though when he asked the question he dreaded to hear the reply to it.

"Because I have not been able to leave."

"Why not?"

"I am kept a prisoner."

"By whom?"

"By these masses of rugged rock."

"You still speak in enigmas," said Tom, endeavouring to maintain his usual calmness.

"Then I will speak plainly, and in a few words you shall know the worst. And yet before I speak, let me desire you to summon up to your aid all the fortitude which you possess."

"I am prepared."

"Then, as I have said, I was caught by the current and carried under the arch. I had been out with a boat, and had been expressly warned against this place; but I was in the vortex before I was aware of it."

"And how did you escape?"

"By a merciful providence I was thrown up on the shore here, if I may so call it. Luckily, I had sufficient strength and sense to drag myself completely out of the water."

"And do you mean to assert," said Tom, glancing around, "that there is no means of exit from this place?"

"None whatever."

"Have you tried?"

"Yes, as a man would try whose object was to free himself from a lifelong solitary imprisonment."

Tom drew a long breath.

He knew what an incentive such a motive as the stranger had expressed would be

[DICK TURPIN AND MAUD AT THE TURNPIKE GATE.]

Yet Tom was not satisfied.

Up to this moment the exciting nature of the extraordinary events which had just occurred had prevented him from thinking at all about the officers, but the word imprisonment had served as a key-note to bring him to his recollection.

He listened.

No sound, however, reached his ear to indicate that such persons as police officers had existence even.

That they would follow him seemed in the highest degree doubtful.

The consideration of this contingency, however, suggested another thought, and he asked, quickly:

"Have you never tried to leave this place by the same route as that by which you entered it?"

"I have. That was the most obvious course."

"It is impossible, then?"

"It is."

"Why?"

"Because just where the stream enters the cavern the violence of the current is so tremendous that it is altogether impossible to stand against it. I have tried and tried again and again, as you may easily suppose I should when I discovered that there was no other chance of leaving."

"But where does the water flow?"

"Through another low and narrow arch yonder; it is at the opposite extremity of the cavern."

"And where does that lead?"

"Heaven knows," answered the stranger, with a shudder. "For aught that I can tell, it may flow miles into the earth, or, what is more likely, it may by some underground course empty itself into the sea. Look, the ocean must at one time have rolled where we now stand, and this huge chamber, doubtless, was hollowed out by the never-ceasing rushing of waves carried on for countless ages."

While making this impressive speech, the stranger had picked up from the floor of the cavern what seemed to be a handful of coarse sand.

But upon investigation, Tom found that it consisted of numberless shells—some merely fragments, and others quite entire.

"You amaze me," said Tom, gazing around him with admiration. "I had no conception of the existence of such a place."

The stranger sighed.

"Under other circumstances," he said, "a close and diligent examination of this cavern would have afforded me infinite delight; as it is, it has served to while away the tedium of many, many hours."

"And have you been long in this place?"

"So long that I have lost the computation of time, for I know not the day, the month, nor even the year. I had lost all hope of ever beholding one of my fellow-creatures again; and when, a short time ago, I saw you floating in the water, no words can describe my sensations."

These disclosures produced a dull, stupified effect upon Tom King.

He could not thoroughly realise the awful nature of his situation.

Perhaps the manner of the stranger tended in no small degree to produce this feeling, for he spoke with the calmness and resignation of one who knows that what he utters is a foregone conclusion.

By his manner he was evidently fully convinced that it was not in the power of human beings to effect an escape from that place.

Tom was not so assured of this, however, and, in spite of his disagreeable position, he could not help experiencing considerable satisfaction at having thus escaped from the power of his foes.

All things are judged by contrasts, and therefore, by comparison, Tom did not feel that discontent which any other person would have exhibited who was not similarly situated to himself.

That his enemies would have the boldness to penetrate to his present retreat, he did not for one moment believe.

Nor was Tom in any immediate hurry to make the attempt to get free, lest in succeeding he should again fall into their power.

The stranger was not a little astonished at Tom's indifference, and at length he was compelled to remark:

"You must be no ordinary man to treat this matter so calmly. I should have imagined that so dreadful a prospect as imprisonment for life would have filled you with despair."

"I don't know that I am very different to other people," answered Tom; "but, for one thing, I do not very readily yield myself to despair."

"Ah! I see now how it is—you are incredulous; you do not believe that you are threatened with such a fate as I have mentioned."

"I do not doubt one word you have said; but I confess I shall be much better satisfied of the impossibility of quitting this place when I have tried my best to do so and failed."

The stranger looked at him with compassion.

"Believe me," he said, "this hope you cherish is a delusive one. Had escape been possible, do you think I should have remained here thus, sundered from all who hold me dear, and who must ever remain in ignorance of my miserable fate?"

Tom did not reply, but, feeling by this time something like himself, proceeded to look around the cavern into which he had been so strangely cast.

The stranger followed in his steps.

He really felt the deepest sensations of pity for our friend, for he knew how long it was before he could bring his mind to a realisation of the dreadful fact that he was entombed alive.

He remembered what he suffered at the time when all hope was extinguished, and he deeply compassionated our old friend.

But then this stranger did not know Tom's indomitable resolution, and doubtless the reader feels most strongly convinced that the impediments would be of no ordinary character that would prevent him from once more working his way to the surface of the earth.

Suddenly Tom stopped.

"I have just been wondering," he exclaimed, "how you manage to obtain food in this subterranean place. Of course there must be some means of doing so, or you would not be in existence at the present moment; but what it can be completely puzzles me."

"I am confined to one particular kind of diet—a thing which, under some circumstances, would no doubt be deemed a hardship, but it is infinitely better than starvation."

"But what is it? I am filled with the utmost curiosity to know."

"Why, that pool or lake yonder—whichever you think fit to call it—abounds with fish, and, fortunately for me, they are easily captured."

"And is this the only means of support you have had?"

"It is indeed."

Tom half shuddered.

Such a life as the stranger described having led must in good truth have been a dreadful one.

But Tom at present was animated and inspired by the belief that he could, if he made the attempt, release himself.

Whether this belief was well founded or not will soon be seen.

He examined the interior of the cavern with great curiosity, looking closely into every nook and corner, for all that he saw was new and strange.

In one nook he came upon the remnants of a fire.

Only a few white-looking embers remained, and they seemed on the very point of utter extinction.

"That must have been one great comfort and consolation," remarked Tom, pointing to it.

"It has been indeed, but will be no longer," was the answer given, with the deepest dejection.

"Indeed! How so?"

"Why, when I first drifted into this place, being a smoker, I had the means about me of producing a light readily. From time to time, quantities of dead leaves, twigs, and other rubbish had accumulated in various corners; with these I made a fire. I thought the supply of material would be inexhaustible; but I have discovered my error. The last morsel has been used."

"Then a sojourn here in future will be even more uncomfortable than it has been hitherto?"

"It will," answered the stranger, with a sympathetic shiver, "for in the gloomy winter time the nights here are fearfully cold, owing, I suppose, to the presence of so large a body of water."

Tom said no more, but continued his exploration.

He paused for some time before the archway through which he had been carried.

Here the water issued with such tremendous rapidity and violence that it seemed to be boiling.

Never before had Tom beheld so impetuous a current.

The stranger stood silently by his side.

"It would be an achievement of no ordinary difficulty, would it not, to attempt to force a passage in defiance of such a stream as that? What chance, think you, would you have of retaining a footing there?"

"It would be impossible to do so unaided," replied Tom, after a few moments' reflection; "but I am far from feeling convinced that it would be impossible for us, by our united means, to overcome even a greater obstacle than this."

In spite of his belief that there was no hope of release, and in spite, also, of thinking that this conviction was firmly impressed upon his mind, a slight flush of colour tinged the stranger's cheeks.

Tom noticed it; but made no comment.

His thought just then reverted to his foes.

He wondered whether they had abandoned the pursuit as hopeless

He fancied they must have done so.

Whether the police officers would be mad enough to trust themselves in a boat to thread the intricacies and encounter the unknown perils of this subterranean stream time alone can show.

At any rate, he could not distinguish above the roaring of the water any sound indicative of their approach.

The spot upon which he had been standing was considerably above the level of the other portions of the cavern floor, to reach which it was necessary to make their way down a winding path.

The water, however, rushed off the brink of a kind of precipice, and fell with great force into a kind of basin, thus forming that mimic waterfall of which we have already spoken.

The water whirled round for some time, and finally expanded itself into a pool, the surface of which, by comparison, was almost calm.

It was from here, as the stranger had said, his only food had been obtained, and Tom, as he looked down at the water, could see multitudes of one kind of fish disporting themselves.

Passing on, Tom came at last to the other outlet of the water.

This arch closely resembled the one at the other side of the cavern; but it was higher and wider, and the water did not rush through with so much swiftness, though, as he stood listening and looking down the dark passage, he fancied he could hear a commotion of waters like that which would be produced by another waterfall.

Whether this was so or not, he was unable to determine, for the darkness which prevailed just within the arch was such as to seem of a tangible character—an actual substance—instead of something merely produced by the absence of light.

CHAPTER MXLVII.

TOM KING MAKES A MOST DESPERATE ATTEMPT TO ESCAPE FROM THE CAVERN.

STILL continuing to look down, Tom indulged in many speculations as to the course which the headstrong stream would probably take.

The idea which his new-found companion had expressed concerning it seemed to be a very probable one indeed.

As he gazed, nothing seemed more likely than that this watercourse poured itself into some inner chamber of the earth.

He was compelled, too, to admit that the aspect of things did not promise well for the success of an escape.

But for all that, our old friend was not downhearted.

Had he been confined in the innermost dungeon of Newgate, with his limbs loaded with irons, and with the closest guard kept upon him by his jailors, he would not have looked upon self-liberation as impossible, and would have essayed his best to regain his freedom.

In comparison with such a task as this, the escape from a cavern seemed absolutely trifling.

The stranger watched Tom's countenance very closely, striving to read all the thoughts that were passing through his mind.

Although he would not admit it even to himself, Tom's confident manner had done much towards enlivening that hope which the stranger fully believed was quite extinct in his breast—namely, that, after all, it might be possible once again to look upon the surface of the earth.

"What think you of the prospect now?" he asked, in a voice which he strove hard to make seem indifferent. "Do you find that I have exaggerated the position?"

"Not much," said Tom. "I confess the situation is unpromising enough. Still, I can assure you that I shall use every effort to get away, nor shall I be at all particular in what I attempt, as I shall feel it is better to lose life in such a cause than passively sit down here and pine out a miserable existence."

"You are right," answered the stranger, "and I ought not to have shrunk so much from risking my life as I have done."

Tom did not reply, but looked narrowly at the walls of the cavern, as though with a view of forming some estimate of the probability of finding a means of scaling them.

The stranger, observing him, added:

"In what way shall you make your first attempt?"

"I can scarcely answer that question yet," replied Tom King, thoughtfully.

"But you were thinking about scaling the walls."

"I was wondering whether such a thing was possible, because up above there must be numberless crevices and fissures, or else how would this light penetrate here?"

"There can be no doubt about the existence of such fissures as you describe; but then the walls are so perfectly perpendicular and smooth, that I do not see how they can be climbed."

"We shall see better after awhile," was Tom's answer. "But if all other means fail, there is one which I shall have desperation enough to hazard."

"What is that?"

Tom did not verbally reply, but raised his finger and pointed to the dark cavernous arch through which the water seethed.

"You do not mean that you would commit yourself to that torrent?"

"I should. But let me tell you that would be the last resource."

"I should think so," replied the stranger, with a shudder. "It would be a desperate chance indeed."

"Yet I should think it preferable to long years of imprisonment in this place, and then perhaps at the end a painful death by starvation and cold."

"But consider," said the stranger: "you know not even that this watercourse conducts to freedom. Then how horrible the idea of imagining oneself hurried with breathless rapidity through intense darkness, and borne, it may be, into the very centre of the earth."

"I admit all that; but I should not think it any more horrible than the contingency to which I have just referred."

To this the stranger made no answer, and Tom King now set about the task of scrutinising every portion of the wall.

He considered that by now a sufficient length of time had elapsed to warrant him in taking steps for his liberation, as he thought the chances were he should hear no more of the police officers.

Could he but succeed in getting away from his present most undesirable quarters, he felt he should indeed have ample grounds for self-congratulation, while the intense and utter disappointment suffered by the police officers would always furnish him with a mirthful subject.

An examination of every portion of the cavern's walls impressed Tom strongly with the conviction that, situated as they were, it was hopeless to think of scaling them.

"No matter," he said, "my resources are not exhausted yet; and so far from allowing this first failure to dishearten me, I shall only set about the next with additional vigour and determination."

The stranger, upon hearing this, gave a peculiar smile, which, however, Tom was by far too busy to notice.

But doubtless the stranger was thinking of the time when he was as full of ardent aspirations as Tom was then.

Our friend now bent his way again to that point at which the stream entered the cavern.

"Is the current always as strong as it is now?"

"Very nearly. I fancy the volume of water has been greater lately."

"Have you ever tried to stand against it?"

"Yes."

"And failed?"

"Completely."

"Well, it is but the matter of another wetting," said Tom, calmly, "so I will try myself. Besides, perhaps you did not have such a thing as this to aid you."

As he spoke, Tom King caught hold of one end of the rope, which still remained tied round his waist in the manner we have described.

The stranger shook his head.

Tom untied the knot.

The rope was long and strong.

"The very thing," said Tom. "Now look here—I will show you how to try an experiment."

Some little distance above the centre of the arch was a sharp, jutting piece of rock—in shape more like a gigantic spike than aught else.

A slip knot having been tied in one end of the rope, Tom cast it over this projection and drew it tight.

Then grasping the other end securely, Tom stepped into the stream.

The violence of the current was, however, something of which he had no conception until then.

Before he was aware of it he had lost his footing.

In vain he struggled to regain it.

He kept fast his hold upon the rope, and well it was that he did so, or he would inevitably have been carried over the verge of the waterfall.

So great was the force of the water, that all attempts to make his feet touch the rocky bed were futile.

He was completely borne up upon the surface.

"Help me," he said, to the stranger—"pull me to the shore!"

The request was complied with in a moment.

"You seemed at first to think," remarked the stranger, "that I had made no thorough, resolute effort to release myself, but that was a mistake, for, as you see, your second attempt has succeeded no better than the first."

"Very true," said Tom, as he shook the water from his drenched garments. "I am now thoroughly convinced of the hopelessness of attempting to effect an egress in that direction, though I have no doubt that, could we but once get beneath the arch, we should then find that the violence of the current was much abated."

"But how to do it?"

"I don't believe it can be done."

"You have tried, then, what I believe to be the only means by which the cavern may be left."

"You forget the other arch."

"No, I do not, but I do not look upon that as another means, and I should think that to pass under it would be nothing in the world else but deliberate suicide."

"Why so?"

"Because it is opposed to all probability that the water-course can find an outlet anywhere above ground."

"And I consider you have very slight grounds for coming to such a conclusion."

"Then you think it likely that it flows out somewhere at the side of the mountain?"

"I do."

The stranger shook his head.

Tom now set about the removal of his rope from the projecting point of rock, which he found to be no easy matter.

In the end, however, he succeeded, and then sat down to rest himself and to think further of what he purposed doing.

There was no shrinking from his purpose, for Tom's nature was such as to cause him to prefer losing his life in an attempt to release himself from captivity to remaining for an indefinite time a prisoner.

And yet, for all that, he had no desire to throw his life away, and that is why he sat down to give the subject further consideration.

He wished to make a trial first of what he was about to do, and then, should it fail, for him to be able to make his way back into the cavern again and try some other scheme.

His reflections were of too busy a nature to allow him to remain long seated.

Starting up, he made his way to the second arch, and there remained for several moments as though vacantly gazing upon the water that was hurrying beneath it.

The stranger still continued, as before, to watch every movement and change of countenance with the utmost closeness.

Before Tom had been gazing long he came to the conclusion that the current here was by no means as violent as at the other arch—indeed, he believed he could successfully make a stand against it.

This was a point most important to be ascertained.

Tom was not the one to remain long in doubt in a case where the matter might so easily be solved, so he once again called the services of the rope into requisition.

Affixing it to a point of the rock and seizing hold tightly of one end, he committed himself to the water as before.

A cry of satisfaction announced that his anticipations were not ill founded.

By the aid of a slight amount of assistance from the rope he was able to maintain his footing firmly.

This was a great deal accomplished, and encouraged him to proceed.

His next step was to pass cautiously under the arch—the water being about only up to his middle.

In this manner he proceeded as far as the rope would allow.

He was now in profound darkness, but he was greatly surprised to discover that the channel widened considerably, so that the water neither flowed so swiftly as before nor was it so deep.

"I wish the rope was a few yards longer," he muttered as he made a vain endeavour to pierce the deep obscurity. "But this is a great deal gained. I must now set to work and try what my ingenuity can invent."

Tom had not much trouble to get back again.

"What think you of our prospect now?" asked the stranger.

"I have every hope of success," was Tom's reply.

"But how?"

"The current, as I told you, is nothing like so strong as I imagined, and I believe it would be quite possible for us to follow the course of the passage so far as we thought proper, and then retrace our steps, should there be a necessity for doing so."

"But is it not a desperate chance?"

"No more desperate than we ought to try. Listen: The sides appear to be uniformly rough and jagged. Now I think that if we secure the ends of the rope round each other's waists, we might venture in safety, because you would take one side and I the other. Then, by clinging tightly we could advance, and have double the power over the force of the current."

"I don't think much of your plan," said the stranger, with great candour. "But perhaps you understand these matters much better than I do, and therefore I shall leave this to you."

"But do you consent to aid me?"

"I do; for I am so weary of my existence here that I would do anything that offered a chance of putting a period to it."

"Come, then," said Tom, "let us try now. The sooner we set about it the better."

The rope was now disengaged.

One end Tom secured tightly round his waist in such a way that the knot would neither slip nor come undone.

The stranger followed his example, and then, after repeating his instructions, Tom ventured to enter the water.

The stranger entered at the same moment.

Both took a tight grasp at the sides of the arch, and then prepared to advance.

"Cling tightly," said Tom; "and I will get as far as I can in advance. Then I will hold with all my might, and you can advance too."

"Go on," was the reply given, in tones of great determination.

Tom was very circumspect in all his actions, never releasing his hold upon one point of the rock until he had tightly grasped another.

But keeping thus to one side carried another advantage with it, for this was where the water rushed with great impetuosity.

The tightening of the rope warned Tom that he could proceed no further, so, grasping a jutting portion of rock with both arms, he called to his companion to follow him.

His injunction was immediately complied with.

All went well.

Each step taken thus safely served to fill the stranger with increased confidence and hope.

He, too, went on until the tightness of the cord prevented him from going further.

"Now," said Tom, "maintain a tight hold, so that, in case I may miss my grasp, you will be able to save me from drifting completely away."

"Right. Go on."

Tom obeyed unhesitatingly, and the progress they made soon served to show the stranger the excellence of the mode of operation.

It was a dreadful progress, though, and one that taxed the courage to the utmost.

In a very short time indeed they became totally involved in darkness.

When they turned a shuddering look back, the archway through which they had passed was scarcely discernible from the general gloom.

Before them not the faintest ray of light could be perceived to indicate that there was in front any opening by which they could achieve their much-wished-for escape.

The roaring of the water, too, added inexpressibly to the dismalness of their situation.

"Courage!" cried Tom, fancying his companion flagged a little—"courage! All is going well! This is much more than I ventured to anticipate."

But his voice was almost drowned by the deafening din of the tumulting water; and he was scarcely certain whether the full import of his words had been caught

The stranger, however, struggled on.

But the water, which was of an icy coldness, had an awfully numbing effect upon their limbs.

Their fingers, too, were so much chilled that every moment the task of holding the rockwork became more and more difficult.

There was another circumstance, too, which shortly occurred, and which promised badly for them.

The passage narrowed, and, as a matter of course, the current increased in impetuosity.

The water also flew up in a kind of spray, which, falling on the rockwork, rendered it as slippery as glass.

The stranger felt his strength was failing him.

He wished to retrace his steps, believing that nothing lay before them but certain death.

He called out to Tom to that effect.

But his voice was drowned by the roaring of the water.

He called again and again.

Finding no notice taken, he waited till the rope tightened.

Then he tugged at it, in the hope of conveying to Tom his desire to retrace his steps.

But this action was performed at a most unfortunate moment.

Tom felt that he had not so good a grasp as usual, and endeavoured to better it.

This was the moment when the stranger gave the rope a sharp snatch.

Slight as it was, it proved too much for the strength of Tom's fingers.

His grasp slipped off the glass-like rock, and in the twinkling of an eye he found himself being carried with frightful rapidity along the watercourse.

His first act upon recovering his senses a little was to utter a loud shout of warning to his companion.

But long before this cry had escaped his lips the stranger had been dragged from his hold by the force with which Tom had been carried away.

After making several ineffectual efforts to arrest the rapidity of his progress, Tom abandoned the attempt, and directed all his energies towards the task of keeping himself from being violently dashed against the rugged sides.

On—on he went, with a swiftness that made the preservation of his breath a matter of extreme difficulty.

On—on, each moment his speed becoming more and more terrific!

On—on, until by degrees all consciousness left him, save a small amount which still enabled him trom time to time to make feeble efforts for his preservation.

How far he was thus carried along in this Egyptian darkness he was not, of course, able to form the least idea.

It must, nowever, nave been a very great distance, for a long time elapsed, and the current carried him along with extreme velocity.

More than once his body was dashed with considerable violence against the rockwork, and this would serve to restore to him a portion of his senses just as he was about losing them altogether.

At last, with a sudden rush, he found himself carried out into the daylight.

How it was he could never recollect

He must have been in a condition closely verging upon insensibility, for he never noticed the gradual change from darkness to light which must inevitably have taken place.

He was weak, bruised, and much exhausted.

Nevertheless, he managed to crawl to the sloping shore: but no sooner was he fairly out of reach of the water than his strength utterly left him and consciousness as well.

The next sensation he experienced was one of intense cold.

Opening his eyes, he found that the moon and stars were shining brightly in the undimmed sky above him.

By slow degrees, as he painfully raised himself up, the recollection of what had happened came clearly to his mind.

With a sudden start he looked round, hoping to catch sight of his companion.

But he was disappointed.

There was the rope still attached to his own waist, but by some means or other it had been parted in the middle—apparently by chafing against some point of rock.

Painfully and with difficulty Tom rose to his feet, for a most benumbing stiffness had taken possession of every joint.

At first he was so weak as scarcely to be able to maintain an erect posture.

Straining his eyes, he endeavoured to catch sight of the stranger.

But in vain.

All around was as silent as some forest never trodden by human feet.

The scene was picturesque and beautiful—especially so now that all harsh and rugged features were softened by the silvery effulgence of the moon.

On one side was a mass of rock of a kind and structure rarely met with in an English landscape.

It was from the base of this that the subterranean stream had issued, and Tom listlessly watched where it flowed calmly and gently through the smooth green meadows, affording no indication of its former turbulence.

"He is gone," said Tom King, at length, having satisfied himself that no trace of his late companion could be seen—"he is gone, but where I cannot guess. I must be moving, too. My veins are like ice, and nothing but rapid motion will get my blood once more into proper circulation. My horse, too, I have lost that. No matter, I have escaped the officers, and my loss is by no means irreparable. If all is well, I shall be able to make my way back to the inn easily by daybreak."

With these words Tom turned round, and, at first with a slow, uncertain steps, made his way from the spot which had so nearly proved a fatal one for him.

CHAPTER MXLVIII.

IN WHICH DICK TURPIN HAS A SINGULAR ADVENTURE ON THE HIGHWAY, WHICH IS PRODUCTIVE OF STILL MORE SINGULAR RESULTS.

LEAVING the completion of Tom King's adventures on this night to be related at a more convenient opportunity, we will return once more to the yard at the back of the Jolly Tar Inn, where, as the reader will doubtless well remember, we left Maud and Dick Turpin, both mounted and in the act of setting out.

The prospect of a night of adventure and excitement caused Maud's cheeks to glow, her heart to flutter, and her breath to come and go quickly.

"Are you quite ready?" Dick asked.

"Quite."

"Come, then. Keep close by my side, and at all hazards obey implicitly every one of my injunctions."

"You may depend upon it," Maud answered, as she gave her horse the rein.

The prospect of sharing all danger with Dick, and of passing several hours in his company when she expected to be left in the dreadful solitude of the inn, enduring a thousand apprehensions, filled her mind with a joyfulness to which she had long been a stranger.

Dick noticed her good spirits, and guessing at the cause, could not help experiencing a very large amount of satisfaction.

"Oh," Maud exclaimed, with joyful accents, "what a delight is this! I feel it because of the contrast which it offers to a sojourn in that awful place."

"We will not remain there long," replied Dick, "though you ought to place due weight upon the security it offers."

"I do—I do. But, nevertheless, it does not abate its horror. When shall you commence your journey to Stonehenge?"

"It will not be long first."

"Do you not think, Dick, that if you were to try, you could between now and then make such arrangements as would enable us all to leave England in company with Tom Davis?"

This was a question which, on many accounts, was a difficult one for Dick to answer.

Fortunately, chance intervened and saved him the trouble.

"Hark!" he cried, just as Maud was pronouncing the last word of her interrogation—"hark! I fancy I heard something then!"

Maud, dreading the approach of danger, listened with the utmost intentness.

But all was still.

"What was it like?" she at length ventured to inquire.

"I fancied a horse's hoofs, but I must have been mistaken. Ha! here is the high-road. Now, then, it will be necessary to make use of the utmost caution."

Up to this moment they had been making their way across the open country, but now, as Dick had said, they had come to the high-road, which was only separated from them by a hedge so low that Maud felt sure her horse could easily leap across it.

Dick thought so too, and so jumped Black Bess over first for an example to the other.

In less than a second Maud was by his side.

So far, then, all was well.

"Do you intend keeping upon the highway to-night?" asked Maud, with some trepidation.

"I had not decided," was the reply, "but I think so, since my intention in coming out to-night is to meet with a good adventure if I can; and where am I so likely to succeed as upon the high-road?"

This was an unanswerable question, so Maud wisely remained silent.

Dick occupied the interval by listening keenly, for he could scarcely make himself believe that he had been deceived by some accidental sound.

Still he was unable to hear anything more

"Come," he said; "we will ride on quietly, and trust to chance to place something in our way"

Maud's excitement increased, and it was no wonder that it should do so.

Suddenly Dick raised his arm and pointed in advance.

"What is that?" he asked. "It is something white."

"A gate, I think," answered Maud.

"Yes, to be sure—I see it now distinctly. It is a turnpike."

"It is closed."

"Yes, you might expect it would be at this hour."

"Shall you venture to pass through?"

"I think so. I may be lucky enough to learn whether any officers are on the road to-night."

Maud offered no opposition.

Indeed, it would have been most unwise for her to have attempted to do so, since Dick must be allowed to be the best judge of what ought to be done in all cases.

A very few minutes enabled them to reach the toll-gate.

A dim light was shining from one of the windows in the tollman's little wooden dwelling.

"Gate—gate!" cried Dick, in a loud voice.

After a short delay the door was opened, and the toll-keeper made his appearance.

"Dang me!" he said. "I was just going to try to have a little bit of rest. I have been waiting here for more than an hour for some one to come to the gate."

"And has no one passed during all that time?"

"Not a blessed soul, sir."

"That's very singular, isn't it?"

"We used to think so, but now we are getting used to it."

"How so?"

"Why, the people are all in such a mortal fright about Dick Turpin and the rest of the highwaymen that they would rather do anything than travel after dark. I don't mind it much, for it gives us a little more peace."

"I suppose so," answered Dick. "And as we have disturbed you, take that for your trouble—I will call for the change some other day."

During the conversation just given, the gate had been unlocked and thrown open.

Dick slipped a guinea into the tollman's hand, who was far from expecting any such sum

But it developed in him a very great deal of latent respect and civility.

He touched his hat several times.

Just as Dick was riding off, he said:

"Don't be afraid to ride back at full speed, captain," he cried, with a meaning intonation of his voice. "You will find the gate wide open."

"All right! Thanks! Good night!"

"He knew you!" ejaculated Maud.

"He guessed who I might be, perhaps. However, I shall look upon that guinea as being particularly well laid out."

"But should you trust to what he said?"

"Certainly! I have gained so much and lost so little by trusting to people that I shall continue to do so. If I distrusted I could do nothing."

"It is fortunate no officers are on the road."

"It is. And yet, if what he says is correct, I may have a good deal more trouble in looking for an adventure than I at all anticipated."

"It is getting very dark."

"Very," said Dick, glancing up at the sky. "We shall have some rain, perhaps a heavy storm, before long."

This was anything but a comfortable prospect.

There was little doubt about Turpin's words coming true.

Since their departure from the inn, immense masses of clouds had rose and thickly covered over the whole face of the firmament, causing the densest darkness to prevail.

The wind moaned and whistled, too, among the rustling tree-tops with that peculiar and unmistakable sound so often heard before a storm.

Every now and then Maud would shiver and draw her cloak more closely around her, for the air was in truth very keen.

Still, Dick journeyed on with a resolute air, as though he by no means intended that the elements should interfere with his night's sport.

"Hark!" he said again. "Surely I cannot be mistaken this time?"

"No," said Maud, "I can hear a horse approaching."

"Yes, and only one. Depend upon it, this will prove a lucky adventure, as we can make sure nothing but some urgent business would induce anyone to be abroad at such an hour as this."

The traveller came on at a steady rate, as though he had a long journey before him.

Dick came to a halt.

"Now, Maud," he said, "place yourself in the shadow of this hedge. There, that will do, and on no account must you move until I come back to you. If I feel sure you are here I shall retain my calmness. If you venture forth, it will so discompose me that my adversary will be able to take every advantage of it, and the worst may happen."

"I promise," said Maud, who was terrified to death at the thoughts which Dick's words had suggested—"I promise faithfully to remain immovable. Don't let that disturb you, but for my sake do—do be careful of your safety!"

"I will, depend upon it!" said Dick, who now rode slowly on towards the approaching traveller.

When he judged himself close enough, Dick increased his pace.

Somewhat to his surprise, the traveller did so likewise, as though he was anxious to bring about a meeting as quickly as possible.

Dick was still more surprised at finding that this stranger, beyond all doubt, rode directly towards him, and manifestly in a most aggressive manner.

This was something altogether unaccountable and unprecedented.

But Dick's state of wonderment did not prevent him from holding on his course with his accustomed steadiness.

Another half-dozen paces brought himself and the stranger face to face.

"Stand," said Dick, in a resolute tone of voice—"stand! No trifling! Hand over what valuables you have about you!"

The stranger stopped at once.

But instead of seeming affected by the highwayman's demand, he burst into a loud, coarse-sounding laugh.

"What!" he exclaimed, "you're not on the toby lay, are you? That's a joke now! I was just going to cry 'Stand and deliver!' to you, for I was fairly out of patience with waiting. I have positively been riding up and down here for the last two hours without catching sight of anyone but yourself; and as for money, I only wish I had a trifle about me; if I had, you would not see me here in the cold."

"But—but," ejaculated Dick, who was considerably taken aback by this address, "you don't mean to say you are a highwayman?"

"Nothing more nor less," responded the man, with another laugh. "What do you say—shall we join together, and try whether fortune will favour us?"

"No, no," answered Dick, somewhat hastily—"you go your way and I will go mine."

"As you like," was the reply, given with another laugh. "Good night! and I hope you will have better luck than I have met with at present."

"Good night!" said Dick, who was more annoyed at this encounter than he liked to admit even to himself.

The highwayman rode on somewhat smartly in the direction of the toll-gate.

Dick repaired to the spot where he had left Maud.

He found her trembling slightly and full of anxiety to know the result of the adventure.

"Why—confound the fellow!—he had the impudence to tell me he was a highwayman."

"A highwayman?" ejaculated Maud.

"Yes; and what is more, he declared he was about to cry 'Stand!' when I forestalled him."

Maud could not help smiling.

"What a harsh, disagreeable laugh he had!"

"Very. But come on, we will venture to try fortune a little further."

"Did you feel that?"

"What?"

"That drop of rain."

"No; but now I do, though."

Dick Turpin might well say this.

The first drop which Maud had felt seemed to be the immediate precursor of a thousand others, for such a violent descent of rain now ensued that was altogether unparalleled in Dick's experience.

In less than a moment they were both nearly drenched to the skin.

"Confound it!" Turpin said. "Nothing but misfortune! What could be more unfortunate than this? You should have stayed at the inn, Maud, and then you would have been spared this wetting."

"But I should have been separated from you, and that, in my thinking, overbalances every other consideration."

Dick could not be displeased at this speech.

But he was determined that Maud should suffer no more from her devotion to him than he could possibly help.

By the aspect of the elements, he could tell that the rain would continue to fall for a considerable length of time.

Consequently, he began to look about him for a shelter of some kind, to which they could betake themselves until the violence of the rain had to some extent abated.

He had not been looking long before he caught sight of a light glimmering at some distance in advance.

Nothing could have been more welcome to his eyes than this.

He accelerated his speed instantly.

"Come, Maud," he cried, "we will try to get under cover for a few moments at any rate."

Upon drawing nearer, he discovered that the light proceeded from one of the windows in a comfortable-looking old roadside inn.

Upon seeing this, he paused for half a moment, for he was doubtful whether it would be altogether safe or expedient to attempt to gain an entrance here.

But he had the word not only of the tollman, but of the highwayman as well, that there had been no one whatever on the road for a considerable length of time.

It was consequently rather unlikely that he would be recognised by the people keeping the inn, for, to the best of his belief, Dick had never been in this part of the country before.

This consideration induced him to run the risk of taking shelter for a time.

The clatter of their horses' feet, as they drew up beside the long wooden horse-trough, quickly brought the landlord and ostler to the door.

"A roughish night, sir," said the former, saluting Dick—"but just such weather as I expected we should have."

"We will stay here awhile," said Dick, "if you can accommodate myself and my wife with a private room."

"Certainly—certainly!" was the brisk reply. "Step this way, if you please."

Dick was on the ground in a moment, and assisted Maud to alight with a rapidity that astonished the two lookers-on.

"Leastways, sir," continued the landlord, as he ushered his guests across the threshold, "it's not exactly a private room, but I have no doubt it will answer your purpose quite as well, if you do not think of making a long stay."

"Let us see it."

"Yes, yes—certainly! Be good enough to follow me. This way, if you please."

With an abundance of obsequiousness, the landlord conducted our two friends along the passage of the inn and into a room in which a bright fire was burning cheerfully, and which most certainly was not a private one, inasmuch as several persons were sitting in it, engaged in the agreeable occupations of smoking, drinking, talking, and warming themselves at the fire.

The landlord crossed this apartment, and opened an inner door leading out of it.

Dick and Maud followed him as closely and as quickly as possible, in order to escape the curious regards which were bent upon them.

The chamber into which the landlord conducted them could not be called otherwise than a very comfortable one.

There was a fire burning, a lamp was lighted, and a general air of that comfort and cleanliness for which, as a rule, country English inns are so celebrated, pervaded everything.

"This will do, sir, I suppose?" said the landlord.

"Oh yes, very well! I will just follow you out to the back, to see where the horses are put——"

"Oh, sir, there is no occasion for your taking that much trouble, I assure you! I will make a point of attending to them myself."

"Thanks!" persisted Dick; "but there are some little matters in the holsters of which I stand in need, and these I should much prefer fetching myself."

"Oh, by all means! You can follow me this way—there is no occasion to go through the front room."

The landlord now opened another door, which Dick had not yet had time to perceive.

It communicated with the back part of the premises.

Dick was very glad to see it, for it seemed to promise him an avenue for speedy escape in case circumstances should arise to render flight necessary.

"I shall not be a moment, Maud," he said, with a peculiar smile. "Remain here till I return."

With these words upon his lips, he followed the landlord into a kind of kitchen, by means of a door in which they gained access to the yard.

The stables were close at hand.

Dick had only made an idle excuse when he mentioned the holsters, but still it sufficed to furnish a plausible reason for wishing to pay a personal visit to his horses in the stable.

When he entered, the ostler was engaged in removing the trappings.

"Stay!" cried Dick—"it is not worth while to do that, for I shall only stay here a very short time. Just loosen the girths and take the bits out of their mouths—you need not trouble yourself to do anything more."

The man at once desisted, and proceeded to fetch the corn, a greater quantity of which was put into the manger than probably there would have been had Dick not been present.

Dick fumbled at the holsters, and then said:

"Give them both a good rub down, my man, and have them ready at the time I want you. I sha'n't forget you."

"All right, sir."

So saying, Turpin hastily ran after the landlord into the house, for the rain seemed to be coming down faster than ever.

"Bring a bottle of wine," he said.

"Very good, sir—a drop of the best?"

"Yes, the very best your cellar can afford—the price will not be out of my reach."

The landlord made a more obsequious bow than usual, while he wished that such customers as Dick were only a little more common.

Maud was glad to see Dick return.

"It is rather ridiculous," she whispered, "to call this a private room."

"Why so?"

"Because don't you see that formerly this and the next both formed one room, and now they have been divided by a very thin wooden partition, which does not reach to the ceiling. We are private so far as being free from being seen, but every syllable can be overheard."

"No matter," said Dick, though he was not very well pleased, nevertheless. "We shall not be here long, so it is not worth while to make any fuss about it."

They were interrupted at this moment by the entrance of the landlord carrying the bottle of wine.

"There," he said; "when you taste that you will say it is not such wine as ordinarily falls to a traveller's share. In fact," he added, in a confidential whisper, "I bought it for my own drinking."

Dick fancied Maud looked somewhat pale and languid, so he said:

"Have you anything at hand tempting to the appetito?"

"As luck will have it, I have; for you must know, sir, that a sale will be held here to-morrow, and a cold dinner is to be provided. We are cooking the things now, and I feel pretty certain there are some beautiful boiled chickens just ready to take out of the pot."

"The very thing!" cried Dick. "Be quick, and bring one here!"

The landlord vanished.

Maud smiled, and murmured:

"It is very kind of you, Dick, to be so thoughtful."

"Tut, tut—nonsense! But what a nuisance that noise is."

The noise to which Dick referred proceeded from the adjoining room, and was caused by the persons who were sitting there talking all together in a loud voice.

But Dick soon saw this was an advantage, for it prevented any conversation between Maud and himself from being overheard.

"We ought to think ourselves most fortunate in falling into such comfortable quarters. I assure you it is far more than I ventured to expect."

Just as he spoke, the landlord again entered, carrying before him on a tray about as tempting and appetising a meal as could well be placed before any hungry travellers.

There was a beautiful boiled chicken, with some white home-made bread and other necessary etceteras.

"There!" the landlord cried—"though I say it, that is a meal for an emperor. Is there anything else you require?"

"Nothing, I think."

"If there is, just pull that bell-wire, and I will be with you in a moment."

So saying, to the relief of both our friends, he quitted the room.

Maud and Dick both laid aside as much of their apparel as they could, and hung it on some chairs in front of the blazing fire.

Then they both sat down to discuss the meal.

Ere they had partaken of more than three or four mouthfuls each, both heard a sound which caused them to stop simultaneously in what they were about.

That sound was the trampling of a horse's feet.

Nearer and nearer came the sound.

"Who is that?" asked Maud.

"Hush—hush!"

Just as Dick pronounced these two words, the clattering of the horse's hoofs abruptly ceased.

It was evident that some one had pulled up with great haste and suddenness in front of the inn.

CHAPTER MXLIX.

CONTAINS THE SEQUEL TO DICK TURPIN'S STRANGE ADVENTURE.

Maud started to her feet, with alarm visibly depicted upon every feature of her face.

"Hush—hush!" said Dick again. "Be still—oh, be still!"

"But who is it?"

"That I cannot tell—perhaps nothing that concerns us. At any rate, let us remain here where we are until we hear something further."

The people in the adjoining room had evidently heard the fresh arrival, for they became hushed and silent, listening in expectation of learning who it was.

The murmuring of voices was heard without.

Then a door was thrown open, and a heavy footstep sounded in the passage.

This footstep came nearer and nearer to the door of the room in which the company was sitting.

Upon the threshold he paused, and after fumbling a moment with the latch, flung the door open.

His appearance was greeted with a universal cry.

"Hullo, Craddock!" said two or three at once. "What ever brings you back here again? We thought you had gone for good."

The reply was a laugh.

That laugh made Turpin start.

He had heard it before.

There could be no mistaking the loud, coarse tones. It was a laugh which, once heard, could be always remembered.

Dick was in no sort of doubt whatever as to the identity of the new-comer.

It was the man he had stopped so short a time before upon the road, and who had declared himself to be a highwayman.

It struck Turpin as being very strange, though, that he should be so well known by the inn guests.

He waited somewhat impatiently to hear more, in the hope of having all his speculations set at rest.

"You are surprised," cried the new-comer, laughing again; "but I am not, I assure you. I wish I had taken old Boniface's advice; I should then have escaped this drenching. But, then, you know a landlord never wants to lose sight of a good customer. He told me it would rain, and, my eyes and limbs, don't it!"

"So it made you turn back?"

"It did, and I account myself a wise man for having done so. Why, except the toll-gate, there is not a dwelling to be met with for the next fourteen miles."

"You did right," said the landlord, joining in the conversation. "If you had gone on you might have met with highwaymen, and so lost all you have about you, and you know well it is no trifling amount."

"Highwaymen?" said the new-comer, in a voice expressive of the utmost contempt and scorn. "Why, I don't care a tinker's d—n for a whole regiment of them! I have never been robbed yet, and never shall, I dare be sworn! Let us come to the fire."

There was the peculiar sound made by moving chairs quickly across a bricked floor, and then it would seem that the wet traveller got close to the fire to dry his clothes.

"Ah, Mr. Craddock!" said the landlord, in a serious voice, "it's all very well to talk like you do, and let me tell you that you are by no means the first I have heard make such remarks; but, recollect, they everyone came to grief in the end, and so will you some fine day or other, despite your boldness."

"Have your own way," replied Mr. Craddock, for so we may as well henceforth designate him, since it would appear that this was his name. "Every man knows his own know best. But I tell you again, I hope I may live till I am robbed, and then I shall be assured of a good long life."

The confidence with which these words were pronounced is indescribable.

Dick listened with all his ears.

All that he had heard since the stranger's arrival had been in the highest degree enigmatical.

[DICK TURPIN HAS HIS REVENGE UPON MR. CRADDOCK.]

Being so deeply interested in the whole matter as he was, the impatience with which he waited to listen to the rest may possibly be imagined.

He felt certain that he had yet something of importance to learn.

"We shall see," was the answer made by the landlord to Mr. Craddock's last speech.

"So we shall. Just hark how the rain comes down!"

"But how is it," inquired some one, "that you consider yourself so free from what almost everyone else is so liable to?"

"Ah, that is a secret!"

"And one worth knowing."

"I should think so."

The last words were accompanied by one of the speaker's boisterous laughs.

"But surely you will not be so unjust and so unchristian-like as to keep it to yourself?"

No. 225.—BLACK BESS.

"Indeed, but I shall though!"

"Then, there, I think, you are wrong. You ought to allow your friends to participate in it at least."

"But were you ever stopped, Mr. Craddock?" inquired another of the company.

"You mean by a highwayman?"

"Yes."

"Then I have."

"Many times?"

"Yes."

"When was the last?"

"To-night."

"To-night?" echoed the interrogator, amid a general expression of the utmost surprise.

Mr. Craddock laughed again.

Dick thought more boisterously than ever.

"You need not look so incredulous," he continued. "I can assure you it is neither more nor less than the truth."

PRICE ONE HALFPENNY.

No. 226 will be Published next Thursday.

"But pray let us hear more about it. You have now inflamed our curiosity to the very utmost. Do you really mean to say that you have been stopped to-night by a highwayman, and that you have brought back all your money?"

"I have. Here it is. Hark!"

Mr. Craddock slapped his pocket as he spoke.

"We are amazed! Did you shoot the fellow?"

"No. We parted in quite a peaceable and friendly manner."

There could be no doubt that Mr. Craddock was amusing himself in no inconsiderable degree at the expense of the company assembled.

There was a brief silence after this, and Mr. Craddock was the first to break it.

"Landlord, you shall bring me a bottle of that rousing old port of yours. I'll be d—d if the rain has not chilled me to the very bone!"

"Then let me tell you, Mr. C., that you could not have anything better than my port in such a case," replied the landlord as he left the room to execute the pleasant commission.

All the guests were now literally devoured with curiosity to hear some details of that highway adventure which Mr. Craddock treated with such extraordinary coolness.

Dick Turpin having by this time quite satisfied himself that he had no particular danger to apprehend, sat down to his meal again and motioned to Maud to follow his example, which she did very willingly.

But no words were exchanged, because of the probability that Mr. Craddock would overhear Dick, and would then most likely recognize his voice.

The wine was presently brought; and from the sounds which reached his ears, Dick concluded that Mr. Craddock had sat down near the fire to enjoy it.

"Shall you stay here all night now, sir?" the landlord inquired.

"Not unless the rain compels me to do so. It comes down now as fast as ever, doesn't it?"

"Faster, if possible."

"Ah, well! If it leaves off I shall depart, for my business is important, and I ought to be some miles further on my road than I am. Gentlemen all, I drink to your good healths!"

The jingling of glasses followed.

"Come, Craddock, old boy," said some one, who to the best of Dick's recollection had not yet spoken, "don't be so unreasonable as to keep this matter to yourself. Tell us, and if you like we will undertake to say that it shall go no further."

"Yes—yes!" cried several voices in response.

"I suppose I shall know no peace if I do not satisfy you, and yet I am afraid I shall be parting with a very valuable secret without any recompense; perhaps I may live to repent it."

"No—no," said all those present who over and over again asseverated that whatever he said should be treated with the utmost confidence.

Of course they imagined themselves quite alone, for the excitement under which they laboured made them altogether forget the presence of the two travellers they had seen enter the adjoining chamber.

"You promise well," said Mr. Craddock, at length, "and if the secret goes no further, it will not matter."

"We assure you it shall not."

"So you said—so you said. But you must please to understand that there is something more in store for you than the mere gratification of your curiosity, for the revelation I am about to make will enable you to defy the power of all highwaymen just in the same way that I do."

This announcement of course had the effect of making them all, if possible, more ardently desirous to hear the disclosure.

"I have heard," began Mr. Craddock, "that a very wise man once remarked that the cleverest and most successful schemes are the simplest; and if this observation holds as good in every case as it does in this, it is true indeed."

This preliminary speech was listened to with sundry manifestations of impatience.

"My scheme is certainly the simplest of the simplest," he went on, "and it will be best explained by relating to you what took place just after I left the inn here this evening. I never make any alteration; and you may, if you choose, adopt the plan with as much ease and with the same good result as myself."

"We are all attention."

"I know that," responded Mr. Craddock, with another of his hoarse laughs; "and what is more, you are burning to hear the next words I have to say."

"Well, we confess it; and now keep us in a state of anxiety no longer."

"I will not. Well, when I set out from here I had not got far before I heard a horse approaching. 'Hullo,' I says to myself, 'I wonder who's coming!'

"Well, I went along very quietly, for I more than half expected what this horseman was, as few people would be out on such a night unless compelled by necessity, or unless to rob some one else.

"In a short time I saw a man.

"He was riding slowly towards me, and by his very manner (for I have had some experience in these matters, let me tell you) I could tell this was a highwayman, and that he intended to call upon me to stand and deliver.

"Such being the case I resolved to adopt my never-failing plan, so I quickened my horse's pace and continued to ride direct towards him.

"When I got a little nearer, this fellow called out to me to stop, speaking in what he thought was doubtless a very intimidating tone of voice, but which made no impression at all upon me.

"On the contrary, as soon as he had finished speaking, I began to laugh as though I was heartily enjoying some capital joke.

"This considerably puzzled the highwayman, as it has done every one of the order upon whom I have tried the experiment.

"'Why,' I exclaimed, 'do you really mean it? Why, I was just going to make the same demand of you.'"

"You said that to the highwayman?"

"I did, for my plan in these cases is nothing more than to pretend to be a highwayman myself. That does the business capitally."

"Well, and what happened next?"

"Why, he stared in astonishment, so I went on to tell him that I had been riding up and down the road looking for prey until I was out of all patience, and that I had been congratulating myself upon hearing somebody at last."

"And did he believe you?"

"He did."

"Well, we will take your word for it, but——"

"But what?"

"Why, we should scarcely have thought that a highwayman could have been so easily imposed upon."

"Ah, that's it! It is the very simplicity of the thing that does it. It is that alone to which it owes its success, though I do begin to believe that these highwaymen fellows are no better than fools."

"It would seem so, however, by your showing. I could scarcely have thought it."

"Nevertheless, I assure you it is a fact."

"And did he ride away then?"

"Yes, shortly after. I told him I was quite out of luck and not blessed with a single coin of the realm, and so I proposed that we should go partners with each other for the rest of the night."

"You—you had the impudence to say that?"

"I had."

"And what did he say?"

"Why, declined, of course; I knew very well that he would, which was the reason why I asked him. Ha, ha!"

"But suppose——"

"Suppose what?" asked Mr. Craddock, somewhat sharply.

"That he had agreed?"

"What, to join with me?"

"Yes."

"There was no fear of such a thing; but still, if he had, I should have trusted to my ingenuity to frame some excuse."

"It seems to me," said another voice, "that the plan is a very excellent one, and I shall not fail to adopt it if ever I have occasion, which I sincerely hope I shall not."

"It is no pleasant matter, I can assure you," remarked Mr. Craddock, "and by no means easy to preserve such a bold front as will deceive your adversary—in a word, you must play your part well."

"Of course," said the voice which had just before spoken. "It cannot be said that I shall fail for want of knowing the way these affairs are managed, for I have been robbed thrice."

"Do you mean to say you surrendered your property on every occasion?"

"I did, for there was always a pistol before me, and I reasoned thus: This wealth I am about to lose I can replace again; but if I lose my life, there will be no recovering that again."

"You speak like a philosopher," said Mr. Craddock, with a sneer.

"Do I? Well, my philosophy will not prevent me from adopting your stratagem, especially if I should be assailed upon this journey, for I have over three hundred pounds with me."

"And that would prove a serious loss."

"It would, in the present state of trade. However, my old friend Tompkins is going to ride with me, so we shall be able to personate highwaymen capitally."

"Perhaps Mr. Craddock would not mind accompanying us," said Tompkins; "we are going his road, you know."

"What time shall you start?"

"Not till after breakfast in the morning."

"Then you will have daylight, and consequently nothing to fear from highwaymen, for they are like owls—never seen by daylight. As for me, my business is too urgent to allow me to remain. I must be jogging on as soon as ever the weather will permit."

Bearing in mind that Dick Turpin heard the whole of the foregoing conversation, the reader may possibly be able to form some conception at the amount of annoyance he experienced.

To think that he, above all others, should have been tricked—deluded by so shallow a device.

He frowned and bit his lip, and every now and then, upon the utterance of some more than usually aggravating remark, he would start, and seem almost about to spring to his feet.

Maud could not help feeling some amusement at the chagrin which he displayed.

Certainly, it was enough to anger him in no ordinary degree.

But as he listened on, his face gradually assumed a very different expression.

Maud noticed it, and knew very well what it meant, for in a general way Turpin's countenance was as easily read by her as a book.

The expression boded no good to Mr. Craddock.

Indeed, before that very hilarious gentleman had brought his narrative to a conclusion, Dick had resolved upon what he should do.

His determination was that Mr. Craddock should no longer make a boast of his immunity from highway robbery.

Having thus, as we have said, decided upon his course of action, Dick became calmer, and even drank his wine with an air of complacent satisfaction.

What he had determined upon will appear in due course.

In the meanwhile he remained comfortable enough by the side of the roaring fire, complacently awaiting the pseudo highwayman's departure.

On the whole, while felicitating himself upon the manner in which he was about to avenge himself, Dick was not disposed to find much fault with the turn events had taken.

Quite unexpectedly, both Maud and himself had got into warm and comfortable quarters, for which both were grateful, and Maud especially.

It was getting very late before the rain showed any signs of abatement.

So great had been the downpour of rain that Dick heartily congratulated himself upon having escaped exposure to it.

"It's left off raining, I think," said Mr. Craddock, at length.

He rose from his seat as he made the observation, and going to the window, looked out.

"Yes," he exclaimed, "it's fine enough now. Let me have my horse, landlord, as soon as ever you can."

"I should advise and recommend you to stay till morning."

"No, no—I cannot afford the time."

"Well, have your own way. Your horse will be ready immediately."

With these words, the landlord quitted the room.

Maud now looked up, expecting that Dick would make some movement.

But she was disappointed, for he remained perfectly still.

After a brief delay, the horse was brought round to the front of the inn.

As soon as ever Mr. Craddock caught sight of it, he exclaimed:

"Good night, friends—or good morning, whichever you like to call it! Here's hoping you'll meet with a prosperous journey, and don't forget the secret. Above all, don't let the highwaymen guess what's o'clock, or the game will be spoilt for ever."

"Never fear—never fear!"

Mr. Craddock drained his glass and departed.

No sooner had he fairly left the premises than Dick rose quickly yet noiselessly, and motioned to Maud to be in readiness to follow him.

He then crossed the room to the door through which he had passed in company with the landlord on the occasion of his paying a visit to the stables.

This last-mentioned place was, of course, Dick's present destination.

He passed out unquestioned into the yard in company with Maud.

Ere they could gain the stable door, however, they perceived the landlord and the ostler coming towards them.

"Oh, sir," said the former, "I trust you have not wanted anything, and that you have not thought me neglectful!"

"Not at all—not at all!" responded Dick, heartily. "But as we only dropped in here for shelter, I am anxious, now that the rain is over, to be getting on the road again."

"Very good, sir! I am only anxious to know whether you are satisfied?"

"Very much so," answered Dick, with an air of great gusto. "And you may depend I shall not fail to recommend your inn to all my friends and acquaintances."

"I am much obliged to you, sir!"

In the meanwhile, the ostler had gone into the stable and brought forth the two horses.

Owing to the instructions which Dick had given, there was no time lost in preparing them for the road—the only thing requisite being to tighten a few buckles.

Nor did it take Dick very long to settle with the landlord, and, judging by that individual's appearance, it would seem that this had been done in a highly satisfactory manner.

Dick was indeed in a great hurry to be off, so without loss of time he assisted Maud to mount, and then sprang into the saddle himself.

He had a crown-piece ready to slip into the ostler's extended palm, and then he immediately set his steed in motion.

Maud followed him.

Upon reaching the high-road, Dick turned at once in the direction of the toll-gate, for, as the reader must already have surmised, it was his intention to pursue that highly-ingenious gentleman, Mr. Craddock.

He was careful not to ride over fast from the inn, lest by so doing suspicion should be excited.

No sooner had the first bend in the road been turned than he cried:

"Now, Maud, let us see what your horse can do! Forward—forward! The faster the better!"

There was no fear of Black Bess being left behind, so Maud urged her horse to the utmost.

It was really an animal of very good quality, and having just been rested and fed, it was in capital condition for speed.

Away, then, they flew along the level surface of the hard high-road, at a pace that made the hedgerows and trees literally seem to fly past them, and which made the rich colour mantle in the checks of both.

It was very unlikely that Mr. Craddock had made any such speed as this, so, after having proceeded some distance, Dick began to look about him, being under the impression that he ought by this time to be in sight.

It was by no means so dark as it had been, for the heavy downpour of rain had materially cleared the atmosphere, and already in the eastern sky there could be perceived some indications of the dawning of another day.

CHAPTER MI.

IN WHICH DICK TURPIN HAS HIS REVENGE UPON MR. CRADDOCK.

It was not until Dick Turpin paused upon the brow of a somewhat steep hill, and looked steadily before him, that he caught a glimpse of the individual of whom he was in pursuit.

Mr. Craddock was riding along at a very much swifter rate than when Dick had encountered him some hours previously.

Perhaps he was anxious to make up for the delay.

At any rate, there he was, and Dick felt that it was necessary for him to be prompt in his actions.

"Now, Maud," he said, speaking somewhat hurriedly, "you see that gentleman yonder? Well, I am going to overtake him and serve him out for deceiving me in the way he did; and what I want you to do in the meantime is to ride quietly after me so as not to be in danger. Do you understand me?"

"Perfectly."

"And yet do not press too closely after me as, if I should suddenly become aware that you were threatened with peril, the discovery would have the effect of paralysing my arm at the moment when it would be of the most service to me."

"Fear nothing on my account," was Maud's answer.

"If you act in accordance with my directions, all will be well."

Having settled this point, Dick gave Black Bess the rein.

Away she flew down the hill with a long, light, stretching gallop, like that of the greyhound.

Fast as Mr. Craddock was going, it must infallibly happen that he would be overtaken in the space of a few minutes.

Dick now, indeed, expected every moment to catch sight of him again, and presently, after passing round a somewhat sharp turn, he did so.

Mr. Craddock of course could not fail to hear that some one was powdering after him at a tremendous rate.

But the confidence he felt in his very clever plan, and the bold assurance that formed so strong and considerable an ingredient in his disposition, prevented him from feeling any uneasiness on this account.

He did just glance behind him to see who it was, but he did not increase his pace in the slightest degree.

"Hold!" cried Dick, in that loud, commanding tone which he could when he chose assume. "Pull up, I say, unless you wish to be brought to by a bullet!"

These words reached Mr. Craddock's ears and made him feel just a little uncomfortable, but without his knowing exactly why.

However, with an assumption of a great deal of surprise, he drew rein and wheeled about.

He recognised Turpin at once.

"Hullo!" he said. "Do we meet again? I hope you have had better luck than I have."

"Then you have your hope gratified," answered Dick, "for I assure you I have been very fortunate indeed."

"Have you really? Well, it's more than I have. The road this way has been quite deserted."

"Has it? Excuse me!"

Dick, as he spoke, placed himself in very close proximity indeed to Mr. Caddock.

"Hullo, sir! What do you mean?"

This exclamation was called forth by the sight of a pistol which Dick very calmly levelled at him.

"Stop—stop!" he continued, shrinking back, for he thought he could see quite down the barrel of the deadly weapon, and even catch sight of the bullet it contained—"stop, I say! What the deuce are you about?"

"You see this pistol?"

"Yes—rather plainer than I care about. Pray turn the muzzle of it another way."

"Nothing of the kind!"

"But I say you must, sir!"

"I decline!"

"Do you know who you are talking to?"

"Perfectly well. And I beg to assure you, in the first place, that when I say a thing I am invariably as good as my word."

"As bad, you mean!" said Mr. Craddock, endeavouring to get up another of his loud laughs; but the attempt was a perfect failure.

"As good or as bad—just whichever you like," continued Dick, imperturbably. "It comes to the same thing; and understand, that unless you quietly surrender to me all the money and valuables you have about you, this bullet shall find out whether you skull contains any brains or not."

"Take my word for it that it does. Don't attempt to discover it by any such means, I beg. But what do you want? What is the meaning of all this?"

"Simply that I require you to deliver over to me all the money you may at the present time be carrying with you."

"What!" ejaculated Mr. Craddock, "is this the way you observe honour among thieves?"

"Silence!" cried Dick—"no nonsense!"

"No, but surely dog would not rob dog. No, no—you don't understand, I feel sure. Would you without scruple deprive a fellow comrade of his spoil?"

"Certainly I would."

"Then you are a base villain!"

"I am content to be auything you like to call me," auswered Dick, "provided I get your money."

"But this is monstrous. For one highwayman to attack and rob a comrade is a thing unheard of."

"No more nonsense!" cried Dick, with greater sternness than he had as yet displayed. "I have certain knowledge of two things."

"May I ask what they are?"

"Yes. In the first place, that you carry with you a considerable sum of money."

Mr. Craddock was silent.

"And the second is, that your highwaymanship is neither more nor less than an impudent assumption—one which, though it may have served you hitherto, will assuredly fail you for the future."

Upon thus finding that his long-maintained cheat was discovered, Mr. Craddock shook a little in the saddle, and turned a trifle paler than he was before.

"I shall stand no nonsense!" Dick added. "You imposed upon me once, and I am determined not to be satisfied with anything but the whole of the property of a valuable character that you have about you; so if you wish to escape any disagreeable consequences, you will hand over the whole quietly, without making any more fuss."

There was no possibility of thinking that Dick was not in earnest in what he said.

Mr. Craddock, in spite of the large amount of assurance which he possessed, felt in his heart that Dick fully meant every word he said.

But for all that, he was most reluctant to part with any of his property.

This was not solely on account of the value of it, but because of the dread he had of the ridicule that would in future be poured upon him.

Still, what was he to do?

To oppose himself in single combat with the highwayman was what he never once dreamt of.

He was by far too prudent to risk his life upon such a desperate chance.

He looked around him as though for relief.

Unable to see anyone, however, or even to hear a sound indicative of the approach of assistance, he, with a heavy sigh, thrust his hand into his pocket.

He produced a purse containing only a few guineas.

This, with manifest reluctance, he placed in the highwayman's hands.

"I want more than this!" cried Dick. "Tell no lies about what you have. I may as well inform you that I overheard every word that passed between you and the people at the inn just down the road, for I happened to be in the adjoining room at the time."

Upon hearing this avowal, Mr. Craddock gnashed his teeth with rage, because he saw that his own mouth had betrayed him

If he had resisted the importunities of his friends, and kept the secret to himself, this humiliation would never have taken place.

"Come," said Dick, "my patience is exhausted. Just let me know whether you intend handing over the money yourself, or whether you prefer that I should take it from you by main force. Let me tell you that I am determined to have it by one means or other, so make your choice."

Once more Mr. Craddock's hand wandered to his pocket.

Once more he drew something forth.

This time it was something more worthy of Dick's acceptance, for it consisted of a very large bag of bank notes and gold, with which valuable contents it was crammed to repletion.

"Now the rest," said Dick—"I am resolved to have everything. And you ought always after this to esteem yourself a very lucky man for having got off so easily."

Mr. Craddock groaned.

Another bag was produced and surrendered.

His watch, rings, and indeed everything he had about him that was at all of a valuable character, followed.

"Now," said Dick, "you are at liberty to ride on. Be off with you, and the quieter you keep this little adventure the less you will be laughed at."

Mr. Craddock seemed glad enough to receive this intimation that he was at liberty to depart.

He at once struck his horse's flank with his heel and rode off.

Ere he had gone many paces, however, he wheeled round suddenly and raised his arm.

Rapid as the movement was, Dick saw it, and was as rapid in his own motions.

At the first glance Dick saw that Mr. Craddock held something in his hand, and intuitively guessed not only what it was, but what he intended to do.

He shifted his position with great suddenness.

At the selfsame moment there was a vivid flash and then a loud report.

But Dick, owing to the rapidity of his movements, escaped all injury.

A fierce feeling, however, instantly arose in his breast, for there was nothing which Dick so much detested as treachery, and nothing which filled him with so much resentment.

Without pausing to think, he started off in full pursuit.

Mr. Craddock saw him coming.

He had the mortification of finding that his shot had been wholly unavailing, and that the highwayman would not be satisfied until he had had his vengeance upon him.

Frantic with fear, he whipped and spurred his horse into a most furious gallop.

Black Bess put forth her extraordinary powers of speed, and consequently Dick Turpin soon found himself near enough to make his voice heard.

"Pull up!" he cried—"pull up, as you value your life! I owe you a shot, and if you disobey me I shall requite the obligation. Pull up, I say! My aim will be a better one than yours!"

But Mr. Craddock was in too great a state of terror to pay any attention to these cries.

If anything, he urged his horse to still greater exertion.

Dick's anger now was by no means so furious as it had been. Still, he was determined to have his revenge.

His pistol was raised, and now, taking a careful aim, he fired at the flying horse and rider.

The reader, however, must by this time know Dick too well to think that he was capable of so base an act as that of shooting a man down in cold blood.

His aim was correctly taken, and the bullet did its work, but it was at the horse he fired, and not at Mr. Craddock himself.

The effects of the shot, however, were not at the moment perceptible.

Very soon, however, the desperately wounded animal began to swerve and stagger, until finally, with a dull, heavy crash, it fell headlong to the earth.

Previous to the occurrence of this catastrophe, however, Mr. Craddock had surmised what was amiss, but he was unable to think of anything else but retaining his seat as long as possible.

When the horse fell, of course he was not taken at unawares, and consequently escaped without any serious injury.

But before he could recover his breath sufficiently to make the attempt to rise, Dick was upon him.

"Now, rascal," he cried, in a savage voice, "what reason can you offer to prevent me at once taking away your miserable life as a punishment for your treacherous act? I look upon you as a murderer—you are one in intent, and it was through no fault of yours that you failed to be one in reality."

His words put Mr. Craddock into a still more dreadful state of fright.

He fully believed that his last hour upon the earth had come, and therefore he began to utter prayers with extraordinary volubility.

"Rise!" cried Dick, with more fury than ever in his tones—"rise, I say! Disobey me at your peril!"

Shaking in every limb, Mr. Craddock slowly and with much difficulty raised himself to his feet.

"You deserve nothing but death," said Turpin, "but yet I do not intend to cheat the hangman; but you shall pay dearly for that treacherous shot!"

While speaking these words, Dick produced from his pocket a piece of thin but particularly strong cord.

Mr. Craddock eyed it with great misgiving.

His apprehensions increased when he saw Turpin deliberately set to work and make a running noose in the end of it.

He thought this surely must be intended for his neck, but he soon found that Turpin had quite another use for it.

Before he quite knew what was intended, he found the cord tightly encircling his right wrist.

"Now," said Turpin, "this way, and if you are a wise man you will not think of offering the least resistance."

Dick gave the rope a sharp tug as he spoke, causing it to cut rather deeply into the flesh.

"Murder!"

"Silence, will you! This way, I say!"

Mr. Craddock obeyed promptly.

Dick merely conducted him to the trunk of a large elm tree that grew by the roadside.

Round this our old friend rapidly passed the cord, and with remarkable dexterity secured the other end to his captive's left wrist.

Mr. Craddock was now compelled to clasp the tree in a very close embrace—much closer than was at all agreeable, for Dick drew the rope as tightly as ever his strength would allow him, totally disregarding the while the horrible howls with which the process was accompanied.

"There," he cried, when he had finished, "you are disposed of now, Mr. Craddock! And you may amuse yourself by cursing the tree, which is close enough to your teeth, until some one comes by who is willing to release you."

Mr. Craddock was now rendered so furious at finding himself in this ignominious situation that, without thinking of the consequences, he gave a snatch with all his might, thinking that he might by this means snap the cord.

But all he did was to force a cry of great agony from his lips, for the rope showed no signs of giving way whatever, and the force he had made use of cut his flesh almost to the bone.

"Try it again, my friend!" cried Dick, with a laugh. "You didn't half try that time! Take my advice, and give another good pull—you will be able to tell better then how strong the rope is."

Mr. Craddock cursed and swore horribly.

"It's no good," Turpin continued. "And what is more, you will not be able to deny having been robbed, as you might have done had you rode off quietly, as I was quite willing to allow you to do. It is all your own bringings on, and you have no one in the world to blame but yourself."

Mr. Craddock howled again.

"I have not done with you yet," his tormentor went on. "There shall be no mistake about the matter—I will take good care of that!"

Turpin's next proceeding was to open Mr. Craddock's own pocket-book, and upon one of the blank leaves in it he wrote these words:—

"Robbed this morning by Dick Turpin, who discovered the cheat so long practised, and therefore emptied his pockets. Afterwards, for a cowardly, treacherous shot, was tied by the said Dick Turpin to this tree, in order to afford him the opportunity of thinking over his present and future prospects."

The words Dick wrote in a large and certainly indifferent hand, but he took care to wet the point of the black-lead pencil at every letter, and to bear very heavily upon the paper, so that there should be no fear of any of the words being easily effaced.

This done, Dick pinned the paper on to the back of Mr. Craddock's coat, from whence, as he knew very well, he could not remove it himself.

"I will leave you now," said our old friend, after giving an approving glance at what he had done, "and I hope some time will elapse before anyone chances to make his way past this spot."

Mr. Craddock continued to swear in the most frightful manner, but this did not afford him the slightest aid in releasing himself from his bonds, though possibly his angry feelings were somewhat soothed by it.

Having now done all that he intended, Dick leisurely mounted Black Bess, and rode towards the spot where Maud was waiting for him, for she had faithfully observed his injunctions, though she had nevertheless been a witness of all that had taken place.

"Oh, Dick," she ejaculated, as soon as he was near enough to hear her voice, "you are sure you were not injured by that treacherous shot?"

"Not in the least, I assure you," was the reply. "And I feel comfortable now, because I have paid him for it in a style which he will not easily forget."

"Shall you leave him where he is?"

"Certainly I shall! Of course, before many hours elapse, some one will pass by and release him."

"And what was that you wrote?"

Dick told her.

Maud looked grave.

"Surely," she said, "that was most unwise!"

"Why so?"

"Why? Because now they will have certain knowledge of your presence hereabouts."

"It does not matter," he replied. "It is my intention to quit the inn. I cannot make up my mind to remain any longer in a place for which you manifest so much aversion."

"But there are other things to be considered besides my fancies."

"It may be so, but your inclinations shall not be wholly disregarded for all that."

"What is it, then, you think of doing next?"

"Why, getting down somewhere in the neighbourhood of the place we have agreed to visit."

"Stonehenge?"

"Yes, I believe we shall be safer there. At any rate, we shall be more miles from London, which is to us the seat of danger."

Against this proposition Maud had not a single word to say.

Not only was she most anxious to quit the ill-omened roof of the inn for ever, but she fully and entirely believed that they would be in more safety if their distance from London was increased.

Maud was not a little surprised, though at the same time she felt gratified in a very high degree, at finding Dick so observant of her comfort and happiness.

Moreover, she fancied that of late she had detected, not only in the accents of his voice, but also in his glances, a greater amount of tenderness than he had ever before displayed.

She was too delighted in making this discovery to think of speculating upon the feelings and causes which had given rise to it, but she was conscious of the existence of a greater amount of happiness in her breast than she could remember having possession of before.

By this time it had begun to grow quite light, and therefore Maud rather anxiously inquired of Dick whether it was his intention to retrace his steps.

"Very shortly," he said. "But first of all, I expect to have a little bit of game arrive in a few minutes—a chance which I would not miss on any account, for not only does it promise some sport, but I feel certain it will turn out profitable. Hark!"

While he was addressing these words to Maud, our hero had caught the sound of horsemen approaching.

A moment's listening convinced him that he had not been mistaken.

"Now, Maud," he exclaimed, "once more retire into the shadow of this hedge, and I will ride on to meet them."

"Be careful."

"I will indeed."

"Promise me," said Maud—"promise me that you will continue to think favourably of what I assure you is the darling wish of my heart, and that which will serve to make my happiness complete."

"I will, but bear in mind that much money will be required."

"Alas!" she sighed, "there is that obstacle."

"But the amount will soon be less than it is even now, for the booty I hope to obtain in a few moments will prove no inconsiderable one. But promise me not to quit your place of safe shelter."

"I promise."

"And I, too, promise," said Dick, with that tenderness in his voice and eyes which it so thrilled Maud to listen to and see. "I will make a promise, and it is that if my companions will give their consent, we will quit England for good as soon as ever an opportunity displays itself."

"Are you quite sure—quite in earnest?" she asked, with her eyes brimming with the tears that excess of joyfulness had called there.

"Quite. I cannot stay to say more, or the chance will be lost."

In good truth, Dick had permitted the approaching horsemen to come very near to where they stood, for the clatter of hoofs now overpowered every other sound.

As he spoke the last words, however, Dick galloped down the road towards the travellers.

As for Maud, she felt so overcome with happiness as scarcely to be conscious of where she was, or what Dick was about.

She did, indeed, find it hard to believe that she had really heard the words which had just been spoken.

It seemed far more likely that she was the victim of some extraordinary delusion, for hitherto, when hoping that Dick would quit his dangerous profession, she had not been able to conceal from herself that she was in reality hoping against hope.

She could not be dreaming.

There around her lay the usual features of an English landscape.

The light early morning breeze was rustling among the topmost branches of the trees.

The first rays of the new-dawning sun were beginning to glint upon the more lofty objects with which she was surrounded.

No, no, it was no dream and no delusion—for she could hear still the beat of horses' hoofs.

Suddenly, however, the sounds ceased and the distant murmur of voices floated to her ears.

CHAPTER MLI.

CONTINUES TO RELATE DICK TURPIN'S ADVENTURES.

Leaving Maud to bear with the suspense which she had to endure as best she might, we will, as usual, follow in the footsteps of the highwayman.

Ere he had gone many yards he caught sight of two mounted men approaching, who, upon seeing him, discovered certain signs of uneasiness and irresolution.

Dick was sure that they were no other than those friends to whom Mr. Craddock had confided his very valuable secret, and who had agreed to put his ruse into practice.

Our hero was rather curious to see how they would manage the matter. It was scarcely to be expected that they would succeed as well as the originator of this very clever idea, because they were not in possession of so great an amount of impudent assurance.

"Hold, gentlemen," cried Dick, placing himself directly in their path—"hold—hold, I say! You cannot proceed any further on your journey until you have transacted a little business along with me."

They came to a standstill without any hesitation, and at the same moment Dick produced a pistol, which had upon them a decidedly uncomfortable effect.

"Now, gentlemen," Dick went on, after having satisfied himself that his weapon was in perfect readiness for instant use, "there is no reason why you should be delayed many minutes upon your journey, for all I require of you at the present time is the whole of the articles of a valuable nature—money included—which you carry with you. When you have placed that in my hands you are at perfect liberty to ride off—no further molestation will be offered you, I assure you."

The extraordinary coolness of this speech seemed to dumfounder the travellers.

Some moments elapsed before they were able to move, or to remember what it was they had agreed to do.

During this interval Dick sat in the saddle, considerably enjoying their utter state of bewilderment.

"Come!" he said, when he considered he had waited long enough. "My patience is entirely exhausted; and though I don't wish to proceed to extremes, yet I must assure you that if you do not comply with my request unhesitatingly, I shall be compelled to use force."

"But, my dear sir——"

"Well?"

"We—we—we are——"

"Highwaymen!" gasped the second, finding that his companion's utterance failed him, and would not allow him to pronounce the important word.

"Yes—we are both highwaymen ourselves," said the first, jerking out the words all at once in the most comical way imaginable.

"Are you indeed!" ejaculated Dick.

"We are."

"Then I am glad to hear it."

"Glad to hear it?"

"Yes, because a highwayman will never refuse a request made to him by one of his comrades; and as I am badly in want of cash for a particular purpose, of course you will not object to place your pockets quite at my disposal."

Upon hearing these words the two travellers stared blankly at each other.

This was something for which they were not in the least prepared, and they fervently wished Mr. Craddock had been a little more explicit, and told them what he should have done under such circumstances.

"Silence, I presume, in this, as in other cases, denotes consent," pursued Dick. "As I am in a hurry, be good enough not to keep me any longer waiting."

"My dear sir——"

"Yes, my very dear sir——"

"As dear as you like."

"What a joke—what a capital joke! Ha, ha! Do you see the joke? Ha, ha! Capital!"

"Yes, capital," muttered the other, trying hard to force a laugh.

"Then, excuse me," interposed Dick, "you have both considerably the advantage of me, for I am forced to confess that I don't see any joke at all."

The artificial merriment of the two travellers subsided into absolute amazement.

"I must be plain and straightforward with you," said Dick, at length. "I see I am obliged to be so."

"Yes—yes."

"Well, then, let me tell you that I happened to overhear all that passed at the inn between Mr. Craddock and yourselves. Ha, ha! I can see a joke now! Can you?"

If they did see it they certainly did not seem to appreciate it in the slightest degree, for they sat on their horses' backs as though they had been changed from humanity to stone.

"I don't want to come to hard measures," Turpin went on; "but I am determined to possess myself of all the valuables you carry, and I leave you to make your choice whether you quietly surrender them to me, or whether you will compel me by main force to take them from you. In either case the result will be the same."

"No—no! Dear, good, kind sir, have mercy upon us!"

"I intend to be merciful."

"Thanks—many, many thanks!"

"But for all that, I intend to have your cash, so hand over before my patience is worn out!"

Both groaned heavily.

Dick raised his pistol.

"I shall count nine," he said, "and if, by the time I have finished doing so, you do not begin to show me the contents of your pockets I shall have to bring the services of this little tool into requisition."

The sight of Dick's holster pistol—he had purposely selected the most terrifying one he had with him—made them shake in their shoes for dread.

Dick began to count in a very deliberate tone of voice.

"Stop—stop!" cried one, as Dick cried "Eight!" "I cannot stand this any longer!"

So saying, he dived his hand into his pocket.

Dick extended his left hand, allowing the reins to fall upon the neck of Black Bess, for he knew very well she would stand still without any restraint.

This first traveller produced a very stout pocket-book, which was crammed so tightly that it seemed in danger of bursting.

It slipped into Dick's pocket with the greatest celerity.

"Now then," he cried, "follow on with your purse, your loose cash, and your watch! Be quick, for time is precious!"

The traveller looked around him with a glance so ludicrously despairing as would provoke a smile from almost any beholder.

But there was no one near at that early hour.

Finding that it was vain to resist, and that he had no other resource save compliance, the traveller made a virtue of necessity, and emptied all his pockets, satisfying Dick that there was nothing left in them by turning each successively inside out.

Having finished with him, he next turned to his companion, who, of course, now was not in a position to think of offering resistance of any kind.

Refusal was out of the question, so he followed the example of the other in every respect, though he accompanied every one of his actions with many heavy groans and dismal shakings of the head, not even putting up with his loss with as much calm philosophy as his associate.

"And now," Turpin exclaimed, "I should just like to make a remark or two before we separate. In the first place, if you will take my advice you will never try this trick again, or, if you do, rehearse the part you have to perform much better, otherwise you will infallibly be known not to be highwaymen at the very first glance."

"I never will," muttered one, in a tone that was conclusive as to his sincerity.

"Nor I either."

"Then as for your very ingenious friend, Mr. Craddock," continued Dick, "I have some interesting information to give you concerning him."

Upon hearing this, the pair pricked up their ears.

"He tried his plan upon me, but I need scarcely tell you he found it of no avail, and in the end he had to clear his pockets of every article."

"Did he indeed?" they ejaculated, with evident satisfaction.

No doubt it was some solace to them, under the circumstances, to be made aware that their friend, after all his boasting, had not been able to escape.

"Just at the present time," Dick went on, "he happens to be so situated as to stand in need of your assistance, and if you ride down the road you will doubtless see or hear something of him. If he denies having been robbed, ask him to pay the gate just below here, and then you will know whether he speaks the truth or not."

With these words, Dick abruptly wheeled his mare round and galloped off before the travellers could recover themselves from their bewilderment.

Maud greeted Dick with a glad smile.

"No more adventures now," she cried.

"None; I have succeeded much better than I could have dared to anticipate. I have capital booty, which I have been lucky enough to obtain with very little risk and difficulty."

"And now you purpose returning to the inn."

"I do. Force your way through that gap. We will make our way across the fields, as by that means we shall save a mile or two."

Maud gladly enough complied, for now that it was daylight, she was most anxious for Dick to get back to the inn, for which place she by no means felt so much repugnance during daylight as at night.

As soon as the open meadows were gained, she looked about her with apprehension, for she was quite at a loss to imagine how it was that during the whole of the past night they had not once been interrupted by their foes, and therefore now naturally dreaded to catch sight of them.

Nothing, however, save the fair and smiling face of the open country met her view, and she began to indulge in the hope that they would be successful in reaching their destination unmolested.

Her mind being thus relieved upon this point, her thoughts naturally averted to what Dick had said to her respecting his accedence to her request.

"It seems too much happiness to be realised," she said, with a deep sigh. "I fear, somehow, I know not why, that it can never be."

"Nonsense, Maud; banish such fears as those—they are unworthy of you. Nevertheless, I don't scruple to tell you that I have been weak and foolish enough to be influenced by a vague presentiment of some coming ill; and without knowing why, I feel assured that if your wishes are carried into execution, a great calamity will be avoided."

These words struck a cold chill to Maud's heart, which seemed as though it had been plunged into ice, thus freezing up her life blood at its very source.

"Do not call any such feeling weak or foolish, Dick, but rather believe it to be some delicate instinct warning you of some hidden approaching danger. Let me beseech you not to disregard the whisperings of such an inward monitor."

"I will not," replied Dick—"I will not for your sake. At present, your life has been sacrificed to me; I can see by your wasted frame, your haggard look, the dulness of your eyes, and numerous other indications, how much the wild life you have so long led has told upon you. I wonder you have borne up so well as you have, for you were never fitted by nature for so many hardships."

"And yet I have been happy, Dick—quite happy in your love, and therefore quite content to bear all, and even more."

"But you shall be happier—of that I am quite determined. Now, when I see the ravages which have been wrought in your beauty, your countenance is a reproach to me; but it shall be so no longer."

Maud wept freely.

"Cheer up!" cried Dick—"let me implore you to cheer up! Our arrangement with Tom Davis and the rest must be carried out; but by the time a month has expired I trust we shall be safely on some bark taking our last look of the shores of England."

There was something saddening even in this.

In particular Dick felt how hard he should find it thus to exile himself from the land where he had passed so busy a career.

"Come," he cried, for he felt no inclination to pursue the subject further, "urge on your horse, Maud! The sooner we reach the Jolly Tar the better."

Upon this point it was impossible that any diversity of opinion could exist.

As before, Maud pushed her horse to the utmost speed he was capable of making, and Dick kept easily by her side.

The only interruption they met with in the course of their long ride was of so slight a character as scarcely to be worthy of the name.

It was while they were crossing a meadow of considerable extent.

Suddenly a loud voice was borne upon the air.

Looking behind them, they caught sight of a man mounted upon a very sturdy-looking roan cob.

He was alone, so whatever apprehensions our friends may have felt instantly subsided.

Seeing that he had attracted their attention, this individual waved his arms about in a very wild and extraordinary manner, while at the same time he bawled out something at the very top of his lungs.

But he was too far off for the purport of the words to reach Dick's ears.

"What does he want?" asked Maud.

"I fancy he is telling us that we are trespassing upon his property. He looks like a farmer, or landholder, or something of that sort. By his violent gesticulation I fancy he wants us to turn back."

"And we are not likely to do that."

"Decidedly not. Push on faster, for as I live he is actually foolish enough to give us chase!"

Whether Dick's supposition was correct, or whether this stranger suspected who they were, is hard to say.

At any rate, he flogged his pony unmercifully with a stick he carried, and made him gallop over the turf at an astonishing rate.

It was quite out of the question, though, that he should succeed in overtaking Black Bess.

Such a thing would be too ridiculous.

Nevertheless, so good was the speed made by the pony, that it was not until they had crossed two more fields that they lost sight of him.

The cross-road now lay before them, and they made their way into it easily by means of a gate which Dick alighted and opened.

About the rest of their journey there was no difficulty whatever.

The Jolly Tar had always occupied a very lonesome situation, and now, in consequence of the dark deeds which had taken place in it, the vicinity was more shunned than ever.

Tom Davis, however, was awaiting their return with very great impatience and anxiety.

He shook his head as soon as he caught sight of them

"I can't think it wise, captain, to venture back here by daylight in this manner. You are sure to be seen."

"It was unavoidable. Have the others returned?"

"Claude and Jack have."

"Not Tom King?"

"No."

"That is strange!"

"Very; and yet he may have had the prudence to conceal himself somewhere rather than run the risk of making his way here by daylight."

Dick could not fall in with this supposition.

He knew where Tom had gone, and it seemed far more probable to ascribe his absence to the fact of his having got into some serious trouble.

Of this private conviction, however, he uttered not one word.

At this moment Claude and Jack made their appearance at the back window of the inn.

They had stationed themselves on their return in the "look-out," for so they called that upper chamber, from which, as we have already informed the reader, they could obtain a view in any direction.

Dick soon discovered that his apprehensions concerning Tom King were fully shared in by his comrades.

There was just the hope that what Tom had said was correct, and this they had perforce to cling to during the whole of the day.

They determined to wait for him until midnight, and then, if he did not make his appearance, to come to some resolution as to how they should act.

The excursion of Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack on that night had not been marked by an adventure of any particular or unusual character.

But they were successful in so far as the purpose for which they set out was concerned.

A good booty had been secured, and with very little trouble.

In one of the cross-roads the highwaymen had encountered a covered waggon—one of that kind in which people at that time often rode from place to place.

They guessed at once the nature of the load carried by the waggon on this occasion, and by threats compelled the driver to stop his team and to sit on his high seat without offering any opposition or resistance.

The people in the waggon were easily terrified into submission.

We have formerly stated that people who could afford another mode of conveyance often chose one of these waggons as holding out a greater prospect of safety than a stage-coach.

In the present instance our friends were so fortunate as to meet with an old avaricious fellow, who preferred to ride in a waggon not only on account of the reason just given, but because it was so much cheaper.

Although he at first declared he had nothing whatever, Claude made a search—a thorough one—and the result was the discovery of a large bag of money.

With this booty they rode off, leaving the man almost frantic at the loss of that which he actually prized above his own life.

The particulars of this adventure having been related, the whole of our friends betook themselves to rest, adopting the plan which on a previous occasion we in full described.

The approach of night was waited for with great impatience, and when it began to grow dusk the anxiety of all was so great that they, without exception, repaired to the look-out, hoping shortly to catch sight of their absent comrade.

The hours passed slowly and wearily, until at length Dick Turpin, consulting the watch he had taken from Mr. Craddock—which was a valuable repeater—announced that the hour of midnight had arrived.

But although they both looked and listened, they neither saw nor heard anything of Tom King.

CHAPTER MLII

TOM KING LEARNS HIS FUTURE DESTINY.

We go back to our old friend Tom King, who was left in anything but comfortable circumstances, although the narrow escape he had just had from death made them more endurable than they would have been otherwise.

But Tom was most moved by the hapless fate which had befallen his companion, and he renewed his search again and again in the hope of discovering something of him.

All was in vain, however.

If the unfortunate stranger had really made his egress in the same manner as our friend, he must have been carried away completely by the stream, and this, judging from the nature of the place, seemed hardly probable.

The idea which fixed itself in Tom's mind was, that

No. 227 will be Published next Monday.

the subterranean stream might at some point have branched off into two directions, one leading to the open air, the other conducting to some of those mysterious recesses of the earth of which the stranger had himself so graphically spoken.

Supposing this hypothesis to be correct, Tom had still further cause to congratulate himself upon the good fortune which had attended him.

Other and more pressing matters, however. now called upon him for immediate attention.

The loss of his horse must be repaired, and then his next and most important step was to make his way back to the place where he knew his friends were so anxiously expecting him, and make them acquainted with the success he had met with in the prosecution of the enterprise upon which he had been despatched.

But many difficulties stood in the way, which by many would have been deemed well-nigh insuperable, and yet which Tom thought but little of.

His first care was, if possible, to ascertain whether the police officers who had so nearly secured him, and who would infallibly have done so but for their own overreaching cupidity, were in the vicinity.

Tom's own opinion, formed after a careful survey of the place, was that they must be on the other side of the rock, unless, indeed, they had ventured to pass beneath the archway in a boat; then it would be hard indeed to say what had become of them.

After reconnoitring for some time, the coast seemed perfectly clear, and Tom having by this time recovered the use of all his limbs, and who felt that the proper circulation of his blood had been restored, at once turned his back upon the scene of this adventure, now intent upon obtaining his first necessary—a horse.

How he was to obtain one seemed in the highest degree mysterious, for he did not happen at that time to possess the sum of money that would be requisite for the purchase of one.

It is true that in some of the meadows around him he might have found an animal to answer his purpose, but then he would have been short of all the trappings—a deficiency, of course, which anyone not similarly situated to himself could easily have supplied.

While pondering over these matters Tom's attention was arrested by a light which he perceived dimly twinkling at some distance in advance.

At first being uncertain as to the source from whence the illumination proceeded, he advanced with considerable caution until he found that the light in question streamed from the side window of a roadside inn.

This discovery seemed to have the effect of causing him to feel with additional acuteness the discomfort of his present condition.

The imaginary prospect of a glowing fire and some blood-warming beverage arose most temptingly before him, and so strong was the effect produced that he found the inducement to enter was irresistible.

Accordingly, he approached with a more rapid step; but before he ventured to enter he peeped cautiously into the room from which the light was shining.

This he was able to do easily, for there was no curtain to obstruct his vision—the light, indeed, thus suffered to shine forth proving a beacon to many a belated traveller, who but for it might have wandered past the inn.

Tom found that he was looking into a room that evidently, from its character, was set aside for the accommodation of the public.

Straight before him was the hearth, upon which a huge wood fire was blazing, giving out so much light that the rays of the lamp were almost made invisible.

At this moment the room was occupied only by one individual, who sat with his back to the window and his face to the glowing embers, so that Tom was not able to note him very distinctly.

By his dress he would seem to be a gentleman.

From such a one as this Tom not unnaturally thought that he had little or nothing to apprehend, and so without further hesitation he advanced to the front door of the inn, opened it, and entered.

The noise which this occasioned had the effect of bringing the alert and attentive landlady forward.

But Tom had accurately noted the situation of the door communicating with the room into which he had peeped, and he opened it without ceremony.

The landlady followed him across the threshold.

"Good evening," said Tom to her, advancing to the fire and nodding to the traveller who sat there. "You see, I have been so unfortunate as to get a ducking this cold night."

"Dear me, sir, so you have! What shall I do? How did it happen?"

"Why, curse it, it is not my only mischance to-night—I have lost my horse as well!"

"Lost your horse?"

"Yes; I wanted the confounded brute to leap a stream, which I am convinced he could have done easily enough, but he jumped short, and we both fell into the water."

"Was it near here, sir?" asked the stranger, who had looked at, and listened to, Tom with great attention.

"A mile or so," was the answer. "I cannot describe the exact spot, for I am a stranger in the locality. But what was worst was that I found the current so strong I could scarcely resist it. Being a good swimmer, though, I gained the shore, and strove to rescue my steed; but in the meantime he had floated to a great distance—to a place where the velocity of the current had so increased that he was carried along like a feather; and in spite of all my endeavours I had the mortification of seeing him drift under a rocky arch that leads I know not where—I should fancy into the bowels of the earth."

"I know well the spot which you describe," observed the traveller; "but it is considerably more than a mile from here. You may consider yourself lucky in having escaped with your own life. Had you passed beneath that arch you would never have been seen or heard of on this earth again."

"The gentleman says truly," added the landlady; "and you must consider yourself fortunate in having escaped so well."

"I do," answered Tom, with a smile, for he was thinking of the officers.

"But, dear me," continued the landlady—"here I am rattling to you in this fashion, and not thinking that those wet clothes will give you your death of cold. Let me show you to a bed-room, where you can remain until all your things are dry."

"Nay, nay—it does not matter. If you will bring me some boiling-hot brandy-and-water I will dry myself by this blazing fire. It is not the first time that I have been soaked to the skin, and without having the advantage of any fire at all. Perhaps, sir," Tom added, addressing the traveller, "you would favour me so far as to join me in discussing a glass hot and strong?"

"I have no objection—none in the world."

"Then, landlady, let us have two glasses with all possible speed. In the meantime I will make myself comfortable."

"You had better take my advice, sir."

"No, no—I shall do best here. Be quick, for I am cold without and within."

Tom hastily removed his upper clothing and hung it near the fire, and then warmed himself thoroughly.

"I think you are running a great risk," said the stranger, who had sat watching him for some time in perfect silence.

"It is nothing," answered Tom, carelessly. "I have seen hard service in my time, and have become inured to all these hardships."

At this moment the landlady reappeared; and after the exchange of some conversation, with which it is needless to trouble the reader, she again quitted the apartment.

By this time Tom began to feel very comfortable in his new quarters.

"What vexes me most of all," he remarked to his companion, "is the loss of my horse, which could not have taken place at a more unfortunate moment. I am anxious to reach a place some miles from here before daylight, and how I am to do it completely puzzles me."

"I think I can get you out of your difficulty."

"In what way, sir?"

"Why, at the present moment I happen to have a horse in the stable here which will just suit you, and which I am willing to part with for a reasonable sum."

"I am much pleased to hear you say as much," responded Tom King, with great heartiness. "It has relieved me of an immense amount of uneasiness."

"I am delighted to hear it!"

"You could not confer a greater favour upon me than by allowing me the opportunity of making this purchase," said Tom. "And if you have no objection we will, after we have drained our glasses, pay a visit to the stable."

"With all my heart!"

It may seem strange that Tom should manifest so much readiness to purchase a horse at a time when he had no means of paying for it.

Either he forgot the state of his exchequer, or else he had devised some plan for dispensing with the necessity of payment.

The pair sat together for some little time—the stranger insisting upon two more glasses being brought, and Tom did not wish to leave until his clothing was completely dried.

The stranger, too, had an object in calling for more brandy—he believed he should be enabled to drive a better bargain.

But he had got the wrong person to deal with.

The glasses at last were emptied, and they rose and repaired to the yard, Tom's apparel being now quite dry and comfortable again.

The traveller was in excellent spirits, doubtless in consequence of the largeness of the profit he was about to make.

Some little delay took place in arousing the ostler; but at length that individual made his appearance, carrying a large stable lantern.

By the aid of the article last mentioned Tom made a tolerably good examination of the horse, which, so far as he could tell, was of an average good quality, and free from blemishes and faults.

"What do you think of him?" asked the traveller, somewhat anxiously.

"Why, I believe he will suit me admirably."

"I feel sure he will. Have him led out into the yard, you will be able to judge better of him then."

To this proposition, of course, Tom King did not for a moment dissent, and accordingly the steed was led out.

In his own mind our friend thought, possibly, that the animal might be worth twenty guineas, and the trappings five guineas more.

"There is only the price," he said—"I should like to know the price."

"Well, I shall not have many words about that," was the reply. "It is a good beast, and suits me very well, and I only part with him for your accommodation. The price is one hundred guineas."

The traveller made this extortionate demand with some trepidation, showing that he had a certain amount of conscience left.

He fully expected that Tom King would make some remark upon the price; and the stranger was, as the reader will readily believe, prepared to make a considerable abatement; but, to his surprise, Tom never opened his mouth or seemed in the least astonished, which was more than the ostler did, for upon hearing so monstrous a sum demanded he grinned from ear to ear.

The next feeling in the stranger's mind was that of disappointment.

He actually wished he had asked more, for Tom's behaviour impressed him with the idea that it would not have been deemed too much.

"I like him," Tom remarked, at length. "The price is high; but then one must expect to pay for an accommodation according to its value. Now, I would rather pay a thousand pounds than not reach my destination at the time appointed."

"Then you think we may say the matter is settled?"

"Well, nearly so. I confess, if you have no objection, that before paying for him, I should just like to try him for a hundred yards or so. I have no doubt I shall be satisfied with him, however."

"Of course you will."

The stranger hesitated a little about allowing Tom a trial, but he was afraid to refuse, lest by doing so he should altogether lose the capital bargain he believed he was about to make.

"What do you say?" asked Tom, observing his indecision.

"Oh, I don't mind! Ostler," he said, "just fetch the saddle and bridle!"

These articles quickly made their appearance, and in a few seconds the horse was fully caparisoned.

"He looks all the better now," observed the owner, patting his horse upon the neck, though when he performed the action he did not know it would be for the last time.

Tom was in the saddle in a twinkling, for he felt by no means assured that the stranger would not alter his mind.

He walked quietly out of the inn-yard into the road, and then, having seated himself to his satisfaction, trotted off.

As he receded the stranger felt very uneasy.

He watched keenly, but Tom King rode on in the most careless manner.

The traveller's anxiety had reached its highest pitch—he was, indeed, about to give utterance to a shout, when Tom turned back again.

Oh, what a relief that was!

Our friend, with an amount of audacity of which few would have dreamed, let alone put into practice, rode back to the front of the inn.

"Well," ejaculated the stranger, "what do you think of him now?"

"My opinion has undergone no alteration."

"I rejoice to hear it. I assure you you become his back excellently. Don't he, Jack?"

"Ra-ather!" responded the ostler, who was the individual appealed to.

"Well," exclaimed Tom, gathering the reins in his hand, "it seems we are all of one opinion. Good night to you both! The settling can stand over till another day."

Just as he pronounced these words, the highwayman gave his new-found horse so sharp a dig with his spurs that the animal, snorting with pain, first reared upright, and then, with a tremendous bound, set forward on his journey.

Simultaneously with that bound came four distinct and different sounds, which, uniting, swelled into a horrible and discordant chorus.

Of course we shall be compelled to mention these sounds separately, leaving the reader to imagine what the effect would be when they were all heard together.

The first was a dreadful kind of whooping howl, which came from the traveller's lips upon realising that his horse was gone for ever.

The second was a loud shout from the ostler, who regretted the loss of his own fee more than he did the abduction of the traveller's horse.

The third was a shrill scream from the lips of the landlady, who had been brought to the front door of the inn by curiosity, and who witnessed with horror the decampment of one whom she had set down in her own mind as being a perfect gentleman.

The fourth and last was a loud burst of laughter given utterance to by Tom King, who was mightily amused at the success of his stratagem and the dismay occasioned by it.
